HUMFREY

BISHOP of LONDON,

Lord Almoner to His Majesty, and one of the Lords of His most Honorable PRIVY COUNCIL.

My Lord,

Though the Nobility of this Great Nation can need no other Patronage, besides that of their own Merit; yet this Edition of theirs is due to Yours; being an effect of that truly publick Re-spect in your Piety and Prudence for the managing of his Writings, and consequently of his Reputation: Which, I hope, Your Lordship will find notably Beautified by the Additions and Alterations herein made, having been so careful to follow the Authors own Copies, that this diligence is all I have to own in the Work, and to accept this Address from

THE PREFACE TO THE READER.

OF this Worthy Author and his ſeveral Works, ſo Large an accompt is already given by the accurate Writer of his Life, that there remaineth little for the gleaning of a ſecond hand: Only, to ſumme up thoſe particulars into this one general, That what before was excellent in each part, is now become more perfect and more uſeful in this Conjunction; which may ſerve for a Body of Divinity: The chief Heads whereof are briefly, plainly, and methodically laid down in the Practical Catechiſm; And then, thoſe points which daily uſe, or the iniquity of the Age, hath made more neceſſary to be inlarged on, are further purſued in the ſeveral Diſcourſes following: And where this alſo is not ſufficient to charm the Spirit of contradiction, they are more fully cleared and vindicated by large Defences in the next Volume.

Now, though this Catechiſm were at firſt the product of his diligence in the inſtruction of his own Pariſh, yet may it ſerve for an Index to the Learned, as well as an Introduction for the more ignorant: And being firſt publiſhed by the perſwaſion, and with the Preface of Doctor Potter, Provoſt of Queens College, which the modeſty of the Author left out in the later Editions; it may not be amiſs to let the Reader ſee the Judgment of that Worthy man, both of the deſign, and the performance: Which he gave in theſe words.

Be not forgetful to entertain ſtrangers, for thereby ſome have entertained Angels unawares, ſaith the Apoſtle to the Hebrews. We have many ſhifts to ſave our Almes; This is a Counterfeit, that an ordinary vagabond, another a ſturdy Beggar; But he that relieves all, will undoubtedly meet with ſome object of his Charity, that may make amends for the reſt of his promiſcuous bounty.

Thou, whoever thou art, that art ſo Charitable to the teeming Preſs, that nothing which it brings forth, eſcapes thy bounty; if, like the man in Lucian thou buyeſt all, and unlike him in this, thou readeſt all too; thou wilt find upon a review of thy purchaces, incountring ſuch a prize as this, that thou haſt entertained an Angel indeed, that will make thee recompence for the reſt of thy unneceſſary profuſion: in truth a pearl of that rich value, that will amply pay thee for the barren field of writers thou boughteſt to compaſs it. Perhaps, my dear affection to the great piety and learning of the Author, may make me ſay that, which his exceeding humility and incomparable modeſty will not be pleaſed to hear; For none hath ever better written or practiſed a Catechiſm: none better taught, or better loved Self-denyal than himſelf: Yet my comfort is, when I have ſaid all I can ſay of it, my conſcience aſſures me, I do not prevaricate: I cannot tell how it may be valued by others, (for though we have but one Truth, we have many ſides) I know how it ought to be, I know how it is by me, whom not only with King Agrippa's ὀν ὀλίγῳ but with S. Paul's ὀν πολλῷ not almoſt, but altogether, I hope, it hath perſwaded to become a Practical Chriſtian; perſwaded, did I ſay? 'tis too narrow an expreſſion, ὑ γὰρ με εἰς πειθὼ, ἀλλ' εἰς ἔκ ſ ασιν ἄγει παῦτα τὰ ὑπερφυᾶ, at the reading hereof methinks with S. Paul, I am caught and rapt up beyond the pitch and ſtature of theſe poor ſublunary things below, counting all, as indeed they are, but σκύβαλα, noyſome things, in reſpect of theſe high and precious truths taught by this Author. And I humbly beſeech God, that it may have the like energy in the breaſts of all that ſhall read it, that we may have leſs talking, leſs writing, leſs fighting for Religion, and more practice; that when our great Lord and Maſter comes, he may not find us ſo talking, ſo writing, ſo fighting; but ſo doing. Quod faxit Deus.

Dr. Potter dyed March 3. 164½.

If ſuch an Elogy were then due to that firſt draught, from a perſon of that Piety and Learning, which his Life and Writings have witneſſed to the World; What might we have expected, if he had lived to ſee it thus poliſhed and perfected by his laſt hand, and thus attended by theſe accurate Diſcourſes?

Of which we need ſay no more in particular, but that, in the Additions (which are many, and in ſome places, large) and the Corrections, we have been ſo careful to follow the Authors Copies, that even where the ſenſe did plainly ſeem to require another reading, we have rather choſen to mention it in the margin, than to alter any thing in the Text without the Authority of his own hand.

Laſtly, To the ſeveral Titles of theſe Diſcourſes we have added the ſeveral years when they were firſt made publick: For that the full underſtanding of moſt Books depends upon the Occaſion of their writing; and that, upon the ſtate of Times and Things when they were written; by which the meaning of many paſſages, the ſeaſonableneſs of others, and even the truth of ſome, muſt be judged. The concerling whereof, by the fraud of thoſe that think to make their Merchandice more ſaleable by the ſeeming newneſs, is oftentimes no ſmall wrong both to the Author and the Reader, the one being miſunderſtood, and the other miſled, for want of ſome ſuch honeſt Advertiſement.

TO

TO THE READER.

THE end of Christs Incarnation, Humiliation, and Death it self, being by St. Paul designed to be the Redeeming us from all iniquity, and purifying to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works; and the end of his Resurrection being by St. Peter set down proportionable to that, to bless us in turning every one of us from our iniquities; and the design of Christ's own Sermons, when he was in the World, being to make our Righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Pharisees, and so in effect the reformation of lives, and heightning of Christian Practice to the most elevated pitch, being the one onely design of all our Christianity: It must needs be matter as of terrour, so of astonishment also, a most direful Prodigy, a most ominous fatal Prognostick in these last days, that Christians have so quite unlearnt their Master, made their lives such a continued contradiction and confutation of all his methods, such a frustration of all his aims; that the principles of Christian Purity and Meekness, and Mercifulness, and Peaceableness, should (not only of old among Julian's Souldiers, but even now among Christian Professors, among those that make good all the formal outward part of Disciple-ship, that have had Christ's eating and drinking daily among them, and teaching in their presence) be perfectly abandoned and rejected, even with reproach and scorn, out of all their thoughts; yea, that the declination of Christian practice should be at last so great as to tear up the very root and foundation, I mean all natural, moral justice and honesty, and in place thereof to set up a new body of Carneades his Philosophy, in stead of those old Heathen dry principles of Integrity and Uprightness, that one Law of Interest, and Passion, and self-preservation. So that as Machiavel thought Religion would emasculate and infeeble Common-wealths, we have more reason to complain, that it hath debauched and corrupted lives: and, were it not that God hath been pleased to preserve a scattered remnant, a few in every Nation, to be the Records, as it were, from whom it may be seen what Christianity is able to do, if it may be hearkned to; were it not that there are a few ancient Primitive spirits, by whom, as by a standard, all others may and ought to be reformed; we have reason to think and say, that Christian-men are the impurest part of the World; that Satan's after Game hath proved more lucky and prosperous to him than his first designment did, that his Night-walk hath brought him more Proselytes, than his unlimited range of going up and down to and fro over the face of the Earth; that as sin by the Law, so Satan by the Faith of Christ, hath taken occasion, and so deceiv'd and ruined us most desperately, more universally, than by all the National Idolatrous customs of Heathenism he hath been able to do. What the one great error is, what the fundamental transcendent distemper that hath had all this inauspicious influence upon us, may perhaps be no great difficulty to discern. Is it not, that Christianity hath been taken, if not with the Atheist for an Art or Trick, yet with the Scholiastick for a Science, a matter of speculation; and so, that he that knows most, that believes most, is the only sanctified person? Is it not, that of the two sorts of things that belong long to another Life, Viſion, which is peculiar to that ſtate, is by men deſired to be anticipated and acquired here, and the love and purity which alſo belong to it, are taken for impertinent things, that we are not concerned in? Is it not, that the factions and animoſities which are thus begotten in us againſt all that are not of our opinions in Religion, are thought to be our duty, and our piety? And all our zeal laid out upon this one head, of hating and condemning of all others; and ſo, the love of many being grown cold, by a natural conſequence all kind of iniquity is increaſed? If this be not the bottom of the matter, if one (or more of theſe in conjunction) have not had the priviledge to engroſs all our ſin and ruin, yet ſure it hath been a mighty and a moſt peſtilent ingredient in it: and I ſhall venture to gueſs but at one more, ſome wreſting of Scripture to our own deſtructions, either by undertaking without a guide to underſtand difficult Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation, and accommodating them to the feeding of our own paſſions, making them to comply with our deſigns, whatſoever they are, (which next pretending to immediate Inſpirations and Enthuſiaſms, and ruling our ſelves not by the ſtanding Rule of Scripture, but by ſomewhat quite diſtant from that, whether we miſcal it ſpirit or conſcience, is the moſt infallibly pernicious) or elſe by miſtaking of ſome plainer places, and ſo ſwallowing and prepoſſeſſing our ſelves with ſome doctrines which directly incline to carnal or ſpiritual ſecurity, and then inſiſting more violently on them than on any other, making them marks of the moſt ſpiritual, ſanctified men, and ſo able to excuſe thoſe trifles of vicious life, that ſuch pious Profeſſors may poſſibly be guilty of. What theſe Doctrines are, I ſhall not in this place particularly define, but rather labour (by inſtilling thoſe diſtant principles which moſt naturally, and directly, and immediately tend to Chriſtian practice) to prevent or Cure thoſe Poiſons. This, and nothing but this, is entirely the deſign of this enſuing platform; which being again reviewed, hath received ſuch alterations and increaſes as ſeemed moſt conducible to the ends to which it was firſt deſigned, and having now attained the juſt growth, hath more reaſon to expect the benefit of the Reader's Prayers, the bleſſing influence of Heaven upon him and it. The Lord remove all prejudices and reſiſtances, which may foreſtal or obſtruct the deſired fruits and effects of it.

H. HAMMOND.

THE

THE LIFE OF THE Most Learned, Reverend and Pious Dr HENRY HAMMOND.

Written by JOHN FELL Dean of Christ-Church, and Lord Bishop of OXFORD.

DOctor Henry Hammond, whose Life is now attempted to be written, was born upon the 26 of August in the Year 1605. at Chersey in Surrey, a place formerly of remark for J. Cæsar's supposed passing his Army there over the Thames, in the Enterprise upon this Island, as also for the entertainment of Devotion in its earliest reception by our Saxon Ancestors; and of later Years, for the Charity of having given burial to the equally pious and unfortunate Prince King Hen. VI.

He was the youngest Son of Dr. John Hammond Physician to Prince Henry, and from that great Favourer of meriting Servants and their Relations, had the honour at the Font to receive his Christian Name.

Nor had he an hereditary interest in Learning only from his Father; by his Mothers side he was allied both unto it and the Profession of Theology, being descended from Dr Alexander Nowell, the Reverend Dean of St Paul's, that great and happy Instrument of the Reformation, and eminent Light of the English Church.

Being yet in his long Coats, (which heretofore were usually worn beyond the years of Infancy,) he was sent to Eaton School; where his pregnancy having been advantag'd by the more than paternal care and industry of his Father (who was an exact Critick in the learned Languages, especially the Greek) became the observation of those that knew him: for in that tenderness of Age he was not only a Proficient in Greek and Latine, but had also some knowledge in the Elements of Hebrew: in the later of which Tongues, it being then rarely heard of even out of Grammar Schools, he grew the Tutor of those who begun to write themselves men, but thought it no shame to learn of one whose knowledge seem'd rather infus'd than acquir'd; or in whom the learned Languages might be thought to be the Mother-Tongue. His skill in Greek was particularly advantag'd by the conversation and kindness of Mr Allen, one of the Fellows of the Colledge, excellently seen in that Language, and a great assistant of Sir Henry Savile in his magnificent Edition of St Chrysostom.

His sweetness of Carriage is very particularly remembred by his Contemporaries, who observ'd that he was never engag'd (upon any occasion) into fights or quarrels; as also that at times allowed for Play, he would steal from his fellows into places of privacy, there to say his Prayers: Omens of his future pacifick temper and eminent Devotion.

Which softness of temper his Schoolmaster Mr Bust, who upon his Fathers account had a tender kindness for him, lookt upon with some jealousie; for he building upon the general observation, that Gravity and Passiveness in Children is not from discretion but phlegme, suspected that his Scholars faculties would desert his Industry, and end only in a laborious well-read non-proficiency: but the Event gave a full and speedy defeat to those well-meant misgivings; for he so improv'd that at about thirteen years old he was thought, and (what is much more rare) was indeed ripe for the University, and accordingly ingly ſent to Magdalen College in Oxford. * Not long after his being ſetled in the College he was choſen Demie; and though he ſtood low upon the Roll, by a very unuſual concurrence of providential Events, happen'd to be ſped and admitted in the year 1622. and though having then loſt his Father, he became deſtitute of the advantage which potent recommendation might have given, yet his merit voting for him, as ſoon as capable, he was choſen Fellow.

* His Entry upon the publick Matriculation Book, is not till June 26. 1621. but it has always been cuſtomary for young Students to neglect the Univerſity Regiſter, till they begin to look towards their Degree.

Being to proceed Maſter of Arts, he was made Reader of the natural Philoſophy Lecture in the College, and alſo was employed in making one of the two Funeral Orations ſpoken on the highly-meriting Preſident Dr Langton.

Having taken His Degree, he preſently bought a Syſteme of Divinity, with deſign to apply himſelf ſtraightway to that ſtudy: but upon ſecond thoughts he returned for a time to Humane Learning, and afterwards, when he reſum'd his purpoſe for Theology, took a quite different Courſe of reading from the other too much uſual, beginning that Science at the upper end, as conceiving it moſt reaſonable to ſearch for primitive Truth in the primitive Writers, and not to ſuffer his Underſtanding to be prepoſſeſt by the contrived and intereſſed Schemes of modern, and withal obnoxious Authors.

Anno 1629. being twenty four years of Age, the Statutes of his Houſe directing, and the Canons of the Church then regularly permitting it, he entred into Holy Orders, and not long after he took the degree of Batchellor in Divinity, giving as happy proof of his proficiency in Sacred, as before he had done in Secular knowledge. During the whole time of his abode in the Univerſity he generally ſpent thirteen hours of the day in Study; by which aſſiduity, beſides an exact diſpatch of the whole Courſe of Philoſophy, he read over in a manner all Claſſick Authors that are extant; and upon the more conſiderable wrote as he paſſed, Scholia and critical emendations, and drew up Indexes for his private uſe at the beginning and end of each Book: all which remain at this time, and teſtify his indefatigable pains to as many as have perus'd his Library.

In the year 1633. the Reverend Dr Frewen, the then Preſident of his College, now Lord Arch-biſhop of York, gave him the honour to ſupply one of his courſes at the Court; where the right Honourable the Earl of Leiceſter happening to be an Auditor, he was ſo deeply affected with the Sermon, and took ſo juſt a meaſure of the merit of the Preacher thence, that the Rectory of Penſehurſt being at that time void, and in his gift, he immediately offer'd him the Preſentation: which being accepted, he was inducted on the 22th of Auguſt in the ſame Year; and thenceforth from the Scholaſtick retirements of an Univerſity Life, applied himſelf to the more buſie Entertainments of a rural privacy, and what ſome have call'd the being buried in a Living: and being to leave the Houſe, he thought not fit to take that advantage of his place, which from Sacriledge or ſelling of the Founders Charity, was by cuſtom grown to be prudence and good Husbandry, but left the Colledge with the ſame integrity that he had lived in it.

In the diſcharge of his Miniſterial Function, he ſatisfied not himſelf in diligent and conſtant Preaching only; (a performance wherein ſome of late have phanſied all Religion to conſiſt) but much more conceived himſelf obliged to the offering up the ſolemn daily Sacrifice of Prayer for his people, adminiſtring the Sacraments, relieving the Poor, keeping Hoſpitality, reconciling of differences amongſt Neighbours, Viſiting the Sick, Catechiſing the Youth.

As to the firſt of theſe, his Preaching, 'twas not at the ordinary rate of the Times, an unpremeditated, undigeſted effuſion of ſhallow and crude conceptions; but a rational and juſt diſcourſe, that was to teach the Prieſt as well as the Lay-hearer. His method was (which likewiſe he recommended to his Friends) after every Sermon to reſolve upon the enſuing Subject; that being done, to purſue the courſe of ſtudy which he was then in hand with, reſerving the Cloſe of the Week for the proviſion for the next Lords-day. Whereby not only a conſtant progreſs was made in Science, but materials unawares were gain'd unto the immediate future Work: for, he ſaid, be the Subjects treated of never ſo diſtant, ſomewhat will infallibly fall in conducible unto the preſent purpoſe.

The offices of Prayer he had in his Church not only upon the Sundays and Feſtivals and their Eves, as alſo Wedneſdays and Fridays, according to the appointment of the Rubrick; (which ſtrict duty and miniſtration when 'tis examined to the bottom will prove the greateſt objection againſt the Liturgy; as that which, beſides its own trouble and auſterity, leaves no leiſure for factious and licentious meetings at Fairs and Markets) but every day in the Week, and twice on Saturdays and Holiday Eves: For his aſſiſtance wherein he kept a Curate, and allow'd him a comfortable Salary. And at thoſe Devotions he took order that his Family ſhould give diligent and exemplary attendance; which was the eaſilier perform'd, it being guided by his Mother, a Woman of ancient Vertue, and one to whom he paid a more than filial Obedience.

As to the Adminiſtration of the Sacrament, he reduced it to an imitation, though a diſtant one, of Primitive frequency, to once a Month, and therewith its anciently inſeparable Appendant, the Offertory: wherein his inſtruction and happily-inſinuating Example ſo far prevail'd, that there was thenceforth little need of ever making any tax for the poor. Nay, (if the report of a ſober perſon born and bred up in that Pariſh, be to be believ'd) in ſhort time a ſtock was rais'd to be always ready for the apprentiſing of young Children, whoſe Parents condition made the proviſion for them an equal Charity to both the Child and Parent. And after this there yet remain'd a Superpluſage for the aſſiſtance of the Neighbour Pariſhes.

For the Relief of the Poor, beſides the foremention'd Expedient, wherein others were ſharers with him, unto his private Charity, the dedicating the tenth of all receipts, and the daily Almes given at the Door, he conſtantly ſet apart over and above every Week a certain rate in money: and however rarely his own Rent-days occurr'd, the indigent had two and fifty quarter-days returning in his Year. Yet farther, another art of Charity he had, the ſelling Corn to his poor Neighbours at a rate below the Market-price: which though, as he ſaid, he had reaſon to do, gaining thereby the charge of Portage; was a great benefit to them, who beſides the abatement of price, and poſſibly forbearance, ſaved thereby a Days-work.

He that was thus liberal to the neceſſitous Poor, was no leſs hoſpitable to thoſe of better quality: and as at other times he frequently invited his Neighbours to his Table, ſo more eſpecially on Sundays; which ſeldom paſt at any time without bringing ſome of them his Gueſts: but here beyond the Weekly treatments, the Chriſtmas Feſtival had a peculiar allowance to ſupport it. He knew well how much the application at the Table inforc'd the doctrines of the Pulpit, and how ſubſervient the endearing of his perſon was to the recommending his inſtructions, how far upon theſe motives our Saviour thought fit to eat with Publicans and Sinners, and how effectual the Loaves were to the procuring of Diſciples.

In accordance to which his generous freedom in Alms and Hoſpitality, he farther obliged his Pariſhioners in the ſetting of their Tithes and Dues belonging to him: for though he very well underſtood how prone men are to give complaints in payment, and how little obligation there is on him that lets a bargain to conſider the caſual loſs, who is ſure never to ſhare in a like ſurpluſage of gain; yet herein he frequently departed from his right, inſomuch that having ſet the Tithe of a large Meadow, and upon agreement received part of the money at the beginning of the Year; it happening that the profits were afterwards ſpoil'd and carried away by a flood, he, when the Tenant came to make the laſt payment, not only refus'd it, but returned the former ſum, ſaying to the poor man, God forbid I ſhould take the Tenth where you have not the nine parts.

As by publick admonition he moſt diligently inſtill'd that great Fundamental Doctrine of Peace and Love, ſo did he likewiſe in his private addreſs and converſation, being never at peace in himſelf, till he had procur'd it amongſt his Neighbours; wherein God ſo bleſt him, that he not only attain'd his purpoſe of uniting diſtant parties unto each other, but, contrary to the uſual fate of Reconcilers, gain'd them to himſelf: there having been no perſon of his Function any where better beloved than he when preſent, or lamented more when abſent, by his flock. Of which tender and very filial affection, inſtead of more, we may take two inſtances: the one, that he being driven away, and his Books plundred, one of his Neighbours bought them in his behalf, and preſerved them for him till the end of the War: the other, that during his abode at Penſehurſt, he never had any vexatious Law diſpute about his Dues, but had his Tithes fully paid, and not of the moſt refuſe parts, but generally the very beſt.

Though he judged the time of Sickneſs an improper ſeaſon for the great Work of Repentance; yet he eſteemed it a moſt uſeful preparative, the voice of God himſelf exhorting to it: and therefore not only when deſir'd made his Viſits to all ſuch as ſtood in need of thoſe his charities, but prevented their requeſts by early and by frequent coming to them. And this he was ſo careful of, that after his remove from Penſehurſt, being at Oxford, and hearing of the Sickneſs of one of his Pariſhioners, he from thence ſent to him thoſe inſtructions which he judg'd uſeful in that Exigent, and which he could not give at nearer diſtance.

For the inſtitution of Youth in the Rudiments of Piety, his Cuſtom was, during the warmer Seaſon of the Year, to ſpend an hour before Evening-Prayer in Catechiſing, whereat the Parents and older ſort were wont to be preſent, and from whence (as he with comfort was uſed to ſay) they reaped more benefit than from his Sermons. Where it may not be ſuperfluous to obſerve that he introduced no new form of Catechiſm, but adher'd to that of the Church; rendring it fully intelligible to the meaneſt capacities by his explanations. It may be uſeful withal to advert, that if in thoſe times Catechetical inſtitution were very ſeaſonable, 'twill now be much more; when Principles have been exchang'd for dreams of words and notions; if not for a worſe ſeaſon of profane contempt of Chriſtian truth. His method of inſtitution chiefly aim'd at the enforcing exemplary Vertue, and holineſs of Life; having much the ſame materials with that moſt uſeful work which he afterwards publiſht, The Practical Catechiſm. But to return; Beſides all this, that there might be no imaginable aſſiſtance wanting, he took care for the providing an able Schoolmaſter in the Pariſh, which he continued during the whole time of his aboad.

And as he thus labour'd in the Spiritual building up of Souls, he was not negligent of the material Fabrick committed to his truſt: but repair'd with a very great Expence (the annual charge of a hundred pound) his Parſonage-Houſe; till from an incommodious ruine he had render'd it a fair and pleaſant dwelling, with the adherent conveniences of Gardens and Orchards.

While he was thus buſy on his Charge, though he ſo prodigally laid out himſelf upon the Intereſts of his Flock, as he might ſeem to have nothing left for other purpoſes; and his Humility recommended above all things Privacy and Retirement to him: yet when the uſes of the Publick call'd him forth, he readily obey'd the Summons, and frequently Preach'd both at S^t Paul's Croſs, and the Viſitations of his Brethren the Clergy, (a ſpecimen whereof appears in print) as alſo at the Cathedral Church of Chicheſter, where by the unſought-for favour of the Reverend Father in God, Brian, then Lord Biſhop of that See, ſince of Wincheſter, he had an intereſt, and had the dignity of Arch-deacon: which at the beginning of the late Troubles falling to him, he managed with great Zeal and Prudence, not only by all the charms of Chriſtian Rhetorick, perſwading to Obedience and Union, but by the force of demonſtration, charging it as moſt indiſpenſable duty, and (what was then not ſo readily believed) the greateſt temporal intereſt of the inferiour Clergy: wherein the eminent importance of the Truths he would inforce, ſo far prevail'd over his otherwiſe-inſuperable Modeſty, that in a full Aſſembly of the Clergy, as he afterwards confeſt, he broke off from what he had premeditated, and out of the abundance of his heart ſpoke to his Auditory; and by the bleſſing of God, to which he attributed it, found a very ſignal reception.

In the Year 1639. he proceeded Doctor in Divinity, his Seniority in the Univerſity, and employment in the Church, and (what perchance was a more importunate motive) the deſire of Eleven of his Friends and Contemporaries in the ſame Houſe, whom not to accompany might be interpreted an affected pride and ſingularity, at leaſt an unkindneſs, jointly perſwading him to it.

His performance in the Act, where he anſwer'd the Doctors, was to the equal ſatisfaction and wonder of his Hearers; a Country-life uſually contracting at the leaſt an unreadineſs to the dextrous management of thoſe Exerciſes, which was an Effect undeſcernible in him.

About this time he became a Member of the Convocation, which ſate with the ſhort Parliament in 1640. as after in that which was call'd with the long one: nay he was named to be of the Aſſembly of Divines; his invincible Loyalty to his Prince, and Obedience to his Mother the Church, not being ſo valid arguments againſt his nomination, as the repute of his Learning and Vertue were on the other part, to have ſome title to him.

And now that Conformity became a Crime, and Tumults improving into Hoſtility and War, ſuch a Crime as had chaſtiſements ſevere enough; though the Committee of the Countrey ſummon'd him before them, and uſed thoſe their beſt arguments of perſwaſion, threatnings and reproaches, he ſtill went on in his regular practice, and continued it till the middle of July 1643. At which time there being in his Neighbourhood about Tunbridge an attempt in behalf of the King, and his Doctrine and Example having had that good influence, as it was ſuppoſed, to have made many more ready to the diſcharge of their duty; it being defeated, the good Doctor (the malice of one who deſign'd to ſucceed in his living being withal aſſiſtant) was forc'd to ſecure himſelf by retirement; which he did, withdrawing himſelf to his old Tutor D^r Buckner; to whom he came about the 25^th of July early in the Morning in ſuch an habit as that Exigence made neceſſary for him, and whither not many days before his old Friend and Fellow-Pupil D^r Oliver came upon the ſame Errand. Which accident, and the neceſſity to leave his Flock, as the Doctor afterwards frequently acknowledg'd, was that which did moſt affect him of any that he felt in his whole life: amidſt which, though he was no valuer of trifles, or any thing that look'd like ſuch, he had ſo extraordinary a Dream, that he could not then deſpiſe, nor ever afterwards forget it.

'Twas

'Twas thus; He thought himself and a multitude of others to have been abroad in a bright and chearful day, when on a sudden there seem'd a separation to be made, and he with a far less number to be placed at a distance from the rest; and then the Clouds gathering, a most tempestuous Storm arose, with thundring and lightnings, with spouts of impetuous rain, and violent gusts of Wind, and whatever else might add unto a scene of horrour; particularly Balls of Fire that shot themselves amongst the ranks of those that stood in the lesser party: When a gentle Whisper seem'd to interrupt those other louder noises, saying, Be still, and ye shall receive no harm. Amidst these terrors the Doctor falling to his Prayers, soon after the Tempest ceas'd, and that known Cathedral Anthem begun, Come Lord Jesus, come away; with which he awoke. The correspondent Event of all which he found verified signally in the preservation both of himself and his Friends, in doing of their duties; the which with much content he was us'd to mention. Beside, being himself taken to the Quires of Angels at the close of that Land-Hurrican of ours, whereof that dismal Apparition was only a faint Embleme; he gave thereby too literal a completion to his Dream, and the unhappy credit of bordering upon Prophecy.

In this retirement the two Doctors remained about three Weeks, till an Alarm was brought, that a strict enquiry was made for Doctor Hammond, and a hundred pound promised as a reward for him that should produce him. Which suggestion though they easily apprehended to have a possibility of being false, yet they concluded a necessary ground for their remove.

Upon this they resolve to be gone; and Doctor Oliver having an interest in Wincheſter, which was then in the Kings Quarters, they chose that as the next place of their retreat. But being on the way thither, Doctor Oliver, who had sent his Servant before to make provision for them, was met and saluted with the News that Doctor Frewen, President of Magdalen College, was made Bishop of Lichfield, and that the College had pitched upon him as Successor. This unlook'd-for accident (as justly it might) put Doctor Oliver to new counsels, and since Providence had found out so seasonable a relief, enclin'd him not to desert it, but fly rather to his Preferments and advantage, than merely to his refuge, and so to divert to Oxford. To this Doctor Hammond made much difficulty to assent, thinking that too publick a place, and, what he more consider'd, too far from his Living, whither (his desires strongly inclining him) he had hopes (when the present fury was allay'd) to return again; and to that purpose had wrote to such Friends of his as were in power, to use their Interest for the procuring his Security. But his Letters meeting a cold reception, and the Company of his Friend on one hand, and the appearance of deserting him on the other hand, charming him to it, he was at last perswaded; and encompassing Hantshire with some difficulty came to Oxford; Where procuring an apartment in his old College, he sought that peace in his Retirement and Study which was no where else to be met withal; taking no other diversion than what the giving Encouragement and instruction to ingenious young Students yielded him, (a thing wherein he peculiarly delighted) and the satisfaction which he received from the conversation of Learned men; who, besides the usual store, in great number at that time for their Security resorted thither.

Among the many Eminent persons with whom he here convers'd, he had particular intimacy with Doctor Potter Provost of Queens College, to whom among other fruits of his Studies he communicated his Practical Catechism, which for his private use he had drawn up out of those materials which he had made use of in the Catechetick institution of the youth of his Parish. The Provost much taken with the design, and no less with the performance, importun'd him to make it publick; alledging, in that lawless Age the great use of supplanting the empty form of Godliness which so prevail'd, by substituting of its real power and sober duties; of silencing Prophaneness, which then usurp'd the names of Wit and Gallantry, by enforcing the more eligible acts of the Christians reasonable service, which was not any other way so happily to be done, as by beginning at the foundation by sound, and yet not trivial, Catechetick institution.

It was not hard to convince D^r^ Hammond that 'twere well if some such thing were done; but that his Writing would do this in any measure, or that he should suffer his Name to become publick, it was impossible to perswade him. The utmost he could be brought to allow of was, that his Treatise was not likely to do harm, but had possibilities of doing (it might be) some good, and that it would not become him to deny that service to the World; especially if his Modesty might be secur'd from pressure by the concealing of him to be the Author. And this Doctor Potter, that he might leave no subterfuge, undertook, and withal the whole care of, and besides, the whole charge of the Edition. Upon these terms, only with this difference, that D^r^ Hammond would not suffer the Provost to be at the entire charge, but went an equal share with him, the Practical Catechism saw the light, and likewise the Author remained in his desir'd obscurity.

But

But in the mean time the Book finding the reception which it merited, the good Doctor was by the ſame arguments conſtrained to give way to the publiſhing of ſeveral other Tracts which he had written upon heads that were then moſt perverted by popular Error; as of Conſtience, of Scandal, of Will-worſhip, of Reſiſting the lawful Magiſtrate, and of the Change of Church-Government; his Name all this while concealed, and ſo preſerved, till Curioſity improving its gueſſes into confident aſſeverations, he was rumor'd for the Author, and as ſuch publiſh'd to the world by the London and Cambridge Stationers, who without his knowledge reprinted thoſe and other of his Works.

In the interim a Treaty being labour'd by his Majeſty, to compoſe (if it were poſſible) the unhappy differences in Church and State, and in order thereunto the Duke of Richmond and Earl of Southampton being ſent to London; Doctor Hammond went along as Chaplain to them; where with great zeal and prudence, he labour'd to undeceive thoſe ſeduced perſons whom he had opportunity to converſe with: and when the Treaty was ſolemnly appointed at Uxbridge, ſeveral Divines being ſent thither in behalf of the different Parties, he, among other excellent men that adher'd to the King, was made choice of to aſſiſt in that Employment. And there (not to mention the debates between the Commiſſioners, which were long ſince publiſh'd by an Honourable hand) Doctor Steward and Maſter Henderſon were at firſt only admitted to diſpute; though at the ſecond meeting the other Divines were call'd in: which thing was a ſurprize, and deſign'd for ſuch, to thoſe of the King's part, who came as Chaplains and private Attendants on the Lords; but was before projected and prepared for by thoſe of the Presbyterian way. And in this conflict it was the lot of Doctor Hammond to have Maſter Vines for his Antagoniſt; who in ſtead of tendring a Scholaſtick diſputation, read from a Paper a long Divinity-Lecture, wherein were interwoven ſeveral little Cavils and Exceptions, which were meant for Arguments. Doctor Hammond perceiving this, drew forth his Pen and Ink, and as the other was reading, took notes of what was ſaid, and then immediately return'd in order an anſwer to the ſeveral ſuggeſtions, which were about forty in number: which he did with that readineſs and ſufficiency, as at once gave teſtimony to his ability, and to the evidence of the Truth he aſſerted; which amidſt the diſadvantage of Extempore againſt Premeditation, diſpell'd with eaſe and perfect clearneſs all the Sophiſms that had been brought againſt him.

'Tis not the preſent work to give an account of that whole Diſpute, or character the merits of thoſe Worthy Perſons who were engag'd in it, either in that or the ſucceeding meetings: eſpecially ſince it was reſolv'd by both parties, that the tranſactions of neither ſide ſhould be made publick. But notwithſtanding this, ſince divers perſons addicted to the defence of a ſide, without any further conſideration of Truth or common Honeſty, have in this particular wounded the Doctors reputation; I ſhall take leave to ſay, that had the Victories in the field which were manag'd by the Sword been like this of the Chamber and the Tongue, a very eaſie Act of Oblivion muſt have atoned for them; ſince what never was, without much induſtry might be ſecur'd from being remembred. The impudent Falſity rais'd upon the Doctor was this, That Mr Vines utterly ſilenc'd him; inſomuch that he was fain to uſe this unheard of Stratagem to avoid his Adverſaries demonſtration, to ſwear by God and the holy Angels, that though at preſent a Solution did not occurr to him, he could anſwer it. Concerning this we have the Doctors own account in a Letter of his, bearing date Jan. 22. Ann. 1655. directed to a Friend who had advertis'd him of this Report.

I have formerly been told within theſe few years that there went about a Story much to my diſparagement, concerning the Diſpute at Uxbridge (for there it was, not at Holdenby*) with* Mr Vines; but what it was I could never hear before: Now I do, I can, I think, truly affirm, that no one part of it hath any degree of truth, ſave only that Mr Vines did diſpute againſt, and I defend, Epiſcopacy. For as to the Argument mention'd, I did neither then, nor at any time of my life, (that I can remember) ever hear it urg'd by any. And for my pretended Anſwer, I am both ſure that I never call'd God and his holy Angels to witneſs any thing in my life, nor ever ſwore one voluntary Oath that I know of, (and ſure there was then none impos'd on me) and that I was not at that Meeting conſcious to my ſelf of wanting ability to expreſs my thoughts, or preſt with any conſiderable difficulty, or forc'd by any conſideration to wave the anſwer of any thing objected. A Story of that whole affair I am yet able to tell you; but I cannot think it neceſſary. Only this I may add, That after it I went to Mr Marſhall in my own and Brethrens names, to demand three things; 1. Whether any Argument propos'd by them remain'd unanſwer'd, to which we might yield farther anſwer: 2. Whether they intended to make any report of the paſt diſputation; offering if they would, to join with them in it, and to perfect a Conference by mutual Conſent, after the manner of that between Dr Reynolds and Mr Hart: both which being rejected, the 3. was, to promiſe each other that nothing ſhould be afterwards publiſh'd by either without the conſent or knowledge of the other party. And that laſt he promis'd for himſelf and his Brethren, and ſo we parted.

But

But while theſe things were in doing, a Canonry in Chriſt-Church in Oxford became vacant, which the King immediately beſtowed on Doctor Hammond, though then abſent; whom likewiſe the Univerſity choſe their publick Orator: which Preferments though collated ſo freely, and in a time of Exigence, he was with much difficulty wrought upon by his Friends to accept, as minding nothing ſo much as a return to his old Charge at Penſehurſt. But the impoſſibility of a ſudden opportunity of going thither being evident unto him, he at laſt accepted; and in March 1645. after, made Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majeſty: probably the very laſt perſon aſſum'd to that Service.

But theſe new Employments no way diverted him from his former tasks; for, according to his wonted Method, he continued to addreſs remedies to the encreaſing Miſchiefs of the times, and publiſh'd the Tracts of Superſtition, Idolatry, Sins of Weakneſs and Wilfulneſs, Death-bed Repentance, View of the Directory; as alſo in anſwer to a Romaniſt, who taking advantage of the publick Ruine, hoped to erect thereon Trophees to the Capitol; his Vindication of the Lord Falkland, who was not long before ſlain in another kind of War.

But now the King's affairs declining every where, and Oxford being forc'd upon Articles to ſurrender to the Enemy, where after the expiration of ſix months all things were to be left to the luſt and fury of a ſervile, and therefore inſolent, Conquerour; though he foreſaw a ſecond and more fatal Siege approaching, a Leaguer of encamp'd inevitable miſchiefs; yet he remitted nothing of his wonted Induſtry, writing his Tracts of Fraternal Correption, and Power of the Keyes, and Apologies by Letter againſt the Pulpit-Calumnies of M^r Cheynel, and the Exceptions taken at his Practical Catechiſm.

When the Calamities of an improſperous War had prepared ſome for a reſort to Heaven, there appearing nothing like ſecurity on Earth; and others were under that violent temptation which has exercis'd the beſt men in all Ages, to repine at the unequal diſtributions of Providence, which brought Majeſty to the Duſt, and ſet Rebellion in the Throne; it ſeeming reaſonable to caſt off that Religion, which God Almighty had firſt himſelf deſerted; to march out of our opinions as we had done out of our Caſtles, and diſmantle our Cauſe as we had done our Garriſons: He with great Charity and skill adapted applications to both theſe equally preſſing, though moſt diſtant occaſions; for he not only by writing endeavour'd to eſtabliſh thoſe, whom the ill circumſtances of the times had inclined to vertue, and reduce them who were unhappily undermin'd or ſhaken; but alſo by converſation and familiar addreſs, he induſtriouſly purſued this bleſt deſign, and very effectually in ſeveral remarkable inſtances attain'd it.

I have been frequently told by a Noble Lord, who ſerved the late King in great employments through the War, with moſt remarkable Courage, Conduct, and Fidelity, and afterwards followed the fortune of our preſent Soveraign, during his exile with the ſame conſtancy and duty: that a little before he marcht out of Oxford, Doctor Hammond though a ſtranger applied himſelf unto him, and prefacing his Diſcourſe with the diſaſters which now had faln upon the Royal Cauſe, and the temptations which probably would come therefrom, particularly to thoſe who were in his Lordſhips condition, and would be driven into a Foreign Country, where they ſhould ſee a glittering Religion, recommended by proſperity and outward pomp, as alſo the inſinuations of artifice and falſehood, and bold obtruding dictates; methods never wanting to the Factors for the Roman Cauſe; He enforc'd upon him as the indiſpenſible obligation, upon all that own themſelves Chriſtians, of taking up the Croſs, and cheerfully receiving whatever ſufferings ſhall prove the price of duty; ſo alſo inſtructed him at large, in the grounds on which the Church of England ſtood bottom'd, both abſolutely in her ſelf, and relatively in oppoſition to Popery; which he back'd with ſuch conviction of reaſon, and obligingneſs of concern, that the ſame Honourable Perſon, who ſtill lives an imitable pattern of Piety and Vertue in this profligate Age, does to this day make liberal acknowledgments of the benefit he took, and yet reaps from thoſe documents ſo long ſince received.

In the mean time his Sacred Majeſty, ſold by his Scotiſh into the hands of his Engliſh Subjects, and brought a Priſoner to Holdenby, where ſtripp'd of all His Royal Attendants, and denied that common Charity which is afforded the worſt of Malefactors, the aſſiſtance of Divines, though he with importunity deſir'd it; He being taken from the Parliament Commiſſioners into the poſſeſſion of the Army, at laſt obtain'd that kindneſs from them (who were to be cruel at another rate) which was withheld by the two Houſes, and was permitted the ſervice of ſome few of his Chaplains, whom he by name had ſent for, and among them of Doctor Hammond.

Accordingly the good Doctor attended on his Maſter in the ſeveral removes of Woburn, Caveſham and Hampton-Court, as alſo thence into the Iſle of Wight, where he continued till Chriſtmas 1647. at which time His Majeſties Attendants were again put from Him, and he amongſt the reſt.

Sequeſtred

Sequeſtred from this his melancholick, but moſt deſir'd, Employment, he return'd again to Oxford: where being Sub-dean, an Office to which belongs much of the Scholaſtick Government of the College, and ſoon after prov'd to be the whole, (the Dean, for the guilt of aſſerting the Rights of His Majeſty and Univerſity in his ſtation of Vice-Chancellor, being made a Priſoner,) he undertook the entire Management of all affairs; and diſcharg'd it with great ſufficiency and admirable diligence, leaving his beloved ſtudies to intereſt himſelf not only in moderating at Divinity-Diſputations, which was then an immediate part of his Task, but in preſiding at the more youthful Exerciſes of Sophiſtry, Themes and Declamations; redeeming ſtill at night theſe Vacuities of the day, ſcarce ever going to Bed till after midnight, ſometimes not till three in the Morning, and yet certainly riſing to Prayers at five.

Nor did his inſpection content it ſelf in looking to the general performances of duty, but deſcended to an accurate ſurvey of every ones both practice and ability; ſo that this large Society of Scholars appear'd his private Family, he ſcarce leaving any ſingle perſon without ſome mark or other of both his Charity and Care, relieving the neceſſitous in their ſeveral wants of Money, and of Books, ſhaming the vicious to Sobriety, incouraging the ingenuous to Diligence, and finding ſtratagems to enſnare the idle to a love of Study. But above all he endeavoured to prepare his charge for the reception of the impending Perſecution; that they might adorn their Profeſſion, and not at the ſame time ſuffer for a Cauſe of Righteouſneſs, and as Evil-doers.

To this End he both admitted and ſolemnly invited all ſober perſons to his familiarity and converſe; and beſide that, receiv'd them to his Weekly private Office of Faſting and Humiliation.

But now the long-expected Ruine breaking in with its full weight and torrent, the Viſitors chaf'd with their former diſappointments and delays, coming with Hunters ſtomachs, and deſign to boot, for to ſeize firſt and then devour the prey, by a new method of judicature being to kill and then take poſſeſſion; the Excellent Doctor became involv'd in the general Calamity. And being conven'd before the pretended Viſitors, he was examined by them, whether he would ſubmit to the Viſitation, or own the Power of the Parliament therein? as alſo if he were not one of the Delegates of the Univerſity, and helpt to frame and paſs thoſe reaſons preſented in Convocation June 1. againſt the power of the Parliament to Viſit? Laſtly, whether he as Sub-dean of Chriſt-Church had publiſht the Orders ſent by the Committee of Lords and Commons, to remove ſeveral Delinquents of that Society, according to the ſaid Orders? To which though he returned no other reply, than that he did not conceive himſelf obliged to anſwer thoſe queſtions thus propos'd to him. (And ſurely there lay ſuch exceptions againſt the frame of thoſe Interrogatories, as could not well admit of any other reply; for inſtance, beſides thoſe Uſurpers having no juriſdiction over him to oblige him to make any anſwer, there was the manifeſt iniquity of requiring an unaccus'd perſon to accuſe himſelf, a thing by that party with all vehemence declamed againſt in the Oath ex Officio; and farther, there was no ſuch thing in the World as the matter of their ſecond queſtion, I mean, Reaſons preſented in Convocation June 1. againſt the Power of the Parliament to Viſit. The immortal, and never to be confuted reaſons which were that day paſt, were againſt the taking of the Covenant and negative Oath, and own'd that and no other Title.) But notwithſtanding his unoffenſive and cautious return to thoſe ill laid demands, immediately, it being the Munday before Faſter, an accuſation was ſent up to the Committee at London, and the ſame Week a Vote paſſed, and returned hither, that Doctor Hammond with ſome others, particularly Doctor Sheldon then Warden of All Souls, late Lord Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, ſhould be removed from their places for their high contempt of the Authority of Parliament. And the fury of theſe godly men who call'd themſelves Viſitors was ſuch, that the Vigils of an Eaſter, and the Charity which that holy ſeaſon would invite to, could not put off the Execution of that Sentence, which they had with ſo much haſt and induſtry obtain'd. And therefore the next moment after the Order was come unto their hands, they ſolemnly marcht to Chriſt-Church-Hall attended with their Janizaries, a guard of Muſquetiers (a fit Equippage for thoſe Divines who had blown the Trumpet for War, and were the Preachers of an Armed Goſpel) and ſending their Mandatory with a Muſquetier to Doctor Hammond's Lodging, commanded him to appear before them, where the whole buſineſs was, to hear himſelf declar'd no Orator of the Univerſity, nor Canon of Chriſt-Church; unleſs perhaps the malice of theſe good men had one farther ſtratagem, to rob him of the next days Sacrament, and diſcompoſe him from that ſerenity of mind, which was neceſſary for the due partaking of the Holy Euchariſt; which yet was a fond attempt, it being a much eaſier thing for his implacable Enemies, to ruine than provoke him; and plunder his Eſtate, than take away his conſtancy and patience. But whereas the then uſual Law of Expulſion was immediately to baniſh into the wide World by beat of Drum, injoining to quit the Town within twenty four hours upon pain of being taken and uſed as Spies, and not to allow the unhappy Exiles time for the diſpoſe either of their private affairs or ſtating the accounts of their reſpective Colleges or Pupils; the Reverend Doctor Sheldon late Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Doctor Hammond, were ſubmitted to a contrary fate, and by an Order from a Committee of Parliament were reſtrained and voted to be Priſoners in that place, from which all elſe were ſo ſeverely driven. But ſuch was the authority and command of Exemplary Vertue, that the perſon deſign'd to ſucceed in the Canonry of Chriſt-Church, though he had accepted of the place at London, and done his Exerciſe for it at Oxford, acting as publick Orator in flattering there the then-pretending Chancellor, yet had not Courage to purſue his undertaking, but voluntarily relinquiſhed that infamous Robbery, and adhered to a leſs ſcandalous one in the Country. And then the Officer who was commanded to take Doctor Sheldon and him into Cuſtody upon their deſign'd removal, Colonel Evelin, then Governour of Wallingford-Caſtle, (though a man of as oppoſite Principles to Church and Church-men as any of the adverſe Party) wholly declin'd the employment, ſolemnly proteſting that if they came to him, they ſhould be entertained as Friends, and not as Priſoners.

But theſe remorſes prov'd but of little effect; the Prebend of Chriſt-Church being ſuddenly ſupply'd by a ſecond choice, and Oxford it ſelf being continued the place of their Confinement: Where accordingly the good Doctor remained, though he were demanded by his Majeſty to attend Him in the Iſle of Wight at the Treaty there, which then was again re-inforced. The pretence upon which both he and the Reverend Doctor Sheldon were refuſed, was that they were Priſoners; and probably the gaining that was the cauſe why they were ſo. But notwithſtanding the denial of a perſonal Attendance, the Excellent Prince requir'd that aſſiſtance which might conſiſt with abſence, and at this time ſent for a Copy of that Sermon which almoſt a year before He had heard preach'd in that place. The which Sermon his Majeſty, and thereby the publick, receiv'd with the acceſſion of ſeveral others delivered upon various Occaſions.

Doctor Hammond having continued about ten Weeks in his reſtraint in Oxford, where he begun to actuate his deſign of writing Annotations on the New Teſtament (nor was it diſproportionate that thoſe Sacred Volums, a great part of which was wrote in Bonds, ſhould be firſt commented upon by the very parallel ſuffering, and that the work it ſelf ſhould be ſo dedicated, and the Expoſitor fitted for his task by being made like the Authors) by the interpoſition of his Brother in Law, Sir John Temple, he had Licence granted to be removed to a more acceptable Confinement, to Clapham in Bedfordſhire, the Houſe in which his worthy Friend Sir Philip Warwick lived. Where ſoon after his arrival, that horrid mockery of Juſtice, the Rape and Violence of all that's Sacred, made more abominable by pretending to Right and Piety, the Trial of the King, drew on; and he being in no other capacity to interpoſe than by writing, drew up an Addreſs to the General and Council of Officers, and tranſmitted it to them. And when that unexampled VILLANY found this Excuſe, that it was ſuch as could be pleaded for, and men in cool Blood would dare to own and juſtifie, he affix'd his Reply to the ſuggeſtions of Aſcham and Goodwin. And now although he indulg'd to his juſt and almoſt-infinite Griefs, which were tranſported to the utmoſt bounds of ſober Paſſion, the affectionate perſonal reſpect he bore unto that glorious Victime, being added to the deteſtation due unto the guilt it ſelf, of which no man was more ſenſible than he who had ſtrange antipathies to all ſin, he gave not up himſelf to an unactive dull amazement; but with the redoubled uſe of Faſting, Tears and ſolemn Prayer, he reſum'd his wonted Studies; and beſides his fitting the Annotations for the Preſs, and his little Tract of the Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtian Religion, he now compoſed his Latine one againſt Blondel in the behalf of Epiſcopacy. As to the firſt of which, (his Annotations,) the manner of its birth and growth was thus.

Having written in Latine two large Volumes in Quarto of the way of interpreting the New Teſtament, with reference to the cuſtoms of the Jews and of the firſt Hereticks in the Chriſtian Church, and of the Heathens, eſpecially in the Grecian Games, and above all the importance of the Helleniſtical Dialect, into which he had made the exacteſt ſearch (by which means in a manner he happened to take in all the difficulties of that Sacred Book:) he began to conſider that it might be more uſeful to the Engliſh Reader, who was to be his immediate Care, to write in our vulgar Language, and ſet every Obſervation in its natural order, according to the guidance of the Text. And having ſome years before collated ſeveral Greek Copies of the New Teſtament, obſerv'd the variation of our Engliſh from the Original, and made an entire Tranſlation of the whole for his private uſe; being thus prepar'd, he caſt his work into that form in which it now appears. The reaſons of it need not to be here inſerted, being ſet down by his own Pen in his Preface to his Annotations.

The Tractate againſt Blondel grew to its laſt form and conſtitution by not unlike degrees, having a very different occaſion from the laſt performance. The immediate antecedent cauſe is own'd, and long ago preſented to the World in that writing; the more remote Original is as follows. The late moſt Learned Primate of Armagh having receiv'd from Dav. Blondel a Letter of Exception againſt his Edition of Ignatius, he communicated it to Doctor Hammond, deſiring his ſenſe of ſeveral paſſages therein contained, relating to the Valentinian Hereſie, Epiſcopal and Chorepiſcopal power, and ſome emergent difficulties concerning them, from the Canons of ſeveral ancient Eaſtern Councils. To all this the Doctor wrote a peculiar anſwer, promiſing a fuller account if it would be uſeful. Upon the receipt whereof the Archbiſhop being highly ſatisfied, return'd his thanks, and laid hold of the Promiſe: which being accordingly diſcharg'd, became the proviſion (and gave materials) to a great part of the Diſſertations. The Primate's Letter ran in theſe words.

I Have read with great delight and content your accurate Anſwer to the Objections made againſt the credit of Ignatius his Epiſtles, for which I do moſt heartily thank you, and am moved thereby farther to intreat you, to publiſh to the World in Latine what you have already written in Engliſh againſt this Objector, and that other, who for your pains hath rudely requited you with the baſe appellation of Nebulo for the aſſertion of Epiſcopacy: to the end it may no longer be credited abroad, that theſe two have beaten down this Calling, that the defence thereof is now deſerted by all men, as by Lud. Cappellus is intimated in his Theſis of Church-government, at Sedan lately publiſhed, which I leave unto your ſerious Conſideration, and all your Godly labours to the bleſſing of our good God, in whom I evermore reſt,

Rygate in Surrey,
Jul. 21. 1649.

Your very loving Friend and Brother,

Ja. Armachanus.

Now in this requeſt the Archbiſhop was ſo concern'd, that he re-inforc'd it by another Letter of Aug. 30. and congratulated the performance by a third of Jan. 14. Both which, though very worthy to ſee the publick light, are yet forborn, as ſeveral of the like kind from the Reverend Fathers the Biſhops of this and our Siſter Churches, as alſo from the moſt eminent for Piety and Learning of our own and the Neighbouring Nations: which courſe is taken not only in accordance to the deſires and ſentiments of the Excellent Doctor, who hated every thing that look'd like Oſtentation; but likewiſe to avoid the very unpleaſing choice, either to take the trouble of recounting all the Doctors Correſpondencies, or bear the envy of omitting ſome.

But to return to the preſent task, and that of the good Doctor, which now was to perfect his Commentaries on the New Teſtament, and finiſh the Diſſertations: amidſt which cares he met with another of a more importunate nature, the loſs of his Dear Mother, which had this unhappy acceſſion, that in her Sickneſs he could not be permitted, by reaſon of his being concern'd in the Proclamation that baniſh'd thoſe that adher'd to the King twenty miles from London, to viſit her; nor while ſhe pay'd her lateſt debt to Nature, to pay his earlier one of filial homage and attendance.

A few months after, the rigour of that reſtraint with the declining of the Year (a ſeaſon judg'd leſs commodious for Enterpriſe) being taken off, he removed into Worceſterſhire, to Weſtwood, the Houſe of the eminently-Loyal Sir John Packington: where being ſetled, and proceeding in the Edition of thoſe his Labours which he had begun at Clapham, his Majeſty coming to Worceſter, by his Neighbourhood to that place, the good Doctor, as he had the ſatisfaction perſonally to attend his Sovereign, and the honour to receive a Letter from his own hand of great importance, for the ſatisfaction of his Loyal Subjects concerning his adherence to the eſtabliſhed Religion of the Church of England, wherein his Royal Father liv'd a Saint, and died a Martyr: ſo likewiſe had he on the other part the moſt immediate agonies for his defeat; to which was added the Calamity which fell upon the Family where he dwelt, from the Perſecution and danger of the generous Maſter of it. But it pleaſed God to give an iſſue out of both thoſe difficulties, eſpecially in the miraculous deliverance of his Sacred Majeſty; a diſpenſation of ſo ſignal an importance, that he allow'd it a ſolemn recognition in his conſtant offices during his whole life, receiving that unuſual interpoſition of Providence as a pledge from Heaven of an arrier of mercies, to uſe his own words, That God, who had thus powerfully reſcued him from from Egypt, would not ſuffer him to periſh in the Wilderneſs; but though his paſſage be through the Red Sea, he would at laſt bring him into Canaan; that he ſhould come out of his tribulations as Gold out of the fire, purified, but not conſumed.

But notwithſtanding theſe reflections, bottom'd upon Piety and reliance upon Heaven, the preſent ſtate of things had a quite different proſpect in common Eyes; and the generality of men thinking their Religion as troubleſome a burthen as their Loyalty, with the ſame prudence by which they chang'd their mild and gracious Soveraign for a bloody TYRANT, began to ſeek a pompous and imperious Church abroad, inſtead of a pious and afflicted one at home. To which Event the Roman Miſſionaries gave their liberal contribution, affording their prepoſterous Charity to make them Proſelytes who had no mind to be Confeſſors or Martyrs. Hereupon the Doctor thought it highly ſeaſonable to write his Tract of Schiſm, and oppoſe it to that moſt popular topick whereby they amus'd and charm'd their fond Diſciples. And whereas the love of Novelty prevail'd in ſeveral other inſtances, as in controuling the uſe and authority of the Scripture, defending inceſtuous Marriages, Polygamy, Divorce, the anabaptizing of Infants, the ſchiſmatical Ordination of Miniſters by mere Presbyters, and diſuſe of the Feſtivals of the Church; he apply'd his Antidotes to each: by which means he made himſelf the common mark of oppoſition to all parties. For (beſides the aſſaults from a whole Claſſis of Antagoniſts which the Diſſertations had engag'd againſt him, and to which he was preparing his defence) upon the Romaniſts part he was charg'd by the Catholick Gentleman and his Armour-Bearer S. W. on the Presbyterian Account by M^r Cawdry and M^r Jeanes; and in the behalf of the Independents and Anabaptiſts by M^r Owen and M^r Tombs: not to mention ſeveral others that ſought themſelves a name by being his Gainſayers, but fail'd of their purpoſe, by bringing only ſpight and paſſion into the quarrel, and ſo were to be anſwered only by pity and ſilence.

Nor did he only ſtand and keep at Bay this multiply'd conteſt; but (as if this had not been task enough) beſides the intercurrent offices of life, his reception of Viſits, anſwering of Letters, his conſtant Preaching and Catechiſing, he found leiſure to write his Tract of Fundamentals, his Paræneſis, his Review of the Annotations; and amidſt all, to be in debt to his importunate Antagoniſts for nothing but their Railing, leaving that the only thing unanſwered. Nay more than ſo, brought ſeveral of them even under their own hands to recognize their ſenſe of their undue procedure us'd by them unto him: which their acknowledgments yet remain, and are producible upon occaſion.

And would to God he had met no other oppoſition; for in the entrance on theſe conflicts that ſtrength of Body which before had faithfully attended his indefatigable Mind began to fail him, and thoſe four torments of diſeaſe, which ſingle have been judg'd a competent tryal of humane ſufferance, ſome years before his death, the Stone, and near his end, the Gout, the Colick, and the Cramp, (the laſt of which was to him as tyrannous as any of the former) became in a manner the conſtant exerciſe of his Chriſtian Fortitude and Patience; affording him from this time to the laſt period of his life very rare and ſhort intervals of vigorous Health.

But among all his Labours, although Polemick Diſcourſes were otherwiſe moſt uneaſy, as engaging to converſe with men in Paſſion, a thing he naturally abhorr'd, his Paræneſis, a perſwaſive and practical Tract (which now he wrote, and which upon that account was exceeding agreeable to his deſires) coſt him moſt throes and pangs of Birth, as having been penn'd firſt in Tears, and then in Ink. For however with great ſerenity he entertain'd all other accidents, having habituated himſelf to his beloved doctrine of ſubmitting not to the Will of God alone, but to his Wiſdome, both which he was us'd to ſay were perfectly one thing in that bleſt Agent (and accordingly in the moſt diſmal appearance of Event made this conſtant Motto גם זו לטובה Even this for good;) yet in this inſtance the tenderneſs of his Soul ſeem'd to have melted his reſolution: the occaſion of that Treatiſe being the Interdict of Jan. 1655. which diſabled the Loyal ſuffering Clergy from doing any Miniſterial act, which he reſented with the higheſt paſſion, not only upon the general account of God's more immediate diſpleaſure to the Nation legible therein, but (what he had much leſs reaſon to do) in reference to his own particular, he looking on this diſpenſation of Providence as God's pronouncing him unworthy to do him Service, the reproaching (to uſe his own words) his former unprofitableneſs by caſting him out as ſtraw to the dunghill. Nor ſhould any conſideration that terminated on himſelf have perſwaded him at all to regard that tyrannous injunction, had not Charity to the Family where he was, made him content to admit of an Expedient that ſecured all real duties, whilſt he for ſome ſhort time forbore that attendance on the Altar which was the very joy of his life.

And now, though his Phyſicians had earneſtly forbidden his accuſtomed Faſtings, and his own weakneſſes gave forcible ſuffrages to their advice; yet he reſumed his rigours, eſteeming this calamity ſuch a one as admitted no exception, which ſhould not be outliv'd, but that it became men to be Martyrs too, and deprecate even in death.

While he thus earneſtly implored the aids of Heaven, and exhorted unto preſent Duty, he omitted not a third Expedient, the ſecuring a Succeſſion to the Church, thereby to preſerve its future being. And this he did not only in reference to the ſuperiour order of Epiſcopacy, which it has pleaſed God now to ſecure by another more gracious method of his favour, and even miraculous goodneſs; but alſo in the inferiour attendance on the Altar: the later of which as it was an Enterpriſe ſuiting well with his heroick Mind, ſo was it no way anſwering his narrow Fortunes. The thing in his deſign was this; Whereas the ancient ſtock of Clergy-men were by this Edict in a manner rendered uſeleſs, and the Church was at beſt like the Roman State in its firſt beginning, res unius ætatis populus Virorum, a Nation of ancient perſons haſting to their Graves, who muſt in a few years be waſted; he projected by Penſions unto hopeful perſons in either Univerſity, to maintain a Seminary of Youth inſtituted in Piety and Learning upon the ſober Principles and old eſtabliſhment of the Anglicane Church. In which work though the aſſiſtances he preſum'd on fail'd in a great meaſure, yet ſomewhat not inconſiderable in this kind by himſelf and Friends he did atchieve, and kept on foot until his death. In his inſtructions to them whom he employ'd in this affair, he gave in charge carefully to ſeek out ſuch as were piouſly inclin'd, and to prefer that qualification before unſanctified good parts; adding this as a certain Maxime, that Exemplary Vertue muſt reſtore the Church.

And whereas that black Defeat at Worceſter, raiſing the inſolent Tyrant here unto that Greatneſs which almoſt outwent the impudence of his hopes, made him to be feared by Foreign Nations almoſt as much as hated by his own, the Loyal Sufferers abroad became ſubjected to the worſt effect of Baniſhment, and even there expell'd and driven from their Flights: ſo paralleling in their Exigencies the moſt immediate objects of that Monſter's Fury. The Excellent Doctor, to whoſe diffuſive Vertue the limits of the Nation were too ſtreight a Circle, thought this a ſeaſon to exert his Charity: accordingly, though this greateſt duty were ſolemnly declared Treaſon, he then continued to ſend over ſeveral Sums for their relief.

Which practice of his, by the ſurpriſe of the perſon intruſted, being diſcovered to the Tyrant, he was alarm'd with the expectation of that uſage which was then a certain conſequent of ſuch meritorious acts. But this adventure brought nothing of amazement or diſturbance to the Doctor, his moſt importunate reflection being only this, that he ſeem'd to have gain'd an opportunity of ſaying ſomething very home to that fierce Monſter concerning his foul deeds, and to diſcourſe the appropriate ways remaining to alleviate at leaſt, if not to expiate for them; which he purpoſed within himſelf to preſs to the higheſt advantage: and indeed this was the only iſſue of that ſo threatning accident, God's reſtraining power interpoſing here, and exemplifying upon him what in others he was wont to obſerve, that they who leaſt conſidered hazard in the doing of their duties fared ſtill beſt.

And this ſucceſs as it was indeed, and accordingly he frequently acknowledg'd it for, an eminent act of the Divine Providence; ſo we may likewiſe take it as a ſignal teſtimony of the commanding worth the Doctor had, which extorted a reverence to his perſon from that worſt of men, and render'd him a Sanctuary, perhaps the only one this Architect of Miſchief ſtood in aw of, and even his Sacrilege preſerv'd inviolate.

Nor did this danger being over, as with others in all likelihood it would have done, perſuade to caution for the future; but with the wonted diligence that formerly he us'd, he immediately proceeded, and chearfully went on in the purſuit of his heroick Charity.

Amidſt theſe diverſions grew up the Labours of this Heroe, the iſſues of his Brain, being not only Midwiv'd into the World like natural Births with torment and diſeaſe, but wrote like Cæſar's Commentaries, in Dangers and in War. And now beſides the Replies which the importunities of M^r Owen, M^r Jeanes, and M^r Tombs drew from him, W. S. continuing his loud clamors and impudent triumph at his own folly, the good Doctor ſuffer'd himſelf to be engag'd on that long Anſwer, which prov'd the laſt of that kind he made, excepting that ſingle ſheet put out a few Months before his death, as a ſpecimen to what deſperate ſhifts the Patrons of the Roman Cauſe were driven: for though ſome of his Friends advis'd him to remit that Divinity Buffoon to be anſwered in his own way by a ſlighter Pen; he by no means would admit of the propoſal, reſolving it unfit that another ſhould do in his behalf what was indecent for himſelf to do; and though there was no reſpect to be had of W. S. yet was the Sacred Cauſe to be manag'd with reverence and awful regard. While this was in hand, the ſecond Review of the Annotations came to light, as alſo the Expoſition on the Book of Pſalms, and ſoon after the pacifick diſcourſe of Gods Grace and Decrees, ventilated between him and his dear Friend the Reverend and moſt Learned

Doctor

Doctor Sanderſon, afterward Lord Biſhop of Lincoln, occaſion'd by ſome Letters which had paſſed on that Subject between the ſaid Doctor and the Reverend Doctor Pierce. To this immediately ſucceeded the Latine Tract of Confirmation, in Anſwer to the Exceptions of M^r Daillée, which was then prepar'd for the Preſs, though detain'd much longer upon prudential or rather charitative conſiderations, a reſpect to which was ſtrictly had in all the Doctor's Writings; it being his care not only to publiſh ſober and convincing, but withal ſeaſonable, uſeful Truths.

He was likewiſe enterpriſing a farther Commentary on the Old Teſtament, and begun on the Book of Proverbs, and finiſhed a third part of it: But the Completion of this and all other the great intendments of the equally Learned, Pious, and indefatigable Author receiv'd here a full period; it pleaſing the Divine Providence to take to himſelf this high Example of all moral and Chriſtian Excellencies, in a ſeaſon when the Church and Nation would leaſt have been depriv'd of his Aids toward the cementing of thoſe breaches which then began to offer at a cloſure.

'Tis eaſily to be preſum'd the Reader will not be diſoblig'd, if we a while divert from this remaining ſadder part of the undertaken Narrative, and entertain him with a Survey of the Perſonal accompliſhments of the Excellent Doctor. The particulars whereof would not readily have faln into the thred of Hiſtory, or at leaſt had been disjointed there, and under diſadvantage; but will be made to ſtand in a much fairer light, when repreſented to the view by way of Character and Picture.

And therefore to this proſpect we chearfully invite all eyes in whoſe eſteem Vertue it ſelf is lovely.

Section the Second.

THE Frame of his Body was ſuch as ſuited with the noble uſe to which it was deſign'd, the entertaining a moſt pure and active Soul, but equally to the advantages of Strength and Comelineſs. His Stature was of juſt height and all proportionate dimenſions, avoiding the extreams of groſs and meager, advantag'd by a graceful Carriage, at once moſt grave, and yet as much obliging. His Face carried dignity and attractives in it, ſcarce ever Clouded with a frown, or ſo much as darkned by reſervedneſs. His Eye was quick and ſprightful, his Complexion clear and florid, ſo that (eſpecially in his youth) he had the eſteem of a very beauteous perſon; which was leſſen'd only by the colour of his Hair: though if the ſentence of other Ages and Climates be of value, that reaſonably might be vouch'd as an acceſſion to it.

To this outward Structure was join'd that ſtrength of Conſtitution, patient of ſevereſt toil and hardſhip; inſomuch that for the moſt part of his life, in the fierceſt extremity of cold, he took no other advantage of a fire, than at the greateſt diſtance that he could to look upon it. As to Diſeaſes (till immoderate Study had wrought a change) he was in a manner only lyable to Feavers, which too a conſtant temperance did in a great meaſure prevent, and ſtill aſſiſted to relieve and cure.

Next to his frame of Body, if we ſurvey his inward Faculties, we ſhall find them juſt unto the promiſes of his outward ſhape. His Sight was quick to an unuſual degree; inſomuch that if by chance he ſaw a knot of Men, a Flock of Sheep or Herd of Cattel, being ingag'd in Diſcourſe, and not at all thinking of it, he would involuntarily caſt up their number, which others after long delays could hardly reckon. His Ear was accurate and tun'd to his harmonious Soul, ſo that having never learned to ſing by Book or Study, he would exactly perform his part of many things to a Harpſicon or Theorbo; and frequently did ſo in his more vigorous years after the toil and labour of the day, and before the remaining Studies of the night. His Elocution was free and graceful, prepared at once to charm and to command his Audience: and when with Preaching at his Country charge he had in ſome degree loſt the due manage of his Voice, His late Sacred Majeſty, by taking notice of the change, became his Maſter of Muſick, and reduc'd him to his ancient decent modulation; a kindneſs which the Doctor very gratefully acknowledg'd to his dying day, and reported not only as an inſtance of the meek and tender condeſcenſions of that gracious Prince, but improv'd to perſuade others by ſo great an Example to that moſt Friendly Office of telling perſons of their Faults, without which very commonly (as here it happen'd) men muſt be ſo far from amending their Errours, that 'tis morally impoſſible they ſhould ever know them.

As to his more inferiour Faculties, we muſt allow the firſt place to his Invention, his richeſt, altogether unexhauſted treaſure, whoſe flowings were with that full torrent, that for ſeveral years, after his choice of Subject, which generally he had in proſpect beforehand, beforehand, a little meditation on the Saturday Night made up his Sermon: but in the laſt twelve of his Life, finding the recollection of his thoughts diſturb his ſleep, he remitted the particular care of the Compoſition and Method of his future Diſcourſe to the Sunday Morning, wherein an hours conſideration fitted him to the office of the day. With the like ſwiftneſs he diſpatch'd his Writings, uſually compoſing faſter than his Amanuenſis, though a very dextrous perſon, could eaſily tranſcribe after him. His Conſiderations of preſent neceſſity concerning Epiſcopacy were drawn up after ten a Clock at Night in a Friends Chamber, who profeſſes, that ſitting by all the while, he remembers not that he took off Pen from Paper till he had done; and the very next Morning, it being fully approved by the Biſhop of Salisbury, he ſent it to the Preſs: to which work he could have no premeditation or ſecond thoughts, he being that very Night after Supper employ'd by the before-mentioned Lord Biſhop of Salisbury, after of Wincheſter, on that task. So likewiſe he began his Tract of Scandal at eleven at Night, and finiſhed it before he went to Bed. Nor was this a peculiar or extraordinary thing with him, but moſt cuſtomary; five ſheets having amidſt his other diverſions been ſundry times his one days work; adding to it ſo much of the Night as he frequently borrowed from ſleep and Supper. And indeed ſuch were his diverſions, ſo many and ſo importunate, that notwithſtanding this incredible eaſe of writing, 'tis hardly imaginable how he could compaſs the tith of what he did. For he that ſhall conſider his laborious way, immerſt in almoſt infinite quotations, to which the turning over Books and conſulting ſeveral Editions was abſolutely needful; his obligation to read not only Claſſick Authors, but the more recent abortions of the Preſs, wherein he proved frequently concerned; his peruſal of the Writings of his Friends and Strangers intended to be publick; his review of his own Works, and correcting them with his own hand ſheet by ſheet as they came forth, which he did to all his later Tracts; his reception of Viſits, whether of Civility, or for reſolution of Conſcience, or information in points of difficulty, which were numerous, and great devourers of his time; his agency for men of quality, providing them School-Maſters for their Children, and Chaplains in their Houſes, in which affair he had ſet up a kind of Office of Addreſs; his general correſpondencies by Letter, whereof ſome coſt him ten, others twenty, thirty, forty, nay ſixty ſheets of Paper, and ever took up two days of the Week entirely to themſelves; the time exhauſted by his ſickneſſes, which in the later years of his life gave him but ſhort and ſeldom truce, and always made it neceſſary for him not to ſtir from his Chair, or ſo much as read a Letter for two hours after every Meal, failance wherein being certainly reveng'd by a fit of the Gout; his not only conſtant preaching and inſtructing the Family where he was, and his viſiting the ſick both there and in the Neighbourhood, but amidſt all, his ſure returns of Prayer, ſo frequent and ſo conſtant as certainly to challenge to themſelves a great portion of the day: he, I ſay, that ſhall compute and ſum up this, the particulars whereof are nakedly ſet down without any ſtraining of the truth or flouriſh of expreſſion, muſt be to ſeek what a point of vacant time remain'd yet undiſpoſed; I do not ſay to write Books, but even to breathe and reſt a little in.

After a ſerious reflexion on the premiſſes, and full debate thereon, the account given by that excellent perſon who had the happineſs of being the neareſt and moſt conſtant witneſs of the before-recited ſeverals, ſeems the beſt and chiefly ſatisfactory that poſſibly can be made; that he gain'd time for his writing Books by the time he ſpent in Prayer, whileſt (a more than ordinary aſſiſtance attending his Devotions) his Cloſet prov'd his Library, and he ſtudied moſt upon his Knees.

As to his Memory, 'twas ſerviceable, but not officious; faithful to things and buſineſs, but unwillingly retaining the contexture and punctualities of words: which defect he frequently lamented, it being harder with him to get one Sermon by heart than to Pen twenty.

His way of Speech and faculty of communicating notions was ſufficiently happy, having only this beſt kind of defect, exuberance and ſurpluſage of plenty, the tide and torrent of his matter being not eaſily confined by periods; whereby his ſtile, though round and comprehenſive, was incumbred ſometimes by Parentheſes, and became difficult to vulgar underſtandings: but by the uſe of writing, and his deſire to accommodate himſelf to all Capacities, he in his later years had maſter'd that defect, which was ſo ſlight, that notwithſtanding it, he deſerved from (the moſt accurate Judge and greateſt Maſter of Engliſh Rhetorick which this Age hath given) His late Sacred Majeſty this Character and Teſtimony, That he was the moſt natural Orator he ever heard.

His Judgment, as in it ſelf the higheſt Faculty, ſo was it the moſt eminent among his natural endowments: for though the finding out the ſimilitudes of different things, wherein the Phancy is converſant, is uſually a Bar to the diſcerning the diſparities of ſimilar appearances, which is the buſineſs of Diſcretion, and that ſtore of notions which is laid up in Memory assists rather Confusion than Choice, upon which grounds the greatest Clerks are frequently not the wisest men; He had to his sufficient Memory and incomparable Invention, a clear discerning Judgment; and that not only in Scholastical affairs and points of Learning, which the arguings, and besides them the designment of his Writings manifest beyond dispute, but in the concerns of publick nature both of Church and State, wherein his gues was usually as near to Prophecy as any mans; as also in the little mysteries of private manage, by which upon occasion he has unravell'd the studied cheats of great Artificers in that liberal Science, wherein particularly he vindicated a person of Honour for whom he was intrusted, and assisted frequently his Friends in their domestick intercurrent difficulties.

As to acquir'd habits and abilities in Learning, his Writings having given the World sufficient account of them, there remains only to observe, that the range and compass of his knowledge fill'd the whole Circle of the Arts, and reach'd those severals which single do exact an entire man unto themselves, and full Age. To be accurate in the Grammar and Idioms of the Tongues, and then as a Rhetorician to make all their graces serve his Eloquence; to have traverst ancient, and yet be no stranger in modern Writers; to be studied in Philosophy, and familiarly vers'd in all the politer Classick Authors; to be learn'd in School-divinity, and a Master in Church-Antiquity, perfect and ready in the sence of Fathers, Councils, Ecclesiastical Historians and Liturgicks; to have devour'd so much and yet digested it, is a rarity in nature and in diligence which has but few Examples.

But after all we must take leave to say, and do it upon sober recollection, that the Doctor's Learning was the least thing in him; the Scholar was here less eminent than the Christian: His Speculative knowledge, that gave light to the most dark and difficult Proposals, became Eclipsed by the more dazeling lustre of his Practick. In the Catalogue of his Vertues, his Chastity and Temperance may claim the earliest place, as being the Sacrists to the rest, and in him were therefore only not the greatest of his Excellencies, because every thing else was so.

And first, his chast thoughts, words and carriage so disciplin'd his lower faculties, as not only restrain'd through all the heats of Youth, made more than usually importunate by the full vigour of a high and sanguine Constitution, (which his escape he gratefully referr'd unto the only mercy of Almighty God) but gave a detestation of all those verbal follies, that have not only the allowance of being harmless mirth, but the repute of Wit and gaiety of humour: so that the scurrilous jest could sooner obtain his Tears in penance for it, than the approbation of a smile; and all approaches to this sin he look'd upon not only with an utter disallowance in his Will, but a kind of natural abhorrence and antipathy in his lower outward faculties.

In his first remove to Pensehurst he was perswaded by his Friends that the Matrimonial state was needful to the bearing off those Houshold cares and other intercurrent troubles which his condition then brought with it; and on this ground he gave some Ear to their advices: which he did then more readily, for that there was a person represented to him, of whose Vertue as well as other more-usually-desired accomplishments he had been long before well satisfied. But being hindred several times by little unexpected accidents, he finally laid down all his pretensions upon a ground of perfect self-denial; being inform'd that one of a fairer Fortune and higher quality than his was, or else was like to be, and consequently one who in common account would prove the better match, had kindness for her. Having thus resolv'd, the Charity of his Mother, who undertook the manage of his Family, became a seasonable assistant and expedient in this single state; till after several years her Age making those cares too great a burthen for her shoulders, he again was induc'd to resume his thoughts of Marriage. But the National disturbances (that afterwards brake out in War and Ruine) appearing then in ferment, he was again diverted by recollecting the Apostles advice, 1 Cor. 7. 26. enforc'd upon his thoughts by the reading of Saint Jerom's Epistle to Agereuchia, where after glorious Elogies of Marriage, the Father concluded in an earnest dehortation from it, upon a representation of a like face of things, the Goths then breaking into Italy, as they before had done into the other near parts of the Roman Empire, and filling all with Slaughter, Cruelty and Ruine. Upon which prospect the good Doctor casting a serious Eye, and with prophetick sorrows and misgivings fearing a parallel in this our Nation, the second time deposited his conjugal intendments, and thenceforth courted and espoused (what he preserv'd inviolate) unto his death the more eminent perfection of spotless Virgin Chastity.

His Appetite was good, but the restraint of it was very eminent and extraordinary; for his Diet was of the plainest meats, and commonly not only his Dishes, but the parts of them were such as most others would refuse. Sauces he scarce ever tasted of, but often often expreſs'd it his wonder how rational Creatures ſhould eat for any thing but health, ſince he that did eat or drink that which might cauſe a fit of the Stone or Gout, though a year after, therein unman'd himſelf, and acted as a beaſt. So that his ſelf-denials were quite contrary to the uſual ones; for conſidering the time loſt in Eating, and the vacancy ſucceeding it, his meals were the greateſt preſſure, and his Faſting-day the moſt ſenſual part of his Week.

In the time of his full and more vigorous health he ſeldom did eat or drink more than once in twenty four hours, and ſome Fruit towards night; and two dayes in every Week, and in Lent and Ember-week three dayes, he eat but once in thirty ſix. Nor did he ever with ſo much regret ſubmit unto any preſcript, as when his Phyſicians, after his great Feaver that he had in Oxford, requir'd him to eat Suppers. Which ſeverity of injunction he ſoon ſhook off, and returned to his beloved abſtinence, until renew'd infirmities brought him back unto the penance of more indulgence to himſelf.

As he had the greateſt indifference to what he eat, ſo had he the greateſt obſervation too, eſpecially when it came to be made point of diet and preſcription; for in this caſe he was moſt exact, never taſting of any prohibited meats, though ſome of them had before the advantage of being cuſtomary towards their ſeeming neceſſary. And herein his Palate was ſo tractable and ſubdued to the dictates of an higher choice, that he really thought no meat pleaſant, but in proportion to its wholeſomeneſs: even his beloved Apples he would oft ſay he would totally abandon, aſſoon as they ſhould appear to be no more than barely innocent, and not of uſe. And if by chance or inadvertency he had at any time taſted of an interdicted Diſh, as ſoon as he perceived it, he diſcovered a diſlike both with himſelf and what he had been ſurpriz'd with.

The Carving at the Table he always made his Province, which he ſaid he did as a diverſion to keep him from eating over-much: but certainly that practice had another more immediate cauſe, a natural diſtributiveneſs of humour, and a deſire to be employed in the relief of every kind of want of every perſon. The report, and much more the ſight, of a luxurious feeder, would turn his Stomach, ſo that he was in more danger to be ſick with other's Surfeits than his own; Charity ſeeming a part of his Complexion, while he perform'd a natural ſpontaneous penance for his Neighbours Vice, as well as a deliberate one in ſorrowing for it.

His temperance in Sleep reſembled that of his Meats, Midnight being the uſual time of his going to reſt, and four or five, and very rarely ſix, the hour of riſing. There was ſcarce any thing he reſented ſo much in his infirmities and multiplied Diſeaſes as their having abridg'd him of his Night-ſtudies, profeſſing thereby he loſt not only his greateſt pleaſure, but higheſt advantage in reference to buſineſs. And in his later time of weakneſs, when to take benefit of a gentle breathing ſweat, which uſually came in the Morning, he had been engag'd by his Phyſician to continue in Bed till it was over; and upon complaint of coſtiveneſs he was on the other ſide directed to riſe ſomewhat early in the Morning; this later injunction he look'd upon as a mere reſcue and deliverance, often mentioning it with thanks, as if it had been an eminent favour done him.

His diſpoſal of himſelf in the other parts of time was to perpetual induſtry and diligence: he not only avoided, but bore a perfect hate, and ſeem'd to have a forcible antipathy to Idleneſs, and ſcarcely recommended any thing in his advices with that concern and vigour, as to be furniſh'd always with ſomewhat to do. This he propos'd as the beſt expedient both for innocence and pleaſure, aſſuring that no burthen is more heavy or temptation more dangerous, than to have time lye on ones hand; the idle man's brain being not only (as he worded it) the Devils ſhop, but his kingdom too, a model of and an appendage unto hell, a place given up to torment and to miſchief. Beſides thoſe Portions of time which the neceſſities of nature and of civil life extorted from him, there was not a minute of the day which he left vacant. When he walked abroad, which he did not ſo much to recreate himſelf, as to obey the Preſcripts of his Phyſician, he never fail'd to take a Book with him, and read all the while: And in his Chamber alſo he had one lay conſtantly open, out of which he read while he was dreſſing and undreſſing; by which one piece of Huſbandry in ſhort ſpace he diſpatch'd ſeveral conſiderable Volumes.

His way was ſtill to caſt into Paper all his Obſervations, and direct them to his preſent purpoſes; wherein he had an incredible dexterity, ſcarce ever reading any thing which he did not make ſubſervient in one kind or other. He was us'd to ſay, he could not abide to talk with himſelf, and therefore was ſo diligently provided of that which he call'd better Company. In his Sickneſſes, if they were not ſo violent to make the recollection of thoughts impoſſible, he never intermitted ſtudy, but rather re-inforc'd it then as the moſt appropriate revulſive and diverſion of pain. The Gout by its moſt frequent and importunate returns exceeded his other maladies; in which although the firſt moſt furious aſſaults were ſure to beat him from his ſtudy, and for a time confine him to his Bed, Bed, yet as ſoon as he had recovered his Chair, he reſum'd his Pen too, and ply'd it as hard as though he had ail'd nothing.

Next to downright Idleneſs he diſlik'd ſlow and dilatory undertakings, thinking it a great folly to ſpend that time in gazing upon buſineſs which ſhould have ſerved for the doing of it. In his own practice he never conſider'd longer than till he could diſcern whether the thing propoſed was fit or not: when that was ſeen, he immediately ſet to work. When he had perfected one buſineſs, he could not endure to have his thoughts lye fallow, but was preſently conſulting what next to ſet about.

But when we reckon up and audit the expences of the Doctor's Time, we cannot paſs his conſtant tribute of it paid by him to Heaven in the offices of Prayer; which took up ſo liberal proportions of each day unto it's ſelf for the ten laſt years of his life, and probably the preceeding. Beſides occaſional and ſupernumerary addreſſes, his certain perpetual returns exceeded David's ſeven times a day. Aſſoon as he was ready (which was uſually early) he prayed in his Chamber with his Servant, in a peculiar form compoſed for that purpoſe. After this he retired to his own more ſecret Devotions in his Cloſet. Betwixt ten and eleven in the Morning he had a ſolemn interceſſion in reference to the National Calamities: to this after a little diſtance ſucceeded the Morning Office of the Church, which he particularly deſired to perform in his own perſon, and would by no means accept the eaſe of having it read by any other. In the Afternoon he had another hour of private Prayer which on Sundays he enlarg'd, and ſo religiouſly obſerved, that if any neceſſary buſineſs or Charity had diverted him at the uſual time, he repair'd his Soul at the coſt of his Body, and, notwithſtanding the injunctions of his Phyſicians, which in other caſes he was careful to obey, ſpent the Supper-time therein. About five of the Clock the ſolemn private Prayers for the Nation and the Evening Service of the Church return'd. At Bed-time his private Prayers cloſed the Day: and after all even the Night was not without its Office, the LI Pſalm being his deſign'd midnight entertainment.

In his Prayers, as his Attention was fixt and ſteddy, ſo was it inflam'd with paſſionate fervours, inſomuch that very frequently his tranſport threw him proſtrate on the Earth; his tears alſo would interrupt his words: the latter happening not only upon the pungent exigencies of preſent or impending Judgments, but in the common Service of the Church; which, notwithſtanding his concealments, being taken notice of by a perſon of good ſufficiency, once a Member of his Houſe in Oxford, that became of late Years a Proſelyte to the new extemporary way, he, among his other Topicks whereby he thought to diſparage ſet Forms, us'd in Diſcourſe to urge the heartleſs coldneſs of them, and to adorn his triumph, would make it his ſolemn wonder how a perſon of ſo good parts as Doctor Hammond was certainly Maſter of, could find motive for his tears in the confeſſion in the beginning of the Liturgy. So much does Paſſion and miſguided Zeal tranſport the moſt ſenſible, that this man, otherwiſe ſagacious enough, never conſider'd how ill an inſtance he had made; which ſhew'd 'twas the coldneſs of the Votary, and not the Prayer, that was in fault, when ever fervour was deficient at the publick Office of the Church.

The Charity and extent of his Prayers was as exuberant as the zeal and fervour: he thought it very unreaſonable that our Interceſſions ſhould not be as univerſal as our Saviours Redemption was; and would complain of that thrift and narrowneſs of mind to which we are ſo prone, confining our Care either to our ſelves and relatives, or at moſt to thoſe little angles of the World that moſt immediately concern'd us, and which on due account bear very low proportions to the whole. There was no emergent diſtreſs, however remote, but it inlarg'd his Litany; every Years Harveſt and new birth of miſchiefs, which for ſeveral ones paſt conſtantly fell on the Orthodox and Loyal Party in the Nation, remov'd it ſelf from the ſanguinary Edicts of the Tyrant, to be tranſcrib'd and expiated by his pathetical Office of Devotion. In which Calender and Rubrick the thirtieth of January was ſure to have a very ſolemn place, and a peculiar Service prepar'd for it.

Nor did he only take to heart general National concernments, but even the more private Exigencies of the ſick and weak had a ſtaple intereſt in his Prayers. Among all which none had ſo liberal a part as they that merited them leaſt, yet wanted them moſt; his and (what was uſually the ſame thing) the Churches and God's Enemies. He never thought he had aſſur'd his forgiveneſs of injuries, unleſs he returned good for them; and though other opportunities of this beſt kind of retaliation might fail him, that of his interceſſions never did.

Three perſons there were who above all men by unworthy malice and impotent virulence had highly diſobliged him; but he in recompence of their guilt had a peculiar daily Prayer purpoſely in their behalf: and though in the openneſs of his Converſation with his moſt intimate acquaintance he confeſt thus much, yet he never nam'd the perſons, though probably that was the only thing which he conceal'd; it being his method to withhold nothing, eſpecially of confidence or privacy, from one he own'd as Friend.

And having mentioned the name of Friend, however incidentally, we muſt not leave it without homage; Friendſhip being the next ſacred thing unto Religion in the apprehenſions of our Excellent Doctor, a Vertue of which he was a paſſionate Lover, and with which he ever ſeem'd to have contracted Friendſhip. The union of Minds thereby produced he judg'd the utmoſt point of humane Happineſs, the very beſt production that Nature has in ſtore, or grows from Earth. So that with compaſſion he reflected on their ignorance who were ſtrangers to it, ſaying that ſuch muſt needs lead a pitiful inſipid herb-John-like life.

Upon this ground he us'd with all induſtrious art to recommend and propagate Friendſhip unto others; and where he ſaw ſeveral perſons that he judg'd capable of being made acquainted to mutual advantage, he would contrive that League; and where himſelf had kindneſs unto any ſo allied, he would ſtill enjoin them to be kinder to each other than to him; beſides, he ſtill labour'd to make all his Friends endeared to each of them; reſolving it to be an Errour bottomed on the common narrowneſs of Soul, which repreſented Amity like ſenſual love, to admit no Rivals, confin'd unto two perſons.

When he ever happen'd to ſee or be in Company with ſuch as had an intimate and hearty kindneſs for each other, he would be much tranſported in the contemplation of it, and where it was ſeaſonable, would openly acknowledge that his ſatisfaction.

In the liſt and number of his Friends there chanced to be three perſons, who having in their youth contracted a ſtrict intimacy, had undertaken the ſame profeſſion; and accordingly had the ſame common ſtudies and deſignments, and with theſe the opportunity through the late Troubles to live in view of each other: whom for that reaſon he was us'd with an obliging envy to pronounce the moſt happy men the Nation had.

Accordingly he profeſt that for his particular he had no ſuch way of enjoying any thing as by reflection from the perſon whom he loved: ſo that his friends being happy was the readieſt way to make him ſo. Therefore when one eminently near to him in that relation was careleſs of health, his moſt preſſing argument was his complaint of unkindneſs to him. And this way of meaſuring felicities was ſo natural to him, that it would occur even in the moſt trivial inſtances: when there has been any thing at the Table peculiarly wholſome in relation to his infirmities, if his Friend, who was in a like weak condition, forbare to eat of it in civility to him, he would with vehemence of grief reſent it as his ſingular unhappineſs after ſo many profeſſions not to be believed, that he had a thouſand times rather that his Friend ſhould have that which was conducible to health, than to have it himſelf; and then aſſum'd, that if this were believ'd, it were impoſſible any one ſhould attempt to expreſs kindneſs by robbing him of his greateſt pleaſure.

The principal thing he contracted for in Friendſhip was a free uſe of mutual Admonition; which he confin'd not to the groſſer guilts which Enemies and common fame were likely to obſerve and mind men of, but extended it unto prudential failings, indecencies, and even ſuſpicious and barely doubtful actions: nay beyond that, unto thoſe vertuous ones which might have been improv'd and render'd better. He was us'd to ſay, it was a poor deſign of Friendſhip to keep the perſon he admitted to his breaſt only from being ſcandalous, as if the Phyſician ſhould endeavour only to ſecure his patient from the Plague. And what he thus articled for, he punctually himſelf perform'd, and exacted back again to be returned unto himſelf.

And if for any while he obſerv'd that no remembrance had been offer'd to him, he grew afraid and almoſt jealous of the omiſſion, ſuſpecting that the Courtier had ſupplanted the Friend, and therefore earneſtly inforc'd the obligation of being faithful in this point: and when with much ado ſomewhat of advertiſement was pick'd up, he receiv'd it always as a huge kindneſs; and though the whole ground of it happen'd to be miſtake, yet he ſtill return'd moſt affectionate thanks.

His good will when plac'd on any was ſo fix'd and rooted, that even ſupervening Vice, to which he had the greateſt deteſtation imaginable, could not eaſily remove it, the abhorrency of their Guilts leaving not only a charity but tenderneſs to their perſons; and, as he has profeſt, his concernment rather encreas'd than leſſened by this means, compaſſion being in that inſtance added unto love. There were but two things which (he would ſay) were apt to give check to his affections, Pride and Falſeneſs, where he ſaw theſe predominant, he thought he could never be a Friend to any purpoſe, becauſe he could never hope to do any good; yet even there he would intend his Prayers, ſo much the more, by how much the leſs he could do beſides. But where he ſaw a malleable honeſt temper, a Jacob's plain ſimplicity, nothing could there diſcourage him; and however inadvertency or paſſion, or haply ſome worſe ingredient, might fruſtrate his deſign, he would attend the mollia tempora, as he call'd them, thoſe gentle and more treatable opportunities which might at laſt be offer'd. He ſo much abhorr'd artifice and cunning, that he had prejudice to all concealments and pretenſions. He us'd to ſay he hated a Non-cauſa, and he had a ſtrange ſagacity in diſcovering it. When any with much circumlocution and contrivance had endeavour'd to ſhadow their main drift and purpoſe, he would immediately look through all thoſe miſts, and where 'twas in any degree ſeaſonable, would make it appear he did ſo: His charity of fraternal correption having only this caution or reſtraint, the hearer's intereſt, of which he judg'd, that when advice did not do good, 'twas hardly ſeparable from doing harm; and on this ground ſometimes he did deſiſt. But whereſoe're he gave an admonition, he prefac'd it always with ſuch demonſtrations of tenderneſs and good will, as could not fail to convince of the affectionate kindneſs with which 'twas ſent, though it could not of the convenience or neceſſity to embrace it. And this he gave as a general rule, and enforc'd by his Example, never to reprove in anger, or the leaſt appearance of it. If the paſſion were real, that then was evidently a fault, and the guilty perſon moſt unfit to be a Judge: if it were reſemblance only, yet even that would be ſo like to guilt, as probably to divert the Offender from the conſideration of his failance, to faſten on his Monitor; and make him think he was chid not becauſe he was in fault, but becauſe the other was angry.

Indeed the perſon who would not be ſome way mov'd with his advices muſt be ſtrangely inſenſate and ill-natur'd. Though his Exhortations had as much evidence and weight as words could give them, he had over and above a great advantage in his manner of ſpeaking: His little phraſe, Don't be ſimple, had more power to charm a paſſion than long harangues from others; and very many who lov'd not Piety in it ſelf, nor to be troubled with the news of it, would be well pleas'd to be invited and adviſ'd by him, and venerated the ſame matter in his language which they have derided in anothers.

He would ſay, he delighted to be lov'd, not reverenc'd; thinking that where there was much of the latter, there could not be enough of the former; ſomewhat of reſtraint and diſtance attending on the one, which was not well conſiſtent with the perfect freedom requiſite to the other. But as he was thus no Friend to ceremonious reſpect, he was an open Enemy to Flattery, eſpecially from a Friend, from whom he ſtarted to meet the ſlighteſt appearance of that ſervile kindneſs. Having upon occaſion communicated a purpoſe againſt which there happen'd to lie ſome objections, they being by a Friend of his repreſented to him, he immediately was convinced, and aſſumed other Counſels. But in proceſs of diſcourſe it happen'd ſomething fell in that brought to mind a paſſage of a late Sermon of the Doctor's, which that perſon having been affected with, innocently mentioned ſuch apprehenſions of it, and ſo paſt on to talk of other matters. The next day the Doctor having recollected that probably the approbation given to the paſſage of the Sermon might be an after-deſign to allay the plain-dealing which preceded it, expoſtulated his ſurmiſe, proteſting that nothing in the world could more avert his love, and deeply diſoblige him, than ſuch unfaithfulneſs. But being aſſur'd that there was no ſuch art or contrivance meant, he gladly found and readily yielded himſelf to have been miſtaken. In other caſes he was no way inclinable to entertain doubts of his Friends kindneſs: but if any irregularity chanc'd to intervene, and cauſe miſapprehenſions, he gave them not leave to root and faſten by concealment, but immediately produc'd his ground of jealouſy; and exacted the like meaſure back again, if his own proceedings fell at any time under a doubtful or unkind appearance. This he thought a juſtice eſſential to Friendſhip, without which it could not poſſibly ſubſiſt: For we think not fit to condemn the moſt notorious Malefactor before he hath had licence to propoſe his Plea; and ſure 'tis more ſtrangely barbarous to treat a Friend, or rather Friendſhip it ſelf, with leſs regard.

To the performances of Friendſhip he hated all mercenary returns, whereof he was ſo jealous, as hardly to leave place for gratitude. Love, he ſaid, was built upon the union and ſimilitude of minds, and not the bribery of gifts and benefits. So generous was he herein, that he has oft profeſt, he admitted retributions of good turns, yet not ſo much on any ſcore, as that his Friend might have the pleaſure of being kind.

There was a perſon of quality, a great and long ſufferer in the late times of tryal, to whom the Doctor had frequently ſent ſupplies, and continued ſo to do, till there happened at laſt a change in the condition of the correſpondent, ſuch a one as, if it did not ſuperſede the need of farther aſſiſtance, yet gave promiſe of an approaching affluence; whereupon the Doctor fear'd the adding a new obligation in this conjuncture of affairs might ſeem a piece of deſign rather than kindneſs or charity: and though this ſuggeſtion was not of force to divert his purpoſe, it prov'd ſufficient to ſuſpend it, till by inquiry he found his deſign'd preſent would be a relief, and then he thought it an impertinence to conſider what it could be call'd beſides.

But doing good to relatives, or being kind unto acquaintance were low expreſſions of this Vertue we exhibit. Miſery and Want, where-ere he met with them, ſufficiently endear'd the Object. His Alms was as exuberant as his Love; and in Calamities to the Exigence he never was a ſtranger, whatever he might be to the man that ſuffer'd. So that ſeveral were ſurpriz'd, and ſome amaz'd at his bounty; and I have been aſſur'd by a learned and ſober perſon employ'd in this affair, that his beneficiaries frequently made it their wonder how the Doctor ſhould either know of them, or their diſtreſs; and lookt on his Errand, who was employed to bring relief, as a Viſion rather than a real bounty.

And here, to ſecure his Charities, the firſt preparative was to leave himſelf no motive to reſiſt or ſlight the opportunities of giving; which he compaſs'd by being a Steward to himſelf as well as unto God, and parting ſtill with the propriety of a ſet portion of his Eſtate, that when at any time he relieved the wants of any, he might become no whit the poorer by his gift, have only the content of giving, and the eaſe of being rid of keeping anothers money. The rate and ſumme of what he thus devoted was the tenth of all his income; wherein he was ſo ſtrictly punctual, that commonly the firſt thing he did was to compute and ſeparate the poor mans ſhare. To this he added every Week five ſhillings, which had been his loweſt proportion in the heat of the War in Oxford, when he liv'd upon his Penſehurſt ſtock, and had no viſible means or almoſt poſſibility of ſupply. Over and above this he compleated the devotions of his Weekly Faſt by joining Alms thereto, and adding twenty ſhillings to the poor man's heap.

Theſe were his debts to Charity, the eſtabliſh'd fixt revenue of the indigent; in the diſpenſation of which he was ſo religiouſly careful, that if at any time he happen'd to be in doubt whether he had ſet apart his charitable proportions, he always paſt ſentence againſt himſelf, reſolving it much better to run the hazard of having pay'd the ſame Debt twice, than to incur the poſſibility of not having done it once. But beyond theſe he had his Free-will Offerings, and thoſe proportion'd more by the occaſion of giving, than the ſurpluſage he had to give. His poor man's bag had ſo many mouths, and thoſe ſo often open'd, that it frequently became quite empty: but its being ſo never diverted him from relieving any that appear'd in need; for in ſuch ſeaſons he choſe to give in more liberal proportions than at others.

In the time of the War at Oxford, to paſs by other leſſer Reliefs, and many great ones, which his induſtrious concealment has preſerv'd from all notice of the moſt diligent enquiry, though he were then at a very low ebb, he furniſh'd an indigent Friend with ſixty pound, which never was repay'd him: as alſo upon another ſcore he parted with twenty pound, and another conſiderable ſumme beſides that: and to one in diſtreſs about the ſame time and on the ſame occaſion an hundred pound.

Inſtead of hiding his face from the poor, 'twas his practice ſtill to ſeek for theirs. Thoſe perſons whom he truſted with (his greateſt ſecret and greateſt buſineſs) his Charity, ſeldom had recourſe to him, but he would make enquiry for new Penſioners: and though he had in ſeveral parts of the Nation thoſe whom he employ'd to find out indigent perſons, and diſpoſe his largeſs to them, and though the Tyranny that then prevail'd made every day ſtore of ſuch; his covetous bounty ſtill graſp'd for more. Beſides his ordinary proviſion for the neigbouring poor, and thoſe that came to look him out in his retirement, (which were not few; for that the Liberal man dwells always in the Road) his Catalogue had an eſpecial place for ſequeſtred Divines, their Wives and Orphans, for young Students in the Univerſities, and alſo thoſe Divines that were abroad in baniſhment: Where over and above his frequent occaſional reliefs to the laſt of theſe, the exil'd Clergy, beſides what he procur'd from others, he ſent conſtantly over Year by Year a very conſiderable Summe, ſuch a one as men of far greater revenues do not uſe upon any occaſion to put into the Corban, and give away, much leſs as a troubleſome excreſcence every Year prune off, and caſt from their Eſtates.

Now if we enquire into the ſtock and fountain that was to feed all theſe diſburſements, 'twas at his flight from Penſehurſt barely three hundred pounds; which, at the ſale of a Leaſe left him for his Portion from his Father, and the aſſiſtance of his Prebend in Chriſt-Church, after all his laviſh Charities during thoſe Years, was near upon a thouſand. The taking of Uſe though he judg'd lawful, yet he never approv'd by practice, but lent ſtill gratis both to Friends and Strangers. The only other way he had of income was the buying of Leaſes for Years, and the Printing of his Books; from the latter of which when there is defaulk'd the many whole Editions he had nothing for, the charge he was at in the ſending of his Copies before he printed them unto his Friends for their animadverſions and advices, his ſending them ſheet by ſheet when printed, and ſurveying the reviſes, and the great numbers he gave away to his acquaintance, it will appear that the remainder was but a ſlight matter. As for private contributions or aſſiſt-

ance of that kind, he had never any: for though there were many who would gladly have made thoſe oblations, yet he induſtriouſly prevented them by publick avowing that he needed not. In which refuſal he was ſo peremptory, that when being in Oxford made Priſoner at the Sign of the Bear, thence to be ſent immediately to Wallingford-Caſtle, a Gentleman perfectly a ſtranger to him, and coming by chance to the Inn, and hearing of his condition, having fifty pieces by him, would needs have preſented them to him; though the Doctor had before him the barbarous uſage of his Brethren, clap'd on Shipboard under Hatches, the like to which he might probably enough meet with; and though this extraordinary occurrence ſeem'd to carry with it ſomewhat of providential deſignment; yet he wholly refus'd the offer, as afterwards he did a far greater Summe from a perſon of honour that courted him with it. Only one twenty pound he was ſurpriz'd by, and thought fit to accept, which after ſome diſpute with himſelf he did upon theſe two grounds: Firſt, that he might not gratifie the pride from whence he was us'd to ſay mens reluctancies to receive benefits proceeded; and ſecondly, that he might not give the Gentleman the diſcomfiture of ſeeing he had made an unſeaſonable Offer.

But with all this diſproportioned Expence unto Revenue (a thing which after a very deliberate and ſtrict enquiry remains riddle ſtill, and an event next door to miracle) the Doctor daily improv'd in his Eſtate, and grew in ſpight of all his liberality rich, being worth at the time of his death about 1500 l. which yet we are not to marvel ſhould be ſtrange to us, ſince it was ſo to the Doctor himſelf, who often profeſt to wonder at it, and thereupon would apply this Axiome, that half is more than the whole, his mean Revenue by being ſcattered in the worſt of times growing upon him, when others that had great ones, by griping made them leſs, and grew ſtark Beggars.

As the Doctor was thus charitable, ſo was he gentile and liberal; his openneſs of hand in Secular occaſions was proportionable to that in Sacred. When any one had ſent him a ſlight preſent of Apples or the like, his reward would uſually much exceed the value; and he would be ſo well pleaſed to have ſuch an occaſion of giving to a ſervant, ſaying, Alas, poor Soul, I warrant he is glad of this little matter, that this ſeem'd a part of the ſender's Courteſie. Thus if there happen'd any other occaſion of giving, or of gratifying, or advancing publick works, (for inſtance the great Bible, upon which he was out 50 l. and re-imburſt himſelf only by ſelling two Copies) he would be ſure to do it at a free and highly-ingenuous rate. So that he was ſparing only to himſelf, and that upon no other principle, but thereby to be liberal to thoſe he lov'd better than himſelf, the neceſſitous and poor. A pregnant inſtance whereof may be, that the Doctor upon occaſion calculating his Expences on himſelf, found them to be not above five pound in the Year.

Beſides this, he had a further impediment to Riches, an eaſineſs which alone has waſted other mens Eſtates; he commonly making thoſe he dealt with their own Arbitrators, and if they ſeriouſly profeſs'd they could go no nigher, he deſcended to their terms, ſaying commonly, that this traſh was not worth much ado. And beyond this he was ſo careleſs after Bargains, that he never receiv'd ſcript of Paper of any to whom he lent, nor Bond of any for performance of Covenants, till very lately from two perſons, when he found it neceſſary to uſe that method with them. He was us'd to ſay, that if he thought men Knaves, he would not deal with them; and if indeed they were ſo, it was not all his Circumſpection that could prevent a Cheat: On the other ſide, if they were honeſt, there needed no ſuch caution. And poſſibly if we conſider the whole matter, there was not ſuch imprudence in the manage as at firſt appears: for Bonds would have ſignified little to him, who in the beſt times would ſcarce have put them in ſuit; but would certainly have ſtarv'd before he would have made an application to thoſe Judicatories which of late prevail'd, and uſurp'd the protection as well as the poſſeſſion of mens rights, and were injurious not only in their Oppreſſions but Reliefs.

In thoſe black days, being charg'd with the debt of about fifty or ſixty pound formerly by him paid, being offer'd a Releaſe if he would take his Oath of Payment, he thought the condition too unequal, and was reſolv'd to double his payment rather than perform it: but a farther enquiry having clear'd the Account, he incurr'd not that penalty.

To a Friend of his who by the falſeneſs of a correſpondent whom he truſted was reduc'd to ſome extremity, and enquir'd what courſe he took to eſcape ſuch uſage, the Doctor wrote as follows;

To your doubt concerning my ſelf, I thank God I am able to anſwer you, that I never ſuffer'd in my life for want of hand or ſeal, but think I have far'd much better than they that have always been careful to ſecure themſelves by theſe cautions. I remember I was wont to reproach an honeſt Fellow-Prebend of mine, that whenſoever a Siege was near, always ſent away what he moſt valued to ſome other Garriſon or Friend, and ſeldom ever met with any again, the ſollicitude was ſtill their ruine: Whereas I venturing my ſelf and my Cabinet in the ſame bottom, never loſt any thing of this kind. And the like I have practis'd in this other Inſtance. Whom I truſted to be my friend, all I had was in his power, and by God's bleſſing I was never deceived in my truſt.

And here amidſt all theſe unlikelihoods and ſeeming impoſſibilities, Riches thruſt themſelves upon him, and would take no refuſal: it pleaſing God, ſince he had exemplified the advices of his Practical Catechiſm to the duties of Alms and charitable diſtributions, in him alſo to make good and ſignally exemplify the aſſurance he there and elſewhere made in the behalf of Almighty God upon ſuch performance, the giving affluence of temporal wealth. Nor was he the ſingle inſtance of this truth; as he had Proſelytes to the ſpeculative verity, he had Partiſans alſo of the effect and real iſſue of it. About four years ſince a perſon of good Eſtate, and without charge of Children, coming to viſit the Doctor, among other diſcourſe happen'd to ſpeak of the late Dean of Worceſter, Doctor Potter (whoſe memory, for his remarkable Charity and all other excellencies befitting his Profeſſion and Dignity in the Church, is precious.) This Gentleman there related, that formerly enquiring of the Dean how it was poſſible for one that had ſo great a charge of Children, was ſo hoſpitable in his Entertainment, and profuſe in Liberality, not only to ſubſiſt, but to grow rich; he anſwered, that ſeveral Years before he happen'd to be preſent at a Sermon at St. Paul's Croſs, where the Preacher recommending the Duty of Alms and plentiful giving, aſſured his Auditory that that was the certaineſt way to compaſs Riches. He mov'd therewith, thenceforward reſolv'd diligently to follow the counſel and expect the iſſue; which was ſuch as now created ſo much wonder. It fortun'd that at that time when this was telling, the Doctor's Δευτεραι φροντιδες were newly come out, and therewith this Sermon of the Poor man's tithing. He therefore willing to improve the opportunity, confeſt that he himſelf was that Preacher which Doctor Potter referr'd to, and that there was the very Sermon: which immediately giving to this Viſitant, he deſir'd Almighty God it might have the like effect on him; and ſo after a ſhort civility diſmiſt him.

As to the way and very manner of his Charity, even that was a part of his donation and largeſs. One great care of his was to diſpoſe of his reliefs ſo as to be moſt ſeaſonable; to which purpoſe he had his Spies and Agents ſtill imployed to give him punctual notice of the occurrents in their ſeveral ſtations. His next endeavour was to diſpenſe them ſo as to be moſt endearing. To perſons that had been of quality he conſulted to relieve their modeſty as well as needs, taking order they ſhould rather find than receive Alms; and knowing well they were provided for, ſhould not yet be able to gueſs by what means they were ſo. To thoſe who were aſſiſted immediately from his hand, he over and above beſtow'd the Charities of his familiar and hearty kindneſs: in the expreſſiveneſs of which he was us'd to ſay that 'twas a moſt unreaſonable and unchriſtian thing to deſpiſe any one for his poverty; but much more by the pleaſure and tranſport which the very act of giving transfus'd into him: which whoſoever noted, ſtood in need of no other proof of the truth of his uſual affirmation, that 'Twas one of the greateſt ſenſualities in the World to give. Upon which conſideration he often took occaſion to magnify the exceeding indulgence of God, that had annex'd future rewards to that which was ſo amply its own recompence. Another circumſtance in the Doctor's Liberality not to be paſs'd over was his choice of what he gave; his care that it ſhould not be of things vile and refuſe, but of the very beſt he had. It happen'd that a Servant in the Family being troubled with the Gout, the Doctor gave order that he ſhould have ſome of the Plaiſter which he us'd in the like extremity: but the ſtore of that being almoſt ſpent, the perſon intruſted in this office gave of another ſort, which was of ſomewhat leſs reputation. Which practice the Doctor within a while coming to know, was extremely troubled at it, and complain'd of that unſeaſonable kindneſs unto him, which diſregarded the preſſing intereſts and wants of another perſon, and thereby gave him a diſquiet parallel to that which a fit of the Gout would have done.

But beſides this of giving, the Alms of lending had an eminent place in the practice as well as judgment of the Doctor. When he ſaw a man honeſt and induſtrious, he would truſt him with a Summe, and let him pay it again at ſuch times and in ſuch proportions as he found himſelf able: withal when he did ſo, he would add his Counſel too, examine the perſons condition, and contrive with him how the preſent Summe might be moſt advantageouſly diſpos'd; ſtill cloſing the diſcourſe with Prayer for God's bleſſing, and after that diſmiſſing him with infinite affability and kindneſs. In which performance as he was exuberant to all, ſo moſt eſpecially to ſuch as were of an inferiour degree; giving this for a Rule to thoſe of his Friends that were of Eſtate and Quality, to treat their poor Neighbours with ſuch a chearfulneſs, that they may be glad to have met with them.

And

And as upon the grounds of his moſt gentile and obliging humanity he never ſuffer'd any body to wait that came to ſpeak with him, though upon a mere viſit, but broke off his beloved Studies, upon which his intention was ſo great, that he extremely grudg'd to be interrupted by any bodily concernment of his own, and ſo would often intermit his preſcribed Walks and Suppers in purſuance of it: ſo with a more exceeding alacrity he came down when it was told him that a poor Body would ſpeak with him. Such of all others he lov'd not to delay; and ſo much he deſired that others ſhould do the ſame, that when the Lady of the Houſe, diverted either by the attractives of his Diſcourſe, or ſome other occaſion, delay'd the Clients of her Charity in Alms, or that other moſt commendable one in Surgery, he in his Friendly way would chide her out of the room.

As Poverty thus recommended to the Doctor's care and kindneſs, in an eſpecial manner it did ſo when Piety was added to it: upon which ſcore a mean perſon in the Neighbourhood, a Weaver by Trade, but by weakneſs diſabled much to follow that or any other employment, was extremely his Favourite. Him he us'd with a moſt affectionate freedom, gave him ſeveral of his Books, and examined his Progreſs in them; invited him, nay importun'd him, ſtill to come to him for whatever he needed, and at his Death left him ten pounds as a Legacy. A little before which fatal time, He and the Lady P. being walking, his Client happen'd to come by, to whom after the Doctor had talked a while in his uſual friendly manner, he let him paſs, yet ſoon after call'd him with theſe words, If it ſhould pleaſe God that I ſhould be taken from this place, let me make a bargain between my Lady and you, that you be ſure to come to her with the ſame freedome you would to me for any thing you want: and ſo with a moſt tender kindneſs gave his Benediction. Then turning to the Lady, ſaid, Will you not think it ſtrange I ſhould be more affected for parting from this poor man than from you? His treating him when he came to viſit him in his Sickneſs was parallel hereto in all reſpects.

Such another Acquaintance he had at Penſehurſt, whom he likewiſe remembred in his Will, and to whom he was us'd to ſend his more practical Books, and to write extreme kind Letters, particularly enquiring of his condition and Childrens: and when he heard he had a Boy fit to put out to School, allow'd him a penſion to that purpoſe: and alſo with great contentment receiv'd from him his kind, though ſcarce legible, returns. In this place I cannot omit to add a very unexpected account of both theſe Perſons beforemention'd; as a great inſtance how unſecure our vertue is in this World, howe're eſtabliſh'd it may ſeem, and removed out of the way and hazards of temptation. Both the one and the other of theſe two, whether out of Pride that their Exemplary Piety had recommended them to the Doctor, and thereby put them into eſteem with others; or that his awe ceaſing to be upon them, they gave way to thoſe vicious inclinations which before they ſuppreſt or concealed, or ſome other more unaccountable and hidden cauſe, upon a ſudden after the Doctor died, which now immediately happen'd, to the amazement of all that formerly knew them, turned open debauchees; and one of them after ſeveral diſorders in the Country, went up to London, where he join'd himſelf to the worſt Company of that place, and turn'd Hector, with the addition of the liberal Art of Coining; but divine vengeance remarkably purſued theſe two unhappy men, who after they had paſt a great part of their Life under the beſt advantages of inſtitution, and ſeeming practice of ſtrict Duty, made ſuch a change of their way of living, and Shipwrack of their Souls: the one being taken up drown'd in a ſmall Brook near his Houſe, not without violent ſuſpicions that he had thrown himſelf wilfully into the Water, to make himſelf away; the other, if my intelligence fail not, coming to a more ſhameful end, being Hang'd at Tyburn. The pretences of theſe perſons to Religion were ſo remarkable, and their Apoſtaſie from it, with the vengeance that followed, ſo extraordinary, the inſtruction naturally flowing from the whole, ſo very uſeful; that I preſume this digreſſion will not be thought an impertinence.

To return to our former ſubject of Diſcourſe, this exuberant kindneſs and condeſcenſion in the Doctor will not ſeem ſtrange to any who ſhall conſider how low a rate he put upon thoſe uſual diſtinctives, Birth or Riches; and withal how high a value on the Souls of men: for them he had ſo unmanageable a paſſion, that it often broke out into words of this effect, which had with them ſtill in the delivery an extraordinary vehemence, O what a glorious thing, how rich a prize for the expence of a man's whole life were it to be the inſtrument of reſcuing any one Soul? Accordingly in the purſuit of this deſign he not only waſted himſelf in perpetual toil of ſtudy, but moſt diligently attended the Offices of his Calling, reading daily the Prayers of the Church, Preaching conſtantly every Sunday, and that many times when he was in ſo ill a condition of health, that all beſides himſelf thought it impoſſible, at leaſt very unfit, for him to do it. His Subjects were ſuch as had greateſt influence on Practice, which he preſt with moſt affectionate tenderneſs, making tears part of his Oratory. And if he obſerv'd his documents to have fail'd of the deſired effect, it was matter of great ſadneſs to him; where inſtead of accuſing the parties concern'd, he charg'd himſelf that his Performances were incompetent to the deſigned End, and would ſolicitouſly enquire what he might do to ſpeak more plainly or more movingly; whether his extemporary wording might not be a defect, and the like. Beſides this, he liberally diſpens'd all other ſpiritual aids: from the time that the Children of the Family became capable of it till his Death, he made it a part of his daily buſineſs to inſtruct them, allotting the interval betwixt Prayers and Dinner to that work, obſerving diligently the little deviations of their manners, and applying remedies unto them. In like ſort, that he might enſnare the Servants alſo to their benefit, on Sundays in the Afternoon he Catechis'd the Children in his Chamber, giving liberty, nay invitation, to as many as would to come and hear, hoping they haply might admit the truths obliquely level'd, which baſhfulneſs perſuaded not to enquire for, leſt they thereby ſhould own the fault of former inadvertence. Beſides he publickly declar'd himſelf ready and deſirous to aſſiſt any perſon ſingle, and to that purpoſe having particularly invited ſuch to come at their leiſurable hours, when any did ſo, he us'd all arts of encouragement and obliging condeſcenſion; inſomuch that having once got the Scullion in his Chamber upon that Errand, he would not give him the uneaſineſs of ſtanding, but made him ſit down by his ſide: though in other caſes amidſt his infinite Humility, he knew well how to aſſert the dignity of his place and Function from the approaches of Contempt. Upon this ground of ardent love to Souls, a very diſconſolate and almoſt deſponding perſon happening ſome years ſince to come to him, there to unload the burthen of his mind, he kept him privately in his Chamber for ſeveral dayes with a paternal kindneſs, anſwering every ſcruple which that unhappy temper of Mind too readily ſuggeſted, and with unwearied patience attending for thoſe little Arguments which in him were much more eaſily ſilenc'd than ſatisfied. This practice continued, till he at laſt diſcovered his impreſſions had in good proportion advanc'd to the deſir'd effect; which proceeded carefully in this Method, that Duty ſtill preceded Promiſe, and ſtrict Endeavour only founded Comfort.

On the ſame motive of this higheſt Charity, when ſome years ſince a young man, (who by the encouragement of an Uncle, formerly the Head of an Houſe in Oxford, had been deſign'd to Learning, but by his Ejectment at the Viſitation was diverted from that courſe to a Country-life, and being ſo, to engage him therein was alſo married and had Children;) amidſt his toilſome avocations continued to employ his vacant hours in ſtudy, and happening on ſome of the Doctor's Writings, was ſo affected with them, as to leave his Wife and Family and Employment, to ſeek out the Doctor himſelf, whom being accordingly addreſt unto, the Excellent Doctor met this unknown Romantick Undertaker with his accuſtom'd kindneſs, and moſt readily received this Votary and Proſelyte to Learning into his care and pupillage for ſeveral years, affording him all kind of aſſiſtance both in ſtudies and temporal ſupport, till he at laſt arrived at good proficiency in knowledge, and became an uſeful perſon in the Church.

Nor could this zeal to the eternal intereſts of Souls be ſuperſeded by any ſight of danger however imminent. The laſt year of the Doctor's Life, one in the Neighbourhood mortally ſick of the Small Pox, deſiring that he would come to him, as ſoon as he heard of it, though the Diſeaſe did then prove more than uſually fatal, and the Doctor's Age and Complexion threatned it particularly ſo to him, and though one might diſcern in his Countenance vigorous apprehenſions of the danger, he preſently ſuppreſs'd his fears, ſtaying only ſo long as to be ſatisfied whether the party was ſo ſenſible that a Viſit might poſſibly be of uſe, and being inform'd thereof, chearfully went; telling the perſon that happen'd to be preſent, whoſe dreads in his behalf were not ſo eaſily depoſited, that he ſhould be as much in God's hands in the ſick man's chamber as in his own: and not contented with going once, appointed the next day to have return'd again; which he had done, had not the Patients Death abſolv'd him of his promiſe.

So likewiſe when at another time a Gentleman of no very laudable life had in his Sickneſs deſir'd to ſpeak with the Doctor, which Meſſage through the negligence of the perſon employ'd was not deliver'd till he that ſent it was in the laſt agonies of Death; the Doctor was very much affected at it, paſſionately complaining of the brutiſhneſs of thoſe that had ſo little ſenſe of a Soul in that ſad ſtate: and pouring out his moſt fervent Prayers in his behalf, requeſted farther that by this example others, and in particular the Companions of that unhappy perſons Vice, might learn how improper a ſeaſon the time of Sickneſs, and how unfit a place the Death-Bed is for that one great important Work of Penitence, which was intended by Almighty God the one commenſurate work of the whole Life.

But though to advance the Spiritual concerns of all that could in any kind become receptive ceptive of the good he meant them was his unlimited designment and endeavour, yet to nourish and advance the early Vertue of young persons was his more chosen study: When he saw such a one, he would contrive and seek out ways to insinuate and endear himself, lay hold of every opportunity to represent the beauty, pleasure and advantage of a pious life; and on the other side to express the toil, the danger and the mischief of brutal sensuality. Withal he would be still performing Courtesies, thereby to oblige of very gratitude to him, obedience and duty unto God.

Where to pass by the many instances that he gave of this his Charity, it will not be amiss to insist on one as a specimen of the rest, which was thus. It happen'd during the Doctor's abode in Oxford in the War, that a young man of excellent faculties and very promising hopes in that place, by his love to Musick was engag'd in the Company of such who had that one good quality alone to recommend their other ill ones. The Doctor finding this, though otherwise a stranger to the person, gave him in exchange his own; and taking him as it were into his own bosom, directed him to Books, and read them with him, particularly a great part of Homer, at a Night dispatching usually a Book, and if it prov'd Holiday, then two; where his Comical expression was when one Iliad was done, to say, Come, because 'tis Holiday let us be jovial and take the other Iliad, reflecting on the mode of the former Debauches, whose word it was, 'Tis Holiday, let's take the other Pint.

And as the Doctor labour'd in the rescue of single persons, he had an Eye therein to multitudes; for whereever he had planted the Seeds of Piety, he presently cast about to extend and propagate them thereby to others: engaging all his Converts not to be asham'd of being reputed innocent, or to be thought to have a kindness for Religion; but own the seducing men to God with as much confidence at least as others use when they are Factors for the Devil: And in stead of lying on the guard and the defensive part, he gave in charge to chuse the other of the assailant. And this method he commended not only as the greatest service unto God and to our Neighbour, but as the greatest security to our selves; it being like the not expecting of a threatned War at home, but carrying it abroad into the Enemies Country. And nothing in the Christian's Warfare he judg'd so dangerous as a truce, and the cessation of hostility. Withal, parly and holding intelligence with guilt in the most trivial things, he pronounc'd as treason to our selves, as well as unto God: for while, saith he, we fight with Sin, in the fiercest shock of opposition we shall be safe; for no attempts can hurt us till we treat with the assailants: Temptations of all sorts having that good quality of the Devil in them, to fly when they are resisted. Besides, whereas young people are us'd to varnish o're their non-performance and forbearance of good actions by a pretence unto humility and bashful modesty, saying they are asham'd for to do this or that, as being not able for to do it well, he assur'd them this was arrant pride and nothing else.

Upon these grounds his Motto of instruction to young persons was, Principiis obsta, and Hoc age, to withstand the overtures of ill, and be intent and serious in good; to which he join'd a third advice, to be furnish'd with a Friend. Accordingly at a solemn leave-taking of one of his disciples, he thus discours'd: I have heard say of a man who upon his Death-Bed being to take his farewel of his Son, and considering what course of life to recommend that might secure his innocence, at last enjoin'd him to spend his time in making of Verses and in dressing a Garden; the old man thinking no temptation could creep into either of these Employments. But I instead of these expedients will recommend these other, the doing all the good you can to every person, and the having of a Friend; whereby your life shall not only be rendred innocent, but withal extremely happy.

Now after all these Excellencies, it would be reason to expect that the Doctor, conscious of his Merit, should have look'd if not on others with contempt, yet on himself with some complacency and fair regard: but it was far otherwise; there was no Enemy of his, however drunk with Passion, that had so mean an Esteem either of him or of his Parts as he had both of the one and other. As at his first appearing in publick he was clearly over-reach'd and cheated in the owning of his Books; so when he found it duty to go on in that his toilsome trade of Writing, he was wont seriously to profess himself astonish'd at their reception into the World, especially, as he withal was pleas'd to add, since others fail'd herein, whose performances were infinitely beyond any thing which he was able to do.

From this opinion of his mediocrity at best, and the resolution of not making any thing in Religion publick before it had undergone all Tests, in point not only of truth but prudence, proceeded his constant practice of subjecting all his Writings to the censure and correction of his Friends, engaging them at that time to lay aside all their kindness, or rather to evidence their love by being rigidly censorious. There is scarce any Book he wrote that had not first travail'd on this Errand, of being severely dealt with, to several parts of the Nation before it saw the light; nay so scrupulous was the Doctor herein, that he has frequently, upon ſuggeſtion of ſomething to be changed, return'd his Papers the ſecond time unto his Cenſor, to ſee if the alteration was exactly to his mind, and generally was never ſo well pleas'd as when his Packets return'd with large acceſſions of objectings and advertiſements. And in this point he was ſo ſtrangely adviſeable, that he would advert unto the judgment of the meaneſt perſon, uſually ſaying, that there was no one that was honeſt to him by whom he could not profit; withal, that he was to expect Readers of ſeveral ſorts, and if one illiterate man was ſtumbled, 'twas likely others of his form would be ſo too, whoſe intereſt, when he writ to all, was not to be paſs'd over. Beſides, thoſe leſs-diſcerning Obſervators, if they could do nothing elſe, he ſaid could ſerve to draw teeth; that is, admoniſh if ought were ſaid with paſſion or ſharpneſs, a thing the Doctor was infinitely jealous of in his Writings. Many years ſince he having ſent one of his Tracts unto an eminent perſon in this Church, to whom he bore a very high and merited regard, to be look'd over by him. He ſending it back without any amendment, but with a profuſe Complement of liking every thing; the good Doctor was much affected with the diſappointment, only comforted himſelf herein, that he had reap'd this benefit, to have learn'd never to ſend his Papers to that hand again: which reſolution to his dying day he kept.

Nor was this caution before the publiſhing of his Books ſufficient, but was continued after it, the Doctor importuning ſtill his Friends to ſend him their Objections, if in any point they were not ſatisfied; which he with great indifference conſider'd in his reviews and ſubſequent Editions: however took more kindly the moſt impertinent exception than thoſe advertiſements of a different kind which brought Encomiums and laviſh praiſes, which he heard with as great diſtaſt as others do the moſt virulent Reproaches.

A farther proof of this low eſteem the Doctor had of himſelf (if ſuch were poſſible) would be meekneſs to thoſe that ſlighted him and diſparag'd his abilities: this being the ſureſt indication that our Humility is in earneſt, when we are content to hear ill Language not only from our ſelves but from our Enemies: which with how much indifference this inimitable perſon did, 'tis neither eaſie fully to deſcribe, nor to perſwade to juſt belief. The ſhort is, as he was never angry with his pertinacious Diſſenters for not being of his mind in points of ſpeculation; no more was he in the leaſt with his ſcornful Oppoſites for their being of it in their little value of his Perſon. And though he had, as well as other men, ſeeds of incitation in his natural temper, and more than others temptation to it in his daily and almoſt intolerable injuries; yet ſuch was the habitual maſtery he had gain'd over himſelf, that the ſtricteſt conſiderers of his actions have not in ten years perpetual converſation ſeen his Paſſion betray him to an indecent Speech.

Nor was his ſufferance of other kinds leſs exemplary than that he evidenc'd in the reception of Calumny and foul Reproach: for though Pain were that to which he was us'd to ſay he was of all things moſt a Coward, yet being under it he ſhew'd an eminent Conſtancy and perfect Reſignation.

At the approach of Sickneſs his firſt conſideration was, what Failing had provok'd the preſent Chaſtiſement, and to that purpoſe made his earneſt Prayer to God (and enjoin'd his Friends to do the like) to convince him of it; nor only ſo, but tear and rend away, though by the greateſt violence and ſharpeſt diſcipline, whatever was diſpleaſing in his Eyes, and grant not only patience, but fruitfulneſs under the rod. Then by repeated acts of ſubmiſſion would he deliver himſelf up into God's hands to do with him as ſeem'd him good; amidſt the ſharpeſt pains meekly invoking him, and ſaying, God's holy Will be done. And even then when on the rack of torture, would he be obſerving every circumſtance of allay: When 'twas the Gout, he would give thanks 'twas not the Stone or Cramp; when 'twas the Stone, he then would ſay 'twas not ſo ſharp as others felt, accuſing his impatience that it appear'd ſo bad to him as it did. And then when ſome degree of health was given, he exerted all his ſtrength in a return of grateful recognition to the Author of it, which he perform'd with a vivacious ſenſe and chearful piety, frequently reflecting on the Pſalmiſt's Phraſe, that it was a joyful thing to be thankful. Which his tranſport whoever ſhould attentively obſerve, would eaſily apprehend how poſſible it was for the infinite fruitions of another World to be made up by the perpetual act of grateful recognition, in giving lauds and ſinging praiſes unto God.

Upon this ſcore he was a moſt diligent Obſerver of every Bleſſing he receiv'd, and had them ſtill in readineſs to confront unto thoſe preſſures he at any time lay under. In the intermiſſions of his importunate maladies he would with full acknowledgment mention the great indulgence, That he who had in his Conſtitution the Cauſe of ſo much pain ſtill dwelling with him, ſhould yet by God's immediate interpoſing be reſcued from the Effect.

To facilitate yet more this his ſerenity and calm of Mind, he lay'd this Rule before him, which prov'd of great uſe, Never to trouble himſelf with the fore-ſight of future Events, being reſolv'd of our Saviour's Maxime, that Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof: and that it were the greateſt folly in the World to perplex ones ſelf with that which perchance will never come to paſs; but if it ſhould, then God who ſent it will diſpoſe it to the beſt; moſt certainly to his Glory, which ſhould ſatisfie us in our reſpects to Him; and, unleſs it be our fault, as certainly to our Good, which, if we be not ſtrangely unreaſonable, muſt ſatisfie in reference unto our ſelves and private intereſts. Beſides all this, in the very diſpenſation God will not fail to give ſuch allays which (like the cool gales under the Line) will make the greateſt heats of ſufferance very ſupportable. In ſuch occaſions he uſually ſubjoin'd Epictetus his Dilemma, Either the thing before us is in our power, or it is not: if it be, let us apply the Remedy, and there will be no motive for complaint; if it be not, the Grief is utterly impertinent, ſince it can do no good. As alſo from the ſame Author he annex'd this conſideration, that every thing has two handles; if the one prove hot, and not to be touch'd, we may take the other that's more temperate: And in every occurrent he would be ſure to find ſome cool handle that he might lay hold of.

And to enforce all this, he made a conſtant recourſe to the Experience of God's dealing with him in preceeding accidents, which however dreadful at a diſtance, at a nearer view loſt much of their terrour. And for others that he ſaw perplex'd about the manage of their difficult affairs, he was wont to ask them, when they would begin to truſt God, or permit him to govern the World. Beſides, unto himſelf and Friends he was wont ſolemnly to give this mandate, Quod ſis eſſe velis, nihilq; malis, in his Engliſh, to rather nothing; not only to be content or acquieſce, but be reſolv'd the preſent ſtate to be the very beſt that could be wiſh'd or phanſied.

And thus all private concernments he paſs'd over with a perfect indifference; the World and its appendages hanging ſo looſe about him, that he never took notice when any part dropt off, or ſate uneaſily. Herein indeed he was concern'd and render'd thoughtful, if ſomewhat interven'd that had a poſſibility of duty appendant to it; in which caſe he would be ſolicitous to diſcern where the obligation lay: but preſently reſcued himſelf from that diſquiet by his addreſſes unto God in Prayer and Faſting, which was his certain refuge in this as well other Exigents; and if the thing in queſtion were of moment, he call'd in the devotions of his Friends. Beſides this Caſe he own'd to have ſome kind of little diſcompoſure in the choice of things perfectly indifferent; for where there was nothing to determine him, the balance by hanging even became tremulous and by a propenſity to either ſide enclin'd to neither, making uſeleſs offers, but promoving nothing: which condition of mind he was wont to call the deliberation of Buridan's Aſs.

Upon which grounds of all other things he moſt diſlik'd the being left to make a choice; and hugely applauded the ſtate of ſubjection to a Superiour, where an obſequious diligence was the main ingredient of Duty: as alſo he did the ſtate of ſubjection unto preſſure, as a privilege and bleſſing. And though he pray'd as much and withal as heartily as any perſon for the return of the Nation from Captivity, he always firſt premis'd the being made receptive of ſuch Mercy by the intervention of Repentance. He would often both publickly and privately aſſert ſolemnly, That proſperous iniquity would not be deliverance, but the moſt formidable judgment: That the Nation during its preſſures was under the Diſcipline of God, given up to Satan by a kind of Eccleſiaſtick Cenſure; and ſhould the Almighty diſmiſs us from his hands, and put us into our own, give us up to our ſelves, with a Why ſhould you be ſmitten any more? this were of all inflictions the moſt dreadful. Though with admirable equanimity he could run over the black Annals of this unhappy Nation while its Calamities were reckon'd up, he could ſcarce hear the ſlighteſt mention of its incorrigible guilt without diſſolving into tears; eſpecially when he happened to advert unto the impudence of that Hypocriſie which reconcil'd Godlineſs and Villany, and made it poſſible for men to be Saints and Devils both together: whereby Religion grew ruinous to it ſelf, and beſides the ſcandal of ſuch Enormities committed in the face of the Sun, with ſuch pretence to Zeal and Holineſs, our Faith became inſtructed to confute and baffle Duty, the Creed and the Commandments, Belief and Practice being brought into the Liſts, and repreſented as incompatible; while the flames intended for the Sacred Lamps, the eſtabliſhment of Doctrinals and Speculative Divinity, burnt up the Altar and the Temple, conſumed not only Charity, but good nature too, and untaught the common documents of honeſt Heatheniſm.

And while this publick Soul in the contemplation of the Miſchief which our ſins both were themſelves and in their Iſſues; great in their provocation and fatal in their plagues, indulg'd unto his pious and generous Griefs: yet even then conſidering Judgment not to be more juſt than uſeful to the ſufferers, he found out means from that unlikely Topick to ſpeak comforts to himſelf and others.

In that laſt Criſis of our gaſping hopes, the defeat of the Cheſhire Forces, which promis'd all the Miſery conſequent to the ſway of a Senate gorg'd in blood, and yet ſtill thirſting more, and of a veterane Army compos'd of deſperate Fanaticks engag'd in equal guilts among themſelves, and equal hate againſt the other Party, and therewithal the Religion, Liberty and Being of the Nation; he thus addreſſes himſelf to the deſponding ſorrows of a Friend.

SIR,

I Have received your laſt, and acknowledge the great fitneſs of it to the preſent opportunities under which God hath pleas'd to place us. If we look about us, there was never any louder call to lamentation and bitter mourning; and the ſharpeſt accents of theſe are viſibly due to thoſe continued Provocations which appear to have wrought all our woe: yet is there not wanting ſome gleam of light, if we ſhall yet by God's grace be qualified to make uſe of it. It is the ſupream Privilege of Chriſtianity to convert the ſaddeſt evils into the moſt medicinal advantages, the Valley of Achor into the door of hope, the blackeſt Tempeſt into the moſt perfect διὰ· and it is certain you have an excellent opportunity now before you to improve and receive benefit by; and you will not deſpiſe that affection which attempts to tell you ſomewhat of it. It is plainly this; That all kind of Proſperity (even that which we moſt think we can juſtifie the moſt importunate purſuance of, the flouriſhing of a Church and Monarchy) is treacherous and dangerous, and might very probably tend to our great ills, and nothing is ſo entirely ſafe and wholeſome as to be continued under God's diſciplines. Thoſe that are not better'd by ſuch methods, would certainly be intoxicated and deſtroyed by the pleaſanter draughts; and thoſe that would ever ſerve God ſincerely in affluence, have infinitely greater advantages and opportunities for it in the adverſe fortune. Therefore let us all now adore and bleſs God's wiſeſt choices, and ſet vigorouſly to the task that lies before us, improving the preſent advantages, and ſupplying in the abundance of the inward beauty what is wanting to the outward luſtre of a Church; and we ſhall not fail to find that the Grots and Caves lie as open to the Celeſtial influences as the faireſt and moſt beautified Temples. We are ordinarily very willing to be rich, and flatter our ſelves that our aims are no other than to be enabled by much wealth to do much good; and ſome live to ſee themſelves confuted, want hearts when Wealth comes in greateſt abundance: ſo thoſe that never come to make the experiment, have yet reaſon to judge that God ſaw it fit not to lead them into temptation, leſt if they had been prov'd they ſhould have been found faithleſs. And the ſame judgment are we now oblig'd to paſs for our ſelves, and by what God appears to have choſen for us, to reſolve what he ſees to be abſolutely beſt for us; and it muſt be our greateſt blame and wretchedneſs, if what hath now befaln us be not effectually better for us, than whatever elſe even Piety could have ſuggeſted to us to wiſh or pray for. And then, I pray, judge candidly whether any thing be in any degree ſober or tolerable in any of us, beſide the one great neceſſary Wiſdom as well as Duty of Reſignation, and making God's choices ours alſo. I have been theſe three Weeks under reſtraint by the Gout and other pains, and am not yet on my legs, yet bleſſed be God have all cauſes of thanksgiving, none of repining. And I ſhall with confidence pray and hope that the great multitudes of perſons and families that are now under far ſharper exerciſes, will find as much greater allays and ſweetneſſes, and the black Cloud (as oft it hath done) vaniſh undiſcernibly.

And when this moſt unlikely Prophecy became fulfill'd, when that black Cloud he ſpoke of, contrary to all humane expectation, broke not in Tempeſt, but the faireſt Sunſhine that ever ſmil'd on this our Land, when our deſpairs and reſolute deſpondencies became unravel'd by a Miracle of Mercy, which after-ages will be as far from giving credit to in its endearing moſt improbable circumſtances, as this of ours (pardon the harſhneſs of a true compariſon) is from eſteeming at its merited rate; our excellent Patriot, and beſt of men, ſeeing the dawnings of this welcome day, paid down at once his greateſt thanks and heartieſt deprecations as a tribute to it, paſſionately fearing what he had more paſſionately wiſht for, ſuſpecting his own hopes and weeping over his fruitions.

As to his Sacred Majeſty, he look'd on His Return with pity and compaſſion, as bringing Him to that uneaſie, if not inſuperable, Task of ruling and reforming a licentious people; to that moſt irkſome ſufferance of being worried with the importunities of covetous and ambitious men, the reſtleſs care of meeting the deſigns of mutinous and diſcontented ſpirits: reſolving, His moſt wiſht Return could only be a bleſſing to his People, but unto him could not be ſo, but only on the ſcore, by having opportunities through glorious ſelf-denials to do good. And for all other perſons he ſaid, that having ſeriouſly conſidered what ſort of men would be better for the Change, he could not think of any. As for the Church, 'twas certain, Perſecution was generally the happieſt means of propagating that; ſhe then grew faſteſt when prun'd moſt: then of the beſt complexion and moſt healthy when fainting through loſs of blood. As to the Laity, in all their ſeveral ſtations and eſtates they had ſo much perverted the healthful diſpenſations of Judgment, that it was moſt improbable they ſhould make any tolerable uſe of Mercy. And laſtly, in reference to himſelf, himself, he resolv'd (though sure on weaker grounds) Affliction most conducible. During the current of that Tyranny, which for so many years we all groan'd under, he kept a constant equable serenity and unthoughtfulness in outward accidents: but the approaching Change gave him somewhat of pensive recollection, insomuch that discoursing of occurrents, he broke forth into these words, I must confess I never saw that time in all my life wherein I could so chearfully say my Nunc dimittis as now. Indeed I do dread Prosperity, I do really dread it. For the little good I am now able to do, I can do it with deliberation and advice: but if it please God I should live and be call'd to any higher Office in the Church, I must then do many things in a hurry, and shall not have time to consult with others, and I sufficiently apprehend the danger of relying on my own Judgment. Which words he spake with the greatest concernment of earnest melting passion as is imaginable. Accordingly it pleas'd Almighty God to deal; and having granted to his Servant the satisfaction of a full return and gracious answer to his Prayer in the then every-day-expected Reception of His Sacred Majesty, not to deny his other great request of not sharing a temporary advantage from it: but as his merits were far beyond those transitory ensnaring retributions, to remove him from them to those solid and unmixt Rewards, which could be nothing else than such, and would be such for ever.

But this sad part of our relation requiring to it self a fresh unwearied sorrow, and the Saint-like manner of this Excellent person's passage from the World being as exemplary and conducing to the uses of Survivers as the notice of his Life; we shall allow it a distinct appartment, and once again break off the thred of our Discourse, for to resume it in its proper unentangled Clue.

Section the Third.

AT the opening of the Year 1660, when every thing visibly tended to the reduction of His Sacred Majesty, and all persons in their several stations began to make way and prepare for it, the good Doctor was by the Fathers of the Church desir'd to repair to London, there to assist in the great Work of the composure of Breaches in the Church: Which Summons as he resolv'd unfit either to dispute or disobey, so could he not without much violence to his inclinations submit unto. But finding it his Duty, he diverted all the uneasiness of antipathy and aversation into a deliberate preparation of himself for this new Theater of affairs on which he was to enter. Where his first care was to fortifie his mind against the usual temptations of Business, Place, and Power. And to this purpose, besides his earnest Prayers to God for his assistance, and disposal of him entirely to his Glory, and a diligent survey of all his inclinations, and therein those which were his more open and less defensible parts, he farther call'd in and solemnly adjur'd that Friend of his with whom he had then the neareſt opportunity of Commerce, to study and examine the last ten Years of his Life, and with the justice due to a Christian Friendship to observe his failances of all kinds, and shew them to him: which being accordingly attempted, the product, after a diligent inquest, only proving the representation of such defects which might have past for Vertue in another person; his next prospect was abroad, what several ways he might do good unto the publick: and knowing that the Diocese of Worcester was by the favour of His Majesty design'd his Charge, he thought of several opportunities of Charity unto that place, and among others particularly cast in his mind for the repair of the Cathedral Church, and had lay'd the foundation of a considerable advance unto that work. Which early care is here mention'd as an instance of his inflamed desire of doing good, and singular zeal to the House of God, and the restoring of a decent Worship in a like decent place: For otherwise it was far from his Custom to look forward into future events, but still to attend and follow after Providence, and let every day bear its own Evil. And now considering that the Nation was under its great Crisis and most hopeful method of its Cure, which yet if palliate and imperfect would only make way to more fatal Sickness, he fell to his Devotions on that behalf, and made those two excellent Prayers which were publish'd immediately after his Death, as they had been made immediately before his Sickness, and were almost the very last thing he wrote.

Being in this state of mind fully prepar'd for that new course of life, which had nothing to recommend it to his taste but its unpleasantness, (the best allective unto him) he expected hourly the peremptory mandate which was to call him forth of his belov'd Retirements.

But in the instant a more importunate, though infinitely more welcome, Summons ingag'd him on his last Journey: For on the fourth of April he was seiz'd by a sharp fit of the Stone, with thoſe ſymptoms that are uſual in ſuch caſes; which yet upon the voidance of a Stone ceaſed for that time. However on the eighth of the ſame month it return'd again with greater violence; and though after two days the pain decreas'd, the ſuppreſſion of Urine yet continued, with frequent Vomitings, and a diſtenſion of the whole Body, and likewiſe ſhortneſs of breath, upon any little motion. When, as if he had by ſome inſtinct a certain knowledge of the iſſue of his Sickneſs, he almoſt at its firſt approach conceiv'd himſelf in hazard: and whereas at other times, when he ſaw his Friends about him fearful, he was us'd to reply chearfully, that he was not dying yet; now in the whole current of his Diſeaſe, he never ſaid any thing to avert ſuſpicion, but addreſt unto its Cure, telling his Friends with whom he was, that he ſhould leave them in God's hands, who could ſupply abundantly all the aſſiſtance they could either expect or deſire from him, and who would ſo provide, that they ſhould not find his removal any loſs. And when he obſerved one of them with ſome earneſtneſs pray for his health and continuance, he with tender paſſion replied, I obſerve your zeal ſpends it ſelf all in that one petition for my recovery; in the interim you have no care of me in my greateſt Intereſt, which is, that I may be perfectly fitted for my Change when God ſhall call me: I pray let ſome of your fervour be employ'd that way. And being preſt to make it his own requeſt to God to be continued longer in the World, to the ſervice of the Church, he immediately began a ſolemn Prayer, which contain'd firſt a very humble and melting acknowledgment of ſin, and a moſt earneſt interceſſion for Mercy and Forgiveneſs through the Merits of his Saviour: next reſigning himſelf intirely into his Maker's hands, he begg'd that if the Divine Wiſdom intended him for Death, he might have a due preparation for it; but if his Life might be in any degree uſeful to the Church, even to one ſingle Soul, he then beſought Almighty God to continue him, and by his grace enable him to employ that Life he ſo vouchſafed induſtriouſly and ſucceſsfully. After this he did with great affection intercede for this Church and Nation, and with particular vigour and enforcement pray'd for ſincere performance of Chriſtian duty now ſo much decayed, to the equal ſupplanting and ſcandal of that holy Calling; that thoſe who profeſs'd that Faith might live according to the Rules of it, and to the form of Godlineſs ſuperadd the Power. This with ſome repetitions and more tears he purſued, and at laſt clos'd all in a Prayer for the ſeveral concerns of the Family where he was. With this he frequently bleſt God for ſo far indulging to his infirmity, as to make his Diſeaſe ſo painleſs to him; withal to ſend it to him before he took his Journey, whereas it might have taken him in the way, or at his Inn, with far greater diſadvantages.

Nor did he in this Exigence deſiſt from the exerciſe of his accuſtomed Candor and ſweetneſs, whereby he was us'd to entertain the addreſſes of the greateſt Strangers. For two Scholars coming at this time to ſee him, when they having ſent up their names, it appear'd they were ſuch as he had no acquaintance with, though they that were about the Doctor, conſidering his illneſs, propoſed that a civil excuſe might be made, and the Viſitants be ſo diſmiſs'd; he reſiſted the advice with greateſt earneſtneſs, ſaying, I will by no means have them ſent away, for I know not how much they may be concern'd in the Errand they come about, and gave order they ſhould be brought up: and when upon tryal it appear'd that a Complement was the whole affair, yet the good Doctor ſeem'd much ſatisfied that he had not diſappointed that unſeaſonable kindneſs.

Likewiſe his own neceſſities however preſſing, diverted not his concernments for thoſe of others. It ſo happen'd that a Neighbour-Lady languiſhing under a long weakneſs, he took care that the Church-Office for the ſick ſhould be daily ſaid in her behalf: and though at the beginning of the Doctor's illneſs the Chaplain made no other variation, than to change the ſingular into the plural, yet when his danger encreas'd, he then thought fit to pray peculiarly for him; which the good Doctor would by no means admit, but ſaid, O no, poor Soul, let not me be the cauſe of excluding her; and accordingly had thoſe Prayers continued in the more comprehenſive latitude. And indeed thoſe Offices which had a publick character upon them he peculiarly valued. For as to the forms of Devotion appropriate to his Extremity, he took care they ſhould not exclude the publick ones, but ſtill gave theſe a conſtant place: and when in his ſharp agonies his Friends betook themſelves to their extemporary ejaculations, he compos'd thoſe irregularities by ſaying, Let us call on God in the voice of his Church.

And in ſeaſons of this kind whereas the making of a Will is generally an uneaſie task, as being at once a double parting with the World; to him it was in all reſpects agreeable and welcome. For having bequeath'd ſeveral Legacies to his Relatives and Friends, and left the remainder of his Eſtate to the diſpoſal of his intimate and approved Friend Doctor Henchman, now Lord Biſhop of London, as if recovered from the worſt part of his Diſeaſe, the neceſſity of reflecting upon Secular affairs, he became ſtrangely chearful, and overlook'd the encroaching importunate tyranny of Sickneſs.

On the twentieth of April, being Good-friday, he ſolemnly receiv'd the Sacrament; and and again on the two and twentieth of April, which then was Easter-day. At which time when the number of Communicants was too great to have place in his Bed-Chamber, and the whole Office was over-long for him to go through with, it was ordered that the Service being perform'd in the usual appartment, a competent number should afterwards come up and communicate with him: Which though he allow'd as most fitting, yet he did so with grief and trouble, breaking out into this passionate complaint, Alas! must I be excommunicated? To be absent from any part of publick Worship he thus deeply resented: So far was he from their opinion (and they would be thought Godly too) who in their most healthful leisurable days make this not their penance, but election and choice.

Amidst his weakness and indisposition of all parts, in the act of Celebration his Devotion only was not faint or sick, but most intent and vigorous: yet equall'd by his infinite Humility, which discovered it self as in his deportment, so particularly in that his pathetical ejaculation, which brake forth at the hearing of those words of the Apostle, Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners; unto which he rejoin'd, in an accent that neither intended a complement to God nor men, to either of which he was not under a temptation, Of whom I am the chief.

The Exuberance of this Humility appear'd in all other occasions of instance: particularly about this time a Letter being sent unto him, in which, among many expressions of great value, there was added an intimation, That there was now hope the dayes were come when his desert should be considered, and himself imployed in the Government as well as the instruction of the Church; at this he was hugely discomposed, and expressed a grief and anguish beyond that his Sickness in any period, however sharp, had extorted from him.

But now through the long suppression of Urine the blood grown thin and serous, withal made eager and tumultuous by the mixture of heterogeneous parts, the Excellent Doctor fell into a violent bleeding at the Nose; at which the by-standers being in astonishment, he chearfully admonish'd to lay aside impatience in his behalf, and to wait God's leisure, whose seasons were still the best: withal thankfully acknowledged God's mercy in the dispensation, alledging, that to bleed to death was one of the most desirable passages out of this World.

And truly he very justly made this observation; for it pleas'd the Divine Providence strangely to balance the symptoms of the Doctor's Disease to his advantage: for the sharp pains of the Stone were allay'd by that heaviness of sense which the recuilment of serous moisture into the habit of the body and insertions of the Nerves occasion'd; and when that oppression endanger'd a Lethargick or Apoplectick torpor, he was retain'd from that by the flux of blood. Which several accidents interchangeably succeeded one the other, insomuch that in this whole time of Sickness he neither had long violence of torment, nor diminution of his intellectual faculties. And here this violent hemorrhage of which we now speak, being of it self even miraculously stopt, when all applications were ineffectual, a drowsiness succeeding, which happened at the time of Prayers, though he perfectly attended, and returned to every response amidst his importunate infirmity, he very sadly resented it saying, Alas! this is all the return I shall make to this mercy, to sleep at Prayers.

When he was in pain he often prayed for Patience, and while he did so, evidenc'd that his Prayer was heard; for he exercised not only that, but Thankfulness too, in his greatest extremity crying out Blessed be God, blessed be God. Among the providential alleviations of the Doctors Sickness, I shall not omit; because he valued it at a considerable rate, that he had the advantages of all the Offices of the Church, and Sacerdotal assistances; being attended not only by the domestick Chaplain, but Mr. Dolben, now the Lord Bishop of Rochester, during all his illness; who coming casually to visit him at the time of his first being amiss, departed not from him till after his Interment.

Nor did this excellent person according to the usual method, inflict his Sickness upon those about him, by peevishness disquieting his attendants; but was pleas'd with every thing that was done, and liked every thing that was brought, condescending to all Proposals, and obeying with all readiness every advice of his Physicians. Nor was it wonder he should so return unto the endeavours of his Friends, who had tender kindness for his Enemies, even the most inveterate and bloody. When the Defeat of Lambert and his Party, the last effort of gasping Treason in this Nation before its blest return unto Obedience, was told him, his only triumph was that of his Charity, saying with tears in his Eyes, Poor Souls! I beseech God forgive them. So habitual was Pity and Compassion to his Soul, that all representations concentred there: Vertue had still his Prayers, because he lov'd it; and Vice enjoyed them too, because it wanted them.

In his own greatest desolations he administer'd reliefs to those about him, mixing Advices vices with his Prayers, and twiſting the tenderneſs of a Friend to that of the Chriſtian, he then diſpens'd his beſt of Legacies, his Bleſſings; moſt paſſionately exhorting the young growing hopes of the Family, whoſe firſt innocence and baſhful ſhame of doing ill he above all things labour'd to have preſerv'd, to be juſt to the advantage of their education, and maintain inviolate their firſt baptiſmal Vows: then more generally commended unto all the great advantage of mutual friendly Admonitions. On which occaſion when the good Lady ask'd him what more ſpecial thing he would recommend unto her for her whole life, he briefly replyed, Uniform Obedience: Whereby (if we may take a Comment from himſelf at other times) he meant not only a ſincere reception of Duty as ſuch, becauſe commanded, and not becauſe 'tis this or that, pleaſant or honourable, or perchance cheap or eaſie duty; but withal the very condition of Obeying, the lot of not being to chuſe for ones ſelf, the being determin'd in all propoſals by humane or Divine Command, and where thoſe left at large, by the guidance of God's Providence, or the aſſiſtance of a Friend.

But amidſt theſe moſt Chriſtian divertiſements, theſe happieſt anodynes of Sickneſs, the 25 of April fatally drew on, wherein his flux of Blood breaking forth again with greater violence than it had done before, was not to be ſtopp'd by outward applications, nor the revulſives of any kind, not of its own, the opening of a Vein, firſt in the Arm, and after in the Foot; till at laſt the Fountain being exhauſted, the torrent ceas'd its courſe, and indeed that Vital one which its regular motion kept on foot: for the good Doctor leaving off to bleed about three of the Clock in the Afternoon, became very weak and dif-ſpirited, and cold in the extreme parts, yet at this time Doctor Willis, and another Friend of the Doctors coming in, who alarm'd with the news of his danger, had in part of that day come from Oxford; he obſerving them ſtand by his Bed-ſide, found ſtrength enough to ſay, with great tenderneſs of paſſion, This is very kindly done; which I mention, as the laſt teſtimony which he gave of the reſentments which he had of Friendſhip, of which no man ever was a greater Votary; and which he thought of weight enough to interrupt his dying Prayers, and laſt addreſſes to his Maker: Having ſaid this, he preſently returned to his Devotions, and in them perſevered unto the laſt period of his life, about a quarter or half hour before his Death breathing out thoſe words which beſt became his Chriſtian Life, Lord make haſt, which he repeated three or four times.

And ſo upon that very day, or, if he did not expire till after Midnight, (for in that concern, the Company that happen'd to be preſent had not leiſure to conſult Clocks or Watches) the Morrow after that, on which the Parliament conven'd, which lay'd the foundation of our Releaſe and Liberty, and brought at once this Nations return from its Captivity, and its Gracious Sovereign Prince, this great Champion of Religion and Pattern of all Vertue, as if reſerv'd for Maſteries and Combats of exigence and hazard, for Perſecution and Sufferings, was taken hence, and by his loſs repreſt the overflowing and extravagance of thoſe joyes that waited the reception of His Sacred Majeſty.

'Twill be below the greatneſs of the Perſon as well as of this Loſs, to celebrate his Death in Womaniſh Complaints, or indeed by any verbal applications; his Worth is not to be deſcrib'd by any Words beſides his own, nor can any thing beſeem his Memory but what is Sacred and Eternal as thoſe Writings are. May his juſt Fame from them and from his Vertue be precious to ſucceeding times, grow up and flouriſh ſtill: and when that Characters engrav'd in Braſs ſhall diſappear, as if they had been writ in Water, when Elogies committed to the truſt of Marble ſhall be illegible as whiſper'd accents, when Pyramids diſſolv'd in duſt ſhall want themſelves a Monument to evidence that they were once ſo much as ruine; let that remain a known and claſſick Hiſtory deſcribing him in his full Pourtraicture among the beſt of Subjects, of Friends, of Scholars, and of Men.

The dead body being opened (which here is mentioned, for that the Reader cannot want the curioſity to deſire to know every thing that concern'd this great Perſon) the principal and Vital parts appear'd ſound; only the right Kidney, or rather its remainder, which exceeded not the bigneſs of an Egg, was hard and knotty, and in its cavity, beſides ſeveral little ones, a large Stone of the figure of an Almond, though much bigger, whoſe leſſer end was faln into the Ureter, and as a ſtopple clos'd it up; ſo that 'tis probable that Kidney had for divers Years been in a manner uſeleſs. The other Kidney was ſwoln beyond the natural proportion, otherwiſe not much decayed; but within the Ureter four Fingers breadth a round white Stone was lodged, which was ſo faſtned in the part, that the Phyſician with his Probe could not ſtir it, and was fain at laſt to cut it out: and ſo exactly it ſtop'd the paſſage, that upon the Diſſection the water before enclos'd guſh'd forth in great abundance: from whence it appeared perfectly impoſſible for Art to have ennobled it ſelf in the preſervation of this great Perſon; as it was alſo manifeſt that nothing but the conſequences of his indefatigable Study took him from us, in the perfection and maturity, the 55*th* Year of his Life.

On the 26*th* day of the ſame Month, in the Evening, he was, according to his deſire, without Oſtentation or Pomp, though with all becoming Decency, buried at the Neighbouring-Church of Hampton, with the whole Office and uſual Rites of the Church of England, ſeveral of the Gentry and Clergy of the County, and affectionate multitudes of perſons of leſs quality attending on his Obſequies, the Clergy with ambition offering themſelves to bear him on their Shoulders; which accordingly they did, and laid that Sacred burthen in the Burial-place of the generous Family which with ſuch Friendſhip had entertain'd him when alive: where now he reſts in Peace, and full aſſurance of a glorious Reſurrection.

Having thus given a faithful, though imperfect, draught of this excellent Perſon, whoſe Vertues are ſo far from imitation by practice, that they exerciſe and ſtrain the comprehenſion of words; and having ſhewed how much he has merited of this Nation in its moſt preſſing Exigents, both by his Writings and by his Example, and perchance above both theſe by his unwearied interceſſion in Devotion; it may poſſibly be neither uſeleſs nor unacceptable to offer a requeſt unto the Reader in his behalf, and ſhew him an expedient whereby he may pay his debt of gratitude, and eminently oblige this holy Saint though now with God.

'Tis this, to add unto his account in the day of Retribution by taking benefit by his Performances: and as he being dead yet ſpeaks, ſo let him perſwade likewiſe.

That the Covetous Reader would now at his requeſt put off his ſordid Vice, and take courage to be Liberal, aſſured by his Example, that if in the worſt of times Profuſeneſs could make Rich, Charity ſhall never bring to Beggery.

That the Proud opinionated perſon on the ſame terms would in civility to him deſcend from his fond heights, inſtructed here that lowly Meekneſs ſhall compaſs great reſpects, and inſtead of Hate or Flattery be waited on with Love and Veneration.

That the Debauch'd or Idle would leave upon this ſcore his lewd unwarrantable joyes, convinc'd that ſtrict and rugged Vertue made an Age of Sun-ſhine, a life of conſtant Smiles, amidſt the dreadfulleſt Tempeſts; taught the Gout, the Stone, the Cramp, the Colick, to be treatable Companions, and made it eligible to live in bad times and dye in flouriſhing.

That the Angry man, who calls Paſſion at leaſt Juſtice, poſſibly Zeal and Duty, would for his ſake aſſume a different temper, believe that Arguments may be anſwer'd by ſaying Reaſon, Calumnies by ſaying No, and Railings by ſaying nothing.

The Coward and Diſloyal, that durſt not own in words, much leſs by ſervice and relief, his Prince; that complemented his Apoſtaſy and Treaſon by the ſoft terms of changing an Intereſt, will from hence learn that the ſureſt way to ſafety is to have but one Intereſt, and that eſpous'd ſo firmly as never to be chang'd; ſince ſuch a Conſtancy was that which a Cromwel durſt not perſecute.

That the employ'd in Buſineſs would from hence diſmiſs their fears of regular Piety, their Suſpicion that Devotion would hinder all diſpatch and manage of affairs; ſince it appear'd, his conſtant Office (like the Prayer of Joſuah, which made the Sun ſtand ſtill) ſeem'd to have render'd unto him each day as long as two.

That the Ambitious perſon, eſpecially the Eccleſiaſtick, would think employment and high place a Stewardſhip, that renders Debtors both to God and man; a reſidence at once of conſtant labour and attendance too; a Precipice that equally expoſes both to Envy and to Ruine: and conſequently to be that which ſhould become our greateſt fear and terror, but at no hand our Choice: ſince it was that which this heroick conſtancy was not aſhamed to own a dread of, and whoſe appearance did render Death it ſelf relief and reſcue.

Laſtly, that the narrow Self-deſigning perſon, who underſtands no kindneſs but advantage; the Senſual, that knows no love but luſt; the Intemperate, that owns no Companion but Drink; may all at once from him reform their bruitiſh Errours: ſince he has made it evident that a Friend does fully ſatisfie theſe diſtant and importunate deſires, being as the moſt innocent and certainly ingenuous entertainment, ſo beſides that the higheſt mirth, the greateſt intereſt and ſureſt pleaſure in the World.

They that had the happineſs of a perſonal acquaintance with this beſt of men, this Saint, who ſeems in our decays of ancient Vertue lent us by ſpecial Providence even for this end and purpoſe, that we might not disbelieve the Faith of Hiſtory delivering the Excellency of primitive Chriſtians; know with what thirſt and eagerneſs of Soul he ſought the ſpiritual advantage of any ſingle man how mean ſoever, with what enjoyment he beheld the recovery of any ſuch from an ill courſe and habit. And whatever apprehenſions other men may have, they will be eaſily induc'd to think, that if bleſſed Spirits have Commerce with Earth, (as ſurely we have reaſon to believe it ſomewhat more than poſſible) they, I ſay, will reſolve it a connatural and highly agreeable acceſſion unto his fruitions, that when there is joy in the preſence of the Angels of God for a Sinner that repents, he may be an immediate acceſſory to that bleſſed triumph, and be concern'd beyond the rate of a bare Spectator.

Perſwaſions to Piety now-adays are uſually in ſcorn call'd Preaching: but 'tis to be hoped that this, how contemptible an Office ſoever it be grown, will be no indecency in this inſtance; that 'twill not be abſurd if his Hiſtory, who deſervedly was reckoned among the beſt of Preachers, whoſe Life was the beſt of Sermons, ſhould bear a correſpondence to its Subject, and profeſtly cloſe with an application: That it adjures all perſons to be what they promiſed God Almighty they would be in their Baptiſmal Vows, what they ſee the Glorious Saints and Martyrs and Confeſſors, and in particular this holy man has been before them; be what is moſt honourable, moſt eaſie and advantageous to be at preſent; and, in a word, to render themſelves ſuch as they deſire to be upon their Death-Beds, before they leave the World and then would be for ever.

Which bleſt atchievement as it was the great deſign of the Excellent Doctor's both Words and Writings, his Thoughts and Actions, is alſo (beſides the payment of a Debt to Friendſhip and to Vertue) the only aim of this imperfect, but yet affectionate and well-meant, account: And may Almighty God by the aſſiſtance of his Grace give all of theſe this their moſt earneſtly-deſired effect and iſſue.

A PRACTICAL CATECHISM.

LIB. I.

SCHOLAR.

I Have, by the grace of God, and your help and care, attained in some measure to the understanding of the Principles of Religion, proposed to those of my age by our Church Catechism; and should in modesty content my self with those Rudiments, but that I find my self, as a Christian, not only invited, but obliged to grow in Grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Of Divinity.

Shall I therefore beseech you to continue my guide, and to direct me first, what kind of questions it will be most useful for me to ask, and you to instruct me in; that I may not please my self, or trouble you with less profitable speculations?

Catechist. I will most readily serve you in this demand, and make no scruple to tell you, that that kind of knowledge is most useful, and proper to be superadded to your former grounds, which tendeth most immediately to the directing of your Practice; for you will easily remember, that it was the form of the young man's question, Mark 10. 17. Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? and our books tell us, that the Oracle, (that is, the Devil himself) was inforced to proclaim Socrates to be the wisest man in the world, because he applied his studies and knowledge to the moral part, the squaring and ordering of mens lives: and Gerson, a very learned and pious man, hath defined * Divinity, of all others, to be an affective, not onely speculative, knowledge; which you will best understand the meaning of, by a very ancient Writer's words, which are in English these, that * The end of Christian Philosophy is to make men better, not more learned; to edifie, not to instruct. Of Practical Points.

* Theologia est Scientia affectiva, non speculativa.

* Ἵνα τὸ τέλος βελτίους ἡμᾶς, ἢ διδάξαι; Cl. Al. in pæd.

S. I shall most willingly intrust my self to your Directions: and though the vanity of my heart, and the unruliness of my youthful affections, may perhaps make me an improper Auditor of such Doctrines; yet I hope the Doctrines themselves, and the assistance of Gods grace, obtainable by our Prayers, may be a means to fit me to receive profit by them. I beseech you therefore to tell me your opinion, what kind of Doctrines, and what parts of Scripture, will be likely to have the most present influence on my heart, or contribute most to a Christian Practice.

C. I conceive, especially these five: first, the Doctrine of the first and second Covenant, together with the difference of them: secondly, the Names, and (in one of them intimated) the Offices of Christ: thirdly, the Nature of the Three Theological Graces, Faith, Hope, and Charity, together with Self-denial, and Repentance, or Regeneration: fourthly, the difference and dependence betwixt Justification and Sanctification: and lastly the thorough understanding of our Saviours Sermon on the Mount, set down in the fifth, sixth and seventh Chapters of Saint Matthew's Gospel. And when those are done, I may perhaps give you a second view of some particulars which you have already learned, but not so distinctly in order to Practice: Such are the Creed it self, the Sacraments, and the vow of Baptism, a most practical point. But you will be frighted with the length of this task, and discouraged from setting out on so tedious a journey. The principal sorts of them.

S. I shall think it unreasonable for me to be tired with receiving the largest favours that you have the patience and the charity to bestow upon me: and to shew you that I have an appetite to the journey, I shall not give you the least excuse of delay, but put you in mind where it was that you promised to set out, or begin your first stage, and beseech you to go before me my guide and instructer, first in the Doctrine of the two Covenants: To which purpose my Ignorance makes it necessary for me to request your first help, to tell me what a Covenant is.

C. A Covenant is a mutual compact, (as we now consider it) betwixt God and man, consisting of mercies on God's part made over to man, and of conditions on mans part required by God.

S. It will be necessary for me to demand, first, what you mean by the first Covenant? Sect. I. Of the first Covenant.

C. I mean that which is supposed to be made with Adam, as soon as he was created, before his first sin, and with all mankind in him.

S. What then was the mercy on God's part made over to him in that Covenant?

C. It consisted of two parts, one sort of things supposed before the Covenant, and absolutely given to him by God in his creation: another promised, and not given but upon condition. The mercies given in it.

S. What is that which is absolutely given?

C. 1. A Law written in his heart, teaching him the whole duty of man. 2. A positive Law, of not eating the fruit of one tree in the garden, all others but that one being freely allowed him by God. 3. A perfect Strength and ability bestowed on him to perform all that was required of him, and by that a possibility to have lived for ever without ever sinning. Absolutely.

S. What is that which was promised on condition?

On condition. C. 1. Continuance of that light and that ſtrength, the one to direct, the other to aſſiſt him in a perſevering performance of that perfect obedience. 2. A crown of ſuch performance, aſſumption to eternal felicity.

S. What was the condition upon which the former of theſe was promiſed?

C. Walking in that Light, making uſe of that ſtrength; and therefore upon defailance in thoſe two, (on commiſſion of the firſt ſin) that light was dimmed, and that ſtrength (like Sampſon's when his locks were loſt) extreamly weakned.

S. What was the condition upon which the Eternal felicity was promiſed?

C. Exact, unſinning, perfect Obedience, proportioned to the meaſure of that ſtrength; and conſequently upon the commiſſion of the firſt ſin, this crown was forfeited, Adam caſt out of Paradiſe, and condemned to death, and ſo deprived both of Eternity and felicity: and from that hour to this there hath been no man living (Chriſt only excepted, who was God as well as man) juſtifiable by that firſt Covenant, all having ſinned, and ſo coming ſhort of the Glory of God promiſed in that Covenant.

S. You have now given me a view of the firſt Covenant, and I ſhall not give my curioſity leave to importune you with more queſtions about it. Only, if you pleaſe, tell me, what condition Adam, and conſequently mankind, were concluded under, upon the defailance or breach of the condition required in that firſt Covenant: for I perceive Adam ſinned, and ſo brake that condition.

The ſtate of man after the breach of the firſt Covenant. C. I have intimated that to you already, and yet ſhall further enlarge on it. Upon the fall of Adam, he and all mankind forfeited that perfect light and perfect ſtrength, and became very defective and weak both in Knowledge and ability of performing their duty to their Creator; and conſequently were made utterly uncapable of ever receiving benefit by that firſt Covenant. It being juſt with God to withdraw that high degree of ſtrength and grace, when he ſaw ſo ill uſe made of it.

S. But why ſhould God inflict that puniſhment upon all mankind, for (or upon occaſion of) the ſin of that one man? Though he uſed his talent ſo very ill, others of his poſterity might have uſed it better, and why ſhould they all be ſo prejudged upon one mans miſcarriage?

God's wiſdom therein. C. Many reaſons may be rendred for this act of God's, and if they could not, yet ought not his wiſdom to be arraigned at our tribunal, or judged by us. Now this is an act of his wiſdom, more than of diſtributive juſtice, it being free for him to do what he will with his own, and ſuch is his Grace and his Crown. But the moſt full ſatisfactory reaſon may be this, Becauſe God intending to take the forfeiture of that firſt Covenant, intended withall to make a ſecond Covenant, which ſhould tend as much (or more) to the main end, the eternal felicity of mankind, as (or than) the firſt could have done. And that you will acknowledge when you hear what this ſecond Covenant is.

S. I beſeech you then, What is the ſecond Covenant? and firſt, With whom was it made?

Of the ſecond Covenant. C. It was made with the ſame Adam now after his fall, in theſe words, The ſeed of the woman ſhall break the Serpents head, Gen. 3. 15. and afterwards repeated more plainly to Abraham, Gen. 22. 18.

S. But who is that Seed of the Woman?

C. It is our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, which ſprang from the Progeny of that Woman.

S. What then is the firſt thing promiſed in that ſecond Covenant?

The promiſes thereof. C. The giving of Chriſt, to take our nature upon him, and ſo to become a kind of ſecond Adam, in that nature of ours to perform perfect, unſinning Obedience, and ſo to be juſt according to the condition of the firſt Covenant, and yet being faultleſs to undergo a ſhameful death voluntarily upon the Croſs, to ſatiſfie for the ſin of Adam, and for all the ſins of all mankind, to taſte death for every man, Heb. 2. 9. to die for all thoſe which were dead in Adam, 2 Cor. 5. 15. And this being the firſt thing, all other parts of this Covenant are conſequent and dependent on this, and ſo the ſecond Covenant was made in Chriſt, ſealed in his blood, (as it was the cuſtom of the Eaſtern Nations to ſeal all Covenants with blood) and ſo confirmed by him, which is the meaning of thoſe words, 2 Cor. 1. 20. All the Promiſes of God in him are Yea, and in him Amen, that is, are verified (which is the importance of Yea) and confirmed (which is meant by Amen) into an immutability, in, or by Chriſt.

S. Well then, what are the promiſes or mercies made over unto us in Chriſt, and ſince his coming into the world, by this ſecond Covenant?

The firſt mercy, Gracious precepts. C. Firſt, (that which is peculiar to Chriſt, ſince his coming into the world) the giving us ſuch precepts as by their own inward goodneſs are able to approve themſelves to our reaſonable nature, and ſo to the meaneſt as well as learnedeſt men, (whereas the more Moſaical obſervances were of another nature, ſuch as whoſe goodneſs depends wholly on Gods Commanding them) and again not outward carnal obſervances (as the Moſaical were) but ſpiritual, to the purifying of affections; viz. that Law of Faith, according to which we Chriſtians ought to live. And this is ſet down as a part of that Covenant. Heb. 8. 10, 11. (taken out of Jer. 31. 31.) where the duty of the new Covenant, which under the times of Chriſt ſhould be revealed, is ſet down) firſt, privatively) not like that of Moſaical Obſervances, external and carnal, v. 9. but (poſitively) laws given into their minds and hearts, v. 10. i. e. agreeable to the rational Soul, and [I will be their God, and they ſhall be my people] i. e. ſincere, honeſt obedience; not ſuch as was fit to be impoſed on hard-hearted Jews, to encumber and traſh them, but ſuch as becomes an ingenuous people: and then it follows, v. 11. They ſhall not teach, &c. i. e. there ſhall be no need of ſuch laborious inſtruction out of the Law, what to doe in point of abſtinences, ſacrifices, uncleanneſſes, purgations, &c. as among the Jews; and laſtly, I will be merciful to their unrighteouſneſs, &c. free pardon to all true penitents, and ſincere ſervants of God, meerly by Gods free grace and mercy in Chriſt, without thoſe expiations under the Law. So again, (where this New Covenant is ſet down) Rom. 10. 8. out of Deut. 30. 11, &c. The commandment which I command thee this day, is not hidden from thee, (the Hebrew word there is by the Tranſlators beſt expreſt, * it is not too heavy for thee) and in other places, † it is not impoſſible for thee; and that farther expreſt in Deut. v. 12. 13. it is not in heaven, nor beyond ſea, &c. i. e. it will coſt no great pains to bring you to the knowing of it, nor, if you pleaſe, to the practiſing, it being very agreeable and conſentaneous to every ones nature, the very ſoul within us being able to tell us, that what Chriſt commands, is better even for us, as men, than any thing elſe; and therefore it follows, v. 14. it is very nigh thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart,

that thou maiſt do it, i. e. it is very eaſie for thee to learn and underſtand, and practiſe alſo. And what this is, is punctually ſet down in that tenth to the Roman, v. 9. confeſſing of Chriſt, and cordial belief of his Reſurrection; the firſt containing under it a ſticking faſt to Chriſt when the Chriſtian Doctrine or profeſſion is perſecuted, and the ſecond, a riſing from ſin as he roſe, a new Chriſtian life, in the practice of thoſe rules of life which he hath left us. To this purpoſe again is that of Saint John, that Chriſts commandments are not grievous, not heavy, or unſupportable; and of Chriſt himſelf, that his yoke is eaſie, (the * Greek ſignifies more,) a good, a gracious yoke, and his burthen a light burthen. The ſecond mercy made over to us by the ſecond Covenant, is, (that even now intimated) the promiſe of pardon or mercy to our unrighteouſneſs, and our ſins, and our iniquities, Heb. 8. v. 12. to wit, to the frailties which thoſe that ſerve God ſincerely do yet fall into, and whatever enormities they have formerly been guilty, but now repented of. The third is, the giving of grace or ſtrength, although not perfect, or ſuch as may enable us to live without ever ſinning, yet ſuch as is ſufficient to perform what is neceſſary now under this ſecond Covenant, or ſo as God in Chriſt will accept, according to that of Saint Paul, that he can do all things through Chriſt that ſtrengthens him; able to do nothing of himſelf, in order to the attaining of bliſs, (We are not ſufficient of our ſelves, ſaith he in another place, to do any thing) but yet through Chriſt that ſtrengthens me, I can do all things that are now required of me, (Our ſufficiency is of God.)

* χρηστὸς.

The ſecond Mercy, pardon of ſins.

The third Mercy, Giving of ſtrength.

S. I beſeech you, where is this part of the Promiſes of the ſecond Covenant ſet down in Scripture?

C. 'Tis intimated in theſe and many other places, but is diſtinctly ſet down in the ſong of Zachary, Luk. 1. 74. he there ſpeaks of the oath which God ſware to our father Abraham, v. 72. which he ſtyles God's holy Covenant, v. 72. and he ſpecifies two parts of it: 1. Deliverance or ſafety from the power of our enemies, Sin and Sathan, in theſe words, that we being delivered † without fear, (for ſo the pointing of the Greek words in the moſt ancient copies teach us to read) that is, without danger, ſafe and ſecure, out of the hand of our enemies: 2. Giving of power or ſtrength to us, to enable us to ſerve him, ſo as he will accept of, and to perſevere in that ſervice, in the reſt of the words [that he would grant (or, as ‖ the word is rendred, Rev. 11. 3. give power) unto us that we might ſerve him (or, to ſerve him) in holineſs and righteouſneſs before him all the days of our life.]

S. This place is, I acknowledge, a clear one to the purpoſe, and I have nothing to object againſt it; onely pardon my curioſity, if having been told by you, that this ſecond Covenant was repeated to Abraham, Gen. 22. 16. and finding it here called the Oath ſworn to Abraham, and yet by reading of that Oath in Gen. not finding any ſuch form of words there expreſt, I beſeech you to ſatisfie this ſcruple of mine, and reconcile thoſe two places, which both you and the margents of our Bibles acknowledge to be parallel the one to the other, but the ſound of the words doth not ſo readily conſent to it. The granting me this favour may, I hope, make the whole matter more perſpicuous.

The Oath unto Abraham.

C. I am of your opinion, and therefore ſhall readily do it, and it will coſt me no more pains than this. 1. To tell you that there is one part of the Oath mentioned in Gen. which belonged peculiarly to the temporal proſperity of the people of the Jews, which were to ſpring from that Abraham, [I will multiply thy ſeed, &c.] and indeed that whole verſe 17. may literally and primarily be referred to that; but then, beſides that, (which Zachary reſpecteth not) there are three things more promiſed, ſpiritual bleſſings, ſpiritual victory, and the incarnation of Chriſt: the laſt of theſe Zachary mentions not in the words of the Oath, becauſe it is ſuppoſed in his whole ſong, (occaſioned only by it, and uttered on purpoſe to celebrate the Incarnation of Chriſt;) but the other two parts are ſpecified and interpreted by him; the victory over (or poſſeſſing the gates of) the enemies there, is here called deliverance (without fear or danger) from the hands of our enemies; and the bleſſing there, is explained here to be giving us power to ſerve him in holineſs and righteouſneſs before him all our days, that is, giving us the Grace of God for the amending of our lives, according to that of the Apoſtle, Gal. 3. 14. where the receiving the promiſe of the Spirit is called the bleſſing of Abraham, the power of Chriſt (aſſiſting and enabling us to perſevere) being really the moſt ineſtimable bleſſing that this life is capable of: to which purpoſe Saint Peter, Acts 3. 26. ſpeaking of Chriſt ſent by God to bleſs us, expreſſeth the thing wherein that bleſſing conſiſts, to be, in turning away every one from his iniquities.

Interpreted.

The bleſſing of Abraham.

S. I have troubled you too far by this extravagance; I ſhall make no delay to recall my ſelf into the rode again, and having been taught by you theſe ſeveral particulars of God's promiſe in the ſecond Covenant, I ſhall deſire you to proceed to tell me what is the condition required of us in this Covenant; unleſs perhaps there be ſome farther particulars promiſed on God's part, which you have not yet mentioned.

C. The truth is, there be two more Promiſes of God (though implied in the third degree beforementioned, yet fit now to be more explicitely inſiſted on) the firſt, of giving more grace, the ſecond, of crowning with glory; but both theſe are conditional promiſes. The firſt, upon condition that we make uſe of thoſe former talents, thoſe weaker degrees of grace given us, which is the intimation of the Parable of the Nobleman, Luk. 19. 13. the ſumm of which is, that unto every one that hath (that is, hath made good uſe of the talent of grace intruſted to him, as Heb. 12. 28. to have grace, ſignifies to make uſe of it to the end to which it is deſigned) ſhall be given, and from him that hath not, (i. e. hath not made that uſe he ought) even that he hath ſhall be taken from him. The ſecond, upon condition that he be (at the day of death or judgment) ſuch a man, as Chriſt now under the ſecond Covenant requires him to be.

The fourth promiſe, Giving more grace.

The fifth promiſe, Crowning with glory.

S. What then is the condition of the ſecond Covenant, without which there is yet no ſalvation to be had?

The condition of the ſecond Covenant.

C. I ſhall anſwer you firſt negatively, then poſitively. Negatively, it is not, 1 perfect, exact, unſinning obedience, the never offending at all in any kind of ſin; (this is the condition of the firſt Covenant;) nor 2 is it never to have committed any deliberate ſin in the former life; nor 3 never to have gone on or continued in any habitual or cuſtomary ſin for the time paſt: but it is Poſitively, the new creature, or renewed, ſincere, honeſt, faithful obedience to the whole Goſpel, giving up the whole heart unto Chriſt, the performing of that which God enables us to perform, and bewailing our infirmities, and frailties, and ſins, both of the paſt and preſent life, and beſeeching God's pardon in Chriſt for all ſuch; and ſincerely labouring to mortifie every ſin, and perform uniform obedience to God, and Negatively.

from every fall rising again by repentance and reformation. In a word, the condition required of us, is a constellation or conjuncture of all those Gospel graces, Faith, Hope, Charity, Self-denial, Repentance, and the rest, every one of them truly and sincerely rooted in the Christian heart, though mixed with much weakness and imperfection, and perhaps with many sins, so they be not wilfully and impenitently lived and died in, for in that case nothing but perdition is to be expected.

S. What part of the Promises is it, of which this condition is required to make us capable?

C. Pardon of sins, and Salvation: by which you see that no man shall be pardoned or saved, but he that observes this condition.

S. What condition is then required to make us capable of that other part of the conditional promise, to wit, of more grace, or continuance of that we have already?

C. A careful industrious husbanding of it, and daily prayer for daily increase, and attending diligently to the means of grace.

S. Methinks I understand somewhat of the nature and difference of these two Covenants, and shall not need to ask you which of them it is, in which we Christians are now concerned, for I take it for granted that it is the second. Only be pleased to tell me which of these two it was by which the Jews were to expect salvation?

C. Both Jew and Gentile, that is, every man that ever was or shall be saved from the beginning of the world, was, and is, and shall be saved by this second Covenant.

S. How then were the Jews obliged to the observation of the Law? is not the Law the first Covenant?

The Jews concernment in the second Covenant.

C. The Judaical law was not the first Covenant, (in the notion wherein now we take it) but the Law of unsinning perfect Obedience made with Adam in innocency. The truth is, the Judaical Law did represent unto us the first Covenant, and that especially, and therefore is so called, Heb. 8. but so it did the second also: the first by requiring perfect obedience, and pronouncing a curse on him that continued not in all those many burthensome ordinances which the law gave no power to any to perform; the second, in the sacrifices, and many other rites, which served as Emblems to shew us Christ, and in him the second Covenant.

S. I shall not interpose any more difficulties, which my ignorance might suggest, but only put you in mind, that you told me that this doctrine had a most present influence on our lives: be pleased to shew me how.

The influence of this doctrine on mens lives.

C. It hath so, many ways; I shall mention a few. First, By prescribing the condition, it sets us a work to the performance of it, and that is, living well. Secondly, By shewing us how possible or feasible that condition is by the grace and help of Christ, it first obliges us to a diligent performance of that duty of Prayer for that Grace, and then stirs us up to Endeavour and Industry in doing what we are enabled to do, that we receive not the grace of God in vain. Thirdly, By shewing us the necessity, indispensible necessity of sincere Obedience; it shuts the door against all temptations to carnal security, sloth, presumption, hypocrisie, partial obedience, or habitual going on in sin. And fourthly, By shewing the true grounds of hope, it fortifies us against desperation. And lastly, If we need any encouragements in our Christian walk, his promise to enable first, and then to accept, will most abundantly contribute to that purpose.

S. I acknowledge the usefulness of your Directions, and I beseech God to assist me in bringing forth the fruit which it is just for you to expect, and for God to require from them: and I promise you by his help to be mindful of your Admonitions.

Sect. II. Of the names of Christ.

I shall desire you to proceed to the second kind of Doctrine which at first you mentioned; the names, and in one of them the offices of Christ. I beseech you, What names do you mean?

C. Those two eminent and vulgarly known, so often repeated, but so little weighed, Jesus and Christ.

S. I pray you what is the importance of the word Jesus?

Of the name JESUS. Matth. 1. 21.

C. It is an Hebrew word which signifies Saviour or Salvation. I shall not need to prove it, when an Angel hath asserted it, Matth. 1, 21. Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins.

S. The place you cite I have considered, and find some difficulty in it, by giving my self liberty to read on to the two next verses, the words of which are these: All this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Prophet, saying, Behold, a Virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel. How could his name be called Jesus and Emmanuel too? or, How could the calling his name Jesus, be the fulfilling of that Prophecy that foretold that they should call his name Emmanuel?

C. You are to know that in the Hebrew tongue, word and thing, and so also calling and being, name and person, are all one; No word shall be impossible with God, is, nothing shall be impossible: and, My house shall be called a house of Prayer, is, my house shall be the house of Prayer, to all People, that is, to the Gentiles as well as Jews: and, so many names, that is, so many men: and according to that idiom, (retained both in the Prophets of the Old and Evangelists of the New Testament) this phrase [they shall call his name Emmanuel] is in signification no more than this, He shall be God with us, or God incarnate in our flesh; which incarnation of his, being on purpose to save his people from their sins, that Prophecy which foretold it, was perfectly fulfilled in his birth and circumcision, at which time he was called Jesus. Which name was but a signification of his design in his coming into the world, according to another place; This day there is born in the City of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

Emmanuel.

S. By the answering of my impertinent scruple, I have gained thus much knowledge, viz. that the whole end of Christs birth, of all he did and suffered for us, was that he might save us. I pray you then, what is meant by Saving?

Saving from sin.

C. To save is to redeem from sin, as you will acknowledge, if you observe but these two plain places; first, that which even now I cited, Matth. 1. 21. [He shall save his people from their sins,] (which is the only reason there rendred, why he is called a Saviour) then Tit. 2. 14. Christ gave himself to be crucified for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity.

S. Wherein doth this saving or redeeming from sin consist?

In three things.

C. In three things: First, in obtaining pardon for sin, or reconciling us to God, and (consequently to to that) in delivering us from the eternal torments which from God as Judge, and from Satan as accuſer firſt, and then as executioner, are, in ſtrict juſtice, or by the firſt Covenant, due to ſin. Secondly, in calling men to Repentance, thereby weakening the reigning power of ſin, and the tempting power of Satan, by mortifying the old man, (that is, the ſinful deſires of the natural and ſinful habits of the carnal man) and by implanting a new principle of holineſs in the heart. And thirdly, in perfecting and accompliſhing all theſe ſo happy beginnings, at the end of this life in Heaven.

S. How can it be ſaid that Chriſt came thus to ſave, to do all this, when ſo many, ſo long after his coming, are ſo far from being thus ſaved in all or any of theſe three ſences?

How then it comes that all are not ſaved.

C. That he came to ſave is certainly true, whatſoever objections you can have againſt it: and that by ſaving theſe three things are meant, if you pleaſe, I ſhall manifeſt from other Scriptures. The firſt ſence is contained in the word, (as it is uſed, Luke 1. 71.) * ſalvation, or that we ſhould be ſaved from our enemies, which muſt needs be our ſpiritual enemies, Sin and Satan: and if you doubt whether ſin be there meant, or the pardon of ſin by that ſaving, the next verſe will clear the difficulty, where it follows, [a] to perform the mercy, or mercifully to deal with our fathers, and to remember his holy Covenant, of which Covenant you know this is one ſpecial part, Heb. 8. 12. [b] I will be merciful to their ſins, (which explains the merciful dealing there) and their iniquities will I remember no more. And then for the ſecond ſence, that ſaving ſignifies calling to Repentance, may appear not only by comparing thoſe two places, [I came to call ſinners to Repentance] and [Chriſt Jeſus came into the world to ſave ſinners;] but alſo by a notable place, Acts 2. very uſeful for the explaining of that word, v. 38. 'tis reported that Saint Peter ſaid unto them, Repent, &c. and v. 40. [c] in more other words he teſtified unto them, or preached unto them, ſaying, [d] Be ye ſaved, or eſcape ye, from this perverſe generation: whence it is clear, that being ſaved, &c. is but more other words to ſignifie Repentance, and therefore ſurely that word, v. 47. which we render [e] ſuch as ſhould be ſaved, but is literally [the ſaved] ſignifies peculiarly thoſe who received that exhortation, v. 41. that is, thoſe that repented of their ſins; and accordingly it is rendred by the Syriack [The Lord added daily ſuch as became ſafe in the Church] i. e. which recovered themſelves from that danger in which they were involved in that wicked generation, and betook themſelves to the Church, as to a Sanctuary. But this by the way. As for the laſt acception of the phraſe, it is ſo ordinary for Salvation to ſignify the holy pure life in heaven, that I ſhall not need give you any proof of it. Having therefore cleared the truth, this were ſufficient, although I wanted skill to anſwer your objection: but yet that may eaſily be done too, by ſaying that Chriſt hath really performed his part toward every one of theſe, and that whoſoever hath not the effect and fruit of it, it is through his own wilful neglect, and even deſpiſing of ſo great ſalvation. Light came into the world, and men loved darkneſs more than light: and, having made a Covenant with death and damnation, are moſt worthy to have their portion therein.

S. What then is the ſhort or ſum of Chriſt's being Jeſus?

How Chriſt is a Saviour.

C. 'Tis this, that he came into the world to fetch back ſinners to heaven, [f] that whoſoever of mankind ſhould truly repent and fly to him, ſhall through him obtain pardon of ſin and ſalvation; a mercy vouchſafed to men, but denied to Angels, who being once fallen, are left in that wretched eſtate, and no courſe taken, and conſequently no poſſibility left for their recovery: which moſt comfortable truth is clearly ſet down by the Apoſtle, Heb. 2. 16. though in our Engliſh reading of it, it be ſomewhat obſcured. The words rightly rendred run thus: [g] He doth not take hold of Angels, but of the ſeed of Abraham he taketh hold. Where the word which I render taking hold of, ſignifies to catch any one who is either running away, or falling on the ground, or into a pit, to fetch back or recover again. This Chriſt did for men in being born, and ſuffering in our fleſh, but for Angels he did it not.

S. What ſpecial influence will this whole Doctrine have upon our lives?

The influence of this on mens lives.

C. I will ſhew you. 1. It is proper to ſtir up our moſt affectionate love and gratitude to this Saviour, who hath deſcended ſo low, even to the death of the croſs, to ſatisfie for our ſins, to obtain pardon for us: this love of Chriſt conſtraineth us, ſaith the Apoſtle. 2. It is proper to beget in us a juſt hatred of ſin, which brought God out of heaven to make expiation for it. 3. It is a moſt proper enforcement of repentance and amendment of life, to remember, 1. That without that we are likely to be little benefited by this Saviour; except we repent, Salvation it ſelf ſhall not keep us from periſhing: 2. That that was an end of Chriſt's death, to redeem us from all iniquity, and purifie to himſelf a peculiar people, zealous of good works, and not only to ſatisfie for us. 4. It is proper to teach us fear of offending, and keep us from ſecurity, when 1. we find what an exemplary puniſhment God ſaw fit, if not neceſſary, to inflict on ſin in the perſon of his Son: and 2. remember how much more guilty we now ſhall prove, if we will ſtill damn our ſelves in deſpight of all theſe precious means of ſaving us.

Of the name Chriſt, and his three Offices.

S. I beſeech God to open my heart to theſe Conſiderations, and then I ſhall further importune you to proceed, and tell me the ſignification of the word Chriſt, wherein you told me the Offices of Chriſt were intimated: but I beſeech you firſt, What do you mean by Offices?

What Office ſignifies.

C. I mean by that word, places of charge and dignity, to which God thought fit to deſign Chriſt, that he might the better accompliſh the end for which he ſent him; the truſt or charge ſuppoſing ſomewhat to be done by him, and the dignity implying ſomewhat to be returned by us, as you will ſee in the particulars.

S. What then is meant by the word Chriſt?

C. Anointed, and that intimates the three offices to which men were at any time inaugurated by God, ſuch inauguration being fitly expreſt (becauſe ordinarily ſolemnized among men) by the ceremony of anointing.

S. What are thoſe three offices?

C. Of King, and of Prieſt, and of Prophet.

Of Chriſt's Kingly Office.

S. What belonged to Chriſt to do as King?

C. To ſet up his throne in our hearts, or to reign in the ſouls of men, and to give evidence of his power through the whole world.

S. What was required of him to that purpoſe?

Over his Enemies, Temporal and Spiritual.

C. 1. To weaken and shorten the power of Satan, which Christ really did at his suffering, Heb. 2. 14. by death destroying the Devil, casting Lucifer from Heaven, that is, from the more unlimited power which he had before, and 2. to give strength and grace to overcome all rebellious lusts, and habits of sin, to bring them down in obedience to his Kingdom, and this he hath done also by sending his Spirit, (in reference to which are those words cited out of the Psalmist, He hath led captivity captive, and given gifts unto men,) and in a word, to reign till he had brought all his enemies under his feet, 1 Cor. 15. 25.

S. What and how many be those enemies?

C. He hath many enemies, some temporal, but most spiritual.

S. What mean you by his temporal enemies?

Temporal, 1. the Jewes.

C. I mean first the Jewish Nation, that rejected and crucified him, which within the compass of one generation were, according to his prediction, destroyed by the Romans, and preyed upon by those Eagles, Mat. 24. 28. by which allusively are noted the Roman Armies (whose Ensign was the [h] Eagle) which found them out (as such [i] Vultures do the carcase, Job 39. 30.) whereseever they dispersed themselves. For that that prophecy of Christ's, Mat. 24. belongs to this matter, primarily or strictly, (not to the day of Judgment) to the destruction of those present crucifiers, and the Jewish state, and not to the destruction of all enemies at his great Appearing yet to come, is apparent by the 34 verse, This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled: where the word [k] generation signifies such a space that they that were then alive, might and should live to see it, in that sence as the word is used, Matth. 1. where the time or space of fourteen mens lives in a line succeeding one another, is called fourteen generations; not that generation signifies the whole space of a mans life; (for that is oft sixty, eighty, or an hundred years) but rather [l] the third part of that: For of any mans age, part he lives in his fathers life time, and part after his sons birth; and thereupon it is wont to be said that three Generations make one sæcle or hundred years, as you shall find it did in the Genealogies, Mat. 1. and ordinarily it doth. So that the plain meaning of that speech of Christ [this generation shall not pass, &c.] is this, that all this should come to pass in their age, or within the life of some that were then men, as [m] Matth. 16. 28. There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his Kingdom. Which though some by the next chapter following are perswaded to interpret of the transfiguration, (as if that were Christ's coming in his Kingdom) may yet more properly be interpreted of this matter, so immediately consequent to his being killed by the Jews, and rising again, v. 21. (which was the ground of this speech of his) viz. Christ's illustrious coming to destroy those Jews: to which also that other place belongs, (which will clear both these) [n] Joh. 21. 22.) If I will that John tarry till I come, what is that to thee? which (saith S. John) was not to be interpreted, that he should never die, v. 23. but only that he should tarry till this coming of Christ; which of all the Disciples peculiarly, (and I think, only) John lived to see, and (as I think I have reason to believe) immediately before it, saw many visions concerning it, which are set down in his Revelation. This destroying or subduing his Enemies and Crucifiers (so terrible, that when it is foretold, Matth. 24. it is generally mistaken for the day of final judgment) is many times in the New Testament styled the Kingdom of God, and the coming of Christ, the end of all things, and the end of the world, because Christ's powerful presence was so very discernible in destroying of that Nation, and in that effect of his Kingdom, in bringing his enemies under his feet: and is without doubt the thing designed in that whole 24*th* Chapter of Saint Matthew, and every part of it, and particularly in those ver. 29, 30, 31. (which are by most thought to belong to another matter. For the darkning of the Sun and Moon, and falling of the Stars from Heaven, are not literally to be understood, (or if they were, would perhaps as little belong to the day of the last judgment) but in the same sence that the Prophets use them, Isai 13. 10. and 34. 4. Ezek. 32. 7. Joel 2. 31. perhaps to signifie no more, but only a great slaughter, or effusion of blood; that (say the Naturalists) sending forth abundance of hot exhalations, which first fill the air with black clouds, taking away the light of heaven, the sight of the stars, &c. and at last turn into meteors in the shape of falling stars, as Esa. 34. 4. and Rev. 6. 13. On which ground it is, that those phrases of the Sun being turn'd into darkness, and the Moon not giving her light, and the falling of the stars from heaven, are used in Prophetical (which seldom are clear) speeches, for great slaughters and destructions, and nothing else. But there is another more commodious way of interpreting that whole verse; by the Sun and Moon and Stars understanding the Temple and City of Jerusalem, and the rest of the Cities of Judea, and by the darkning and falling of them, the great tribulations and destructions that should befal all these; both which are very agreeable to the style wherein Prophecies are written. Which being supposed to be the interpretation of the 29*th*. verse, that of the sign of the Son of man, and his coming, ver. 30. and the sound of the trumpet gathering of the Elect, ver. 31. will without much difficulty belong to it also, and signifie the remarkableness of this punishment on the Jews, as an act of signal revenge from the crucified Christ, and the saving or delivering of a remnant (according to all the Prophecies) i. e. of some few Jews, out of this general incredulity and slaughter.

S. Were there any other sort of Temporal enemies to be destroyed by him?

2 The Romans.

C. Yes, those other who joined with the Jews in crucifying of him; I mean, the Romans themselves, or heathen Rome; On which that another cup of Gods wrath was to be poured out, is, I conceive, the importance of another great part of the Revelation, which was remarkably fulfilled by Alaricus and others, in sacking it and destroying the Heathen, but sparing the Christian part of it: In which also was remarkably founded the conversion of that City and Empire from Heathenism to Christianity, and so the subjecting it to Christ's Kingdom.

S. You have satisfied both my reason and my curiosity in this particular, and I shall not importune you further; I pray then, besides these rebellious crucifying Jews and Romans, what other enemies did you mean?

Spiritual Enemies: Sin. Satan.

C. First, Sin, the great enemy of Souls, which he labours to destroy in this life by the power of his grace, and will totally destroy at the day of Judgment. Secondly, Satan, (which I told you of) who therefore, when Christ comes to dispossess him of his hold in the poor man, demands, Art thou come to deſtroy us? Mark 1. 24. and at another time, Art thou come to torment us before our time? acknowledging that Chriſt was to deſtroy him, (he underſtood ſo much in the ſacred predictions) but withal hoping it was not yet the time for that execution, and in the mean while counting it a kind of deſtruction and torment to him to be caſt out or deprived of any of the power which he had over the bodies or ſouls of men.

S. Are there no other enemies that this King muſt deſtroy?

C. Yes, two more: Firſt, all wicked and ungodly men, that after all his methods of recalling them to amendment, do ſtill perſevere in impenitent rebellions, to whom eternal perdition belongs by the ſentence of this King, Thoſe that will not let me reign over them, muſt be brought forth and ſlain before their King. Secondly, Death it ſelf, according to that of the Apoſtle, 1 Cor. 15. The laſt enemy that ſhall be deſtroyed, is death: he ſhall deſpoil the grave, and make it reſtore all its captives, and then death ſhall be no more, ſhall be ſwallowed up in victory. Wicked men. Death.

S. What is required of us in anſwer and return to this office of his?

C. Principally and by indiſpenſable neceſſity, that we render our ſelves obedient, faithful, conſtant ſubjects to this King, hold not out any diſloyal Fort, any rebel luſt, or ſin againſt him, but as to a King, vow and perform entire allegiance unto him. And then conſequently that we entruſt him with our protection, addreſs all our petitions to him, have no war or peace, but with thoſe who are his and our common enemies or friends, fight his battels againſt ſin and Satan, pay him our tribute of honour, reverence, obedience: yea, and of our goods alſo, when they may be uſeful to any poor member of his. Our returns to Chriſt's Regal Office, &c.

S. I ſhall detain you no longer with leſs neceſſary Queries about this office of his, as, When Chriſt *was inaugurated to it: becauſe I have had the chance to obſerve, by comparing two known places of Scripture together (*Pſal. 110. 1. and 1 Cor. 15. 25.) that [Chriſt's reigning] and [his ſitting at God's right hand] are all one; from whence I collect that the time of his ſolemn inauguration to his Regal Office was at his Aſcenſion.

C. You have gueſſed aright, and therefore I ſhall not farther explain that unto you, nor put you in mind of any other niceties; but in ſtead of ſuch, rather remember you of the practical concluſion that this Office of Chriſt's may ſuggeſt unto you, that you are no farther a Chriſtian, than you are an obedient ſubject of Chriſt's; that his Goſpel conſiſts of Commands as well as Promiſes, the one the object of the Chriſtian Faith as well as the other.

S. O Lord, increaſe this Faith in me.

Pleaſe you now to proceed to the ſecond Office of Chriſt, that of his Prieſthood. Of Chriſt's Prieſtly Office.

C. I ſhall, and firſt tell you, that the nature of this Office of Chriſt is a little obſcure, and therefore I ſhall tell you nothing of it, but what the Scripture gives me clear ground to aſſert.

S. What doth the Scripture tell us of Prieſthood?

C. It mentions two orders of Prieſthood, one after the order of Aaron, the other after the order of Melchizedek. Two Prieſthoods.

S. What was the office of the Aaronical Prieſt? Aaronical.

C. To offer ſacrifice and to bleſs the people, but eſpecially to ſacrifice.

S. What of the Melchizedekian Prieſt? Melchizedekian

C. It is not improbable that Melchizedek offered ſacrifice alſo; but becauſe the ſacred ſtory mentions nothing of him as belonging to his Prieſthood, but only his bleſſing of Abraham, therefore it is reſolved that the Melchizekian Prieſthood conſiſted only in bleſſing. This you will beſt diſcern by looking into the ſtory of Melchizedek meeting Abraham, Gen. 14. 18, 19.

S. What is there ſaid of him?

C. It is ſaid that Melchizedek King of Salem brought forth bread and wine, (i. e. treated and entertained Abraham as a King) and he was Prieſt of the moſt high God, and he bleſſed him, and ſaid, Bleſſed be Abraham of the moſt high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thine hand.

S. Which of theſe kind of Prieſts was Chriſt to be?

C. Chriſt being conſidered in the whole purpoſe of God concerning him, was to undertake both theſe Offices of Prieſthood, to be an Aaronical Prieſt firſt, and then for ever after a Melchizedekian Prieſt; he was appointed firſt to offer up ſacrifice for the ſins of the world, which he performed once for all upon the Croſs, and therein exerciſed the office of an Aaronical Prieſt, and withal compleated and perfected that whole work of ſatisfaction for ſin, to which all the old legal ſacrifices referred; and that being done, he was to enter upon his other office of Melchizedekian Prieſthood, and exerciſe that continually from that time to the end of the world, and therefore is called a Prieſt for ever after the order of Melchizedek. And this ſecond kind of Prieſthood is that which the Scriptures of the New Teſtament, eſpecially the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, doth mainly refer to, when it ſpeaks of Chriſt; and is to be conceived to ſpeak of that, whenſoever it indefinitely mentions Chriſt's Prieſthood. Both in Chriſt.

S. But what then? is not Chriſt a Prieſt after the order of Aaron?

C. I told you that he was, but now I tell you that he is not: he was one in his death, but never was to repeat any act of that afterwards; and ſo now all the Prieſthood that belongs to him is the Mechizedekian. I will ſet this down more plainly. It is moſt truly ſaid and reſolved, that Chriſt's death was a voluntary offering and ſacrifice of himſelf once for us, and that will ſerve to denominate him an Aaronical Prieſt in his death, or rather to conclude that his death was the completion of all the Rites and Ceremonies (ſuch as the ſacrifices) of the Aaronical Prieſthood. But this being but one act never to be repeated again, is not the thing that Chriſt's eternal Prieſthood (denoted eſpecially by his Unction or Chriſm) refers to; but that other Melchizedek Prieſthood that he was to exerciſe ° for ever. Beſides, it may be ſaid that this ſacrifice at his death, may under that notion of an Aaronical ſacrifice, paſs for the Rite and Ceremony before his Conſecration, or at the conſecrating him to be our eternal high Prieſt. For ſuch ſacrifices we find mentioned, Lev. 8. 22. the ram, the ram of conſecration; and of this nature I conceive the death of Chriſt to be, a previous or preparatory But now only the Melchizedekian. ° vi; & alibi.

ratory rite to Christ's Consecration to his great eternal Priesthood after the order of Melchizedek, whereupon it is said that it became [p] God to consecrate the Captain of our salvation by sufferings, Heb. 2. 10. for so the word signifies, which we render to make perfect. This suffering and satisfying for our sins, fitted him for the office of Intercessor. To which purpose you may observe two things: 1. That Christ's Priesthood is said to be an eternal Priesthood [thou art a Priest for ever] and a Priesthood [q] not transitive, but for ever fastened in the person of Christ, Heb. 7. 24. after the power [r] of an indissoluble life, ver. 16. which cannot appertain to that one single finite unrepeated sacrifice of himself upon the Cross. 2. That Christ was not inaugurated to this his Priesthood till after his Resurrection, for then only he was instated in that indissoluble life: and this seemeth to be the importance of Acts 3. 26. where it is said, that God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you: where questionless that [mission to bless] notes the office of the Melchizedekian Priesthood, and most probably the phrase of [Raising him up] denotes his Resurrection.

S. Will not this notion of Christ's Priesthood derogate something from the suffering of Christ, or satisfaction wrought by it?

The necessity of Christs death in two things.

C. No, nothing at all, but rather demonstrate that this death of his was necessary in a double respect: 1. As an act of an Aaronical Priest, and a completion of all those legal Rites which vanished at the presence of this great sacrifice. 2. That in respect of the satisfaction wrought by it, it was necessary to make him our eternal Priest, or to make us capable of the benefits of that Priesthood of his.

S. Well then, I shall acknowledge those plain words of Scripture, that Christ is now to us (and ever shall be) a Priest of Melchizedek's order, and not strive to phansie him still an Aaronical Priest (that sacrifice being offered up once for all) because I have no ground now for such phansie. But then I beseech you, wherein lies the parallel betwixt Melchizedek's Priesthood and Christ's? Is it in offering of bread and wine, which we read of Melchizedek, or in any thing answerable to that?

The parallel between Melchizedek and Christ.

Negatively.

C. No, that is the Papists phansie, caused by a great mistake of theirs: they conceive that Melchizedek offered up bread and wine to God, and that in that respect he is called a Priest, or that he was sacrificing, or did sacrifice. But in this there are two mistakes. For first, Melchizedek brought forth this bread and wine, and presented it to Abraham, did not offer it to God; (and therefore Philo a Jew, well seen in that story, sets it as an act of Hospitality in Melchizedek, not of Priesthood) contrary to the crabbed niggardliness of Amalek; he would not allow water, but Melchizedek brought forth bread and wine. Secondly, this he did as a King; and so Christ as a King may perhaps be said to entertain and feed us in the Sacrament with bread and wine, and the spiritual food annexed to, or represented by it, the giving of Grace and Pardon being a Donative of his Kingly Office; but the Priestly acts of Melchizedek are those that follow, wherein only Christ's Eternal or Melchizedek Priesthood consists.

Positively, in

S. What are they?

C. 1 Blessing us. 2. Blessing God for us.

S. What is the meaning of Christ's blessing us?

1. Blessing us.

C. You will see that by reviewing the place even now cited, Acts 3. 26. God having raised up his Son Jesus sent him to bless us; which now you perceive is a denotation of his Priestly Office, every Priest, especially the Melchizedek-Priest, being to bless.

S. I do so, but how doth that shew me what that blessing is?

C. Yes, there are words that immediately follow, which clearly describe wherein this blessing consists, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities.

S. Be pleased then to make use of that Key for me, and shew me clearly wherein that part of Christ's Priesthood, his blessing of us, consists.

C. In using all powerful means to convert or turn, i. e. to bring all mankind to repentance.

S. What be those means?

The parts and branches of that.

C. First, the communicating that spirit to us, whereby he raised up Jesus from the dead, Rom. 8. 11. Secondly, sending the Holy Ghost (to convince the world of sin, and righteousness, and of judgment) that is, appointing a succession of Ministers to the end of the world to work in mens hearts a cordial subjection to that doctrine, which at Christ's preaching on earth was not believed. Thirdly, the giving of grace, inspiring of that strength into all humble Christian hearts, that may enable them to get victory over sin. Fourthly, his interceding with God for us, (which you know is the peculiar Office of the Priest) as he promised he would for Saint Peter, that his faith fail not; that is, that God will give us the grace of perseverance, (which intercession of his being now with power and authority, (all power is given to me, saith Christ) is all one in effect with the actual donation of that grace) and as a crown of this follows another kind of blessing, actual bestowing of heaven upon such blessed persevering children of his Father.

Our returns thereto.

S. What is required of us in answer to this part of his Office?

C. First, to seek and pray for grace to descend towards us through this conduit of conveyance. Secondly, to receive it when it thus flows, with humble grateful hearts. Thirdly, to count grace the greatest blessing in the world. Fourthly, to make use of it to the end designed by Christ; not to pride or wantonness or contempt of our meaner brethren, but to the converting and reforming of our lives. And fifthly, to look for no final benefit, pardon of sins, or eternal salvation from that Priest, either as suffering or satisfying for us, but upon the good use of his grace, which will engage us to walk painfully here, and to approach humbly to receive our reward, the crown not of our works, but God's graces, hereafter.

S. What is the second part of Christ's Melchizedekian Priesthood?

2. Blessing God for us.

C. Blessing or praising God for ever in heaven for his goodness, his mercy, his grace towards us poor sinful enemies of his, in giving us the victory over our so bitter adversaries, sin, and Satan, and death, and hell, by the blood of the Lamb, and the power of his grace.

S. What is our part in this business?

C. To follow this Precentor of ours, in blessing and magnifying that God of all grace, and never yielding yielding to those enemies, which he hath died to purchase (and given us) power to resist and overcome.

S. I do already discern the influence of this Office, thus explain'd, upon our lives: yet if you please, give me your direction and opinion, what is the main practical Doctrine emergent from this Office of Christ, especially as it consists in blessing?

The influence of this Doctrine on our lives.

C. This is it, that from hence we learn, How far forth we may expect Justification and Salvation from the sufferings of Christ no farther, it appears, than we are wrought on by his renewing and sanctifying and assisting grace, this being the very end of his giving himself for us, not that absolutely or presently we might be acquitted and saved, but that he might redeem us from all iniquity, from the reigning power, as well as guilt, and that impartially, of all iniquity, and purifie unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works, Tit. 2. 14. without which acquisition of purity, and zeal of good works in us, as in a peculiar people, Christ fails of his aim and design in dying for us, he is deprived of that reward of his sufferings, which is mentioned, Isa. 53. 10. The seeing of his seed, the having the pleasure of the Lord (which is said to be our Sanctification, 1 Thess. 4. 3.) prosper in his hand, the seeing of the travail of his soul, v. 11. dividing his portion with the great, and the spoil with the strong, verse 12. that is, rescuing men out of the power of sin to amendment of life, and to holiness, which is the crown and reward of his pouring out of his Soul to death, and making intercession for the transgressors. And if he fail of his hope, much more shall we of ours; after all that Christ hath done and suffered, the impenitent unreformed fiduciary shall perish. And what can you imagine more obligatory to good life than this?

S. I acknowledge the truth of what you say to be very convincing, and shall think my self bound in charity to my poor tottering soul, no longer to flatter and fool my self with such vain hope, that Christ's active and passive obedience shall be imputed to me, unless I am by his blessing thus qualified to receive this benefit from his death. Yet now I think of it, if Christ's active obedience may be imputed to me, then what need have I of obeying my self? If the righteousness that was in him by never sinning be reckoned to me, what need I any other initial imperfect inherent righteousness or holiness of my own? this is to me a scruple yet not answered by you.

Of Christ's active obedience.

C. I confess it is, for I have had no occasion to mention that Active Obedience of Christ, it being no part of his Priestly Office. And now if you will have my opinion of it, I conceive that Christ's active Obedience is not imputed unto any other person, so as he shall be thought perfectly to have obeyed by this only, because Christ hath perfectly obeyed; much less to him that lives in all kind of disobedience, and means Christs obedience shall serve his turn. For, first, if Christ's active obedience were thus imputed to me, then by that I should be reckoned of and accepted by God as if I had fulfilled the whole Law, and never sinned; and then I should have no need that Christ should suffer for my sins, and so this would exclude all possibility of having Christ's Passive obedience imputed to me. For what imaginable reason could be given, why I should suffer for sin, or any other surety for me, if by some former act I am accounted to have performed perfect unsinning Obedience, at least have the benefit of that obedience (performed by that Surety of mine, and accepted for me?) 'Tis true, when the penitent believer's sins are pardoned by the sufferings of Christ, Christ's perfect obeying the Law may so far be imputed to such an one, as to give a gloss or tincture to his still imperfect obedience, at least so far as that they shall be accepted by God: but that will not belong at all to, or avail for such as obey not sincerely; (for their impenitent sins are far different from those imperfections:) but only for them, that walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit, Rom. 8. 4. the prime place which seems to belong to that matter. Secondly, the truth is clear, that Christ's active Obedience was required in his person, as a necessary qualification to make it possible for him to suffer or satisfie for us: for, had he not performed active Obedience, that is, had any guile been found in his mouth or heart, had he ever sinned, he must have suffered for himself, and could no more have made satisfaction for us, than one of us sinners can do for another. It is true indeed, Christ merited as well as satisfied for us; but that by which he merited was not his never sinning or perfect obedience; (for that was due to the Law under which he was born) but his voluntary giving up himself to death, even to the death of the Cross, (and all that was preparative to it performed by him) freely, without any obligation or duty lying upon him (as a man) to do so, according to that of Heb. 10. 7. out of the Psalmist, Then said I, Lo I come, to do thy will, O God; I am content to do it; and Phil. 2. 6. Christ Jesus being in the form of God, &c. made himself of no reputation, and took on him the form of a servant, and was made in likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross, which is there set as the foundation of his merit, [Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, &c.] By this means (it is true that) he merited for us as well as for himself: For us he merited grace and glory; for himself, that he might have the power of dispensing them to whom, and in what manner and measure he pleased: this was the meaning of those words, [All power is given to me, &c.] and [God hath given him a name which is above every name;] and [when he ascended up on high, he gave gifts unto men.] But all this you see is quite another matter from his active obedience, or fulfilling the Law, being so imputed to us, as that the drunkard shall be accounted sober, the Adulterer chaste on this one score, because Christ was sober and chaste in our stead. No, that which he merited for us, being the gift of grace, (which was on purpose to deliver us from the reigning power of sin, and to bless us in turning every man from his iniquities) a power of serving God acceptably in righteousness and godly fear, he is so far from meriting for us any excuse or immunity from the indispensable force of this obligation, that he gave himself for us, did and suffered all this to this very end, Tit. 2. 14. That he might redeem us from all iniquity, rescue us out of the slavery of every evil habit, and purifie unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works: and if this use be not made of the grace which he purchased for us, if we do not work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, (which is the use which Saint Paul makes of the Doctrine of Christ's merit, Phil. 2. 12.) we shall have little priviledge by that part of his merit, and shall fall short of the glory purchased also. By all which 'tis clear that Christ's active obedience will not supply the place of ours, or make ours (I mean our sincere renewed obedience) less necessary, and consequently that our renewed obedience and ſanctification, or ſincere, honeſt, faithful purpoſe of new life (witneſſed to be ſuch by the conformity of the future action) is ſtill moſt indiſpenſably required (though mixed with much of weakneſs, ignorance, frailties, recidivations) to make us capable of pardon of ſin or ſalvation, which ſure is the intimation of thoſe places which impute our Juſtification rather to the Reſurrection of Chriſt (and the conſequents of that, the ſubſequent acts of his Prieſthood heretofore mentioned) than to his death. Such are Rom. 8. 34. It is God that juſtifieth, who is he that condemneth? It is Chriſt that died, yea rather that is riſen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who alſo maketh interceſſion for us: which laſt words refer peculiarly to that act of this his Prieſthood in bleſſing or interceeding for us: And Rom. 4. 25. who was delivered (to death) for our offences, and was raiſed again for our juſtification; the Death of Chriſt not juſtifying any who hath not his part in his Reſurrection.

S. I perceive this theme of Chriſt's Prieſthood to be a rich mine of Chriſtian knowledge, every ſcruple of mine opening ſo large a field of matter before you. I ſhall ſatisfie my ſelf with this competency which you have afforded me; I beſeech God, I may be able to digeſt it into kindly juice, that I may grow thereby.

Of the Prophetick Office of Chriſt.

Pleaſe you now to proceed to the third and laſt Office of Chriſt, that of a Prophet?

C. I ſhall, and promiſe you not to exerciſe your patience ſo largely in that, as in the former.

Wherein it conſiſts.

S. Wherein doth his Prophetick Office conſiſt? In foretelling what things ſhould happen to his Church?

C. No, that is not the notion we have now of a Prophet, (although that he hath alſo done in ſome meaſure as far as is uſeful for us.)

S. What other notion have you of a Prophet?

C. The ſame that the Apoſtle hath of Propheſying, 1 Cor. 11. 4. and 14. 6.

S. What is that?

C. Expounding, ſignifying or making known the will of God to us.

S. Wherein did Chriſt do that?

C. In his Sermons, but eſpecially that on the Mount, telling us on what terms Bleſſedneſs is now to be had under the Goſpel, and revealing ſome Commands of God which before were (either not at all, or) ſo obſcurely revealed in the Old Teſtament, that men thought not themſelves obliged to ſuch obedience. Beſides this, the Prophetick Office was exerciſed in ordaining ceremonies and diſcipline for his Church, the uſe of the Sacraments, and the Power of the Keys, that is, the Cenſures of the Church.

S. What elſe belongs to his Prophetick Office?

C. Whatſoever elſe he revealed concerning the Eſſence and Attributes of God, concerning the myſtery of the calling of the Gentiles, and whatſoever other divine truth he revealed to his auditors, either in Parables or plain enunciations.

What we muſt return to it.

S. What are we to return to this office of his?

C. Our willing full aſſent, never doubting of the truth of any affirmation of his; a ready obedience to his inſtitutions and commands, neither deſpiſing nor neglecting the uſe of what he hath thought fit to preſcribe us, and ſubduing carnal proud Reaſon to the obedience of Faith.

S. You have gone before me through the Names and Offices of Chriſt ſeverally: Is there any influence on practice that all of them jointly may be thought to have over and above what from the ſeverals you have ſhewed me?

C. I ſhall commend only one conſideration to you for this purpoſe, that Chriſt being an union of theſe three Offices, is a Jeſus, or Saviour finally to none but thoſe who receive him under all his three Offices uniformly into their hearts.

S. The Lord grant that I may do ſo, that I may be not a little way, or a partial, unſincere, but a true Chriſtian.

Sect. III.

What hinders but that you now proceed, according to your method propoſed, to the particulars of the third rank, the Theological graces and Chriſtian vertues?

C. I ſhall, if your patience and appetite continue to you.

Of Faith.

S. To begin then with the firſt, What is Faith?

The ſeveral acceptions of the word.

C. There is not any one word which hath more ſignifications than this hath in the Word of God, eſpecially in the New Teſtament. It ſometimes ſignifies the acknowledgment of the true God, in oppoſition to Heatheniſm; ſometimes the Chriſtian Religion, in oppoſition to Judaiſm; ſometimes the believing the power of Chriſt to heal diſeaſes; ſometimes the believing that he is the promiſed Meſſias; ſometimes fidelity or faithfulneſs; ſometimes a reſolution of Conſcience concerning the lawfulneſs of any thing; ſometimes a reliance, affiance, or dependence on Chriſt either for temporal or ſpiritual matters; ſometimes believing the truth of all divine relations; ſometimes obedience to God's commands in the Evangelical not Legal ſence; ſometimes the Doctrine of the Goſpel, in oppoſition to the Law of Moſes; ſometimes it is an aggregate of all other graces; ſometimes the condition of the ſecond Covenant in oppoſition to the firſt: and other ſences of it alſo there are diſtinguiſhable by the contexture, and the matter treated of where the word is uſed.

S. I ſhall not be ſo importunate as to expect you ſhould travel with me through every of theſe ſeverals, but ſhall confine your trouble to that which ſeems moſt neceſſary for me to know more particularly. As firſt, which of all theſe is the notion of that Faith which is the Theological grace, diſtinct from Hope and Charity,

1 Cor. 13. 13.

1 Cor. 13. 13.

C. It is there the aſſenting to, or believing the whole Word of God, particularly the Goſpel, and in that the Commands, and Threats, and Promiſes of that word, eſpecially the Promiſes. This you will acknowledge if you look on verſe 12. of that Chapter, and there obſerve and conſider, Faith oppoſed to Viſion.

that Viſion in the next life is the perfecting of that Faith in this life, or that Faith here is turned into Viſion there, (as hope into enjoying) for this argues Faith here to be this aſſent to thoſe things which here come to us by hearing, and are ſo believed by adherence, or dark ænigmatical knowledge, but hereafter are ſeen or known demonſtratively, or face to face. Hence it is that Faith is defined by the Apoſtle, Heb. 11. 1. the [r] confident expectation of things hoped for, the [s] conviction (or being convinced, or aſſured) of things which we do not ſee. The confident expectation of things future, and at a diſtance, diſtance, out of our reach, and the being convinced of the truth of thoſe things, for which there is no other demonſtration, but only the word and promiſe of God, and yet upon that, an inclination to believe them as aſſuredly as if I had the greateſt evidence in the world.

S. I cannot but deſire one trouble more from you in this matter, i. e. to know what kind of Faith was the Faith of Abraham, which is ſo ſpoken of in the New Teſtament, Rom. 4. Gal. 3. Heb. 11. Jam. 2. and ſeems to be meant as the pattern by which our Faith ſhould be cut out, and upon which both he was, and we may expect to be, juſtified. Abraham's Faith.

C. I cannot but commend the ſeaſonableneſs of the queſtion before I anſwer it, for certainly you have pitcht upon that which is the only ſure foundation and groundwork of all true knowledge and reſolution in this matter, Abraham being the Father of the Faithful, in whom that grace was moſt eminent, very highly commended and rewarded in the Scripture, and like whom we muſt be, if ever we expect to approve our ſelves to (or to be juſtified by) God.

S. But what then was the Faith of Abraham?

C. Many acts of Abraham's Faith there are mentioned in the New Teſtament, which were ſeveral exerciſes of that grace in him, and they are mentioned indiſtinctly, Gal. 3. as the pattern of that Faith which is now required under the Goſpel. But more eſpecially two there are, by which in two trials of his Faith he approved himſelf to God ſo far as that God imputed them to him for Righteouſneſs, i. e. accepted of thoſe acts of his as graciouſly as if he had performed perfect unſinning obedience, had lived exactly without any ſlip or fall all his life; yea, and gave him the honour of being called the Friend of God. Two ſpecial acts of it.

S. What was the firſt of thoſe Acts?

C. That which Saint Paul refers to Rom. 4. his believing the Promiſe of God made unto him, Gen. 15.

S. What was that Promiſe?

C. It conſiſted of two parts. Firſt, that God would ſhield and defend, or take him into his protection, and withal reward him abundantly for all the ſervice that he ſhould ever perform unto him. This Promiſe is ſet down, ver. 1. in theſe words, Fear not, Abraham, I am thy ſhield and exceeding great reward. The ſum of which is, that God will protect all thoſe that depend and truſt on him, reward all his faithful ſervants in a manner and meaſure inexpreſſibly abundant, and particularly, that he would then deal ſo with Abraham, a true faithful ſervant of his, and conſequently that he ſhould not fear. This promiſe it is not ſaid in the Text expreſly that Abraham believed; but yet it is ſo far implied that there is no doubt of it: for Abraham's queſtion, ver. 2. [What wilt thou give me ſeeing I go childleſs?] is in effect a bowing and yielding conſent to the truth of this promiſe, and firmly depending upon it, and thereupon proceeding to a ſpecial particular, wherein he deſired that favour of God to be made good to him, the giving him a Child for his Reward, whereas otherwiſe (having none, and ſo his ſervant being his only heir apparent) all the wealth in the world would not be valuable to him: and thereupon as a Reward of that his former Faith on the former Promiſe, God proceeds to make him that ſecond more particular Promiſe, which I called the ſecond part of it. The firſt conſiſting of two parts.

S. What was that?

C. The promiſe that he ſhould have an heir of his own body, from whom ſhould come a poſterity as numerous (or rather innumerable) as the ſtars of heaven, (and among them at length the Meſſias, in whom all the people of the world ſhould be bleſſed) for that is the meaning of [ſo ſhall thy ſeed be, ver. 5. and of the ſame words delivered by way of Ellipſis, Rom. 4. 18. who believed that he ſhould be the father of many nations, according as had been ſaid to him by God] So (i. e. as the ſtars of heaven) ſhall thy ſeed be. The ſecond part of the Promiſe being a particular contained before under the general of rewarding him exceedingly, but not till now explicitely revealed to Abraham, that God would then reward him by giving him a ſon, and a numerous poſterity, and the Meſſias to come from him, was a particular Trial whether his former belief were ſincere, i. e. whether he would truſt and depend on God or no, there being little reaſon for him to expect a child then, having remained ſo long without one, and ſo ſome difficulty in ſo believing; and then it follows that in this trial he was found faithful, he believed, v. 6. (or, as Saint Paul heightens it, beſides, or beyond hope he believed, Rom. 4. 18.) and God counted it to him for righteouſneſs, i. e. took this for ſuch an expreſſion of his faithfulneſs and ſincerity and true piety, that he accepted him as a righteous perſon upon this performance, though no doubt he had many infirmities and ſins, which he was or had been guilty of in his life, unreconcileable with perfect righteouſneſs.

S. What was the ſecond of thoſe acts of Abraham's faith?

C. That which Saint James mentions, chap. 2. 21. and Saint Paul, Heb. 11. 17. offering up his Son Iſaac upon the Altar. For God having made trial before of his faith in one particular, that of believing his Promiſe, makes now a new trial of it in another, that of obedience to his Commands: for when God gives Commands as well as Promiſes, the one is as perfect a ſeaſon and means of trial of faith as the other; and to ſay I have faith, and not thus to evidence it, not to bring forth that fruit of it, when God by expecting it and requiring it puts me to the trial, is either to manifeſt that I have no faith at all, or elſe not a through faith, but only for cheaper eaſier ſervices, not able to hold out to all trials, or elſe that this is but a dull liveleſs habit of faith without any vital acts flowing from it: which yet are the things that God commands, and without yielding of which in time of trial (or when occaſion is offered) the habit will not be accepted by him. The ſecond.

And this I conceive the cleareſt way of reconciling Saint James and Saint Paul in what is affirmed by them in this matter. Abraham was juſtified by Faith, ſaith Saint Paul, Rom. 4. and not by works, i. e. by believing and depending on God for the performance of his promiſe, and reſigning up wholly to him to obey his Precepts; or more clearly, by that Faith which, howſoever it was tried, whether by Promiſes of ſtrange incredible things, or Commands of very hard duties, (killing his only Son) did conſtantly approve it ſelf to be a true Faith, and ſo was accepted by God, without performance of abſolute unſinning obedience, much more without performance of the Moſaical Law, (Abraham then being uncircumciſed:) which two things, one or both, are generally by St. Paul meant Saint James reconciled with Saint Paul.

by works. But then ſaith Saint James, Abraham was juſtified by works, i. e. his Faith did approve its ſelf by faithful actions, particularly by offering up his ſon, that being an act of the greateſt fidelity and ſincerity and obedience in the world; and if in time of trial he had not done ſo, he had never paſſed for the faithful Abraham, had never been juſtified, i. e. approved or accepted by God: which is in effect all one with that which Saint Paul hath ſaid; neither one nor the other excluding or ſeparating faithful actions, or acts of faith from faith, or the condition of Juſtification, but both abſolutely requiring them as the only things by which the man is juſtified: only St. Paul diſputing againſt the Jew, who relied and depended on his legal righteouſneſs, mentions the works of the Law, and excludes them from having any thing to do toward Juſtification, leaving the whole work to Faith; and St. James diſputing not againſt the Jews, but uncharitable Gnoſticks, the pattern of all preſumptuous fiduciaries, hath no occaſion to add that excluſive part to ſhut out works, which belonged only to the Jew, but rather to prevent or cure that other diſeaſe, which he ſaw the minds of men through miſtake and abuſe of Saint Paul's doctrine poſſeſſed with, or ſubject to, (thinking that a dead habit of Faith would ſerve the turn, and miſtaking every ſlight motion or formal profeſſion (ſuch as bidding the poor go, and be rich, and giving them nothing, ver. 16.) for that habit of faith) and in oppoſition to that, reſolveth that the Faith which in time of trial, when occaſion is offered, doth not bring forth acts, is ſuch a dead carcaſe of faith that God will never be content with to the juſtifying or accepting of any, or counting any man (as Abraham) his friend, for ſuch are none, ſaith Chriſt, but thoſe which do whatſoever he commands them, John 15. 14.

S. I thank you for this very plain delineation of Abraham's Faith: be only now pleaſed, (to prevent any miſtake of mine) to change the ſcene, and bring home the whole matter to my own heart, and tell me what is that Faith which is required of me, and which alone will ſuffice to denominate me a child of faithful Abraham, and which will be ſure to be accounted to me for righteouſneſs by God. And this you may pleaſe to do only with reflexion, and in proportion to what you have already told me of Abraham.

What faith in us is parallel to that by which Abraham was juſtified.

C. I will obey you. The Faith which is now required of you, and which God will thus accept to your Juſtification, is a cordial ſincere giving up your ſelf unto God, particularly to Chriſt, firmly to rely on all his Promiſes, and faithfully to obey all his commands delivered in the Goſpel, which will never be accounted by God that ſincere cordial faith, unleſs it be ſuch as will (whenſoever any trial is made of you) act and perform accordingly, believe what Chriſt hath promiſed in the Goſpel, againſt all ſpiritual or worldly temptations to the contrary, and practiſe what Chriſt commands, againſt all the invitations of pleaſure, or profit, or vain glory to the contrary; to which purpoſe it is that Chriſt ſaith, that they cannot believe which receive the praiſe of men, Jo. 5. 44. by that one carnal motive, (and that now-adays a moſt prevailing one, the notion of honour being moſtly taken from Women and Children, and the worſt of men, and ſo making all vice neceſſary to a good reputation, and all vertue, eſpecially the moſt precious Chriſtian vertues, meekneſs, &c. the only reproachful thing) by that one carnal motive, I ſay, as by an example or inſtance of the reſt, illuſtrating this truth, that he that, the World, or Fleſh, or Devil can carry away from the profeſſion of and obedience to Chriſt, is no ſon of the faithful Abraham, no believing Diſciple of his. For if it be ſaid that Abraham was faithful before thoſe acts of his faith, at leaſt before the ſecond of them, that of Obedience, being juſtified upon the believing the Promiſe before, Gen. 15. and ſo that you may have true Faith before you produce theſe effects of it, at leaſt, that by believing the Promiſes of Chriſt you are ſo juſtified, without reſpect unto (or abſtracting from) this obedience to his Commands; I ſhall ſoon ſatisfie that ſcruple, by confeſſing the truth of it as far as concerned Abraham on this ground, becauſe Abraham was by God (who ſaw his heart) diſcerned to be faithful before any of theſe trials, nay had formerly given evidence of it, by going out of his countrey at God's Command, which was an act of great "ὑπήκουσεν ἐξελθεῖν. Obedience, Gen. 12. 1. and Heb. 11. 8. And after, being tried at that time only with a Promiſe, he gave full credit to that Promiſe, and ſtill gave evidence of his Fidelity as faſt as occaſions were offered, which God, that ſaw no maim in him, did accept of, even before he had made thoſe other trials. And proportionably it will ſtill hold true of you, that if your heart be ſincerely given up to Chriſt, if there be in you a reſolution of uniform Obedience unto Chriſt, which the ſearcher of hearts ſees to be ſincere, and ſuch as would hold out in time of temptation, this will be certainly accepted by God to thy juſtification: nay, if God try thee only with the Promiſe, as, (be it but this) that God will give reſt to all that being weary come to him, or for temporal things, that he will never fail thee, nor forſake thee, if thou do thus come unto him, and confidently depend on the truth of this without any doubting or ſtaggering, this will be accepted by God to thy juſtification, without any further act of Faith or obedience to his commands, in caſe, or ſuppoſing, there were no ſuch other command as yet given to thee, or no occaſion of obeying it. But now thy caſe being in one reſpect diſtinguiſhed from that of Abraham's, the whole Goſpel being already revealed and propoſed to thee as a ſummary of what thou art bound to believe and what to do, (and no need of any ſuch particular revelations of God's will, either by way of promiſe or particular precept, as was to Abraham) the Object of thy Faith is already ſet thee, all the Affirmations, all the Promiſes, and all the Commands, yea and Threats of the Goſpel; and all theſe are to be received uniformly with a cordial Faith proportioned to each of them, aſſent to all his Affirmations, dependence on all his Promiſes, reſolution of Obedience to all his commands, (even thoſe hardeſt ſayings of his, moſt unacceptable to fleſh and blood) and fear and awe of his Threats, without any flattering fallacious hope of poſſibility to eſcape them. Thy faith, if it be true, muſt be made up of all theſe parts, and not of ſome one or more of them; and then whenſoever any trial ſhall be particularly made of thee, (in which kind ſoever it happens to be firſt) thou muſt expreſs and evidence thy fidelity, or elſe this Faith will not at that time be accepted by God to thy juſtification, i. e. will not be approved by him, or accounted for thy righteouſneſs: and the ſame muſt be reſolved, when and how often ſoever occaſions ſhall offer themſelves either of aſſenting or adhering, or obeying or fearing God, (i. e. whenſoever any difficulty or other temptation interpoſes in any one of theſe) for then it is with thee as it was with Abraham when God tempted him, and there is no hope of God's approbation of thee to be had, but upon paſſing faithfully, (I ſay not, without all ſin, all blemiſh, all imperfection, but without all falſeneſs, falſeneſs, faithleſneſs, hypocriſie) honeſtly, ſincerely, couragiouſly through ſuch trials. For though God may approve and juſtifie thy faith and thee before or without any trial, any performance, (beholding all in the heart which men do in the actions;) yet when thoſe trials are made, and the performance not met with, it is then apparent even to men and thy own ſoul, that thy reſolutions were not before ſincere, (i. e. thy faith true) and conſequently God, that ſaw that before thoſe trials, cannot be thought to have juſtified that unſincere reſolver, that dead, heartleſs, liveleſs Faith. But when upon ſuch trials God meets with his deſired expected returns, he then juſtifies the Fidelity or faith of that man, and conſequently that man himſelf, who hath ſhewed himſelf ſo faithful; and ſo (by the purport of the New Covenant, through the ſufferings and ſatisfaction of Chriſt) he imputeth not to that man the ſins of his former, nor frailties and infirmities of his preſent life.

S. You have given me a large account of my demand, and I can find nothing wanting to my preſent ſatisfaction, but the more diſtinct deſcending to the ſeveral parts and branches of Faith, that I may more nearly look into the ſeverals of my duty in this matter, wherein I am ſo mightily concerned.

C. I ſhall give you that without detaining you long, or adding much to what hath been already ſaid, only by giving you the Object of true Faith, which is of two ſorts; either God himſelf, or the Word of God; God who is believed in, and the Word of God as the rule of that Faith, or matter to be believed; and that Word entirely conſidered, ſignifying whatſoever I am (or may ever be) convinced to come from him, and in it (as it is now ſhut up and compriſed in the Books of Canonical Scripture) theſe ſpecial parts, which do divide the whole Scripture between them. 1. The Affirmations of Scripture, whether by way of Hiſtorical Narration, or by way of Doctrine. 2. The Promiſes of God both in the Old and New Teſtament, but eſpecially the Promiſes of the Goſpel, both ſuch as belong to this life, and eſpecially thoſe that belong to another. 3. The Commands of God, whether the Natural Law of all mankind written in our hearts by the finger of God, made up in the frame of the humane ſoul, and more clearly revealed both in the Decalogue and other parts of Sacred writ; or whether the Commands of Chriſt, raiſing nature to a higher pitch in the Sermon on the Mount, and ſuperadding ſome poſitive inſtitutions, as thoſe of the Sacraments and Cenſures of the Church, in other parts of the New Teſtament. 4. The Threats of the Goſpel, thoſe terrours of the Lord ſet on purpoſe to drive and haſten us to amendment of our ſinful lives. All theſe put together are the adæquate object of our Faith, which is then cordial and ſuch as God will accept of, when it affords to every one of theſe that reception which is apportioned to it, aſſent to the truth of the Affirmations, fiducial reliance on the Promiſes, obediential ſubmiſſion to the Commands, and humble fear and awe to the Threats.

The objects of true Faith.

The ſeverals of God's Word reduced to four heads.

S. I cannot but acknowledge the truth of all this, but yet have ſome objection to propoſe againſt the laſt branch of it, wherein you make Fear of the Threats a part of Faith, whereas Faith ought to be made perfect by love, ſaith Saint James; and Saint John, 1 Joh. 4. 18. tells us that perfect love caſts out fear; and beſides, fear including doubting, ſeems to be moſt contrary to Faith.

How Fear is reconcileable with Faith.

C. That the terrors of the Lord, and Threats of eternal puniſhment to all unreformed ſinners, are one part of the Goſpel, there is no doubt; and being ſo, they muſt needs be the object of our Faith, and that Faith deſcending to the heart, becomes that Fear and Awe forementioned (in the ſame kind, as believing the Commands becomes obedience.) Thus in the caſe of Noah's faith, Heb. 11. which was believing the Threats of God againſt the old world, it is ſaid, ver. 7. that Noah by faith (being warned by God) being [w] poſſeſt with fear or awe, to wit, of thoſe Threats) prepared an ark, &c. And ſo there can be no doubt of the truth of that doctrine, nor danger in the expreſſion. As for that place of Saint John, [that perfect love caſts out fear] the Fear which that excludes is not the fear of God's wrath, but of Perſecutions and temporal dangers: for ſo that love of Chriſt, if it be perfect, ſuch as Chriſt's was to us, chap. 3. 16. which is referred to again chap. 4. 17. that as he is, ſo we ſhould be in this world, (or as he is in this world, whileſt here on earth, ſo we ſhould be) will make us venture any thing for the Beloved, even death it ſelf, confeſs him in time of the greateſt hazard; but ſure, not the diſpleaſing of God or torments of Hell. And ſo that place is miſapplied to this buſineſs. And as little pertinent is the other part of the objection; that becauſe Faith is contrary to doubting, therefore 'tis not reconcileable with fear. For the doubting which faith excludes, is the doubting of the truth of that which we are commanded to believe, or the not adhering and in our practice keeping faſt unto it: but the Fear which we ſpeak of, ſuppoſes us to believe, and not thus to doubt; and indeed is in this caſe the direct contrary to doubting: for when a judgment is denounced againſt me, then the leſs I doubt of the truth of the denunciation, the more I ſhall be afraid of the judgment: and my want of fear, if it be at all rational, muſt be founded and built in want of this faith, in doubting or not believing. And indeed this fear is in ſome caſes the only, in all a moſt excellent means to keep me ſafe, to help me work, and work out my own ſalvation: and therefore knowing the terrours of the Lord, we perſwade men, ſaith the Apoſtle; the terrours are as fit to perſwade, as the love of God to conſtrain us to perform our duty. As for the duty of ſerving God without fear, Luke 1. you have [x] formerly had an account of that, that it belongs not to this matter.

S. You have ſatisfied my objection; I ſhall now more chearfully proceed. I have heard much of a General and a Particular Faith, and that the General is little worth without the Particular. Tell me whether that be appliable to the Faith you now ſpeak of.

C. Being rightly underſtood, it is.

S. What then is the General and Particular Faith as it refers to the affirmation of Scripture?

C. The General is a belief of God's Veracity, that whatſoever is affirmed by him is infallibly true: the Particular is the full giving up my aſſent to every particular which I am convinced to be affirmed by God, aſſoon as ever I am ſo convinced, or have means ſufficient offered me ſo to convince me; and yet more particularly, the acknowledging of thoſe Truths which have ſpecial marks ſet upon them in Scripture to ſignifie them to be of more weight than others, as, That God is, Heb. 11. 6. That Chriſt is the Meſſias of the world, the acknowledging of which is ſaid to be life eternal, Joh. 17. 3. The Doctrine of the Trinity, into which all are commanded to be baptized, and thoſe other fundamentals of faith, which all men were inſtructed in anciently before they were permitted to be baptized, baptized, contrived briefly into the compass of the Apostles Creed, a summary of Christian faith or doctrine necessary to be believed.

Commands.

S. What is the General and Particular Faith as it refers to the Commands of the Gospel?

C. The General is an assent to the truth and goodness of those Commands in general, as they concern all men, that is, believing that Christ hath given such a law to all his Disciples, to all Christians, and that that law is most fit to be given by him. The Particular is the applying these Commands to my self, as the necessary and proper rule of my life, the resolving to perform faithful obedience to them.

Threats.

S. What is it as it refers to the Threats?

C. The general is to believe that those Threats will be (and that it is must just they should be) executed upon all against whom they are denounced. The Threats under Oath, absolutely, non-admission into God's rest to all disobedient provokers, Heb. 3. 11. the conditional Threats, conditionally, i. e. unless we repent, and use the means to avert them. The Particular is to resolve, that except I get out of that number, I shall certainly find my part in them.

Promises.

S. What as it refers to the Promises?

C. The general is the believing the truth, infallible truth of the Promises, particularly of those Promises which concern the pardon of sin, and salvation, (the looking at and receiving or embracing of Christ, as the only remedy against sin, the only propitiation for it:) which Promises, (the object of that Faith) being generally conditional, not absolute Promises, great care must be taken, that the Faith be proportioned to the nature of the Promises: as when the Promise of Rest is made peculiarly to the weary and heavy laden thus coming to Christ, the general Faith is to believe undoubtedly, that this Rest shall be given to all that perform this Condition, to all humble faithful penitentiaries; and to believe that it belongs either absolutely to all, or to any but those who are so qualified, is to believe a lie; no piece of Faith, but phancy or vain conceit, which sure will never advantage, but betray any that depend upon it.

S. What then is the Particular Faith terminated in this conditional Promise?

C. Not the believing that the Promise belongs absolutely to me, (for it doth not any longer than I am so qualified) nor the believing that I am so qualified, (for 1. perhaps I am not; and 2. that is no object of Faith, no part of the Promise, or of any other piece of God's Word) but it is made up of these three things. 1. The confident perswasion that if I fail not in my part, Christ will never fail in his; if I do repent, and lay hold on Christ for pardon, no power of heaven, or earth, or hell, no malice of Satan, no secret unrevealed decree shall ever be able to deprive me of my part in the Promise. 2. A setting my self to perform the condition on which the Promise is made; as when Rest being promised upon condition of Coming, I come upon that invitation, then this coming of mine may be called particular Application: as when a Picture is so designed and set, as to look on every one that comes in at the door, and on none else, the way to be particularly lookt on, i. e. to apply the eye of the picture particularly to me, is to come in at the door. And 3. the comparing the conditional Promise to my particular present estate by way of self-examination, and thence concluding upon sight of the condition in my self, that I am such a one to whom the Promise belongs, and shall have my part in it, if I continue and persevere. The second of these, if it be real and sincere, gives me a [a] certainty of the object, seals the promise to me in heaven, which will remain firm though I never know of it. The third, if it be on right judgement of my self, may give me the other [b] certainty, i. e. ascertain me that I am in the number of God's children: but there being so much uncertainty whether I judge aright of my self or no, and there being no particular affirmation in God's word concerning the sincerity of my present, or perseverance of my future condition, that assurance reflexive, of which this is one ingredient, cannot be a divine Faith, but at the most an humane, yet such as perhaps I may have no doubting mixed with, nor reason that I should so doubt. For at the conclusion of life, having finished his course and persevered, St. Paul could say without doubting, Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness. Which if another man be not able to say with that assurance, 'twill not presently be want of Faith in him, as long as this want of assurance proceeds not from any distrust of the truth of God's Promises, but only from an humble conceit of his own repentance, that 'tis not such as God requires of him. And if that place, 2 Cor. 13. [Know ye not that Christ Jesus is in you except ye be reprobates?] be objected, to prove that all are Reprobates that know not that Christ is in them; the answer will be satisfactory, that the words rendred [in you] signifie (very frequently in the Scripture, and peculiarly in a place parallel to this) Exod. 17. 17. among you, or in your Congregation. And so the sence will be best dissolved into a question and answer, Know ye not (by the miracles and preaching, the demonstration of the Spirit and of Power) that Christ Jesus is among you? (by way of interrogation, for so 'tis in the Greek, and the meaning appears by the context to be) Know ye not, discern you not your selves, that the power of the Gospel is come among you by my Apostleship? and then by way of answer; [except ye be reprobates] you are obdurate insensate creatures, or (as our margent, Rom. 1. 28 renders the word) [c] void of Judgment, undoubtedly, unless you do.

Justifying Faith.

S. You have shewed me the difference betwixt General and Particular Faith, and I shall not follow that matter any farther, but I pray help me in one difficulty. We are said in Scripture to be Justified by Faith; and we hear much talk of a Justifying Faith; I pray tell me what faith this is, to which Justification is attributed.

Faith no efficient of our Justification.

C. First, let me tell you that Faith, in whatever acceptation, is no proper efficient cause of Justification, for such is only God through the satisfaction of Christ, accepting our persons and our weak performances, and not imputing our sins: In which act nothing in us can possibly have any, so much as inferior Instrmental efficiency. It is true, the habit of Faith may in some sence be called the cause of the acts of Faith, and so of this act of receiving or embracing of Christ, in which sence 'tis called the eye and hand of Faith: but then it is clear, that this receiving of Christ is a thing very distinct from justification; the one is clearly the act of man, the other of God: and therefore to conclude that Faith is an efficient, though but instrumental, of justification, because it is an Instrument ſtrument of receiving Chriſt is no ſolid argument; and ſo in like manner from its activity in other things, to infer its efficiency in juſtification. The moſt that can be ſaid is, that 'tis a condition without which God, that juſtifies the penitent believer, will never juſtifie the impenitent Infidel; and therefore 'tis obſervable that 'tis no where ſaid in Scripture, that Faith juſtifies, but we are juſtified by Faith, which particle [[a] by] is a peculiar note of a condition, not a cauſe. Only a Condition.

S. But then what Faith is this which is the condition of our Juſtification?

C. That Faith which we ſhewed you was Abraham's faith; or in fewer words, the receiving the whole Chriſt in all his Offices, as my King, my Prieſt, my Prophet, whereby I believe the Commands as well as the Promiſes of the Goſpel; or take the Promiſes as they are, i.e. not as abſolute, but as conditional Promiſes. And this is a cordial practical belief, a firm reſolution of uniform Obedience and Diſcipleſhip, faith made perfect by works, Jam. 2. 22. Intimating, that without the addition of ſuch works, ſuch Obedience Evangelical, any other act, or part, or notion of faith, would be imperfect, unſufficient to this end, that is, to our Juſtification. The ſame is called in a parallel phraſe, Faith [b] conſummate by love, Gal. 5. 6. (which indeed we render working by love, but the Greek and Syriack ſignifies conſummate by love) that is, by acts of Chriſtian charity; and therefore in two parallel places it is thus varied; in one we read, in ſtead of it, the new creature, Gal. 6. 15. in another, the keeping the Commandments of God, 1 Cor. 7. 19.

[b] ἐνεργουμένη δι ἀγάπης.

S. But how then is it ſo often ſaid, that we are not juſtified by works, Gal. 1. 16. and Rom. 3. 28. that we are juſtified by faith without the deeds of the law? Juſtification by Faith.

C. I have in effect already told you, and ſhall in a word again tell you. The word [works] and [deeds of the law] in thoſe places ſignifies legal obedience, or circumciſion, and the like Judaical outdated ceremonies; and [Faith] the Evangelical Grace of giving up the whole heart to Chriſt, without any ſuch obedience or Judaical obſervances: and ſo 'tis truly ſaid, we are juſtified by faith without them, i.e. without ſuch works, ſuch obedience; yet not excluding, but including that Evangelical obedience, for without that faith is dead, ſaith S. James, 2. 17. and then ſure not able to juſtifie any. And therefore you may obſerve in that Apoſtle's diſcourſe, James 2. he affirms that Abraham was juſtified by works, ver. 21. and makes that a parallel phraſe to that of the Old Teſtament, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteouſneſs, ver. 23. where, as [Juſtification] and [imputed to him for righteouſneſs] are phraſes of the ſame importance, ſo are [works] and [believing] alſo.

S. The reaſon of it, I conceive, is becauſe faith always brings forth good works, or if it do not, it is no true faith.

C. I am not altogether of your opinion, for I conceive it very poſſible for me to believe, and yet not to live accordingly. The truth is, that is not a juſtifying Faith, or ſuch as even now I defined, and ſo no true faith in that ſence, but yet it may be a true Faith, for ſo much as it is; or if you will, it is one part of true Faith, which is oft miſtaken for the whole. I may truly, without all doubting, believe the Promiſe of mercy and ſalvation to the true penitent, and none elſe, which belief is very fit and proper to ſet me a reforming and amending, and yet 'tis poſſible for temptations of carnal objects to perſwade me to defer this duty, nay never to think fit to ſet my ſelf to the performance of it, the preſent pleaſures of ſin may out-weigh in my debauched choice thoſe future ſpiritual joyes; nay, I may ſee and like them, and yet for the preſent embrace the contrary, the Will of man being a middle free faculty, not abſolutely obliged to do or chuſe what the Underſtanding judgeth moſt honeſt, i.e. what Reaſon, and Faith, and the Spirit of God commandeth to be done. The truth is, if this Faith get once to be radicated in the heart, to rule and reign there, if the Will chuſeth what Faith recommendeth, then it bringeth forth all manner of good works; and ſo then 'tis the conſummation of that former act of Faith by this latter, or (in the words of Saint Paul and Saint James) the conſummation of Faith by Charity and good Works, that God accepteth in Chriſt to juſtification, and not the bare aptneſs of faith to bring forth works, if thoſe works, by the fault of a rebellious infidel will not be brought forth. Works do not infallibly follow Faith.

S. But is there no one peculiar act of Faith to which juſtification is particularly imputable?

C. That to which Juſtification is promiſed, is certainly the giving up of the whole ſoul intirely unto Chriſt, accepting his Promiſes on his conditions, undertaking Diſcipleſhip upon Chriſt's terms. But yet 'tis poſſible that ſome one act of Faith may be more excellent and acceptable in the ſight of God than others; as that humble act of the faithful ſervant, that when he hath done all, acknowledges himſelf unprofitable, and ſo excludes all glorying, (which the Apoſtle makes very neceſſary to juſtification, Rom. 4.) expects all good from God's free mercy in Chriſt, without any reflexion on any of his own performances; or again, that of full truſt, affiance, reliance, rolling ones ſelf on God, depending on his All-ſufficiency in the midſt of all difficulties, on the fidelity of him that hath promiſed, when all worldly probabilities are to the contrary: but then this muſt be accompanied with other acts of Faith, when occaſion is offered for them, and with uſe of the means preſcribed by Chriſt, or elſe reliance may prove preſumption after all. And however it is, We muſt add to our faith vertue, &c. or elſe our Faith may ſtill be dead, liveleſs, being alone, that is, unable to ſtand us in any ſtead to the deſired end. Some acts of Faith more excellent than others.

S. I could hear you, and propoſe ſcruples to you much longer on this argument, but I deſire to carry away only ſo much of this ſubject of Faith as may tend to the increaſe of all vertue in me, and I am ſenſible how long I have detained you on this theme; and therefore I ſhall importune you no farther about it: but yet only vary, not end, your trouble, and advance to the next Theological Grace, that of Hope, and deſire your directions in that particular.

C. This Grace is ſubject to ſome miſtaking, and therefore I ſhall deſire you to mark carefully what I conceive of it.

S. What is Hope?

C. It is a patient comfortable expectation of the performance of God's Promiſes, belonging to this life or a better. Of Hope.

S. What is the ground of Hope? The Ground

C. Some ſure word of Promiſe aſſented unto by Faith?

S. What

S. What is the Object of Hope?

The Object two-fold.

C. It is made up of two things; 1. The thing promised. 2. The Cause or Author of it. 1. The thing promised, or the performance of that Promise. Such is the Resurrection of the dead, which nature cannot help us to see any thing into, but being believed by Faith becomes the object of Hope. And it is observable, that seven times in the Acts of the Apostles the word Hope refers to this one object, the Resurrection or future state or life in another world; which indeed is the supreme object of the Christian hope, and all other things but in an inferiour degree, and as they refer to that, and in order to that great treasure of our rejoycing. Though the truth is, as there be promises of this life as well as of another, (as that God will give us all things necessary for us, and the like) so is there a Secular Hope, or an Hope of this life, and an object of that Hope.

S. What is that Secular Hope?

Secular Hope.

C. A reliance on God, that he will send me whatsoever is good for me.

S. What is the object of that Hope?

C. Good successes, good things.

S. Am I bound to hope that all things that are good for me, shall befall me?

The conditions of that.

C. I must answer you with some caution. First, those Promises are conditional, All things shall tend to good to them that love God. If we be lovers of God, then that Promise belongs to us, not else. And consequently then we are to hope it, not else. Ye that fear the Lord, hope in the Lord, saith the Psalmist.

S. But is every true servant of God bound to hope that God will give him all secular good things, as wealth, peace, honour, and the like.

C. There is another condition required in him first before that Promise belongs to him, and consequently before he is bound to that Hope.

S. What is that?

C. To pray for them, for the Having and Finding is promised to none but to them which ask and seek; yea, and to use the means ordinary and lawful, which are in order to that end, as labour, and the like, (among which mercifulness and liberality is one, to which the Promise of secular wealth is most frequently made, and the contrary threatned with want.)

S. Well then, must the servant of God having prayed, and used those means, hope and be assured that that which he thus prays for shall be granted him?

C. Yes, either formally, or by way of equivalence; either that, or something that is better; or again, either now, or when God sees fitter for him: for this must be allowed God, to be able to chuse for us better than we can for our selves, both for the thing it self, and the time of conferring it. For many times, that which we ask, would, if it should be granted, be worse for us, and perhaps tend to our destruction; and then God by denying the particular matter of our Prayers, doth grant the general matter of them, which always is that which is best for us. Sometimes again he defers to grant, that we may re-inforce our impression, pray more ardently; and for us to be so exercised in prayer and hope, is best for us also.

S. Are we bound then thus to expect and hope in every thing that we pray for?

C. Yes, we are, and the want of that is the sin of doubting, noted by Christ and his Apostles.

S. Well, but you told me there was another part of the object of Hope, besides the thing promised, which you called the Cause or Author of it. What is that?

The Author of our hope.

C. The person that is to make good his Promise to me, which is God himself. And therefore we are so often exhorted to hope in the Lord, &c. For as in the other affections, we are not only angry at the injury or the provoking thing done to us, but at him that did it, and we do not only fear pain and punishment, but him also that can inflict it on us; so we do not only hope for heaven, or for any other good thing, but for God as the Fountain of our bliss, and through whose mercy it is that it befalls us. This is called hope in him, or (as it should rather be rendred) hope on him, 1 John 3. 3. And this is a special act of Christian hope, to be thus unbottom'd of our selves, and fastned upon God with a full reliance, and trust, and dependance on his mercy.

S. I thank you for this direction. Give me leave to proceed. What be the seasons and opportunities of this hope?

Seasons of Hope.

C. 1. Time of Tribulation, Rom. 5. 4. Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed. Where the word which we render, ʸ experience, signifies approved upon a tryal, and the sence runs thus; Tribulation is a season and a means to work patience, and that patience to produce approbation, as of one that is tried in the fire, and has past the test; and this is a means to work an hope or expectation of reward, and that hope will not confound or shame, that is, deceive, any that relies on it, and besides will keep from being ashamed of those sufferings, and make us rather glory, ver. 3. that is, rejoice in them, as in the most benign auspicious signs, that in another world there is a reward for the righteous, because in this life 'tis the contrary rather. So Rom. 12. 12. Rejoycing in hope, and patience in tribulation, are joined together. 2. Time of Temptation, when some present delight is ready to invite to sin, or present bitterness to deter from the ways of God, then the hope of future joys (to be exchanged for that bitterness, and to outvy and preponderate that pleasure) comes in seasonably. 3. The time of Mourning for the dead, which the assured hope of a Resurrection will moderate and alleviate.

S. You told me, the ground of Christian hope was the Promises. I pray, is a man to hope for nothing but that for which he hath some promise in Scripture?

C. He may perhaps lawfully hope for some things for which there is no Promise, so there be nothing to the contrary; but then this is not the Grace of hope, but a good natural assurance or confidence, which Aristotle observes ᶻ young men to be full of, and old men not so inclined to. But if it be for any spiritual matter, it is (if it be not grounded on some Promise) but presumption.

ᶻ νεότης ἐλπίδος πλήρης, γῆρας δύσελπι.

S. There is no promise in Scripture for every particular mans eternal salvation, yet sure every man is bound to hope he shall be saved.

C. This

C. This is the miſpriſion I deſired to anticipate and foreſtal in you, and now I muſt be fain to cure, ſeeing I could not prevent it. To which purpoſe you muſt again remember, that God's Promiſes being the ground of Hope, and thoſe Promiſes being but ſeldom abſolute, moſt what conditionate, the hope (if it be the Chriſtian grace of hope) muſt be proportioned and attemperate to the promiſe; and if it exceed that temper and proportion, it becomes a tumour and tympany of hope. For example, that there ſhall be another ſtate or life after the end of this, both for juſt and unjuſt, there is an abſolute promiſe, and therefore every man may juſtly hope for that; though to the ungodly it may be matter rather of fear than hope; but for a happy or joyful reſurrection to life, a bleſſed future ſtate, there is no abſolute unlimited, but conditional limited promiſe, to the true penitent believer, and to none elſe; for to all others God hath ſworn, they ſhall not enter into his reſt. And then he that is ſuch, may no more hope for his part in the reſurrection of the juſt, than for the moſt impoſſible thing: or if he do hope, that hope will ſtand him in no ſtead, will never make that true by hoping it, which was otherwiſe falſe; The hope of the hypocrite ſhall periſh, ſaith Job; and ſo the carnal impenitent, his hope ſhall periſh alſo, ſure will never be able to keep him from periſhing. Whether every man be bound to hope he ſhall be ſaved.

S. What then is the Chriſtian hope in this particular?

C. It is an aſſurance, 1. That though my ſins be never ſo great, they may be pardoned me, if the condition to obtain that pardon be not neglected. 2. To hope chearfully and confidently upon the obſervation of thoſe means. 3. (which is the prime act and evidence of the Chriſtian hope) to ſet induſtriouſly and piouſly to the performance of that condition on which the promiſe is made; as Saint John ſaith, Every man that hath this hope purifies himſelf. And 4. upon view of the ſincerity of that performance of mine, to hope comfortably and chearfully for God's performance. In brief, the hypocrite or unreformed ſinner may have ſome room for hope ſuppoſitively, if he do change and repent; the honeſt penitent may hope, poſitively. The former may hope as for a future poſſibility, the latter at the preſent as for a certainty. But the latter of theſe is the only Chriſtian hope. For by this you ſhall know a Chriſtian hope from all other, that he that hath it purifies himſelf, 1 John 3. 3. The hypocrite or carnal man hopes, and is the wickeder for hoping; he fears nothing, and ſo diſcerns not the neceſſity of mending: the beſt way to reform ſuch a man, is to rob him of his hope, to bring him to a ſenſe of his danger, that he may get out of it, to conduct him by the gates of hell to a poſſibility of heaven. But the Scripture-hope, the [this hope] as Saint John calls it, i. e. the hope of ſeeing God, 1 John 3. 2. being grounded on conditional promiſes, (and that condition being purity, holineſs, without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord) ſets preſently to performing that condition, that is, to purifying, according as you ſhall ſee the practice of it in Saint Paul, 2 Cor. 7. 1. Having therefore theſe Promiſes, (what promiſes? conditional promiſes, chap. 6. 17.) let us purifie our ſelves, &c. The Chriſtian hope in this matter.

S. But is not Deſpair a ſin? and doth not that conſiſt in not hoping for heaven? Deſpair.

C. The want of the Chriſtian hope, is a ſinful Deſpair, but not the want of all kind of Hope; the thinking it impoſſible his ſins ſhould be forgiven, though he ſhould be never ſo truly penitent, is a ſin, but that rather of Infidelity than Deſpair, it being the disbelieving an eternal truth of God's. A conſequent of this indeed may be deſperation, (as on the contrary hope is a conſequent ſuperſtructed on faith) to wit, when he that believes himſelf uncapable of pardon, goes on without any care or thought of reforming; ſuch a one we vulgarly call a deſperate perſon, and that ſure is a moſt damning ſin: but for him that lives an impenitent ſinner, not to hope for mercy as long as he doth ſo, is ſure no ſin ſuperadded to his impenitence; his impenitence is a ſin, but that being ſuppoſed, his not hoping is but duty and juſtice; the contrary would be a greater ſin and a more deſperate ſign. So that not every not hoping for Heaven is the ſin of Deſpair, but rather the peremptory contempt of the condition, which is the ground of Hope; the going on (not only in terrours and amazement of conſcience, but alſo) boldly, hopingly, confidently, in wilful habits of ſin, which therefore is called deſperateneſs alſo; and the more bold thus, the more deſperate.

S. But what if a godly penitent man ſhould either doubt of his ſalvation, or not hope at all for it?

C. If that doubting or not hoping be only grounded in a falſe judgment of his own repentance and ſincerity, in conceiting too meanly of himſelf, in thinking himſelf no true penitent when he is, this will not be the ſin of Deſpair; no nor infidelity neither: becauſe if he could believe his penitence ſincere, (the want of which belief is not the diſ-believing of any part of God's Word, becauſe that ſaith nothing of him particularly) he would aſſuredly hope; and now that only his humility makes him ſo comfortleſs, there is certainly no ſin in that. Doubting of Salvation.

S. But what if a ſinner be ſo overwhelmed with ſorrow, as not to lay hold on the Promiſes at all, is not this the ſin of Deſpair? Exceſſive ſorrow.

C. The trial of him will be by examining whether he purifie or no, that is, whether his ſorrow bring forth fruits of amendment; if ſo, this is not the ſin of Deſperation yet; he hath the Grace of Hope, which brings forth fruits of Hope, though it be clouded over with a melancholy vapour, that it be not diſcernible even to himſelf. But if this trouble of mind ſet him a ſinning farther, like Judas, who had ſorrow, but then killed himſelf, this is Deſpair indeed.

S. I ſhall ſollicite you no further in this point, but for your Prayers that God will keep me from all premature perſwaſion of my being in Chriſt; that he will give me that Hope that may ſet me a purifying, and not ſuffer me to go on preſumptuouſly or deſperately in any courſe. Only upon an occaſion of this Grace of Hope, give me leave to ask you, Whether he that now lives in ſin, and hopes he ſhall one day repent, and go to heaven (this Repentance and that Heaven being a future good, and ſo the object of Hope) may be ſaid to have the Grace of Hope in any kind? The ſinners hope of repentance and mercy.

C. By no means: Becauſe God hath made no ſuch promiſe that he ſhall repent, nor without Repentance that any man ſhall have Heaven. This is a ground-work of carnal ſecurity, and no degree of the Grace of Hope.

S. Once more, May he that hath gone on in a continued courſe of ſin, and at laſt is overtaken with God's judgments, (and ſeeing Hell gates open upon him, doth grieve for his wicked life, and upon that hopes for mercy) be conceived to be ſaved by that Hope?

The death-bed sorrow and hope. [a] λύπη κατὰ θεόν.

C. I list not to pass sentence on any particular, because I cannot throughly discern his state; only I can say in general, I know no promise of pardon in Scripture, to a bare death-bed sorrow, because indeed none to any sorrow at any time, but that which is [a] godly sorrow which worketh repentance: which repentance, as it is available if true, though never so late, so is seldom true when it is late; nor can well be known to be true but by persevering fruits, which require time. And though a serious purpose of amendment and true acts of contrition, before or without the habit, may be accepted by God to my salvation; yet in this case there is no sure judgment whether this purpose be serious, or these acts true acts of contrition. And so in this case there is no sure foundation for his hope: and then a groundless hope, or a bare hope, without the other conditions to which the Promises belong, will never be able to save any.

Of Charity.

S. Shall we now proceed to the third Grace, that of Love or Charity?

C. Most willingly: it is a precious Grace, and that which Saint Paul prefers before Hope and Faith.

S. But is any grace to be preferred before that of Faith? (I thought that had been the most necessary Gospel-Grace.)

The preeminence of that before Faith.

C. It is most certain there is, (Faith being taken in that notion which I told you belongs to that place) because Saint Paul hath affirmed it, that Charity is the greatest of the three, 1 Cor. 13. 13. And it is as sure, that no other Scripture hath contradicted this. And although very great things are said of Faith, as of the only condition of Justification and Salvation, yet, 1. This is when it is in conjunction with Charity, Faith consummate by love. And 2. it is observable, that the most imperfect things are always the most necessary, and consequently the great necessity of Faith is no argument of its dignity in comparison of this other grace. For indeed Faith is necessary, as that without which Charity cannot be had: but then this alone is insufficient to save any, if Charity be not added to it. Faith is the foundation, which though it be the most necessary part of the building, yet is it the lowest and most imperfect; Charity the superstruction, which is never firmly built but when grounded in Faith, and when it is so, it is far more excellent than its foundation. Besides, Charity is a grace not out-dated in Heaven, as Faith and Hope are.

S. But what is Charity?

C. The sincere love of God, and of our Neighbour for his sake.

S. Wherein doth the love of God consist?

Love of God of two sorts.

C. As love in its latitude is of two sorts, of Friendship, and of Desire; the 1. betwixt Friends, the 2. betwixt Lovers; the 1. a rational, the 2. a sensitive love: so our love of God consists of two parts, 1. Esteeming, prizing, valuing of God; 2. Desiring of him.

Estimation.

S. How shall I know, whether I do esteem God as I ought to do?

C. If you would be content to do any thing or suffer any thing rather than lose his favour, rather than displease him. If you love me (saith he) keep my Commandments. And therefore loving him and obeying him, love and works (to wit, Evangelical works) are taken for the same thing in Scripture.

S. How must this love be qualified?

C. The special Qualification, or rather indeed essential property of Charity, is the Sincerity of it, as that is opposite to Hypocrisie, or a double heart, or divided love, or joining any rival or competitour in our hearts with him. The loving God above all, and all other for his sake; this is set down both by Moses, Deut. 6. 5. and by Christ, Matth. 22. 37. and Mark 12. 30. and Luke 10. 27. (with a little variation by Saint Matthew) in these words, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. The Heart, as I conceive, signifying the Affections; the Soul the Will or elective faculty; the Mind, the Understanding, or rational faculty, and the Strength the powers of the body for action; and all four together making up the whole man, and the word All, affixt to each, not to exclude all other things from any inferiour part in my love, but only from an equal or superiour interest to exclude a partial or a half-love.

S. What are the motives that may stir up this love in my heart?

Motives to it.

C. 1. The consideration of God's infinite essence. And 2. of his most glorious Attributes. And 3. of his bounteous actions towards us in creating, redeeming, preserving, and providing such rewards for those that love him.

S. What is that other part of Love which you call the Desiring of him?

Desire.

C. The actual appetition or fastning our affections on him, desiring to enjoy 1. his Grace or sanctifying Spirit here, and 2. the perpetual Vision of him hereafter. The former part of this is called hungring and thirsting after righteousness, a hatred and impatience of sin, a desiring to be out of that polluted condition, and to be made like unto God in Holiness and Purity, (and you may know the sincerity of that, 1. by Assiduity and frequency and fervency in Prayer, that way of conversing and communing with God, a most infallible concomitant of this kind of love: 2. By loving and seeking the means, 1. of resisting sin, and 2. of receiving, and 3. of improving of Grace: that one principal Desire of David's, That he might dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of his life, to behold the fair beauty of the Lord, and to visit his Temple:) The latter part of this is called by the same David, the longing of the soul after God; by Saint Paul, desiring to be dissolved and to be with Christ.

Trial of that.

S. What are the motives to this kind of love?

Motives to it.

C. 1. God's loving us first, and dying for us, an expression of that love, able to constrain and extort a reciprocation or return of love. 2. The true superlative Delight even to flesh and blood that is in Sanctity, and the practice of Christian Vertues, beyond all that any sensual pleasure affords; so great, that when they are expresst by the Apostle in these words, 1 Cor. 2. 9. [Neither eye hath seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entred into the heart of man to conceive what things God hath prepared for them that love him] (which in that place clearly belongs to the hidden wisdom of God, v. 7. and the deep things of God, v. 10. and the things that are freely given to us of God, v. 12. the spiritual Manna, or Preparation for the lover of God to feed on) they are ordinarily mistaken for the description of Heaven.

3. Those

3. Thoſe joys in the Viſion of God in another life, thus deſcribed by the Pſalmiſt, In thy preſence are fulneſs of joys, and at thy right hand pleaſures for evermore.

S. Well, you have gone through the two parts of the love of God; and told me that the ſincerity required in it requires me to love God with all my heart. May not I then love any thing elſe but God?

Love of other things beſide God.

C. You may, but with theſe conditions; 1. That it be not ſome prohibited object, as the world and the things of the world; that is, any thing that is vain or ſinful in it, for if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him, 1 John 2.15. 2. That it be in a degree inferiour to the love of God: thus God being loved above all, other things may lawfully in a lower degree be loved alſo. 3. That thoſe other things be loved for God's ſake, and in that order that he preſcribes them.

S. But may not the outward expreſſions of love in many good Chriſtians be greater to ſome other object than to God? or is this incompetible with the ſincerity of the love of God?

Outward expreſſions of love more to other things than to God.

C. Our love of God may be ſincere, though it be accompanied with ſome frailties: now the ſenſitive faculty may have a ſenſitive love of ſome ſenſitive objects: which though it be moderated ſo as not to fall into ſin either in reſpect of the object or the exceſs, yet through the nature of mans ſenſe may expreſs it ſelf more ſenſitively towards that inferiour object than towards God himſelf; and this is a piece of humane frailty, not to be wholly put off in this life. And yet for all this the love of God may be more deeply radicated in that ſoul; and that will be tried by this, that if one were to be parted with, I would part with any thing rather than God. But that not to be judged by what I would anſwer, if I were asked the queſtion; nay, nor what I would reſolve at a diſtance: but in time of temptation and actual competition betwixt God and that any thing elſe that could not be held without ſinning againſt God, what then I would really do. This may beſt be underſtood by that other paſſion of ſorrow. I may weep more for the loſs of a friend than for my ſins; yet my ſorrow for ſin may be the deeper and more durable ſorrow, though it be not ſo profuſe of theſe ſenſitive expreſſions. So may and muſt our love of God be moſt firmly rooted, though not ſo paſſionately expreſt, as through the infirmity of our fleſh and nearneſs of other objects to it, our love to them is wont to be.

Paſſionate ſorrow.

S. Shall we proceed to the other branch of Charity, that of our Neighbour? and firſt, What do you mean by the word Neighbour?

Charity to the Neighbour.

C. Every man in the world, for ſo Chriſt hath extended the word, Luke 10. 36, 37. not only to ſignifie the Jew in relation to the fellow-Jew, who was the Old-Teſtament-Neighbour, but to the Samaritan in relation to the Jew, i. e. to him that was moſt hated by him, as appears by the parable in that place.

S. What is the love of my Neighbour?

C. 1. The valuing him as the Image of God, one for whom Chriſt died, and one whom God hath made the proxy of his love, to receive thoſe effects of it from us which we cannot ſo well beſtow on God. 2. The deſiring, and 3. The endeavouring his good of all kinds.

S. In what degree muſt this be done?

The degree of it.

C. As I deſire it ſhould be done to my ſelf.

S. How is that?

C. Why, in all things to deal with other men as (if I might be my own chuſer) I would wiſh that other men, nay God himſelf, ſhould do to me. This will certainly retain me within the ſtricteſt bounds of Juſtice to all men I have to deal with, (becauſe it is natural to deſire that all men ſhould deal juſtly with me) and teach me all mercy to others both in giving and forgiving and bleſſing them, becauſe I cannot but deſire that God ſhould be thus merciful to me.

S. But will not my love of God be ſufficient (without this other love of my Neighbour) to denominate me charitable?

C. It will not. 1. Becauſe this loving my Neighbour is one, nay many, of the Commandments which he that loveth God muſt keep, 1 Jo. 3. 23. 2. Becauſe God hath pleaſed to appoint that as the teſt of the ſincerity of the love of God, in judging of which we might otherwiſe deceive our ſelves and prove liars, had we not this evidence to teſtifie the truth of our love, according to that of Saint John, 1 Epiſt. 4. 20. For he that loveth not his brother whom he hath ſeen, how can he love God whom he hath not ſeen? Which place argues that all the arguments or motives which we have to love God, we have to love our brother alſo, God having devolved all his right to our love upon our brethren here, (and therefore interpreting whatſoever is done to them as done to himſelf) not ſo as to deveſt himſelf of it, but to accumulate it on his image here below, communicating all his claims to it; to which claims of God our relation to our Brethren ſuperadding one more, that of acquaintance, and affinity of our humane nature, expreſt by thoſe words, [his brother whom he hath ſeen] it follows in all neceſſity, that he that loves not his brother, that behaves not himſelf to all men, ſuperiours, equals, inferiours, ſtrangers, friends, enemies, Turks, Jews, Heathens, Hereticks, Sinners, according as the rules of Chriſtian charity, of juſtice and mercy oblige him, is not a lover of God.

S. Is there any more that I need know concerning this grace?

C. No more at this time: The particulars farther conſiderable will come in our rode hereafter.

Of Repentance.

S. Your propoſed method then leads me to Repentance next; what is Repentance?

C. A change of mind, or a converſion from ſin to God. Not ſome one bare act of change, but a laſting durable ſtate of new life, which I told you was call'd alſo Regeneration.

Regeneration.

S. But is not Regeneration an Act of new birth?

C. Not only that, but it is alſo the ſtate of new life, (called the New creature) living a godly life, or ſuch as will become the ſons or children of God; for the Scripture-phraſe, to be regenerate or born again, or * from above, is all one with being a child of God, that is, one, who, as he hath his ſeed of new life from the Spirit of God, ſo returns him the obedience of a Son-like gracious heart, lives like a ſon in his family, and never goes from him with the Prodigal into the far Countrey.

* ἄνωθεν.

S. Of what parts doth Repentance conſiſt?

C. Not properly of any, it being nothing elſe but a Change of mind or new life; yet there are many preparatives in the paſſage to this ſtate, every of which doth alſo in ſome meaſure accompany it where-ever it is.

S. What are thoſe preparatives then?

Preparatives to Repenrance. C. 1. Senſe of ſin. 2. Sorrow or contrition for ſin, 3. Confeſſion of ſin. 4. Diſclaiming, forſaking, reſolving againſt ſin.

S. Wherein doth the Senſe of ſin conſiſt?

Senſe of ſin. C. In diſcerning, 1. the Odiouſneſs, 2. the Danger of it.

S. What Odiouſneſs?

The odiouſneſs. C. 1. How it diſpleaſeth God, and makes us odious in his ſight. 2. How it defiles and defames us, turns the members of Chriſt into members of an harlot. 3. Makes us odious to all good men. 4. Makes us uncapable of heaven, wherein nothing ſhall enter that defileth. Rev. 21. 27.

S. Wherein doth the Danger conſiſt?

The danger. C. In bringing, 1. the curſes of this life upon us: 2. temporal death: 3. eternal plagues and torments in another world.

S. What then is a Senſe of theſe?

C. 1. A conviction of the truth of theſe. 2. A ſerious conſideration and pondering of this important truth as it concerns our endleſs weal and woe. 3. A being affected with it, ſo as to humble our ſouls in that ſenſe, which leads to ſorrow and contrition.

Contrition. S. What is ſorrow and Contrition for ſin?

C. A being grieved with the conſcience of ſin, not only that we have thereby incurred ſuch danger, but alſo that we have ſo unkindly grieved and provoked ſo good a God, ſo compaſſionate a Father, ſo gracious a Redeemer, ſo bleſſed a Sanctifier.

S. Is it not ſufficient to grieve in reſpect of the danger and damnation which ſin betrays me to? and is not ſuch grief Contrition?

Attrition. C. No, it is but Attrition (as the Schools uſe to ſpeak) a fretting of the heart, not breaking of it; which any man living would have, when he ſaw ſuch danger near; he would be prickt at heart, and be ill pleaſed to ſee hell gaping upon him: and you may obſerve, that where ſuch preſent danger is the only cauſe of ſorrow, when that danger is over, there ſeldom or never follows reformation. And therefore that opinion and doctrine of the Papiſts, who teach that this Attrition (or ſorrow that we ſhall be puniſhed) without producing amendment of life in the ſinner, yet by the power of the Keys, i. e. by the abſolution of the Prieſt, is turned into Contrition, is a moſt unkind deceit of Souls; for there being no Promiſe of Scripture that ſuch Attrition alone, or flying from the wrath to come, Matt. 3. 7, 8. ſhall be ſufficient to obtain pardon without bringing forth meet fruits of repentance, the Prieſt that abſolves any on no better grounds than thoſe, goes beyond his Commiſſion, and by telling a lie, can never make that lie become truth; by abſolving an uncontrite ſinner, cannot make him contrite, either in reality, or in God's acceptation of him; becauſe he hath not promiſed to accept any but the broken and contrite, and therefore not any thing elſe in ſtead of Contrition.

S. What think you then of that ſorrow and compunction that the approach of death and terrors of the Goſpel bring men to?

Death-bed Compunction. C. If it be a bare ſorrow and compunction, only reſpecting thoſe preſent terrors, and advancing no higher, then certainly it hath no Promiſe of mercy belonging to it. But if that which begins thus, by Gods mercy allowing of time, and by his grace uſing theſe terrors for the ſoftning of the heart improve farther into ſorrow for diſpleaſing of God, and from thence into a real ſincere reſolution to amend and forſake ſin, then theſe ſuperſtructions have a promiſe of mercy belonging to them, though that foundation had not. The only thing then in this matter to be conſidered is, whether it be thus improved or no: and that no man can certainly judge of, neither Confeſſor nor Patient himſelf, but by the fruits of it afterwards in time of Temptation. For 1. the man himſelf may through ſelf-love take that for Godly ſorrow and reſolution of amendment, which is only ſorrow for his own danger, and willingneſs to avoid that: and again, when foreign temptations are out of the way, and by diſeaſe, &c. inner flames quencht in him, he may reſolve againſt thoſe ſins which before he had lived in; or, by way of natural revenge, he may vow never to return to thoſe ſins which he hath had ſuch experience of, for the emptineſs and damningneſs of them, and ſo think himſelf a compleat penitent. And 2. the ſenſitive expreſſions being oft as great for the one as the other, nay greater for danger than for ſin, and from weakneſs of body than change of mind, the Confeſſor may eaſily miſtake likewiſe; but when God pleaſeth to reſtore health and ſtrength, when thoſe preſent apprehenſions are over, and temptations of the world and fleſh return again, and perhaps ſome new that were not before in his rode, then if the ſorrow continue as great and the reſolution as earneſt, and perſevere to hold out in deſpight of temptations to the contrary, and take not up any new ſins in exchange for the old, this is a comfortable evidence that that ſorrow was contrition, and that reſolution a ſincere reſolution. But if this time and means of trial being allowed, the matter prove otherwiſe, if the penitent return to his vomit in ſpight of the loathſomeneſs of it, if he overcome his diſlikes to ſin, and ſo fall back to his former jollity and luxury; or in ſtead of thoſe nauſeated ſins, make ſome other choice of a new path to hell, entertain covetouſneſs in ſtead of prodigality, ſpiritual pride in ſtead of carnal ſecurity, envy, malice, ſedition, faction, in commutation for luſt, and the like: this is a demonſtration that that ſorrow was not contrition, that reſolution no ſincere reſolution, and conſequently that if that man had then died, there would not have been found any thing in him which God hath promiſed to accept of. But if the caſe be ſet in a third or middle way, that the Patient die before any ſuch trial hath been made, either to evidence the ſincerity or unſincerity, then that which remains for us, is, not to judge, but to leave him to God's inſpection, who can ſee without thoſe ways of trial, and diſcern what it was in its ſelf, attrition, or contrition, ſincere, or not ſincere, whether it would have continued (or no) a through change of mind; and conſequently will accept the will for the deed, if it be a firm and ratified will, and not elſe. And ſo in brief, God may have mercy on him whoſe Repentance began never ſo late, if he ſee it was ſincere cere Repentance. But in this case there is small matter of comfort to us, because there is no such way of assurance that we are ordinarily capable of, nor reason to hope that God will afford us any extraordinary; and for any man to put off his present Repentance, on contemplation of a possibility that his later Repentance may serve the turn, is the most wretchless presumption in the world, and that which I am sure hath no Promise of Mercy annexed to it.

S. I shall satisfie my self with these grounds of resolution for this matter, and conceive that any more particular difficulty will be solved by the application of these grounds to it, and so not object what was obvious to have done, the example of the Thief on the Cross, which is so common a ground of security and presumption to carnal livers; because I alrtady discern reason to think his state the state of true Contrition and Conversion, and not of Attrition, because in those minutes he lived on the Cross, he gave such evidence of this in confessing and praying to Christ, when his own Disciples had forsaken him; and beside, Christ, who knew his sincerity, and will not accept the unsincere, revealed to him his acceptance of him. I shall therefore detain you no longer with questions of this nature, but procted to enquire more particularly of Contrition.

What sins must be taken in by it? or, For what must this godly sorrow be conceived?

C. For all kinds and sorts of sin. 1. For the weaknesses, frailties, and pollutions of our nature, our proneness and inclinations to sin; for though these being unconsented to are no actual sins, yet are they matters of true sorrow and grief and humiliation to a true Christian (as infelicities, if not as sins) that he is such a polluted unclean creature, and so apt to fall into all sin, if he be not restrained and prevented by God's Grace. 2. For the sinful acts and habits of our unregenerate life, with all the aggravations belonging to them. 3. The slips and relapses of our most regenerate life, and the infinite frailties and infirmities that still adhere to it. What sins Contrition belongs to.

S. Are any of those which you named under the first head, Infelicities only, and not Sins?

C. Yes, the weakness of our nature, as that signifies the want of strength, the not being able (since God withdrew his extraordinary gift of Grace) to perform the perfect will of God; this cannot it self be called a sin, but rather a punishment of Adam's sin, and so to us an unhappiness and infelicity. So likewise our inclination to sin, as that signifies the inclination of the flesh to the carnal object, the bending of the eye to the beauty, the taste to the sweetness, which is naturally acceptable to it, and was discernable in Eve before the Fall, and so cannot be said to be sin in that notion, but rather temptation, which to resist is an act of virtue, and victory; though as it signifies the inclination of the will to one side rather than the other, to the evil more than the good, to the carnal forbidden than to the spiritual Christian object, it is a kind of aversion from God, and a degree of conversion to the creature, and so a sin in that respect.

S. But how can Contrition, which you called a Preparative to Repentance, and so to Regeneration, include sorrow for the sins of the regenerate life?

C. I told you, these Preparatives to Repentance do also accompany it whereseever it is; and in that respect it will be clear, that Contrition is not one initial act of sorrow for sin past, but also a current permanent state of sorrow and humiliation for sin present, and through the whole life never out-dated.

S. What now is Confession of sin? Confession

C. It is of two sorts; 1. To God, 2. To men; especially the Presbyters.

S. What is Confession to God?

C. An humble sorrowful acknowledgement of sin in prayer to God. 1. By confessing that I am a sinner, who have worthily deserved his wrath. 2. By enumeration of the particular sorts of sin of which I know my self guilty. 3. By aggravating these sins upon my self, by the circumstances and heightning accidents of them. 4. By comprizing all my unknown, unconfest sins under some such penitentiary form as that of David's, Who can tell how often he offendeth? cleanse thou me from my secret faults. to God:

S. How doth the necessity of this appear?

C. Beside the practice of David and other holy men in Scripture, by these expres Texts; If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins; and, He that confesseth and forsaketh, shall have mercy.

S. But why then should we confess to men, and particularly to Presbyters? to man:

C. 1. Because we are commanded by Saint James 5. 16. to confess our faults one to another, that we may be capable of one anothers prayers. 2. Because our sins may possibly be such wherein other men are injured, and then Confession to them is the first degree towards Reconciliation, Matth. 5. 24. Or if they be only against God, then Confession of them to his Ministers also will be no way improper, but in some kind necessary to him which desires their Absolution, verse 15. 3. Because there being two parts in sin, the guilt and the corruption, the one to be pardoned, the other cured; the first being confessed to God, to obtain his pardon, ought also, if it have been offensive and scandalous to the Congregation, to be acknowledged to them, that that expression of Repentance may make Satisfaction to them for the ill Example, and avert and deterr from sin whom it had invited to it. And for the cure, it will sure be very profitable to advise with others, especially the Physicians of the soul, how and by what means this cure may be wrought, how a raging sin may be subdued, the occasions to it avoided; to which end alone the disclosing of the particular state is more than profitable: and this being supposed, it will be acknowledged necessary for a Christian not to despise such proper useful means to a necessary end, unless without that help he can direct himself, which ignorant men and habituate sinners in any kind will hardly be able to do. 4. Because this may much tend to my comfort, when another (whose office it is) upon a strict survey and shrift of my former life, and present testification of my Repentance, may upon good grounds give me Absolution, and pass judgment on me, better than I can do on my self. to the Minister.

S. What is the fourth Preparative to Repentance?

C. A firm Resolution and vow of new life. 1. An abjuring of all my former evil ways, i. e. both of the sins themselves, and the occasions which were wont to bring me to those sins; 2. A resigning my self up to do the will of Christ; 3. The pitching on some particular duties of Piety, and Vow of New life.

and Charity, which were most criminously omitted before, and are most agreeable to my calling to perform, and to bring forth all other meet fruits of Repentance.

S. What now is the penitent state?

The Penitent state.

C. The actual continued performance of these Resolutions both when occasions are offered, and when Temptations to the contrary.

S. But what if those Resolutions be not then performed?

C. Then is not that to be accounted a Penitent or Regenerate man.

S. But what? are no sins competible with a Regenerate estate?

What sins competible therewith.

C. Yes, 1. Sins of infirmity; 2. of ignorance, and (under that head of infirmity) 3. sins of sudden surreption; and 4. such as by daily incursion of temptations (though constantly resisted, yet) through the length of the work, and our frailty, and Satans vigilance sometimes are gained from us: all these (together with those which 5. through levity of the matter insensibly steal from us) are, by general Repentance, (i. e. humbling our selves before God for them, begging God's pardon in Christ, and labouring against them more diligently for the future) reconcileable with a regenerate estate; these are spots, but those spots of sons, though they be never totally overcome in this life. 6. Some one wilful act of deliberate sin, which we might have resisted, if it be presently retracted with Contrition and Confession, and re-inforcing of our resolution and Vigilance against it, and so not favoured or indulged unto, may be also reconcileable with a regenerate state so far, as not wholly to quench the spirit of God, to cause spiritual desertion, though it do grieve that Spirit, waste the conscience, wound the soul, and provoke God's displeasure (from which nothing but hearty Repentance can deliver us) and commonly bring some temporal judgment upon us.

What incompetible.

S. What then are unreconcileable with a Regenerate state?

C. Whatsoever are not competible with an honest heart, a sincere endeavour: particularly these two, Hypocrisie and Custom of any sin. Whatsoever is born of God doth not commit sin, 1 John 3. 9. (i. e. doth not live in sin as in a trade or course) for his seed remaineth in him; (there is in the Regenerate a new principle or seed of life, a principle of Cognation with God, which whilest it continues in him, is still a hazening him out of sin) and he cannot sin in such manner, because he is born of God: or if he do, he is no longer a child of God, or Regenerate person: or, as Saint Paul saith, Gal. 5. 16. Walk in the Spirit, and you shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh, i. e. these two are unreconcileable; as when we say, an honest man cannot do this or that, our meaning is not to affirm any natural impossibility, that he is not able, but that he cannot think fit to do it; the Principles of Honesty within him, as here the Seed of God, or new Principle in him, will resist it; or if he do it, he is no longer to be accounted an honest man.

S. This place in Saint John's Epistle hath sure great difficulty, I beseech you make it as intelligible to me as you may.

Interpreted.

C. I shall do it, and that most clearly, by bringing down the sence of the whole Chapter from the beginning to this place, in this brief Paraphrase; do you look upon the words in your Bible, whilest I do it. Ver. 1. God's love to us is very great in that he hath accepted us Christians to be his children, (which, by the way, is the reason that the world which rejected Christ, rejecteth us also.) Ver. 2. And being Children, though we know not exactly the future benefit which shall accrue to us by this means, yet this we know, that when this shall be revealed to us, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is, and that Vision will assimilate us unto him. Ver. 3. And the very hope of it now, if it be fastened on God, hath the same power of making us pure, as he is pure. For 1. Hope includes Desire and Love of the thing hoped for, which being Heaven, a place of purity, the hope of Heaven must include a desire of Purity: and therefore the Heaven that the sensual man desires, if he desire it for the present, is a mock-heaven; and if it be the true Heaven, the state of purity, then he desires it not for the present, but hereafter when sensual pleasures shall have forsaken him. And 2. the Condition of God's Promises being our Purification or Sanctification, and the particular Condition of this seeing God being holiness, it is madness for us to hope any thing but upon those grounds; and therefore he that hath this hope of seeing him, or being like him hereafter, labours to become like him now in Purity, (a special imitable quality of his.) And (Ver 4.) He that wants it, (i. e. every one that committeth sin) is guilty of the breach of the law, of this Evangelical law of his; and that sin it self is that breach, upon which consequently follows the forfeiture of those Promises contained in it. (Ver. 5.) And to that end, that we, for whom Christ died, should not thus sin, it was without doubt that he came amongst us; and sin, or any such impenitent committer of sin is not in him. (Ver. 6.) For every one that remaineth in him, as a member of his, sinneth not wilful deliberate sins: if any man do so, pretend or profess he what he will, he hath neither seen nor known Christ. (Ver. 7.) I pray, suffer not your selves to be deceived. Christ you know is righteous, and the way to be like him is to be righteous also; and that cannot be, but by doing righteousness, living a constant Christian life. (Ver. 8.) He that doth not so, but goes on in a course of sin, is of the Devil, and by his actions expresses the stock he comes of. For 'tis the Devil that began his age with sin, and so continued it, and so sin is his trade, his work; and this was a special part of the end of Christ's coming, to destroy his trade, to dissolve that fabrick he had wrought, i. e. to turn sin out of the world. (Ver. 9.) And therefore sure no child of God's, none of that superiour stock will go on in that accursed trade, because he hath God's seed in him, that original of cognation between God and him, God's grace that Principle of his new birth, which gives him continual dislikes to sin, such as (though they do not force or constrain him not to yield to Satan's temptations, yet) are sufficient to get him out of those snares; and if he be a child of God, of Christ's making, like him that begat him in purity, &c. * he cannot, he will not thus go on in sin. (Ver. 10.) So that hereby you may clearly distinguish a child of God from a child of the Devil: he that doth not live a righteous and charitable life, (do justice and love mercy, as Micah saith) is no child of God's, hath no relation of consanguinity to him. I shall need proceed no farther; by this you will understand the sence of the Verse to be this, and no more: Those that are like Christ, and so God's Children, 'tis supposed that they have such a Seed or Principle of Grace in them, that inclines them to dislike, and

* Hæc non admittet omnino qui natus è Deo fuerit, non futurus Dei filius si admiserit. Tertul. de pudicit. And to the same sence, Virtus sine ulla intermissione perpetua est, nec discedere ab ea potest qui semel eam cœpit. Nam si habeat intervallum, si quando eâ cadere possumus, redeunt protinus peccata, quæ virtutem semper impugnant. Lactant.

enables them to resist all deliberate sins; and if they do not make that use of that grace, sure they are not like Christ, none of his fellow-sons of God: a Regenerate man remaining such, will not, nay morally cannot, do so; so doing is contrary to a Regenerate state.

S. I heartily thank you for this trouble, I shall divert you by another scruple, which is this; Will not, I pray you, the flesh, as long as we continue in these houses of clay, be we never so regenerate, lust against the spirit, the members war against the mind, and so keep us from doing the thing that we would, yea and captivate us to the law of sin? and so will not this captivity and thraldom to sin, so it be joined with a contrary striving and dislike, be reconcileable with a regenerate estate?

C. Your question cannot be answered with a single Yea, or Nay, because there be several parts in it, some to be affirmed, others to be denied; and therefore to satisfie you, I shall answer by degrees. 1. That there is a double strife in a man, the one called a war betwixt the law in the members and the law in the mind, the other the lusting betwixt the spirit and the flesh. The former, betwixt the law in the members and in the mind, is the perswasion of sin or carnal objects on one side, and the law of God inviting us on the other side, commanding us the contrary: and in this case, the law, as the Apostle saith, being weak, and not able of it self to help any man to do what it commands him, it must needs follow, that they that have no other strength but the bare light of the law in the mind, no grace of Christ to sustain them in their combats, will by their carnal appetite be led to do those things which the law tells them they should not; which if they do and continue in them, this condition you will have no colour of reason to mistake for a regenerate state. 1. Because it is the state of him only that knows the Law (which is not able to quicken or renew) considered without the grace of Christ, which is necessary to a regenerate man. 2. Because this law in the mind, when it is not obeyed, but despised, doth serve only to testifie against us, that we knew our Masters will, and did it not, i. e. that what we did was against the dictates of our own Conscience, which sure will never help to excuse a sin, (but rather to aggravate it) or consequently to make that Act reconcileable with a regenerate estate, which otherwise would not be so. And therefore, 2. Of this kind of composition of a man, when his mind or upper soul being instructed in its duty, dislikes the sins he commits, and yet he continues to commit them, you may resolve, that this striving or this dislike of his mind is no excuse or apology for his sin, much less any argument of his regeneracy or good estate; but on the other side, his serving of, or captivity to, the law of sin in his members, is all one with the reigning of sin in his body, to fulfil the lusts thereof, and that a sure token of an unregenerate: for of every regenerate 'tis said, 1 John 5. 4. that he overcometh the world, which is quite contrary to being sold under sin, (a phrase referring to the Romans custom of selling slaves under a spear, or to that which is said of Ahab, 1 Kings 21. 25. that he was sold to do evil) being a slave of sin, or serving with the flesh the law of sin; and therefore you may conclude, that he, whosoever it is, that with the mind serves the law of God, i. e. approves of God's command, or consents to it, that it is good, and yet with the flesh, the members, serves the law of sin, that not only commits some act of sin, but lives indulgently in it, and appears thereby to be enslaved to it, is never to be counted of as a regenerate man, but only as one that by law is taught the knowledge of his duty, but by that bare knowledge is not enabled to perform it.

The war betwixt the law in the members, and in the mind, Rom. 7.

S. But what then is the other thing you told me of, the lusting of the spirit and the flesh one against the other?

C. Those words you will find Gal. 5. where by the spirit is meant the Seed of grace planted in my heart by God, as a principle of new life, or the mind and upper soul elevated yet higher (above the condition it is in by nature, or by the bare light of the law) by that supernatural principle; and by the flesh is meant again the carnal appetite still remaining in the most regenerate in this life; and the lusting of one of these against the other, is the absolute contrariety that is betwixt these two, that whatsoever one likes the other dislikes; whatsoever the one commends to the Will, the other quarrelleth at.

The lusting of the flesh and spirit.

S. What then is the meaning of that which follows this contrariety, Gal. 5. 17. in these words, [so that you cannot do the things that you would?]

C. The words in Greek are not [that you cannot do] but [that you do not,] and the sence is, either 1. That this contrariety always interposes some objections to hinder or trash you from doing the things that you would, i. e. sometimes the spirit trashes you from doing the thing that your flesh would have done, sometimes the flesh trashes you from doing the thing that the spirit would have done. And 2. whatsoever you do, you do, first against one velleity (or wouldingness) or other; and secondly, with some mixture of the contrary: Or else that this contrariety gives you trouble, that whatsoever you do on either side, you do it not quietly, stilly, but with a great deal of resistance and opposition of the contrary faculty.

S. Well then, may this * wrestling, this resistance be in a regenerate man?

C. Undoubtedly it may, and in some degrees it will be, as long as we carry flesh about us, for the flesh will always dislike what the spirit likes. But then we must be sure that the flesh do not carry it against the spirit, i. e. do not get the consent of the will to it, for if it do, lust conceives and brings forth sin, even those works of the flesh mentioned, ver. 19. for though this wrestling be reconcileable with a regenerate state, i. e. that a man may be and continue regenerate for all this, yet it is not an argument of a regenerate estate, so that every one that hath it, shall by that be concluded regenerate; for if the flesh carry it from the spirit, to fulfil the lusts thereof, it seems that man walks not in the spirit, ver. 16. and consequently is not in a regenerate state.

* Lucta.

The reluctance of the flesh.

S. But is every man unregenerate that doth any thing that the flesh would have?

C. I told you, Frailties and imperfections, and also sins of sudden surreption, and those that by daily incursion, continual importunity, at some one time gained in upon us, (so they were as suddenly taken and repented of) were reconcileable with a regenerate state; and therefore if it proceed no farther, it is only mixture of the flesh in our best actions, or else slips and trips or falls suddenly recovered again; but not carnality, or walking after the flesh. And for these you know the remedy I prescribed you, daily prayer for daily slips, and daily caution and care and endeavour to prevent them. But as for indulgence in sin, or habits of carnality, 'tis not the lusting of the spirit against the flesh that that will excuſe them from being works of the fleſh, or him that is guilty of them from being carnal. For it being too too poſſible and ordinary for the luſtings of the ſpirit, (i. e. ſpiritual motions) to be reſiſted, it will be little advantage to any to have had theſe motions, unleſs he have obeyed them, i. e. unleſs he walk in the ſpirit, and be led by it; for to ſuch only it is that there is no condemnation, Rom. 8. 1.

* Votum pœnitentiæ, the wiſh to be penitent.

S. I ſhall detain you but with one ſcruple more, and that is, whether * a vow or a wiſh that I were penitent, will not be accepted by God for repentance?

C. If you take that Vow and that Wiſh to be all one, you are miſtaken; a wiſh is a far lower degree than a vow; and therefore I muſt diſſolve your demand into two parts; and to the firſt, anſwer, that the vow or reſolution to amend, if it be ſincere, and ſuch as is apt to bring forth fruits, is ſure to be accepted by God; and that it is not ſincere we ſhall not be able to diſcern, but by ſeeing it prove otherwiſe in time of temptation: only God that ſees the heart can judge of it before ſuch trial, and if he find it ſincere, he will accept of it. But for the wiſh that I were penitent, there is no promiſe in holy Writ that that ſhall be accepted, nor appearance of reaſon, why he that wiſhes he were penitent, but is not, ſhould be accounted the better for that wiſh; 1. Becauſe when the reward of penitents and puniſhment of impenitents is once aſſented to as true, 'tis impoſſible but the mind of man ſhould wiſh for the one, and have diſlikes to the other, and ſo there will be no vertue in that neceſſity. 2. Becauſe that wiſhing is only a bare airy ſpeculative act of the mind, and not a practical of the will, which alone is puniſhable or rewardable. 3. Becauſe the actions being contrary to ſuch wiſhings are more accuſable of deliberate ſin, and ſin againſt conſcience, than if thoſe motives which produced thoſe wiſhes had never been repreſented to the faculty.

Prayers for grace of Repentance.

S. But are not prayers for the grace of Repentance, (which are but a kind of articulate wiſhes, put in form of the Court, and addreſſed to God) accepted by God?

C. Not ſo far as to ſave them that go no farther. Accepted they ſhall be (if rightly qualified with humility, and ardency, and perſeverance, or not fainting) ſo far as concerns the end immediate to them; i. e. God hath promiſed to hear them, in granting the grace prayed for, ſtrength to convert from ſin to God, (which is the clear Goſpel-promiſe, How much more ſhall your heavenly Father give the holy Spirit to them that ask?) and then when this grace, or ſtrength given, is thus made uſe of to actual reformation, then the promiſe of that other acceptance belongs to them alſo; and ſo prayer is a good means, and wiſhing a good thing too, as previous or preparative to that, and both without doubt proceeding from the good Spirit of God. But yet if the whole work be no more but this, if he be advanced no farther toward repentance, but only to wiſh and to pray that he were penitent, this perſon remains ſtill impenitent; and ſo long the impenitent's portion belongs to him, and none other; for ſtill he that is born of God overcometh the world; and he that is advanced no farther toward a victory, than to wiſh or to pray for it, is for that preſent far enough from being a Conqueror; and if for the future he add not the ſincerity of endeavour to the importunity of prayer, the Joſhuah's hands held up to fight, as well as the Moſes's to pray, the ſword of Gideon as the ſword of the Lord, there is yet little hope that ſuch victories will be atchieved.

S. God grant me this grace, and an heart to make uſe of it. But we have ſkipt over one particular forementioned, the grace of Self-denial. And I do not remember that you mentioned taking up of the Croſs, which in Chriſt's preſcriptions is wont to be annexed to it. Give me leave to recal them to your memory. And firſt, Of Self-denial. what is meant by Self-denial?

C. The abnegation or renouncing of all his own holds, and intereſts, and truſts of all that man is moſt apt to depend upon, that he may the more expeditely follow Chriſt.

S. What are theſe ſeverals that we are thus to renounce?

C. In general, whatſoever comes at any time in competition with Chriſt. In particular; the particulars whereof every man is made up, his ſoul, his body, his eſtate, his good name.

What it is in reſpect of the ſoul.

S. What under the firſt head, that of his Soul?

C. 1. His Reaſon, when the word of Chriſt is contradicted or checkt by it: As in the buſineſs of the Reſurrection, and the like, I muſt deny my reaſon, and believe Chriſt, bow down the head and worſhip, captivate my underſtanding to the obedience of Faith.

Denial of my reaſon.

S. But I have heard that God cannot do contradictions, or make two contradictions true at once, and in one reſpect. How then can I be bound to believe God, when that which he ſaith contradicts reaſon?

C. I am not glad that you have met with that ſubtlety, yet ſeeing 'tis proper to the particular we are upon, and that a branch of a practical point, I will endeavour to ſatisfie you in it; 1. by granting the truth of your rule, that, To make both parts of a contradiction true, is abſolutely impoſſible, a thing which God's infinite power and veracity makes as unfit for God to be able to do, as to lie or ſin; becauſe it were not an exceſs but defect of power, to be able to do theſe. But then ſecondly, you muſt know what is meant by contradictions, nothing but affirmation and negation of the ſame thing in all the ſame reſpects; as, to be and not to be, to be a man and not a man, to be two yards long and not two yards long; which therefore are thus abſolutely impoſſible to be done, even by divine power. But then, thirdly, that which you called reaſons contradicting of Chriſt, is a very diſtant thing from this. For when reaſon ſaith one thing, and Chriſt the contradictory to that, reaſon doth not oblige me to believe reaſon; or if it doth, it bids me disbelieve Chriſt, and ſo ſtill I believe not contradictories, whetherſoever of the contradictories I believe. All that reaſon hath to do in this caſe, is to judge which is likelieſt to judge of (or affirm) the truth, its ſelf or God; wherein if it judge of its own ſide againſt God, it is very partial and very Atheiſtical, it being very reaſonable, that God, which cannot lie, ſhould be believed rather than my own reaſon, which is often deceived in judging of natural things, (its only proper object) but is quite blind in ſupernatural, till God be pleaſed to reveal thoſe unto it. The ſhort is. Reaſon tells me (and in that it is impoſſible it ſhould erre, eſpecially God having revealed nothing to the contrary, it is doubtleſs that it doth not erre) that theſe two propoſitions cannot be both true, [there is another life] and [there is not another life;] and therefore I am not bound by Chriſt to believe both: but it doth not tell me, that to affirm another life implies a contradiction, but only profeſſeth that it cannot perceive, or that it is

How far. Not to believe contradictions.

But to believe God rather than my reaſon.

above reaſon to diſcern, how there can be a return from a total privation to a habit again. And the like objections reaſon hath againſt ſome things ſuppoſed in the Reſurrection, which though nature cannot do, and conſequently natural reaſon cannot tell how they are done, yet reaſon may acknowledge that the God of nature can do them, and will do them, if he ſaith he will; and illuminated reaſon having revelation of this will of God, muſt and doth believe they ſhall be done, or elſe makes God a liar.

S. What then is it to deny my reaſon?

C. Whenſoever my reaſon objects any thing to what God affirms, to reſolve that God ſhall be true in deſpight of all my appearances and objections to the contrary.

S. Is there any thing then elſe in the ſoul which I am to deny?

C. Something there is which men are apt to overvalue, and ſomething there is thought to be which is not, and both thoſe muſt be equally renounced.

S. What do you mean by that ſomething which is overvalued?

C. Natural ſtrength, which is now ſo weakned, that it is not at all able to bring us to our journeys end, without ſome addition of ſpecial grace of God, to prevent and aſſiſt in that work; and therefore all ſtrength in my ſelf, i. e. all ſufficiency in my ſelf, as of my ſelf, I muſt renounce, and apply my ſelf humbly in prayer for, and truſt in dependence on, that ſpecial grace of Chriſt, to help me both to will and to do whatſoever is good, and that is to deny my ſelf, that is, all opinion of my own abilities toward the attaining any ſupernatural end. Not over-valuing natural ſtrength.

S. What is that other ſort of things which you ſay is thought to be, but is not?

C. Any righteouſneſs of my own: for as for perfect unſinning righteouſneſs, he that ſhould pretend to that, deceives himſelf, and the truth is not in him; and for imperfect righteouſneſs, ſuch as by the help of grace this life is capable of, though that be a condition without which no man ſhall ſee God, (be either juſtified or ſaved) yet muſt not that be depended on as the cauſe of either, but only the free mercy of God in Chriſt, not imputing of ſin; and ſo I am to deny my own righteouſneſs, renounce all truſt in that for ſalvation. My own righteouſneſs.

S. What now doth Self-denial as it refers to the body ſignifie?

C. It ſignifies renouncing of all the unlawful ſinful deſires of the fleſh, and even lawful liberty and life it ſelf, when they come in competition with Chriſt, ſo that either Chriſt muſt be parted with or theſe. And the ſame is to be conceived both of eſtate and good name. He that forſaketh not houſe and land, Matt. 19. 29. that will not part with any worldly hope or poſſeſſion, rather than do any thing contrary to Chriſt's commands, is not worthy of Chriſt; and, If you receive the praiſe of men, how can you believe? He that is not reſolved to part with reputation and honour, when it comes in competition with Chriſt, can never go for a good Chriſtian: and not only thus, when theſe things come in competition with Chriſt's ſervice, but even abſolutely taken, ſome kind of ſelf denial is required by us of Chriſt, of which the particulars are not ſpecified by him, but referred to our free choice, our voluntary performing them. We muſt not always do what is lawful to do, but wean our ſelves from, and deny our ſelves the enjoying of, many lawful pleaſures of the world, that we may have the better command over our ſelves, and that we may be the more vacant for God's ſervice. Thus faſting, &c. becomes our duty, yea and revenge, or contrary abſtinence in caſe of former exceſs. In reſpect of the Body and Eſtate.

S. This grace, by the hints you have afforded me, I diſcern to be a moſt eminent Chriſtian vertue; the God of heaven plant it in my heart. But what do you think needful to add to this, about taking up the Croſs?

C. That it is a precept peculiar to the Goſpel, that nothing but Chriſtianity could make ſo very fit and reaſonable to be commanded us. Of taking up the Croſs.

S. What do you mean by the Croſs, and by taking it up?

C. By the Croſs I mean any affliction that God in his providence ſees fit to lay upon us, or to lay in our way toward piety; any puniſhment which befalls us either for righteouſneſs ſake, or not for unrighteouſneſs.

S. What mean you by taking it up?

C. 1. Not receding from any Chriſtian performance upon ſight of that lying in the way, which in the parable of the ſower is expreſſed by [not being offended, or ſcandalized, or diſcouraged, or falling away in time of tribulation.] 2. Bearing of it, patiently, chearfully, and comfortably. 3. Giving God thanks for it.

S. Is a man bound to be glad that he is afflicted?

C. He is. 1. Becauſe he ſees it is God's will, when 'tis actually upon him; and then he ought to be willing and joyful that God's will is done. 2. Becauſe Chriſt commands him to rejoyce, and be exceeding glad, Mat. 5. 12. Rejoyce and leap for joy, Luke 6. 22. To think it all joy, James 1. 2. 3. Becauſe it is a conforming us to the Image of the crucified Chriſt, to which every beloved Child of God is predeſtinate, Rom. 8. 29. 4. Becauſe it is ſuch a ſign of God's love, that every one that is not chaſtned, is by that character markt out for a Baſtard, and no ſon, Heb. 12. 8. Which though it be not ſet down as a duty of ours, for which we are to account; or again as a certain mark by which men are given to diſcern whether they are children of God or no: yet is it as an Aphoriſm of obſervation for God's ordinary acts of providence now under the Goſpel, that he is wont to chaſtiſe thoſe here whom he beſt loves; which is a ſufficient motive of joy to him who finds himſelf in that good number. Rejoycing in tribulations.

S. But ſure, there are ſome kinds of afflictions (ſharp pains of the body, and the like) which bring with them ſorrow neceſſarily, and ſo cannot be matter of joy to us.

C. Spiritual joy may well be reconcileable with that ſenſitive ſorrow; at the ſame time when the outward ſmart produceth the one in the body, the contemplation of the hand which ſtrikes, and of the advantages deſigned to the Patient by thoſe fatherly medicinal chaſtiſements, may well be allowed to beget the other in the inward diviner part. Spiritual joy reconcileable with ſenſitive ſorrow.

S. But the continuance of ſome afflictions, particularly of ſharp pains, doth by certain conſequence make a man unfit for performance not only of the duties of the calling, but even of devotions, of prayer it self, and so make the life utterly unprofitable in respect of men and of God; and can any man rationally think fit to rejoyce in, or for that?

How corporal pain can be matter of rejoycing.

C. He that is imployed as God would have him, that behaves himself duly in that state wherein he is set by God, must not be thought to live unprofitably. God cannot receive any real profit or advantage by any our most God-like actions; he wanteth not, and therefore we can no way contribute to him: only when we do what he commands, then are we said to be his good and useful servants. And therefore when by his will and providence (which is an inarticulate command) we are determined to suffering in stead of doing, when we are restrained from an active life, and by God's designation placed in a passive condition, when we are confined to the pains of a weary bed, our patience, and meekness, and Christian deportment under that heavy hand of God, is then a most acceptable service to him; and he that thus magnifies the power of God's Grace in the faithful exercise of such Christian vertues, and thereby reacheth forth to all beholders so many glorious copies for them to transcribe, will never be deemed unprofitable either to God or man; but shall be lookt on by both as an exemplary, imitable combatant and conquerour, which hath wrestled with the stoutest champion in the world, the sharpest of Satan's buffetings, and being proved is found faithful. And then this is still fit and proper to be matter of rejoycing to him.

S. But is a man bound to give thanks for affliction?

Giving thanks for afflictions.

C. Yes he is: 1. Because that is the only spiritual Christian way of expressing to God his rejoycing. 2. Because it comes from God, and is meant by him for our good, a gift or donative of heaven: To you it is given, Phil. 1. 29. it is granted, as a grace and vouchsafement of God's special favour, to suffer for Christ; and that grace designed, 1. to reform what is amiss, 2. to punish here, that there may be nothiug of evil left for another world; to judge us here, that we may not be condemned hereafter. 3. Because we are so commanded to glorifie God in this behalf, 1 Pet. 4. 16. and in this respect to sanctifie the Lord God in our hearts, 1. Pet. 3. 15. i. e. to hallow or praise him for it.

Afflictions that fall not for righteousness sake, matter of rejoycing also.

S. This is easily assented to, if it fall upon me for righteousness sake, as the Apostles went out of the Temple rejoycing that they were thought worthy to suffer shame for Christ's name: but, What if it be not so, but only that afflictions fall on me I know not how?

C. They are then not only patiently and thankfully to be received, but to be rejoyced in also; 1. Because of all kind of chastening the Apostle pronounceth, that, though for the present it seemeth not joyous but grievous, yet afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which be exercised thereby, Heb. 12. 11. 2. Because there is somewhat behind of the sufferings of Christ to be filled up in our flesh, Col. 1. 24. i. e. some Reliques of that bitter Passion-cup of his for us to drink. 3. Because it is such an expression of a curse to have our Reward, and (with Dives) all our good things in this life, and that an ominous sign that there is nothing left to be rewarded in another life.

Renouncing of persecuted Duties.

S. What judgment then is to be made of those, who in evil times, when Christian Doctrines and practices are persecuted, think fit to renounce those doctrines and practices, or to preserve themselves from worldly danger by not confessing, and so by not seeming to approve of them?

C. The judging of other men is no part of that lesson which I meant to teach you. But that which every person thus guilty ought to judge of himself, is this, that he is guilty of some degree of that cowardise which is join'd with infidelity, Rev. 21. 8. and that he is of the number of those many foretold by Christ, Matt. 24. 12. whose love to Christ is grown cold, upon the encreasing of iniquities abroad in the world, which must needs be a great unkindness to Christ, to whom our love and zeal and constancy ought then most to be shewed, when he or his doctrines are most opposed, and so most stands in need of assistants and advocates to maintain them. And I shall tell you one thing more on this matter, that the ancient heresie of the Gnosticks (which had its spring from the Magician Simon, and against several branches of which the several Epistles of all the Apostles in the New Testament were sent to arm the Churches, and the Epistle of Christ himself by John to the seven Churches in Asia) is taken notice of by ancient Writers for this prime fundamental doctrine of theirs, that [a] it was an indifferent thing (or no sin) in times of persecution to forswear the faith without any scruple, and to taste of the Idol-sacrifices. And therefore it is that the Apostles so call for confession of the mouth, Rom. 10. 9, 10. and require that perfection of love to Christ, which 1 John 4. 18. casts out fear of persecutions, punishments, &c. and pronounce Anathema's against them that thus love not the Lord Jesus, 1 Cor. 16. 22. setting the love of Christ, who loved us and died for us, as the example of our walking in love, Eph. 5. 2. which clearly contradicts that opinion of the world, that the preserving of our selves is the great principle to which all other precepts are but subordinate, binding us no longer than will be reconcileable with that. For sure the copy of Christ's love, which, if need be, we are required to follow both there, Eph. 5. 2. and 1 John 4. 17. that as he was in this world, so we should be also, (farther expresst there, by having [c] courage to confess Christ in the day of Judgment, i. e. when we are in danger to be sentenced by any Judicature to any punishment, though it be of death it self, as Christ was) obliges us then especially to express our love to Christ, when our danger is greatest from the world in so doing. And therefore Saint Paul to Titus prescribes not only soundness in the Faith, but in love and [a] patience, or endurance also, chap. 2. 2.

S. What then is to be thought of them who to get the cross off from their own shoulders, and to put it on other mens, will venture on things most contrary to peace, and shake the quiet, perhaps the foundations, of a Kingdom?

Enmity to the Cross.

C. I will say no more (and I can scarely say worse) than that they are of all others the extreamest enemies to the cross of Christ, a very ill and sad spectacle among Christians; and that there is nothing more unreasonable than to pretend Christianity for the doing this, which is so perfectly contrary to it.

S. You have now past through all the Christian graces at the first designed for consideration. I shall put you in mind of the next thing whereof you made your self my debtor; the difference of, and dependence between, tween Justification and Sanctification; wherein first you will please to give me the notion of the single terms. And first, what is Justification?

C. It is God's accepting our persons, and not imputing our sins, his covering or pardoning our iniquities, his being so reconciled unto us sinners, that he determines not to punish us eternally. Sect. IV. Of Justification.

S. What is the cause of that?

C. Gods free mercy unto us in Christ, revealed in the new Covenant. The cause of it.

S. What in us is the Instrumental cause of it?

C. As an Instrument is logically and properly taken, and signifies an inferior, less principal efficient cause, so nothing in us can have any thing to do (i. e. any kind of physical efficiency) in this work; neither is it imaginable it should, it being a work of God's upon us, without us, concerning us, but not within us at all. And if you mark, Justification being in plain terms but the accepting our persons and pardoning of sins, it would be very improper and harsh to affirm that our works, our any thing, even our faith it self, should accept our persons, or pardon our sins, though in never so inferior a notion; which yet they must if they were instrumental in our Justification. 'Tis true indeed, those necessary qualifications which the Gospel requires in us, are conditions or moral instruments without which we shall not be justified; but those are not properly called Instruments or causes.

S. What are those qualifications? The qualifications.

C. Faith, repentance, firm purpose of a new life, and the rest of those graces upon which in the Gospel pardon is promised the Christian; all comprizable in the New-creature, Conversion, Regeneration, &c.

S. Are these required in us, so as without them we cannot be justified? How then are we justified by the free grace of God? Justification by free grace.

C. Yes, these two are very reconcileable; for there is no worth in our Faith or Repentance, or any poor weak grace of ours, to deserve God's favour to our persons, or pardon of what sins are past, or acceptation of our imperfect obedience for the future; 'tis his free grace to pardon, and accept us on such poor conditions as these, and this free grace purchased, and sealed to us by the death of Christ.

S. What now is Sanctification?

C. The word may note either a gift of God's, his giving of grace to prevent and sanctifie us; or a duty of ours, our having, i. e. making use of that grace: and both these considered together, either as an Act, or as a State. Of Sanctification.

S. What is it as it signifies an Act?

C. The infusion of holiness in our hearts, or of some degrees of holiness; and parallel to that, the receiving and obeying the good motions of God's sanctifying Spirit, and laying them up to fructifie in an honest heart; the turning of the soul to God, or the first beginning of new life. As it is an Act.

S. What is it as it signifies a State?

C. The living a new, a holy, a gracious life, in obedience to the good grace of God, and daily improving and growing, and at last persevering and dying in it. As a State.

S. What now is the dependence between Justification and Sanctification?

C. This, that the first part of Sanctification, the beginning of new life, must be first had, before God pardons or justifies any; then when God is thus reconciled to the new convert upon his vow of new life, he gives him more grace, enables and assists him for that state of sanctification, wherein, if he makes good use of that grace, he then continues to enjoy this favour and justification; but if he perform not his vow, proceed not in Christian holy life, but relapse into wasting acts or habits of sin, then God chargeth again all his former sins upon him, and those present iniquities of his, and in them, if he return not again, he shall die; as appears by Ezek. 18. 24. If the righteous (i. e. the sanctified and justified person) depart from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, in his sin that he hath sinned, he shall die: and by the parable of the King, Matth. 18. where he that had the debt pardoned him freely by his Lord, yet, for exacting over severely from his fellow-servant, is again unpardoned and cast into prison, delivered to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him, ver. 34. which parable Christ applies to our present business, ver. 35. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you. The dependence between Justification and Sanctification.

S. But is not a man justified before he is sanctified; and if he be, how then can his Justification depend on his Sanctification?

C. If he were justified before he were sanctified in any kind, then would your reasoning hold; for sure by the same reason that Justification might be begun before Repentance, or Resolution of new life, or Conversion to God, it might also be continued to him that repented not, or that returned to his evil way: and therefore without all doubt this kind of Sanctification is precedent in order of nature to Justification, i. e. I must first Believe, Repent, and Return, (all which together is that Faith which is required as the Condition of our being justified, a receiving of the whole Christ, a cordial assent to his Commands as well as Promises, a giving up the heart to him, a resolution of Obedience, [a] a proneness or readiness to obey him, the thing without which (saith [b] an ancient Writer) Christ can do none of his Miracles upon our Souls, any more than he could his mighty works among his unbelieving Countrey-men) before God will pardon: (though indeed in respect of time there is no sensible priority, but God's pardon and our change go together: At what time soever we repent, or convert sincerely, God will have mercy, i. e. justifie.) A further proof of this, if it be needful, you may take from the Author to the Hebrews, Chap. 10. where having said, v. 14. that Christ by his own suffering perfected for ever them that are sanctified, intimating that they must be sanctified before he perfect them, he addeth a proof by which these two things are cleared: First, that [to perfect] there signifies [to forgive sins or to justifie;] Secondly, that this doctrine of the Priority of Sanctification is agreeable to the description of the second Covenant, Jer. 31. 33. That by perfecting he means justifying or pardoning of sins, 'tis apparent by ver. 17. Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more; which must needs be acknowledged to be that part of the Testimony that belongs to that part of the Propoſition to be proved by it [[a] he hath perfected for ever] (the former part of the Teſtimony belonging to the latter part of the Propoſition) which may further thus appear: To perfect, in this Author, ſignifies to Conſecrate to Prieſthood, (Ch. 2. 10. 5. 9. & 7. 28.) that being applied to us, is a phraſe to note Boldneſs or Liberty to enter into the Holies, ver. 19. that again to Pray confidently to God, which, ver. 18. is ſet to denote Pardon of ſin. Which being premiſed, the ſecond thing alſo follows; that in Jeremy 31. 33. the tenure of the Covenant ſets Sanctification before Juſtification: for, ſaith the Apoſtle, he [c] firſt ſaid, I will put my Law into their hearts, and put or write them in their thoughts or minds, which is Preparatory on God's part to their Sanctification; and then [c] after the ſaying of that [d] Alſo I will no more remember their ſins, nor their offences. Many other Scripture-evidences might be added to this matter, if it were needful.

[d] Juſtification before Sanctification, in what ſence.

As for thoſe that make Juſtification to be before Sanctification, I hope and conceive they mean by Sanctification the ſanctified ſtate, the actual performance and practice of our vows of new life, and our growth in grace; and by our Juſtification that firſt act of pardon, or Reconciliation in God, and then they ſay true: but if they mean, that our ſins are pardoned before we convert to God, and reſolve new life, and that the firſt grace enabling to do theſe is a conſequent of God's having pardoned our ſins; this is a miſtake, which in effect excludes Juſtification by Faith, which is that firſt grace of receiving Chriſt, and reſigning our hearts up to him, and muſt be in order of nature precedent to our Juſtification, or elſe can neither be Condition nor Inſtrument of it: and beſides, this is apt to have an ill influence on Practice, and therefore I thought fit to prevent it. The iſſue of all is, that God will not pardon till we in heart reform and amend. He that forſaketh, i. e. in hearty ſincere reſolution abandons, the ſins of the Old man, ſhall have mercy, and none but he. And then, God will not continue this gracious favour of his, but to thoſe who make uſe of his aſſiſting grace to perſevere in theſe reſolutions of forſaking: ſo that the Juſtification is ſtill commenſurate to the Sanctification; an act of Juſtification upon an act of Sanctification, or a reſolution of new life; and a continuance of Juſtification, upon continuance of the ſanctified eſtate.

S. But is not God firſt reconciled unto us, before he gives us any grace to ſanctifie us?

God reconciled before he gives grace.

C. So far reconciled he is as to give us grace, and ſo far as to make conditional Promiſes of Salvation; but not ſo as to give pardon or juſtifie actually: for you know, whom God juſtifies, thoſe he glorifies, i. e. if they paſs out of this life in a juſtified eſtate, they are certainly glorified; but you cannot imagine that God will glorifie any who is not yet ſanctified; for without Holineſs no man ſhall ſee the Lord. And therefore you will eaſily conclude, that God juſtifies none who are unſanctified; for if he did, then ſuppoſing the perſon to die in that inſtant, it muſt follow, either that the unſanctified man is glorified, or the juſtified man not glorified. Any thing elſe God may do to the unſanctified man but either ſave him, or do ſomewhat on which ſaving infallibly follows; and therefore give him grace he may, but till that grace be received and treaſured up in an honeſt heart, he will never be throughly reconciled to him, i. e. juſtifie or ſave him.

S. I pray then, from theſe Premiſes ſet me down the Order or Method uſed by God in the ſaving of a ſinner.

God's method in ſaving a ſinner.

C. I will. It is this. 1. God gives his Son to die for him, and ſatisfie for his ſins; ſo that though he be a ſinner, yet on condition of a new life he may be ſaved. Then 2. in that death of Chriſt he ſtrikes with him a New Covenant, a Covenant of Mercy and Grace. Then 3. according to that Covenant he ſends his Spirit, and by the Word (and that Spirit annexed to it) he calls the ſinner powerfully to Repentance: If he anſwer to that Call, and awake, and ariſe, and make his ſincere faithful Reſolutions of new life; God then 4. juſtifies, accepts his perſon, and pardons his ſins paſt: then 5. gives him more grace, aſſiſts him to do, (as before he enabled him to will) i. e. to perform his good Reſolutions. Then 6. upon Continuance in that ſtate, in thoſe Performances, till the hour of death, he gives to him, as to a faithful ſervant, a crown of life.

S. The good Lord be thus merciful to me a ſinner. I bleſs God, and give you many thanks for theſe Directions, and ſhall be well pleaſed to continue you my debtor for the other particular you promiſed me, till ſome further time of leiſure, and ſo intermit your trouble for ſome ſmall time.

LIB. II.

Sect. 1. Of Chriſt's Sermon in the Mount.

S. THE benefit I reaped by your laſt Diſcourſe, hath not ſatisfied, but raiſed my appetite to the more earneſt importunate deſire of what is yet behind, and in the next place, of the conſideration of Chriſt's Sermon in the Mount, which I have heard commended for an abſtract of Chriſtian Philoſophy, an elevating of his Diſciples beyond all other men for the practice of vertue: But, I pray, why did Chriſt when he preacht it leave the multitude below, and go up to a Mount, accompanied with none but Diſciples?

Why in the Mount?

C. That he went up to the Mount, was to intimate the matter of this Sermon to be the Chriſtian Law, as you know the Jewiſh law was delivered in a Mount, that of Sinai. And that he would have no Auditors but Diſciples, it was, 1. Becauſe the Multitude followed him not for Doctrines, but for Cures, Chap. 4. 24, 25. and therefore were not fit Auditors of Precepts. 2. Becauſe theſe Precepts were of an elevated nature, above all that ever any Law-giver gave before; and therefore were to be diſpenſed only to choice Auditors. 3. Becauſe the Heights and Myſteries of Chriſtianity are not wont to be abruptly diſpenſed, but by degrees, to them [a] that have formerly made ſome Progreſs, (at leaſt have delivered themſelves up to Chriſt's Lectures, entred into his School) i. e. to his Diſciples.

S. What then? are none but Diſciples the men to whom this Sermon belongs? and if ſo, will it not thence follow that the Commands contained in it ſhall oblige only the Succeſſors of thoſe Diſciples, the Miniſters of the Goſpel, and ſo all others be freed from that ſeverity?

C. That

C. That it was given only to Disciples then, it is acknowledged; but that will be of latitude enough to contain all Christians: for to be a Disciple of Christ, is no more than so; for you know Christ first called Disciples, and they followed him some time before he sent them out, or gave them Commission to preach, &c. i. e. before he gave them the Dignity of Apostles; of which, as only the Pastors of the Church are their Successours, so in Discipleship all Christian Professors. And therefore you must resolve now once for all, that what is in this Sermon said to Disciples, all Christians are concern'd in indifferently; it is Command and Obligatory to all that follow him, or retain to him. Who the Auditors of it.

S. You have engaged me then to think my self concerned so nearly in it, as not to have patience to be longer ignorant of this my duty.

Will you please then to enter upon the substance of the Sermon, wherein I can direct my self so far as to discern the eight Beatitudes to be the first part? I pray, how far am I concerned in them? Of the Beatitudes.

C. So far as that you may resolve your self obliged to the belief, 1. That you are no farther a Christian than you have in you every one of those Graces to which the Blessedness is there prefixed. 2. That every one of those Graces hath matter of [b] present Blessedness in it: the word Blessed in the front denoting a present condition, abstracted from that which afterwards expects them. 3. That there is assurance of future Blessedness to all those that have attained to those several Graces. All Christians concerned in them at present, and for the future.

S. I shall remember these three Directions, and call upon you to exemplifie them in the particulars as they come to our hands; and therefore, first, I pray, give me the first of these Graces, what it is.

C. Poverty of Spirit. Of Poverty of Spirit.

S. What is meant by that?

C. It may possibly signifie a Preparation of Mind or Spirit to part with all worldly wealth, a contentedness to live poor and bare in this world; but I rather conceive it signifies a lowly opinion of ones self, a thinking my self the meanest vilest creature, least of Saints, and greatest of sinners; contrary to that spiritual pride of the Church of Laodicea, Rev. 3. 17. which said, she was rich, and encreased with goods, and had need of nothing, not knowing that she was wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked. This is that infant child-temper that Christ prescribes, so absolutely necessary to a Christian, Mat. 18. 4. and chap. 19. 14. and that in respect of the Humility of such, chap. 18. 4. and the Littleness, Luke 9. 48. i. e. being in our own conceit (which I conceive is meant here by the phrase [in spirit] the least, and lowest, and meanest, and (as children) most impotent, unsufficient of all creatures.

S. What now is the present Blessedness of such?

C. It consists in this. 1. That this is an amiable and lovely quality, a charm of love amongst men whereever 'tis met with; whereas on the other side, pride goes hated, and cursed, and abominated by all, drives away servants, friends, and all but flatterers. 2: In that this is a seed-plot of all Vertue, especially Christian, which thrives best when 'tis rooted deep, i. e. in the humble lowly heart. 3. Because it hath the Promise of Grace, [God giveth grace to the humble, but, on the contrary, resisteth the proud.] The present blessedness of it.

S. What assurance of future Blessedness is there to those that have this grace? The future.

C. It is expresst in these words, [for theirs, or [c] of them, is the Kingdom of Heaven] which, I conceive, signifie primarily, that Christ's Kingdom of grace, the true Christian Church, is made up peculiarly of such: As in the answer of Christ to John, Mat. 11. 5. (a way of assuring him that he was the Christ) 'tis in the close, [d] the poor are evangelized, or wrought on by the preaching of the Gospel: and as Mat. 18. 4. He that shall humble himself as this child, the same shall be greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven, i. e. a prime Christian, or Disciple of Christ; and chap. 19. 14. for [e] of such (which is a like phrase parallel to [of them] here) is the Kingdom of Heaven, i. e. the Church, into which he therefore commands them to be permitted to enter by Baptism, and chides his Disciples for forbidding them. Thus is the Kingdom of Heaven to be interpreted in Scripture in divers places of the New Testament, which you will be able to observe when you read with care.

[e] τῶν τοιούτων.

S. But how doth this belong to future blessedness?

C. Thus, that this Kingdom of Grace here is but an inchoation of that Glory hereafter; and he that lives here the life of an humble Christian, shall there be sure to reign the life of a victorious Saint.

S. What is Mourning?

C. Contrition, or godly sorrow conceived upon the sense of our wants and sins. Of Mourning.

S. What wants do you mean?

C. Spiritual wants, 1. Of original immaculate Righteousness, and Holiness and Purity. 2. Of Strength and Sufficiency to do the duty which we owe to God our Creator, Christ our Redeemer, and the Spirit our Sanctifier. For Wants,

S. What sins do you mean?

C. 1. Our original depravedness, and proneness of our carnal part to all evil. 2. The actual and habitual sins of our unregenerate; And 3. the many slips and falls of our most regenerate life. For sins.

S. What is the present felicity of these Mourners?

C. That which results from the sense of this blessed temper, there being no condition of soul more wretched than that of the senseless obdurate sinner, that being a kind of numness, and lethargy, and death of soul; and contrariwise, this feeling and sensibleness, and sorrow for sin, the most vital Quality, (as it is said of Feeling, that it is the sense of life) an argument that we have some life in us, and so true matter of joy to all that find it in themselves. And therefore it was very well said of a Father, [f] Let a Christian man grieve, and then rejoice that he doth so. Besides, the mourning soul is like the watered earth, like to prove the more fruitful by that means. The present felicity of Mourners.

[f] Doleat homo Christianus, & de dolore gaudeat, Aug.

S. What is the assurance of future felicity that belongs to this Mourner?

C. 'Tis set down in these words, [for they shall be comforted.] Christ who hereafter gives, now makes The future.

makes promise of comfort to such; the reaping in joy belongs peculiarly to them that sow in tears, and godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation, when all other worketh death. And besides, this assurance ariseth from the very nature of Comfort and Refreshment, (by which the joys of Heaven are expresst) of which none are capable but the sad disconsolate Mourners: nor indeed is Heaven (the vision of God, and revelation of his favour) matter of so much Bliss, as when it comes to those that wanted Comfort, and when it wipes away all tears from their eyes, who went mourning (all the day) all their life long.

S. What is Meekness?

Of Meekness, in relation to God,

C. A softness, and mildness, and quietness of Spirit, expressing it self in many passages of our life: 1. In relation to God, and then it is a ready willing submission to his will, whether to believe what he affirms, be it never so much above my reason; (the captivation of the understanding to the obedience of faith) or to do what he commands, and then 'tis Obedience; or to endure what he sees fit to lay upon us, and then 'tis Patience, chearfulness in affliction, contentedness with our lot whatsoever it is, (contrary to all murmuring and repining, and enmity to the Cross, and all restless unsatisfiedness) the being dumb or silent to the Lord, Psal. 37. 7. and resolving with old Ely, it is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good. All which, Faith, Obedience, Patience, though they be vertues of themselves distinct from Meekness, strictly taken, may yet be very fitly reduced to that head, inasmuch as to men; Superiours,

Meekness moderates that wrath which would by consequence destroy them. 2. In relation to men, whether Superiours, Equals, or Inferiours. If they be our Superiours, then 'tis modesty, and humility, and reverence to all such in general, (at least reductively, Meekness being an adjunct and help to those vertues, removing that which would hinder them:) but if withal they be our lawful Magistrates, then our Meekness consists in Obedience, active or passive, acting all their legal commands, and submitting (so far at least, as not to make violent resistance) to the punishments which they shall inflict upon us, when we disobey their illegal, in quietness of spirit, and not being given to changes; the direct contrary to all speaking evil of dignities, but especially to Sedition, and taking up of Arms against them: which of what sort soever it be, though we may flatter our selves that we are only on the defensive part, will bring upon us condemnation, Rom. 13. 2. For, although it be naturally lawful to defend my life from him that would unjustly take it away from me, yet if it be the lawful supreme Magistrate that attempts it, I must not defend my self by assaulting of him; for that is not to defend only, but to offend; and God forbid that, though it were to save my own life, I should lift up my hand against the Lord's Anointed. It is true, Defensive wars may be possibly lawful at some time, when Offensive are not: but of Subjects against their Soveraign neither can, because, if it be war, it will come under the phrase, Resisting the power, Rom. 13. and so be damnable, and quite contrary to the Meekness here, and (farther) to all such Oaths, which in every Kingdom are taken by the Subjects to the supreme Power, as that of Allegiance, &c.

Equals, Friends,

S. Wherein doth Meekness towards our Equals consist?

C. Those may be our friends, or our enemies; or of a middle nature. If they be our friends, then meekness consists, 1. In the not provoking them, for the wrath of man worketh not the will of God, Jam. 1. 20. 2. In bearing with their infirmities. 3. In kind, mild, discreet reproof of them; and 4. In patience and thankfulness for the like from them again. 5. In submitting one to another in love, every one thinking another better than himself.

Enemies,

S. But what if they be our Enemies?

C. Then it is the meek mans part to love to do good, and bless and pray for them; in no wise to recompense evil with evil, injury with injury, contumely with contumely, in no wise to avenge our selves, but to overcome evil with good.

Neither,

S. What if they be neither our friends nor foes?

C. Then meekness consists in humble, civil, modest behaviour towards them, neither striving and contending for trifles, or trespasses, or contumelies; nor molesting with vexatious suits, nor breaking out into causeless anger, proud wrath, as Solomon calls it, rage or fury; nor doing ought that may provoke them to the like.

The injured,

S. But there is yet another notion of my Equals considerable, those to whom I have done injury; what is meekness towards them?

C. It consists in acknowledging the fault, and readiness to make satisfaction, in going and desiring to be reconciled to such a brother, and willingly submitting to all honest means tending to that end.

Inferiours.

S. What is the duty of meekness towards Inferiours?

C. Condescending, kindness, lovingness, neither oppressing nor tyrannizing, nor using imperiousness, nor taking the rod when it may be spared, nor provoking to wrath Servants, Subjects, or Children.

S. Is there any other branch of meekness which my questions have not put you in mind of, to communicate to me?

Meekness of the understanding.

C. There is one branch of it scarce toucht yet, the meekness of our understandings in submitting our opinions to those that are placed over us by God: which though it be, in strict speaking, the vertue of humility and obedience, and not the former elicite act of meekness, yet meekness being ordinarily, and sometimes necessarily annexed to these acts of those vertues, I shall place them reductively under meekness.

S. What must this Meekness of our understanding be?

In several cases.

C. The propereſt rules for the defining it will be these: 1. That where in any matter of Doctrine, the plain word of God interposes it self, there we must most readily yield, without Demurs or Resistance. But 2. if it be matter neither defined, nor pretended to be defined in Scripture, then with each particular man among us, the definitions of the Church wherein we live must carry it, so far as to require our yielding and submission; and with that Church which is to define it (if it come in lawful assembly to be debated) the tradition of the Universal, or opinion of the Primitive Church is to prevail, at least to be hearkened to with great Reverence in that debate; and that which the greater part of such a lawful Assembly shall judge to be most agreeable to such rule, or (in case there be no light to be fetcht from thence, then) that which they shall of themselves, according to the wisdom given them by God, agree upon to be most convenient, shall be of force to oblige all inferiours, 1. not to express dissent, 2. to obedience. But 3. if Scripture be pretended for one party in the debate, and the question be concerning the interpretation of that Scripture, and no light from the Scripture it self, either by surveying the context, or comparing of other places, be to be had for the clearing it, then again the judgment of the Universal, or my particular Church, is to be of great weight with me; so far as (if it so command) to inhibit my venting my own opinion either publickly or privately, with design to gain Proselytes: or if all liberty be absolutely left to all in that particular, then Meekness requires me to enjoy my opinion so, as that I judge not any other contrary-minded.

S. But what if the particular Church wherein I was baptized shall fall from its own steadfastness, and by authority, or law, set up that which, if it be not contrary to plain words of Scripture, is yet contrary to the Doctrine or Practice of the Universal Church of the first and purest times, what will Meekness require me to do in that case?

C. Meekness will require me to be very wary in passing such judgment on that Church: but if the light be so clear, and the defection so palpably discernible to all, that I cannot but see and acknowledge it, and in case it be true, that I am actually convinced, that the particular Church wherein I live is departed from the Catholick Apostolick Church; then, it being certain that the greater authority must be preferred before the lesser, and that next the Scripture the Catholick Church of the first and purest times (especially when the subsequent Ages do also accord with that for many hundred years) is the greatest Authority, it follows that Meekness requires my Obedience and Submission to the Catholick Apostolick Church, and not to the particular wherein I live: so far, I mean, as that I am to retain that Catholick Apostolick, and not this novel, corrupt, not Catholick doctrine. And if for my doing so I fall under persecution of the Rulers of that particular Church, Meekness then requires me patiently to endure it, but in no case to subscribe to, or act, any thing which is contrary to this Catholick doctrine.

S. But what if I may not be permitted to live in that particular Church without this submission, or such acting; what doth the doctrine of Meekness then advise?

C. If the meaning of your words [may not be permitted to live] be, that they will put me to death, then Meekness saith, I must meekly bear the loss of life it self, and so follow Christ. Or, if the meaning be, that they will banish me out of the Kingdom, I must venture my cause with God, and meekly submit to that punishment also, and depend on God's Providence for my preservation in some other. Or, if the meaning be, that they will devest me of my possessions, mulct, or otherwise punish me, the answer is still clear, because all these are less than the one loss of life is supposed to be.

S. But what if they shall excommunicate me? hath the doctrine of Meekness any salve for me then, or any thing which it requires of me?

C. Yes: Meekly to lie under that Censure, supposing that I am not excommunicate from the Catholick Apostolick Church of Christ by any such Censure, but rather so much the more firmly united to it by this means. Nor am I obliged in this case to seek out some other particular Church, which will receive me into their Communion, out of which this hath ejected me; but to submit to that lot contentedly which God permits to befal me in the discharge of a good Conscience. And in this case, as long as I continue constant to the Doctrine of the Catholick Church, and maintain the inward Communion (that of Charity) with all the true Churches of God, wheresoever they are, and with all particular Churches (and even with this which hath excommunicated me) so far as to embrace them with the arms of Christian Charity, to join even with erroneous Churches so far as they are not erroneous, i. e. to embrace all Catholick Truth wheresoever it is, separating only from the corruptions of it, (and that too, only because they will not permit me externally to join with them in the Catholick truths and communion, unless I will profess to join in their corruptions also) in this case, I say, it is no fault of mine, if it should so happen, that I live in no external publick communion at all. The true Christian thus patiently abiding the good pleasure of God, ceaseth not to be such, by being cast upon a Desart, or other equal Hermitage in the midst of Men and Christians. Though after all this, if there be any purer Church that will receive me, or if any Church equally corrupt will yet give me liberty to join with them in the publick Service of God, without complying or joining with them (or seeming and appearing, to the scandal of others, so to do) in their corruptions, I doubt not but it is lawful for me to associate with them; unless my particular calling or condition be such, as that (by some accident) some sin be consequent to my doing thus, as the forsaking those which I am bound to cleave to, and the like.

S. But, What if this particular erroneous Church of which I am, do not excommunicate or exclude me from her communion, what doth Meekness then prescribe in respect of that communion?

C. To communicate with her in all but her corruptions. My meaning is this, some other Obligations there are upon every Christian (wherein Meekness interposeth not) which do require me not to depart from any Catholick Apostolick truth or practice, at least not to submit to (or act) the contrary, or to do any thing which is apt to confirm others in so doing, or to lead those that doubt (by my example) to do what they doubt to be unlawful. For in all these particulars, the Christian law of scandal obliges me, not only not to yield to any schism from the Catholick Apostolick Church, or other the like corruption, but not to do those things by which I shall be thought by prudent men to do so. And therefore thus far I must abstain. But this caution being given and observed, Meekness then requires me, as far as I may without breach of these Obligations, to communicate with that particular Church, as long as I live in her arms; but permits me also, to seek out for some purer Church, if that may conveniently be had for me. Nay, if I am by my calling fitted for it, and can prudently hope to plant (or contribute to the planting) such a pure Apostolick Church, where there is none, or to reconcile and restore peace between divided members of the Church Catholick, my endeavour to do ſo is in this caſe extremely commendable, and that which God's Providence ſeems to direct me to, by what is thus befallen me.

S. But there is one caſe yet that ſeems not to have been mentioned; I ſhall now gather it up, as pertinent to my former queſtions about the meekneſs of the underſtanding, though to thoſe which I have ſince propoſed not altogether ſo agreeable: and it is this, What if there be on both ſides great probabilities, but no demonſtration from Chriſtian Principles, or interpoſing of the Church univerſal or particular, which way will meekneſs then direct me to propend or incline?

C. That which muſt then direct me is mine own Conſcience, to take to that which ſeems to me moſt probable; and in that my meekneſs hath nothing to do, nor can it oblige me to believe that which I am convinced is not true, nor to disbelieve that which I am convinc'd is true: but yet before I am thus convinced, Meekneſs will give me its directions, not to rely too over-weeningly on my own judgment, but to compare my ſelf with other men, my Equals, but eſpecially my Superiours, and to have great Jealouſies of any my own ſingular opinions, which (being repreſented to others as judicious as my ſelf, together with the reaſons that have perſwaded me to them) do not to them prove perſwaſive; nay, after I am convinced, Meekneſs may again move me to hearken to other reaſons, that other men judge more prevailing, and, if occaſion be, to reverſe my former judgment thus paſt upon that matter; it being very reaſonable for me (though not to believe what I am not convinced of, yet) to conceive it poſſible for me not to ſee thoſe grounds of Conviction which another ſees, and ſo to be really miſtaken, though I think I am not: and then what is thus reaſonable to be concluded poſſible, my Meekneſs will bid me conclude poſſible; and having done that, adviſe me to chuſe the ſafer part, and reſolve rather to offend and err by too much flexibility, than too much perverſeneſs; by meekneſs, than by ſelf-love.

S. What is the preſent felicity of the meek man?

The meek mans preſent felicity.

C. 1. The very poſſeſſion of that grace, being of all others moſt delightful and comfortable, both as that that adorns us, and ſets us out beautiful and lovely in the eyes of others, (and is therefore called the ornament of a meek and quiet ſpirit, 1 Pet. 3. 4.) and as that that affords us moſt matter of inward comfort. As for example, that part of meekneſs which is oppoſed to revenge, and conſiſts in bearing, and not retributing of injuries, this to a ſpiritual-minded man is matter of infinite delight; 1. In conquering that mad, wild, deviliſh paſſion of revenge, getting victory over ones ſelf, which is the greateſt act of valour, the thought of which is conſequently moſt delighful. 2. In conquering the enemy, of which there is no ſuch way as the [g] ſoft anſwer, which, ſaith the wiſe man, turneth away wrath; and feeding the hungry enemy, which, ſaith Saint Paul, is the heaping live-coals upon his head; and that the way that Metalliſts uſe to melt thoſe things that will not be wrought on by putting of fire under them, which he farther expreſſes by overcoming evil with good. 3. In conquering or out-ſtripping all the Jewiſh and Heathen world, which had never attained to this skill of loving of enemies, (at the leaſt of thinking it a duty) which is a peculiar pitch [h] of Chriſtianity to which they are elevated by Chriſt: and the honour of this muſt needs be a moſt pleaſant thing. 2. It is matter of preſent felicity to us, in reſpect of the Tranquillity and Quiet it gains us here within our own breaſts, a calm from thoſe ſtorms that Pride and Anger and Revenge are wont to raiſe in us. And 3. in reſpect of the quiet peaceable living with others, without ſtrife and debate, without puniſhments and executions, that are the portion of the ſeditious, turbulent, diſobedient ſpirits. Which is the meaning undoubtedly of the Promiſe in the Pſalmiſt, The meek ſhall inherit the earth, i. e. ſhall generally have the richeſt portion of the good things of this life; from whence this place in the Goſpel being taken, though it may be accommodated to a ſpiritual ſence, by interpreting the Earth for the [i] land of the living; yet undoubtedly it literally notes the land of Canaan, or Judea, which is oft in the Old and New Teſtament called the Earth: and ſo then the Promiſe of inheriting the Earth will be all one with that annexed to the fifth Commandment, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee; i. e. a proſperous long life here is ordinarily the meek mans portion: which he that ſhall compare and obſerve the ordinary diſpenſations of God's Providence, ſhall find to be moſt remarkably true, eſpecially if compared with the contrary fate of turbulent ſeditious perſons. Although ſometimes God in his wiſdom permit it to be otherwiſe, for the puniſhing of a wicked nation (which can have no greater puniſhment than that of a Civil war, wherein the meek man oft ſuffers moſt, and is ſurvived by the turbulent) or for ſome other reaſon in his œconomy.

His aſſurance of future.

S. But if this reward belong to the meek in this life, what aſſurance of future felicity can he have, there being no other promiſe to him, but that he ſhall inherit the earth?

C. The temporal reward can no ways deprive him of the eternal; but as the temporal Canaan was to the Jew a type, and to them that obeyed a pledge, of the eternal; ſo is the earth here a real inheritance below, and a pawn of another above: and this is the meek man's advantage, (above many other duties;) a double Canaan is thought little enough for him, the ſame felicity in a manner attending him which we believe of Adam, if he had not fallen, a life in Paradiſe, and from thence a tranſplantation to Heaven. The like we read of them that part with any thing dear to them for Chriſt's ſake or in obedience to Chriſt's command, (which I conceive belongs eſpecially to the meek, patient endurer of Chriſt's Croſs, and to the liberal-minded man) he ſhall have a hundred fold more in this life, and in the world to come everlaſting life; and unleſs it be here to the meek (or to Godlineſs in general, 1 Tim. 4. 8.) we meet not with any other temporal promiſe in the New Teſtament. And therefore this place here may be reſolved very well to be parallel to that other, not only in the hundred fold, or inheritance in this life, but in that addition alſo of everlaſting life after this. Beſides, other places of Scripture there are that intimate the future reward of the meek, as where it is ſaid to be in the ſight of God of great price; and that, if we learn of Chriſt to be meek, we ſhall find reſt to our ſouls: and even here the bleſſedneſs in the front, noting preſent bleſſedneſs, cannot rightly do ſo, if there were no future reward alſo belonging to it, it being a curſe, no bleſſing, to have our good things, with Dives, or, with the Hypocrite, our reward in this life, and none to expect behind in another.

Of hungring and thirſting after righteouſneſs.

S. What then is the fourth grace?

C. Hungring and thirſting after Righteouſneſs.

S. What

S. What is that? And 1. what is meant by Righteousness?

C. It is of two sorts, 1. Inherent, and then imputed: the inherent, imperfect, proportioned to our state, consisting in the mortifying of sins and lusts, and in some degrees of holy new life; the imputed is Christ's righteousness accepted as ours, which is in plain words, the pardon of our sins, and acceptation of our persons in Christ.

S. What is hungring and thirsting?

C. You may join them both together, and make them one common appetite of both those kinds of Righteousness. Or, if you please, you may more distinctly set them thus, that hungring is an earnest appetite or desire of food, and here in a spiritual sence is apportioned to the first kind of Righteousness, that of God's sanctifying grace, which is as it were bread or food to the soul, to sustain it from perishing eternally; and so hungring after righteousness is an eager, impatient, unsatisfiable desire of grace, of sanctity to the soul; and that desire attended with prayer and importunity to God for the obtaining of it.

S. What is thirsting after righteousness?

C. Thirsting is a desire of some moisture to refresh, and is here apportioned to that second kind of righteousness consisting in pardon of sin, which is the refreshing of the panting soul mortally wounded, and so like the Hart in the Psalmist, longing after the water brooks, to allay the feaver consequent to that wound, to quench the flame of a scorching conscience; and so, Thirsting after righteousness is a most earnest desire of pardon, and petitioning for it from God in Christ, and never giving over that importunity, until he be inclined to have mercy.

S. What present felicity can there be in this Hunger and Thirst?

C. As appetite or stomach to meat is a sign of health in the body, so is this hunger in the soul a vital quality, evidence of some life of grace in the heart, and in that respect matter of present felicity: whereas on the other side, the decay of appetite, the no manner of stomach, is a pitious consumptive symptom, and most desperate prognostick; and not caring for grace or pardon, for sanctification or justification, the most mortal desperate condition in the world. The present felicity of such.

S. What assurance of future happiness attends this Hungring?

C. As much as God's promise of filling can afford. Nay, proportionably to the two parts of the appetite, the state of glory is full matter of satisfaction to each; there is there perfect holiness without mixture of infirmity or carnality, answerable to the hungring after inherent righteousness; and there is there perfect final pardon and acquittance from all the guilt and debt of sin, and so the thirst of imputed righteousness is satisfied also. So that he that hath no other hunger or thirst but these, shall be sure to find satisfaction; which they that set their hearts upon carnal wordly objects, hungring after wealth and secular greatness, lusts, &c. shall never be able to arrive to, either here or hereafter: such acquisitions being here, if attained to, very unsatisfying, the more we have of them, the more we desire to have; and in another world there is no expectation of ought that shall be agreeable to such desires. The future.

S. What is Mercifulness?

C. Abundance of charity, or goodness, or benignity: there being in the Scripture style * two words near kin to one another, justice and mercifulness ordinarily going together; but the latter a much higher degree than the former: the first signifying that legal charity, that both the law of Nature and Moses require to be performed to our brethren; but the second an abundance or supereminent degree of it: expressions of both which we have, Rom. 5. 7. under the titles of the righteous man and the good man. Of Mercifulness. * צדקה and חסד, δικαιοσύνη and ἐλεημοσύνη.

S. Wherein doth this Mercifulness express it self?

C. In two sorts of things especially; 1. Giving. 2. Forgiving.

S. In giving of what?

C. Of all sorts of things that our abilities and others wants may propose to us: such are, relief to those that are in distress, ease to those in pain, alms to poor house-keepers, vindication of honest mens reputation when they are slandered; but above all to mens souls, good counsel, seasonable reproofs, encouragement in performing of duty when they are tempted to the contrary, comfort in time of worldly afflictions, but especially of temptation, strengthening in the ways of God, and whatsoever may tend to the good of any man. In giving.

S. What mean you by forgiving?

C. The not avenging of injuries or contumelies, not suffering their trespasses against men, nay, nor sins against God, to cool or lessen my charity and mercy to them, but loving and compassionating, and shewing all effects of true Christian mercy (such especially as may do them most good) as well to enemies and sinners, as to friends. In forgiving.

S. What is the present felicity that attends this grace?

C. The present delight of having made another man happy, of rescuing a poor soul wrestling with want, &c. from that pressure, of reprieving him that was, as it were, appointed to die; this is certainly the most ingenuous pleasure in the world. 2. The gloriousness of so doing; a kind of God-like act; one of the † two things which a heathen could say were common to us with God; especially if it be an act of ghostly mercy, an alms, a dole, a charity to the soul: to rescue a poor sinner dropping into the pit, reeling into hell, by conference, advice, examples of heavenly life, not only to save my life, but others also; this is in a manner to partake of that incommunicable title of Christ, that of Saviour; such a thing to which (saith ‖ Aristotle) as to an heroick quality belongs not praise, but pronouncing blessed; according to that of Saint Paul from our Saviour, It is more blessed to give than to receive: which supposes that it is a blessed thing to give. The present felicity of the Merciful. † ἀληθεύειν καὶ εὐεργετεῖν, Pythag. ‖ οὐκ ἐπαινῶ, ἀλλὰ μακαρίζω.

S. What assurance is there of future blessedness to such?

C. The greatest in the world, from this Promise annext, [they shall obtain mercy.] God's punishments are mostly answerable to our sins, he thinks good to give us a sight of our transgressions by the manner of his inflictions, and so he is also pleased to apportion his rewards to our graces, mercy to the merciful most peculiarly; by Mercy meaning, 1. Acts of bounty, liberality from God, to wit, temporal The future.

abundance (the common portion of the Almes-giver) and ſpiritual abundance of grace; of ſtrength in time of temptation. 2. Mercy in forgiving, pardoning, not imputing our ſins. Upon which ground it is, that in the form of prayer which he hath himſelf preſcribed us, he annexeth the forgiving of all treſpaſſes againſt us to our prayer for forgiveneſs to our ſelves, as the condition without which we may not hope for ſuch forgiveneſs.

S. What is purity in heart?

Of purity of heart. C. The heart ſignifies the inner man, and eſpecially the practical part, or principle of action. Two ſorts of it. And the purity of that is of two ſorts: the firſt, that which is contrary to pollution; the ſecond, that which is contrary to mixture; as you know, Water is ſaid to be pure when it is clean, and not mudded and defiled, and Wine is ſaid to be pure when it is * not mixt. In the firſt reſpect it excludes Carnality, in the ſecond Hypocriſie.

* Ἄκρατον.

S. When may I be ſaid pure in heart in the firſt ſence?

The firſt C. When not only in the members or inſtruments of action, but even in the heart, all parts of carnality or worldlineſs are mortified. As when we neither are guilty of actual uncleanneſs, nor yet conſent to unclean deſires; nay, feed not ſo much as the eye with unlawful objects, or the heart with filthy thoughts: and becauſe there be other pieces of carnality beſides, as ſtrife, faction, ſedition, &c. yea and pride, and the conſequents of that; all theſe muſt be wrought out of the heart, or elſe we have not attained to this Purity, but are in the Apoſtle's phraſe, 1 Cor. 3. 3. ſtill carnal. And ſo for worldlineſs (for earth you know will pollute alſo) when I not only keep my ſelf from acts of injuſtice and violence, but from deſigns of oppreſſion, nay from coveting that which is another's; and ſo likewiſe for Satanical injections, when I give them no manner of entertainment, but reject them, ſuffer them not to ſtay upon the Soul, and ſo to defile it.

S. When may I be ſaid pure in heart in the ſecond ſence?

The ſecond. C. When I attain to ſincerity; when I favour not my ſelf in any known ſin, double not with God, divide not between him and my own luſt, own ends, own intereſts, between God and Mammon, God and the praiſe of men, &c. For this is ſure a main part of the damning ſin of hypocriſie, againſt which there are ſo many woes denounced, (not the appearing to others leſs ſinful than we are, for that is not more unpardonable, but leſs damning than open, profeſt, avowed, ſcandalous ſinning: but) the halting between God and Baal, the not loving and ſerving God with all our heart, the admitting other rivals with him into our hearts.

S. But is no man to be thought a good Chriſtian that hath either carnality or Hypocriſie in him?

C. None that is either carnal or hypocrite. But the truth is, as long as we live here, and carry this fleſh about us, ſomewhat of carnality there will remain to be daily purged out, and ſo alſo ſome doublings, ſome reliques of hypocriſie; ſomewhat of my ſelf, my own credit, my own intereſt ſtill ſecretly interpoſing in my godlieſt actions. But theſe (ſo they be not ſuffered to reign, to be the chief maſters in me, to carry the main of my actions after them) may be reconcileable with a good eſtate; as humane frailties, not waſting ſins.

S. What is the preſent felicity that belongs to ſuch?

The preſent felicity of the pure. C. To the firſt ſort of purity belongs, 1. that contentment that reſults from having overcome and kept under that unruly beaſt, the carnal part, and brought it into ſome terms of obedience to the ſpirit. 2. The quiet and reſt that proceeds from purity of heart, contrary to the diſquiets and burnings that ariſe from unmaſtered luſts. 3. The eaſe of not ſerving and tending the fleſh, to obey it in the luſts thereof. 4. The quiet of Conſcience, abſence from thoſe pangs and gripings that conſtantly attend the commiſſion of carnal ſins. The ſame may in ſome meaſure be affirmed of all the other branches of the firſt kind of purity. And for the ſecond, as it is oppoſite to mixture or hypocriſie, the conſcience of that is matter of great ſerenity of mind, of Chriſtian confidence and boldneſs towards God and man; when I have no intricacies, Mæanders, windings and doublings within me, when I need no diſguiſes or artifices of deceit, but can venture my ſelf naked and bare to Gods eye, with a, Prove me, O Lord, and try me, ſearch out my reins and my heart; and ſo to men, when I fear not the moſt cenſorious ſtrict ſurvey, have a treaſure of confidence, that I dread not the face of any man, have no pains, no agonies for fear of being deprehended, which the hypocrite is ſtill ſubject unto.

S. What is the reward apportioned to purity hereafter?

The future. C. The Viſion of God, which 1. none but the pure are capable of, and 2. which hath no matter of felicity in it but to ſuch.

S. Why are only the pure capable of the ſight of God?

C. Becauſe God is a Spirit, and cannot be ſeen by carnal eyes, till they be cleanſed and purged, and in a manner ſpiritualized; which though it be not done thorowly till another life, yet purity here, ſuch as this life is capable of, is a moſt proper preparative to it: and therefore is ſaid to be that without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord; which you know is affirmed of holineſs, Heb. 12. 14. which word in that place ſignifies the very purity here ſpoken of.

S. Why hath the Viſion of God no felicity in it but to the pure?

C. Becauſe a carnal faculty is not pleaſed with a ſpiritual object; there muſt be ſome agreeableneſs, before pleaſure is to be had, and that pleaſure is neceſſary to felicity.

S. What is meant by Peace-making?

Of Peace-making. C. The word Peace-makers ſignifies no more than peaceable-minded men. The notion of making in Scripture phraſe belonging to the bent of the Soul; as to make a lie, is, to be given to lying, to practiſe that ſin, to be ſet upon it. So, to do (which is in the Greek, to make) righteouſneſs and ſin, 1 John 2. 29. and 3. 4. notes the full bent and inclination of the ſoul to either of them. So to make peace, both here, and Jam. 3. 18. is to have ſtrong hearty affections to peace.

S Wherein doth this peaceable affection expreſs it ſelf?

Many degrees of it. C. In many degrees: ſome in order to private, ſome to publick peace; ſome to preſerve it where it is, ſome to reduce it where it is loſt.

S. What degrees of it, in order to private peace?

C. A

C. A command and victory over ones Paſſions, eſpecially Anger and Covetouſneſs; the former being moſt apt to diſquiet Families, the latter Neighbourhoods. The angry man will have no peace with his ſervants, children, nay wife and parents, any that are within the reach of his ordinary converſation: and the covetous man will contend with any near him, that have any thing that he covets. 2. A charitable or favourable opinion of all men, and actions that are capable of candid interpretation; Jealouſies in the leaſt ſocieties being the moſt fatal enemies to peace, and ſuch as foment the leaſt diſcontents into the mortalleſt feuds and hatreds. 3. An apertneſs and clearneſs of mind, in a friendly debate (with friends or neighbours) of any actions which have paſt, ſubject to miſconſtruction, without all concealing of grounds of quarrel, not ſuffering them to boil within, but diſcreetly requiring an accompt of all ſuch dubious accidents of thoſe who are concerned in them. 4. The reſolving againſt contentions and litigations in law as much as is poſſible, being rather content to ſuffer any ordinary loſs, than to be engaged in ſuch ways of vindication, or righting our ſelves; and in greater matters referring it to arbitrement of honeſt neighbours, rather than to bring it to ſuit. 5. Expreſſing a diſlike to flatterers, whiſperers, and back-biters, and never ſuffering our affections to be altered by any ſuch. By theſe you will gheſs of other degrees alſo. In order to private peace.

S. What, in order to publick peace?

C. 1. Contentment in our preſent ſtation, and never faſtning our ambition and covetiſe on any thing which will not eaſily be attained without ſome publick change or innovation. 2. Willing Obedience to the preſent Government of Church or State. 3. Patience of the Croſs, or preparation for that Patience, and reſolving never to move a State, to get my ſelf from under any preſſure. 4. Reſolving on the truth of that ſacred dictate, that the faults and infirmities of Governours are by God permitted for the puniſhment of the people; and that conſequently they are to be looked on not in a direct line, only (or chiefly) to cenſure them; but in order to reflexion on our ſelves, to obſerve what in our ſelves hath ſo provoked God to puniſh us. 5. The not thinking our own opinions in Religion (ſuch as are not of faith) of ſuch importance, as either to deny Salvation or Communion to any that differ from us. 6. Modeſty and Calmneſs in diſputing. 7. Not affixing holineſs to opinions, or thinking them the beſt men that are moſt of our perſwaſions. 8. The not defining too many things in Religion. And many others you will judge of by theſe. to publick.

S. What to preſerve it where it is?

C. 1. Valuing of it according to its true eſtimation, as that which is in the eyes of men very amiable, and in the ſight of God of great price, and as that which is to every particular man the ſame thing in many reſpects (of his eſtate, his reputation, his bodily conveniencies, and oft life it ſelf) which bodily health is in one of thoſe reſpects only. 2. Conſidering how inſenſibly it may be loſt, and with how great difficulty recovered again, and how near to a Hell this life is without it. 3. Prudent watching over it, and over thoſe that are enemies to peace. 4. Not being eaſily provoked, but overcoming ſtrife with mildneſs, or kindneſs, the ſoft anſwer, &c. and overcoming evil with good. 5. Praying conſtantly to God the Author of Peace for the continuance of this beloved creature of his among us. to Preſerving it where it is.

S. What to recover it when it is loſt?

C. 1. Humbling our ſouls, amending our lives, ſearching out thoſe peculiar reigning ſins that have made this bleſſing too good for us to enjoy, and ſo making our peace with God firſt. 2. Examining (every man ſingle) what I have contributed toward the removing of it, whom I have ſlandered, &c. and repairing what I have thus done by Confeſſion and Satisfaction. 3. By inceſſant prayer to God fetching it back again. to Recovering it when 'tis loſt.

S. What is the preſent felicity that belongs to ſuch?

C. 1. The preſent reſt and peace, the greateſt of all worldly pleaſures, and which is (as I ſaid) as health in the body, the foundation of all other ſuperſtructions of temporal joy. 2. The Conſcience of the charitable offices done to all others by this means. 3. The honour of being like God in it, who is the God of Peace; and like Chriſt, who came on this errand to this earth of ours, to make peace between the greateſt enemies, his Father and the poor ſinner's ſoul. The preſent felicity of the Peace-maker.

S. What is the reward appointed to Peaceableneſs hereafter?

C. 1. God's acknowledgment of us as of thoſe that are like him. 2. Pardon of ſins, and eternal reſt and peace hereafter. The future.

S. To whom doth the laſt Beatitude belong?

C. To thoſe 1. that are perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake, 2. that are reviled falſly for Chriſt's ſake. Of Perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake.

S. How do theſe differ one from the other?

C. Only as a more general word and a more ſpecial. * Perſecution ſignifies properly and ſtrictly, being purſued, and driven, and hunted, as noxious beaſts are wont; but in common uſe noteth whatever calamity or affliction the malice or tyranny of others can lay on us: and Reviling is one ſpecial kind of it, which is moſt frequently the true Chriſtians lot, becauſe 1. thoſe that have no ſtrength or power to inflict other injuries, have yet theſe weapons of their malice always in readineſs. 2. Becauſe they who are not good Chriſtians themſelves, do in their own defence think themſelves obliged to defame thoſe that are; their good actions, when they are ſilent, ſeeming ſo reproachful to them, made to reprove their thoughts, Wiſd. 2. 14. And ſo they endeavour by their tongues to revenge themſelves upon them, to redeem their reputation by that means. * διωγμός. Reviling.

S. But what is meant by the phraſes, [for righteouſneſs ſake] and [falſly for my ſake?]

C. Thoſe words contain a reſtraint or limitation of the ſubject to this purpoſe: that the Beatitude belongs not to thoſe indefinitely that are perſecuted and reviled (for many may thus juſtly ſuffer as thieves, as murtherers, evil doers, buſie-bodies, 1 Pet. 4. 15. and receive little joy or bleſſedneſs in that) but to thoſe peculiarly that are true Chriſtians. And that either 1. for ſome good action wherein their Chriſtianity and the teſtimony of a good Conſcience is concerned; as when men are reviled and perſecuted, becauſe they will not either totally forſake and Apoſtatize from Chriſt, or in any particular occurrent offend againſt him (or when ſome ſuch Chriſtian performance brings this conſequent perſecution Falſely for Chriſt's ſake.

perſecution or reproach upon them.) Or 2. for ſome indifferent ſinleſs action, which though it be not done in neceſſary obedience to Chriſt, yet bringing unjuſt perſecution or reviling falſly upon them, may (though in an inferiour degree) belong to this matter: and in that caſe the perſecution that ſo falls on them will be thought to be permitted by our wiſe and good God, and diſpoſed or ordered by him for our Beatitude, i. e. for the benefit of us as Chriſtians; either as a Chaſtiſement of our other ſins, that we may not be condemned with the world; or as a means of tryal whether we will bear it patiently and Chriſtianly.

The preſent felicity of the perſecuted.

S. Wherein doth the preſent felicity of ſuch conſiſt?

C. 1. In having their evil things in this life, that ſo all their good things, their reward, may remain on arrear, unpaid till another life. 2. In the honour and dignity of ſuffering for Chriſt's ſake. 3. In conformity with the ancient Prophets and Champions of God in all Ages. 4. In the comfort that proceeds from this evidence and demonſtration of our being true Chriſtians; for that is the meaning of [yours is the Kingdom of Heaven] i. e. the ſtate of Chriſtians, or the true Chriſtian ſtate. It being a Chriſtian Aphoriſm, that God chaſtens every Son, Heb. 12. 7. and that the good things that are made good to Chriſtians here, ſhall be with perſecution, Mar. 10. 30. 5. In this pledge of God's favour to us, in that we are thought worthy to ſuffer ſhame for his name. 6. In the aſſurance of a greater Reward hereafter, proportioned to our ſufferings here.

The future.

S. What is the reward hereafter, apportioned to this?

C. A greater degree of glory in Heaven.

S. You told me, at your entring on the Beatitudes, that I was no farther to believe my ſelf a Chriſtian, than I ſhould find all and every of theſe Graces in me to which theſe Beatitudes are prefixt: This I can without difficulty acknowledge for all the former, (and reſolve I am no farther a Chriſtian, than I am poor in ſpirit, mourning, meek, hungring and thirſting after righteouſneſs, merciful, pure in heart, and peaceable;) but the laſt ſticks with me, and I cannot ſo eaſily aſſent to that, that I cannot be a Chriſtian, unleſs I be perſecuted and reviled; I pray clear that difficulty to me.

How this a token of a true Chriſtian.

C. I ſhall, by ſaying theſe four things to you. 1. That though to be perſecuted is no duty of ours; yet, 1. to bear it patiently, and 2. to rejoice in it, when it befalls us, and 3. that it be for righteouſneſs ſake, (when it lights upon us) is our duty, required of all Chriſtians. 2. The very being perſecuted, though it be not a duty again, is yet a mark and character of a Chriſtian; and the Scripture doth ſeem to affirm, that no good Chriſtian ſhall ever be without his part in it, Heb. 12. 6, &c. And it will be hard for any to find out one holy man that hath paſſed through his whole life without this portion. 3. If it ſhall not be ſo general a rule, but it be reſolved capable of ſome exception, i. e. if ſome good Chriſtians be found which are not perſecuted, yet ſtill the Preparation of mind for this indurance is neceſſary to every Chriſtian. 4. The being perſecuted ſhall contribute much to the encreaſe of our glory, and ſo may ſtill be ſaid neceſſary reſpectively (though it ſhould not be affirmed abſolutely) to the attaining of that degree of glory: and therefore this is placed after all the reſt, as a means of perfecting and conſummating the Chriſtian, that as the former ſeven are neceſſary to the attaining a crown at all, ſo this to the having ſo rich a crown, or ſo many gems in it.

Of the Order of theſe Beatitudes.

S. Is there any thing now which from the order of theſe Beatitudes you would think fit to teach me?

C. Yes, eſpecially two things. 1. That the Grace firſt named is a general principal Grace, which is the foundation of all the reſt. Where that is once ſeated and planted, all the reſt will more eaſily and more happily follow. Humility is the ſeed-plot of all, and from thence it is moſt proper to proceed, 1. to mourning, or ſorrow for ſin; (the humble heart is a melting heart) 2. to meekneſs and quietneſs of ſpirit; (the humble heart is the next degree to that already) 3. to hungring and thirſting after righteouſneſs; (the humble heart will moſt impatiently deſire both pardon of ſin, (that firſt kind of righteouſneſs) and grace to ſanctifie, (that ſecond kind of righteouſneſs) 4. to mercifulneſs; (the humble heart will be moſt ready to give and forgive) 5. to purity of heart; the humble heart is moſt unreconcileable with all filthineſs both of the fleſh and ſpirit, but eſpecially the latter, of which, pride, a chief particular is the direct contrary to Humility) 6. to peaceableneſs; (contention being generally the effect of pride) 7. to perſecution and reviling; (Humility 1. being apt to tempt the proud worldling to revile and perſecute: 2. being ſure to work patience of them in the Chriſtian.)

S. What is the ſecond thing that from the Order you obſerve?

C. The interchangeable mixture of theſe Graces; one toward God, and another toward man, thus interweaved, that the firſt reſpects God, the next man, the next God again, and ſo forward till it comes to the laſt, which reſpects God again. For having told you that the firſt is a general Fundamental Grace, as the head to all the reſt; it follows that the ſecond, that of mourning, muſt be the firſt particular, which being faſtened particularly on ſin, reſpecteth God, againſt whom we have ſinned; then next to that, meekneſs reſpecteth our Neighbour eſpecially; and 3. hungring and thirſting after righteouſneſs, (which is all to be had from God) reſpecteth God; Mercifulneſs again reſpecteth man; Purity in heart, God; Peaceableneſs, man; and laſtly, Perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake, and patience of it, as coming from a conſideration and belief of God's provident diſpoſal of all things, reſpecteth God again. So that you ſee the firſt and the laſt reſpecteth our duty toward God; (who is Alpha and Omega, the firſt and the laſt) and thoſe between, divided between our Neighbour and God. That ſo we may reſolve, that to God belongs the chief, and firſt, and laſt of our Love and Obedience; yet ſo as not to exclude, but require alſo in its ſubordination our care of duty and love toward man alſo; one intermixing lovingly and friendly with the other, and neither performed as it ought, if the other be neglected.

S. I conceive you have now concluded the explication of the firſt part of this Sermon, God give me grace to lay all the ſeverals to heart.

Sect. II. Chriſtians muſt be exemplary.

What is the ſumme of the ſecond branch or Section in it?

C. It conſiſts of the four next verſes, to wit, ver. 13, 14, 15, 16. and the ſumme of them is, the neceſſity that the graces and vertues of Diſciples, or Chriſtians, ſhould be evident and exemplary to others alſo, i. e. to all Heathens and ſinners, and all indefinitely which may be attracted by ſuch example.

ample. This is enforced by four reſemblances: 1. of Salt, which as long as it is ſalt, hath a quality of ſeaſoning of other things to which it is applied; 2. of the Sun, that is apt to illuminate the dark world; 3. of a City on a Hill, which is conſpicuous; 4. of a Candle ſet in a Candleſtick, which giveth light to all that are in the houſe. By all which he expreſſes, that thoſe graces are not to be accounted Chriſtian, which either, 1. do not bring forth fruits, (and ſo remain but dull habits, uſeleſs poſſeſſions) or 2. which are not made exemplary to others.

S. But ſure all this belongs to Miniſters and men in eminent place only (They are the ſalt of the earth, and light of the world) not to every private Chriſtian.

C. Yes to every private Chriſtian; for ſuch are the Diſciples to which Chriſt here ſpeaks, the ſame auditors continuing to every part of the Sermon, and ſo the duty of exemplary lives is in ſome meaſure required of every of them, who before were bound to be meek, or peaceable, &c. i. e. (as 'tis apparent, ver. 1.) of all thoſe that are entred into the School of Chriſt: not only Apoſtles, (whoſe Succeſſors the Governours of the Church now are) for as yet there were none ſuch, (the Apoſtleſhip or ſolemn miſſion, the inſtating that authority on his Diſciples, which was to continue in their ſucceſſors, being not yet begun at the time of Chriſt's ſpeaking theſe words, nor till after his Reſurrection, John 20. 21. or rather his aſcenſion, Acts 2. 4.) but, I ſay, all Diſciples, i. e. all Chriſtians that undertake to follow Chriſt, and expect any good by him.

S. What then is the meaning of this neceſſity that the Chriſtian's graces muſt be evident and exemplary?

C. 'Tis this: 1. That a Chriſtian muſt not content himſelf in doing what Chriſt commands, but muſt alſo diſpoſe his actions ſo as may moſt tend to God's honour, which conſiſts in bringing in many Diſciples unto him, and which ought to be as precious to a Chriſtian as the ſalvation of his ſoul. Moſt contrary to which are the practices of thoſe which profeſſing Religion, commit thoſe things which even nature it ſelf and ſober Heathen reaſon abhors (ſuch are circumventing of other men, rebellion, ſedition, and many times unclean ſins, not to be named, alſo) and ſo bring up an evil report upon Chriſtian Religion, defame it in the opinions of men. 2. That he ought to labour the converſion of others, (in charity to them) the extending, not incloſing God's Kingdom.

S. This doctrine is clear, and therefore I will detain you no longer on this Section.

S. What is the ſumme of the next Section, which conſiſts of four verſes more, 17, 18, 19, 20?

Sect. III. Chriſt did not aboliſh.

C. It is in brief the atteſtation of two great Chriſtian truths.

S. What is the firſt of them?

C. That Chriſtianity is not contrary to the laws by which mankind had formerly been obliged, is not deſtructive of them; Chriſt now commands nothing that the natural or moral law had forbidden, and likewiſe forbids nothing that that had commanded: this is affirmed in three forms in this Section. Firſt, ver. 17. He came not to deſtroy the Law and the Prophets, i. e. the doctrine deſigned and taught by them; and it would be a very dangerous errour, very noxious to practice, to think he did, Think not, &c. Secondly, ver. 18. he affirms with an aſſeveration, that the leaſt letter or tittle of the Law ſhall not be deſtroyed, i. e. loſe its obligingneſs, (till all be fulfilled, we read; it is) * till all things be done, i. e. till the world be at an end, or (which is the ſame at the beginning of the Verſe, though in other words) till Heaven and earth, i. e. this preſent world, paſs away, or is diſſolved. Thirdly, verſ. 19. He pronounces clearly, that he that affirms any the leaſt commandment of the Law to be now out-dated, (that not only breaks them himſelf, but teaches others that they are not obliged to keep them) he ſhall be called the leaſt in the Kingdom of Heaven, i. e. ſhall not be accounted a Chriſtian; for ſo the Kingdom of Heaven frequently ſignifies in the Scripture, and (to be the leaſt in it) is a phraſe that ſignifies being utterly excluded from it.

* ἕως ἂν πάντα γένηται.

S. What is the ſecond thing?

But perfect the Law, and ſet it higher.

C. That Chriſt hath perfected the Law, and ſet it higher than any the moſt ſtudied Doctor did think himſelf obliged by it formerly. And this is affirmed here alſo by two phraſes. Firſt, verſe 17. I came not to deſtroy the Law, but to perfect it. The Greek word which we render [[a] to perfect] is anſwerable to an Hebrew which ſignifies not only [b] to perform, but to [c] perfect, to fill up, as well as to fulfil; and ſo is rendred ſometimes by one, ſometimes by th'other. And the Greek it ſelf is ſo uſed in like manner. When it refers to a word or a prophecy, then it is to perform, to fulfil, 2 Chron. 36. 22. 1 Mac. 2. 55. In other caſes it is to fill up, to compleat, to perfect, Eccleſ. 33. 16. and 39. 12. and 2 Chron. 24. 10. And that it is ſo in this place, may appear by the ancient Greek Fathers, which expreſs it by two ſimilitudes. 1. Of a veſſel that had ſome water in it before, but now is filled up to the brim. 2. Of a picture that is firſt [d] drawn rudely, the limbs only and lineaments, with a coal or the like; but when the hand of the Painter comes to draw it in colours [e] to the life, then it is ſaid to be filled up. 2. That except your righteouſneſs, i. e. Chriſtian actions and performances, exceed the righteouſneſs of the Scribes and Phariſees, i. e. go higher than that ſtricteſt ſect of the Jews and the Doctors among them thought themſelves obliged to, or taught others that they were obliged, they ſhall not paſs for Chriſtians here, or prove Saints hereafter. In which word ſure he doth not pitch on the name of Scribes and Phariſees, peculiarly as thoſe that were the greateſt evacuators of the Law by their own hypocritical practices or falſe gloſſes in ſome particulars; but the Phariſees as the moſt exact ſect among the Jews, Acts 26. 5. and the Scribes as the Doctors of the Law, and thoſe that knew better what belonged to it than other men; and both together as thoſe that ſate in Moſes chair, i. e. taught there truly (though they practiſed not [they ſay, but do not]) the doctrine of the Moſaical Law in that manner as others were obliged to perform it, Matth. 23. 2. This ſame truth is alſo farther proved in the remainder of this Chapter, by induction of ſeveral particulars of the Law, firſt barely ſet down by Chriſt, and then with Chriſt's improvement added to them, in this form of ſpeech, but I ſay unto you. And though this be no new doctrine, but affirmed diſtinctly by moſt of the [f] Ancient (eſpecially the Greek) writers, before Saint Auſtin's time, and thus far acknowledged by all parts, that Chriſt required more of his Diſciples, i. e. of Chriſtians now, than the Jews by any clear revelation had been convinced to be neceſſary before, (which is in effect as much as I ſhall deſire to have granted:) yet I have thought good to confirm it yet further to you, (becauſe it is the foundation of of a great weighty ſuperſtructure) by two things; 1. by one other remarkable place of Scripture; 2. by ſome reaſons which the Fathers have given for the doing of it.

Juſtin Martyr, τὸ καθ' ἑνὸν ἑκάστῳ ἀνθρώπῳ πιστευθέντος δεῖ, To live according to nature is the part of one that hath not yet believed. Irenæus l. 4. c. 27. Dominus naturalia legis non diſſolvit, ſed extendit, ſed & implevit. Chriſt did not diſſolve thoſe parts of the law which were from the law of nature, but extended them, and alſo filled them up. Where to fill up is more than to extend, and in that notion is ſet oppoſite to Chriſts words of deſtroying the law, Matth. 5. So again, ſed plenitudinem & extenſionem, his Law is the plenitude and extenſion of the former. Again, Superextendi decreta, & augeri ſubjectionem. The Laws under Chriſt are extended above what they were, and our ſubjection encreaſt. And again, adimplentis, extendentis, dilatantis, that Chriſt doth fill up, extend, and dilate the Law: and that whole Chapter is wholly ſpent on that purpoſe, ſhewing abundantly what Chriſt meant by πληρῶσαι, not fulfilling, as that ſignifies in our ordinary phraſe performing the former Laws, (though Chriſt did that alſo) but filling it up, encreaſing it, adding to it: So Clemens Alex. Strom. 3. hath a great deal of Chriſts renewing the Law being grown old, καὶ ὅτι συγχωρεῖτο, not permitting thoſe things any longer which had been before permitted, but leading his Diſciples ἀπὸ τῆς προχειροτέρας, from that preluſory life of nature to thoſe higher Myſteries. So Athenagoras in his Embaſſie or meſſage to Antoninus and Commodus, oppoſes againſt all the precepts of the Lawyers and Philoſophers of all former ages, this one dogma or precept of Chriſt, ἀγαπᾶτε τοὺς ἐχθροὺς, love your enemies, challenging them all to compare with Chriſt in that one piece of Chriſtianity. So Saint Baſil on the 15 Pſalm: As, ſaith he, the old Law ſaith, Thou ſhalt not kill, ſo the Lord (Chriſt) τελειότερος νομοθετῶν, giving more perfect laws, ſaith, Thou ſhalt not be angry, &c. So the Author of thoſe Conſtitutions which go under Clemens Romanus's name, and are acknowledged to be very ancient, in his 6 Book c. 23. vide loc. So Conſtantine the Emperour in Zoſim. l. 2. calls Chriſt's Law νέαν παιδαγωγίαν the new diſcipline; Macarius, νόμον πνευματικὸν, a ſpiritual law, oppoſed to the natural, hom. 37. p. 442. But moſt clearly Saint Chryſoſtome, who calls the Sermon on the Mount, ἄκρον τῆς φιλοσοφίας, the top of Philoſophy, καὶ ὁ ὢν καινὴ νόμοι μέλειοι καὶ περὶ πολλῶν μειζόνων, in the new Teſtament, ſaith he, there are a many laws, and of many higher or greater matters. Edit. Savil. T. 3. p. 93. To which he applies that of Chriſt John 15. 22. If I had not come, and ſpoken to them, they had had no ſin; whence 'tis clear, that 'twas his opinion that ſome things were prohibited by Chriſt's coming and ſpeaking, which he that practiſed before, either had no ſin, or was not in ſo great meaſure guilty of it. So again, that Chriſt's giving of Laws was πλήρωσις καὶ ἐπίτασις, a filling up and extending of the old, and that this was the reaſon why Chriſt medled not with all the precepts of the Decalogue, becauſe, ſaith he, he reſolved not πάντας αὐξῆσαι to encreaſe all. Again, on Matt. p. 112. he ſaith, that it was now μειζόνων ἐντολῶν καιρὸς a ſeaſon of greater precepts. So T. 3. p. 91. ὑ τὰ αὐτὰ κεῖται παλαιοῖς καὶ ἡμῖν σκάμματα, the antients and we have not the ſame goals propoſed to us: and ſo on, in a moſt clear place, for it be intirely tranſcribed, or (inſtead of that) conſulted in the Father. So Theophylact compares Chriſt with the Law, as the ζωγράφους τελεία the painting to life, to the σκιαγραφία, or drawing in black and white, or firſt lineaments, p. 28. in Eu. and that Chriſt did not καταλύειν σκιαγραφίαν, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον ἀναπληροῦν, not deſtroy the firſt draught, but rather fill it up. So again, To love friends, ſaith he, ἀτελὲς ἐστι, is an imperfect thing; τέλειον ἡ πάντας ἀγαπᾶν, but to love all is perfect, or an high degree of perfection. Again, that the precepts of the Law are ſuch as θηλάζουσι καὶ παιδίοις ἁρμόζει, are agreeable to ſucklings and children, which ἀνδράσιν αἰσχύνη, it will be a reproach to men not to have exceeded. So Oecumenius, T. 1. p. 286. ὑ τὰ αὐτὰ ἐν νέᾳ ὄντα τιθέμεθα ἅπερ οἱ πάλαι ἐν νόμῳ, we have not now the ſame precepts in the New which we had in the Old Teſtament, but καινὰ καὶ νέα προσῆλθματα καὶ φιλοσοφώτερα, new commands and more philoſophical, i. e. of deeper and higher importance for the regulating of mens lives. For, ſaith he, killing was forbidden of old, anger alſo is forbidden us; and ſo of ſwearing, diſtinctly, ὐκ ἦν πονηρὸν τότε, μετὰ ἡ Χριστὸν δεῖ πονηρὸν, it was not then (univerſally) unlawful, but now after Chriſt it is; μὴ ὅλως ὀμνύειν, for Chriſt hath ſaid, But I ſay unto you, ſwear not at all. The ſame is affirmed by Saint Baſil in the fore-cited place, ἐπορκία συγχωρεῖται, ſwearing truly is permitted under the Law; ἐν ἡ τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ παντελῶς ἀπηγόρευται, but under the Goſpel it is univerſally forbidden, i. e. ſome kind of oaths, which are there permitted, are here univerſally prohibited; as for example, ſwearing by others beſide God. And ſo both Saint Chryſoſtome and Theophylact alſo. So among the Latines, Tertullian l. 3. contra Marcion. c. 16. Chriſti legem ſupplementa neceſſaria eſſe diſciplinæ Creatoris, that Chriſts Law is an addition of neceſſary ſupplements to the Law of the Creator. Again, l. de patientia; Ampliandæ adimplendæque legi adjutricem Chriſtus præfecit patientiam, Chriſt added his rules of Patience for an help to enlarge and fill up the Law; quod ad juſtitiæ doctrinam retrò deſuiſſet, becauſe that had formerly been wanting to the doctrine of righteouſneſs: nondum enim patientia in terris, quia nec fides, for patience was not as yet on the earth, becauſe faith was not, i. e. Chriſtianity brought that high pitch into the world with it. And after a great deal more he comforts the Law of Moſes for the loſs of its ceremonies, &c. and tells it that it hath found more in Chriſt than it loſt. So again, ad Scap. p. 91. Hæc eſt perfecta & propria bonitas noſtra, This is a goodneſs perfect and proper to us Chriſtians; Amicos enim diligere omnium eſt, inimicos ſolorum Chriſtianorum, 'Tis every mans part to love friends, only the Chriſtians to love enemies. Again, 4 contr. Marc. p. 524. (Paml. ed.) Chriſtus Dei Creatoris præcepta ſupplendo & conſervavit & auxit, Chriſt preſerved and encreaſed the Laws of God the Creator by filling them up. So again, l. de pudicitia; Legem ſiſtimus, ſcilicet in his quæ & nunc Novo Teſtamento introducto etiam cumulatiore præcepto prohibentur; pro Non mœchaberis, Qui viderit, &c. Some things in the New Teſtament are prohibited by an higher precept, in ſtead of [Thou ſhalt not commit adultery] [He that looketh, &c.] So Saint Jerome on Matth. concerning oaths; Hoc quaſi parvulis conceſſum, This was allowed before, or permitted to the Jews, as to little ones; Evangelica autem veritas non recipit, The Goſpel-truth doth not permit it. So Saint Auſtin T. 4. p. 1109. de Serm. in monte l. 1. Where having propoſed a double fence of fulfilling the Law, he inſiſts only on the latter, viz. that Chriſt fulfilled the Law by adding quod minus habet, what was deficient, & ſic perficiendo confirmaverit, and ſo by perfecting confirmed it: dum enim fiunt quæ adduntur, multo magis fiunt illa quæ permiſſa ſunt ad inchoationem, for while thoſe things are done which are added, thoſe things are much more done which were permitted for their initial ſtate. Then upon that Verſe, [Unleſs your righteouſneſs exceed, &c.] he explains it thus, Niſi non ſolùm ea quæ inchoant homines impleveritis, ſed etiam iſta quæ à me adduntur, qui non veni ſolvere, ſed adimplere, Unleſs you fulfil not only thoſe things which men perform in that initial ſtate, but alſo thoſe which are added by me, who came not to looſe but to fulfil, you ſhall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. And again on that paſſage [He that ſhall do, and teach theſe leaſt Commandments, ſhall be called great] 'tis not, ſaith he, to be underſtood ſecundum illa minima, ſed ſecundum ea quæ dicturus ſum, according to thoſe leaſt things under the Law, but to the leaſt of thoſe precepts which Chriſt meant to deliver them. Quæ ſunt autem iſta? and what are they? ſaith he, and anſwers, ut abundet juſtitia, that your righteouſneſs exceed, &c. Theſe few may ſuffice to give ſome ſight of the ſence of antiquity in this point.

S. What is that remarkable place of Scripture?

C. In the firſt Epiſtle of Saint John, chap. 1. v. 5. prefaced and brought in with more magnificent ceremony than any other paſſage of Scripture, That which was in the beginning, &c. Ver. 1. That which we have ſeen and heard, &c. Ver. 3. and, Theſe things write we, Ver. 4. This then is the meſſage, Ver. 5. All which are remarkable characters ſet upon that which follows, ſhewing it to be the ſumme of the whole Goſpel, or doctrine of Chriſt; and it is this, [That God is light, and in him there is no darkneſs at all,] Ver. 5. which words ſo uſhered in, you will eaſily believe have ſomewhat more in them than at the firſt ſound, taken alone, they would ſeem to have, and this ſure it is; That now under the Goſpel, Chriſt, this light, appears without any mixture of darkneſs. Light is the ſtate and doctrine of Chriſtianity; darkneſs, of ſin and imperfection, and ſuch as was before among Jews and Heathens, (which is referred to by the phraſe, If we walk in darkneſs, ver. 6. i. e. live like Jews or Heathens:) and therefore to be light without all mixture of darkneſs, is to be perfect without all mixture either of ſin or of imperfection; which you will not think fit to affirm of God, (or Chriſt under the Goſpel) in reſpect to himſelf; (for that were to conceive that he had not been ſo before) but in reſpect of his Law and Commandments, the rules of mens lives, that they had before ſome indulgence for ſome ſins, and where they had not ſo, yet that they had ſome mixture of imperfection, but now they have none; they had before ſome vacuities in them, which now are filled up by Chriſt.

S. What reaſons do the Fathers give for this?

Grounds of it.

C. Theſe eſpecially: Becauſe 1. Chriſt under the Goſpel gives either higher or plainer Promiſes than he did before; the Promiſes of eternal life are now as clear as thoſe of a temporal Canaan had been been before to the Jews. 2. Becauſe he gives more grace now to perform them than before he had done. The Law given by Moſes was a carnal law, i. e. weak, not accompanied with ſtrength to perform what it requires; but the Goſpel of Chriſt is the adminiſtration of the ſpirit, i. e. a means to adminiſter the ſpirit to our hearts, to enable us to do what he commands us to do: and then, as the Father ſaid, Lord, give me ſtrength to do what thou commandeſt, and command what thou liſteſt; if ſo Chriſt ſtrengthens me, I am ſurely able to do all things, having that ſufficiency from God.

S. If this be true, that Chriſt now requires more than under Nature or Moſes had been formerly required, at leaſt fully revealed to be required; how then is our Chriſtian burthen lighter than the Jewiſh formerly was? In theſe things it is heavier rather.

C. It is made lighter by Chriſt in taking off that unprofitable burthen of Ceremonies, that had nothing good in them, and yet were formerly laid on the Jews: lighter again in reſpect of the greater Revelations, and effuſion of Grace, now under Chriſt, than was allowed before; the encreaſing of which above the proportion of the burthen, is conſequently (in effect) the leſſening of the burthen. Which two things being ſuppoſed, the adding of theſe Perfections to the Law (which are all of things gainful and profitable, and before (even by thoſe that either were not, or thought not themſelves obliged by them) acknowledged to be more excellent and more honourable than the other) will not in any reaſon be counted the encreaſe of a burthen, (for no man will be thought oppreſſed by that he gains by) but the gainful yoke will be a light one, though it be a yoke, Mat. 11. 30. And 2. as long as he gives ſtrength, his Commandments, what ever they are, cannot be grievous. Wherein the lightneſs of the Chriſtians burthen conſiſts.

S. But ſure it were not difficult to find in the Old Teſtament, the ſame or equivalent Commands to every of thoſe that follow here; How then can Chriſt be ſaid to have improved them?

C. Some glimmerings perhaps of this light there were before, as Goſpel under the Law: but theſe either 1. not univerſally commanded to all under threat of eternal puniſhment, but only recommended to them that will do that which is beſt, and ſo ſee good days, &c. or 2. not ſo expreſly revealed to them as that they might know themſelves thus obliged. And yet if any will contend, and ſhew as univerſal plain obliging Precepts there as here, I ſhall be glad to ſee them, and not contend with him, ſo he will bring the Jews up to us, and not us down to the Jews; for that is the only danger, which I have all this while uſed all this diligence to prevent. The glimmerings of this light in the Old Teſtament.

S. One queſtion more I ſhall trouble you with in this matter, Whether theſe ſuperadditions of Chriſt in the reſt of the chapter may not be reſolved to be only Counſels of perfection, which to do, is to do better; and not Commands, which not to do, is a ſin.

C. The following ſuperadditions are all Commands, and not Counſels onely; Chriſt delivering theſe now in the ſame manner as Moſes did thoſe other before; Chriſt in a Mount, as he in a Mount; his ſaying [I ſay unto you] a form of Command, as that phraſe [God ſpake theſe words and ſaid] a form of it, Exodus 20. and the breach of theſe new ſayings threatned with judgment and hell fire, and impriſonment irreverſible, and caſting into hell, &c. in the enſuing words. All which ſignifie them ſins which muſt be accounted for ſadly by a Chriſtian, and not only failings, or falling ſhort of perfection. Chriſt's ſuperadditions are commands all.

S. How many ſorts of theſe new Commandments are there in this enſuing Chapter?

C. Six; 1. Concerning Killing, 2. Adultery, 3. Divorce, 4. Perjury, 5. Retaliation, 6. Loving of Neighbours. In each of which Chriſt, to ſhew that he came not to deſtroy, but to fill up, or perfect, the Law, firſt rehearſes the old Law, and thereby confirms it, and then annexeth his new law to it. Six ſorts of them.

S. That we may with underſtanding proceed to this matter, I muſt firſt deſire you to tell me what is meant by this phraſe in the front of the firſt of theſe, [Ye have heard that it was ſaid by them of old time. Sect. IV.

C. [Ye have heard] ſignifies you have been taught, and that out of the Word of God, or Books of Moſes: [ſaid by them of old time] ſeems to be ill tranſlated, and therefore is mended in the margents of our Bibles [to them] i. e. to the Jews your Anceſtors. And that this is a denotation of the Law of the Decalogue given to them, Exod. 20. you will have little reaſon to doubt, if you obſerve that the three ſeverals to which theſe words are prefixt, (being omitted in the reſt, in ſome part) are three diſtinct Commandments of the Decalogue, Thou ſhalt not kill, Thou ſhalt not commit adultery, Thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf, or take God's name in vain, (as anon you ſhall ſee.) As for the other three, of Divorce, of Retaliation, of Loving neighbours, and Hating enemies, which have not that entire form or phraſe prefixt, but ſome other different from it, they are not Commands of the Moſaical Law, but Permiſſions or indulgences allowed the Jews, but now recalled, and denied Chriſtians. The ſtile of the old Commandments.

S. The firſt of theſe being the ſixth of the Law, I muſt firſt deſire you to explain unto me, and tell me what was forbidden by it under the Law. Sect. V. Of Killing.

C. The firſt and principal thing is the ſhedding of man's blood, by way of killing, or taking away his life; God only, who gave us life, having power to take it away again.

S. What then is to be thought of the Magiſtrates taking away the life of a capital offender? Is not that forbidden by that Law?

C. God having ſole power over the life of man, may without doubt take it away by what way he pleaſeth, either immediately by himſelf, or by any man whom he appoints to execute his will. Thus you know might Abraham kill his Son, when God bid him; becauſe though Abraham had not power over his Son's life, yet God had: and this bidding Abraham kill him, is not any thing contrary to this Law, which only forbids man to do it, but doth not forbid God. In the like manner, God having, Gen. 9. 6. commanded the murtherers blood to be ſhed by man, and thereby enſtated the power of the Sword on the Magiſtrate, (who, by whomſoever he ſhould be ſuppoſed to be choſen to be Magiſtrate, by God, or the People, hath that power of the Sword given him immediately from God, the People having not ſingly this power over their own lives, and therefore not able to give it any other) not only permits him and makes it lawful for him thus to puniſh malefactors, but alſo commands and requires him ſo to do, as his Miniſters to execute wrath, Rom. 13. And ſo the word [Thou] in the Commandment muſt here be reſolved to ſignifie the man of himſelf, without Power or Commiſſion from God; Of the power of the ſword.

which yet he that hath it muſt exerciſe juſtly, according to the laws of God and man, or elſe he breaks the Commandment alſo: this Commiſſion being not given to him abſolutely and arbitrarily to uſe as he liſt, but according to defined rules in the Scripture [He that ſheds man's blood, &c.] (which was given not to the Jews, but to all the ſons of Noah) and according to the laws of every nation, which being made by the ſupreme Power (who by the Ordinance of God bears the ſword, Rom. 13.4.) may afterwards be juſtly executed by ſuch ſubordinate Magiſtrates as are ſent by him for the puniſhment of evil doers, and the praiſe of them that do well, 1 Pet. 2. 14.

Of ſelf-murther.

S. May not a man in any caſe kill himſelf?

C. He may not, having no more power over his own life than any other mans; and how gainful ſoever death may ſeem to any, yet is he to ſubmit to God's Providence, and to wait, though it be in the moſt miſerable, painful, wearieſome life, till God pleaſe to give him manumiſſion and deliverance out of it.

S. What is to be ſaid of Sampſon, who killed ſo many by pulling away the pillars, and involved himſelf in the ſame deſtruction?

In Sampſon.

C. He was a Judge in Iſrael; and ſuch in thoſe days (and particularly him) did God ordinarily move by his Spirit to do ſome extraordinary things: and it is to be imagined, that God incited him to do this; or, if he did not, he were not to be excuſed in it.

S. What is to be ſaid of thoſe that rather than they would offer to Idols in the Primitive Church, did kill themſelves, and remain ſtill upon record for Martyrs?

In ſome Primitive Chriſtians.

C. If the ſame could be affirmed of them which was conceived of Sampſon, that God incited them to do this, they ſhould by this be juſtified alſo: but having under the Goſpel no authority to juſtifie ſuch pretence of divine incitation, it will be ſafeſt to affirm, that this was a fault in them, which their love of God, and fear that they ſhould be polluted by Idols, was the cauſe of; and ſo though it might as a frailty be pardoned by God's mercy in Chriſt, yet ſure this killing themſelves was not it that made them Martyrs, but that great love of God, and reſolving againſt idolatrous worſhip, which teſtified it ſelf in that killing themſelves for that cauſe. This it was that made them paſs for Martyrs, and that other incident fault of theirs was not in that caſe thought ſo great, as to deveſt or rob them of that honour.

S. What is meant by that which follows the mention of the old Commandment in this place [whoſoever ſhall kill, ſhall be in danger of the judgment?]

The puniſhment of murther.

C. The word rendred [the judgment] ſignifies a Court of Judicature, or Aſſiſes of Judges, who ſate in the gates of every City, and had cognizance of all greater cauſes, Deut. 16. 18. and particularly of that of Homicides, Exod. 21. 12. Levit. 24. 17. Deut. 19. 11, 12. The number of theſe Judges was ordinarily twenty three: and ſo though it be not annext, Exod. 20. to that Commandment, yet from the body of the Moſaick Law, Chriſt concludes, that againſt killing the ſentence of death by the ſword (for that was the puniſhment peculiar to that Court) was to be expected.

S. But was nothing elſe forbidden in the Law by that Commandment but killing?

C. That was the prime eſpecial matter of it, but by way of reduction other things which are preparatory to this, or offences of this nature, but of a lower degree. As 1. Mutilating or maiming any mans body. 2. Wounding him, which may poſſibly endanger his life. 3. Entring into, or accepting, or offering of Duels, wherein I may kill, or be killed; in which caſe, which ſoever it prove, I am guilty of murther. Nay, if by the equality of fortune both come ſafely off, yet the voluntary putting my ſelf on that hazard, is guilt enough for a whole ages repentance and humiliation; to conſider what had become of me, if without repentance I had thus fallen a murtherer of my ſelf, and my fellow-Chriſtian alſo.

Of Duels.

S. May no injury or affront be accounted ſufficient to provoke me to offer (or challenge to) a Duel?

The utter unlawfulneſs thereof.

C. None imaginable: for that injury whatever it is, if it be a real one, of a conſiderable nature, will be capable of legal ſatisfaction, and that muſt content me; private revenge being wholly prohibited by Chriſt. Or, if it be ſuch that the Law allows no ſatisfaction for, that is an argument that it is light and unconſiderable; and then ſure the life of another man, and the danger of my own, will be an unproportionable ſatisfaction for it.

S. Well, but if another ſend me a challenge, may not I accept of it? eſpecially when I ſhall be defamed for a Coward if I do not?

C. Certainly I may not; the Law againſt killing reſtrains me. And for that excuſe of Honour, 1. It is moſt unreaſonable that the Obedience to God's commands ſhould be an infamous thing. And then 2. if ſo impious a cuſtom hath prevailed, I muſt yet reſolve to part with Reputation, or any thing, rather than with my Obedience to God. Nay 3. you may obſerve that there are two ſorts of Cowardice, much differing the one from another; the one proceeding from fear of being beaten or killed, the ſecond from fear of hurting or killing another. The moſt valiant deſpiſer of dangers may be allowed to have a great deal of the ſecond of theſe, and will certainly have as much of it as he hath either of good Nature or Religion; and that will reſtrain Duels as much as the other. And might this but paſs, as ſure it deſerves, for an honourable and creditable thing, the fear of the other kind of diſcredit would work little upon us. For the world is now generally grown ſo wiſe, that a man may without any diſhonour fear being killed or hurt; and even to run away from ſuch dangers, being very imminent, is creditable enough. The unluckineſs of it is, that the other honeſt kind of fear, that of hurting, or killing another, is become the only infamous thing, the only cowardice that is counted of. For the removing of which, you may obſerve, 4. That in a reaſonable eſtimation of things, he that for the preſerving of his Reputation ſhall venture to diſobey God, is ſure the greateſt Coward in the world; he is more fearful of diſgrace and ignorance in this world, than any pious man is of violating the laws of natural reaſon, of offending God, or incurring the flames of eternal Hell.

S. But what am I to do in caſe a challenge be ſent or offered to me?

C. I am, firſt, in Conſcience toward God, to deny it, whatever the conſequents may be: ſecondly, condly, to offer a full Satisfaction for any either real or ſuppoſed injury done by me, which hath firſt provoked the challenger: thirdly, as prudently as I can, to ſignifie (and by my actions teſtifie the truth of that) that it is not the fear of dying but of killing, not cowardice but duty, which reſtrains me from this forbidden way of ſatisfying his deſire.

S. But what if all this will not ſatisfie him: but he will ſtill thirſt my blood, and accept of no other ſatisfaction, but aſſault me, and force me either to deliver up my own life, or try the uncertainty of a Duel?

C. The utmoſt that in this extreme caſe can be lawful, I ſhall define to you by ſetting before you an example which I have met with. Two perſons of Quality meeting in a publick place, the one paſſed an affront upon the other; the other bare it patiently in that preſence, but after ſent him a Challenge: he ſent him a meek return of acknowledgment of his fault, and readineſs to give him any other ſatisfaction that ſhould be thought on to wipe off the injury: the other will not accept any other: he keeps his Chamber, and for a long time uſeth all care not to meet him in any place which would be ſeaſonable for fighting, and ſtill offers tender of ſatisfaction. At length it falls out that they meet in a place where this could not be avoided. The Challenger ſets upon him: the other draws in his own defence, wounds him lightly; having done ſo, deſires again that this may end the quarrel, or offers any other ſatisfaction: the Challenger will not conſent, aſſaults again, is killed; and ſo the Tragedy concluded with loſs of the chief Actor's life. That the ſurviver did any thing (except the firſt affront) unlawful in all this (all circumſtances conſidered) I cannot affirm; no man being bound to ſpare that other man's life, which he cannot ſpare without parting with his own. I conceive this may ſatisfie the utmoſt of your ſcruples in this matter, if I tell you, that this caſe taken with all the circumſtances is the only one I can give you wherein one of the two Duellers may be Innocent. And you will be apt to deceive your ſelf, if you ſeek to find out other caſes, and think to juſtifie them by this. The utmoſt that can be lawful in this matter.

S. But is there nothing elſe reducible to the prohibition of murther?

C. Yes, fourthly, Oppreſſion of the poor, and not giving relief to thoſe that are in extreme diſtreſs, according to that of the ſon of Sirach, The poor man's bread either that which he hath, or that which in extreme want he craves of thee) is his life, and he that deprives him of it is a murtherer. Fifthly, the beginnings of this ſin in the heart, not yet breaking forth into action, as malice, hatred, meditating of revenge, wiſhing miſchief, curſing, &c. All theſe are reducible to this Commandment, as it was given in the Law. Oppreſſion.

S. Is there any thing yet elſe thus reducible?

C. One thing more there is, and that is War, the conſideration of which is full of great difficulties. For though all unjuſt War be ſimply forbidden under this ſixth Command of the Law, and it be evident enough that ſome wars are unjuſt, as that of Subjects ſeditiouſly raiſed againſt the Supreme power in any State, that of one Prince or Nation invading another for the enlarging of their Dominion or Territories, &c. and though indeed there be but few wars but ſin againſt this Commandment, and in thoſe few that do not, yet there be many actors in them, auxiliaries, ſtipendiaries, &c. which have no lawful calling to take part in that trade of killing men, (for ſo only have they that do it in obedience to their lawful Magiſtrate:) yet ſtill it is apparent that ſome war is lawful; as that which hath had God's expreſs command, and that which is for the repreſſing of Seditions and Rebellions, and betwixt Nation and Nation for the juſt defence of themſelves, and the repelling of violence. But this laſt head of wars being that wherein the greateſt difficulties lie, will not be ſo proper for this place as for another which we ſhall meet with, that of not reſiſting of evil, v. 39. And therefore to that place we ſhall refer it; as alſo that of Private war, or fighting in caſe of aſſault. Of War. Some lawful.

S. I ſhall then count off that debt, and not require payment till that time cometh, but proceed to demand,

What Chriſt hath added to this letter of the Moſaick Law thus explained.

C. It is clearly anſwered in theſe words, [But I ſay unto you, that whoſoever is angry with his brother without a cauſe, &c.] to the end of that verſe. Wherein there be three things forbidden by Chriſt. Firſt, Cauſeleſs or immoderate anger, going no farther than the Breaſt. Secondly, The breaking out of this anger into the Tongue, but ſomewhat moderately: [Whoſoever ſhall ſay, Racha.] Thirdly, A more violent railing, or aſſaulting him with that ſword of the tongue that anger hath unſheathed: [Whoſoever ſhall ſay, Thou Fool.] Of cauſleſs or immoderate anger.

S. What do you mean by the firſt of theſe?

C. That Anger which is either without any, or upon light cauſe, or, being upon any the juſteſt and weightieſt cauſe, exceeds the degree and proportion due to it: and this again in either kind aggravated by the duration and continuance of it. And the Greek word here uſed is a denotation of every of theſe. In the Breaſt.

S. For the underſtanding of this, I deſire firſt to know, whether any anger be juſt or no in reſpect of the cauſe; and if ſo, what?

C. Saint Paul's advice of being angry and not ſinning, though it refer there peculiarly to the not continuing or laſting of wrath, [Let not the Sun go down on thy wrath] doth yet imply, that ſome wrath may be lawful in reſpect of the cauſe; for otherwiſe, the Non-continuance of it would not juſtifie it from ſin. The moſt juſtifiable cauſes of Anger are, 1. When it proceeds from ſorrow that God is provoked; anger conceived for God's ſake, Mark 3. 5. without reflexion on our ſelves. 2. When it is conceived for vertue's ſake, to ſee that neglected, deſpiſed, and the rules of it violated. 3. When for other men's ſake; ſtill without reflexion on our ſelves or any intereſt of ours. And each of theſe not in light trivial matters neither, but in matters of weight: and ſo the cauſleſs anger is that which ariſes upon ſlight, or no cauſes, or thoſe wherein our own intereſts are concerned: which though they may be cauſes, are not juſtifiable cauſes of anger in us. Cauſes of anger.

S. Having this direction from you to underſtand cauſeleſs anger, I ſhall eaſily anſwer my ſelf for the Immoderate. other two circumstances which make it fit for Christ to prohibit it: As first, When it is immoderate and exceeds the degree and proportion due to it, which I confess may be done even when the cause is just; and se-

In danger of judgment. repeated, and again applyed to this causeless anger, as before to killing, [shall be in danger of the judgment?] Sure it is not that he thinks it fit that every Christian that thus offends should be by the Magistrate put to death, as even now you interpreted those words.

C. The meaning is, that the wrathful man in another world shall be subject to punishment as the murtherer is here: i. e. that wrathfulness being so contrary to that meekness, patience, humility, re-

Prov. 21. 24. quired now by Christ, and being as Solomon intimates an effect of pride and haughtiness, is to be accounted of as an unchristian sin; which unless it be mortified here by the grace of Christ, will cost us dear in another world; though not so dear as the second and third mentioned in this verse. The punishment of that Court of Judicature being the sword or beheading; which though it be heavy enough, is not yet so great as the two other which are afternamed.

S. This of causless anger being thus clearly forbidden by Christ, and yet that that even good Christians are so subject to fall into; what means will you direct me to, to mortifie or subdue it?

Means to subdue anger. C. First, a Conviction of the danger and sin of it; not flattering our selves that either it is no sin, or such as with our ordinary frailties shall have its pardon of course. But 1. such as lieth here under an heavy penalty particularly denounced against it by Christ. And 2. that which is most directly opposite to those graces of humility, meekness, patience, peaceableness, bearing with one another, and forgiving one another, &c. which is required most strictly by Christ of his Disciples, i. e. of all Christian followers of him. Secondly, a consideration of the unreasonableness of that sin, which is, 1. very unjust, being causless or immoderate; 2. very much against what I would have done to me either by my brother, (it being a very painful, uneasie thing to be under another's wrath, especially when ill words or blows are joined with it, and that which no body would be under, if he could help it) or by God himself (whom I so oft displease, and would be sorry if he should be wroth with me, even when justly he might.) Thirdly, the labouring against that bitter root of pride in my heart, of which this is so necessary and infallible an attendant. Fourthly, the reflexion upon my self, if it were possible in time of that passion, or else immediately after, when I come to my self again out of that drunkenness of soul, and considering how ill-favor'd a hateful thing it is, how like a Tiger, a Bear, or any the furiousest Beast, rather than a man, it makes me; what a deforming of me it is, putting me out of all that posture of civility that in time of sobriety I chuse to appear in; yea, and what a painful agony it was when I was under it. Fifthly, the considering how at such time we are out of our own power, and so apt to fall into those oaths, acts of fury, indiscretions, revealing of secrets, disadvantageous expressions, &c. in a few such minutes, which a whole age of repentance will not repair again. Sixthly, a sober vow or resolution never to permit my self to fall into so inconvenient and dangerous a sin; that when I find it a coming upon me, I may restrain it by remembring that this was it that I thought fit to vow against. Seventhly, a watching over my self continually, that I be not taken unawares. Eightly, abstaining carefully from the least indulgence to any beginnings of it; it being easier to keep from any first degree of it, than yielding to that, to restrain the farther and higher degrees. Ninthly, avoiding temptations and provocations as much as I can, and so the company of those who are subject to that sin, or the employments and conversations which encline me to it. Tenthly, labouring with God in prayer for grace to mortifie this in me. Eleventhly, diverting (in time of temptation) with some particular repeated ejaculations to God to suppress at that time any such exorbitant affection in me. Many other conducible means you will be able to suggest to your self.

S. What is the second thing here forbidden?

In the tongue, saying Racha. * Thus Minerva in Homer. Il. a. when she forbids Achilles striking Agamemnon. (ἀλλ' ἄγε λῆγ' ἔριδος, μηδὲ ξίφεϊ φῶο ἔλκεο χερεὶ) gives him leave to reproach him and give him contumelious words: Ἀλλ' ἤτοι ἔπεσιν μὲν ὀνείδισον. Which shews the pitch of Christ's divine precepts here, above that of the Heathen Goddess.

C. Saying to his brother, Racha,] i. e. when anger breaks into * contumelious speeches; such are the calling him empty, despicable, witless fellow; for the word Racha is an Hebrew word, and signifies vain or empty. This, though not the highest kind of contumely, is yet greater than the former, and therefore is here expresst by the punishment apportioned to it, greater than the former, as much as stoning is a sorer death than beheading; for that is the meaning of [he shall be in danger of the council:] the Council signifying the Sanhedrin, or the supreme and great Senate, where the ordinary punishment was stoning. And so the meaning is, this is a greater sin, and so to expect a greater punishment than the former.

S. What is the third thing forbidden here?

Thou Fool. C. Saying, Thou Fool] i. e. when wrath breaks out into most virulent railings, all sorts of which are here intimated by this one word; and this being a greater sin or aggravation of causless anger than the former, is here described by the third kind of punishment: Which though it were not in any legal Court of Judicature, was yet well enough known among the Jews: not under the name of Hell fire, (as we render it by a mistake, because those torments in Hell are in other places described by Hell fire. גי הנם these) but of the valley of Hinnom. The meaning of which is this; Without the City of Jerusalem, in the valley of Hinnom, there was a place where the Jews sometime, in imitation of the Phœnicians, used a most cruel, barbarous kind of rites, burnt children alive, putting them in hollow brazen vessels, and so by little and little scalding them to death; where because the children could not chuse but howl hideously, they had Timbrels perpetually sounding to drown that cry, and therefore it was

תפתי called Tophet, (from a word signifying Timbrels) and is described by the Prophets of the Old Testa-

Isai. 30. 33. ment. This punishment taking denomination from the place, that valley of Hinnom, is called here in Greek by a word little differing in sound from the Hebrew, and that word in the New Testament, γέεννα. and ordinarily in sacred Writers, Greek and Latin, yea, in the ancient Hebrew writings, is set to גי הנם signifie Hell fire; because this was the best image or expression of those torments conceived there, that their knowledge or experience could represent to them. And so is here fitly made use of to express the greateſt ſin in this kind, by the greateſt puniſhment that they could underſtand. For indeed above the Sword and Stoning, there was no puniſhment in uſe in the Jewiſh Courts of Judicature, (the burning among them being not that which is in uſe among us ſometimes, of burning alive, but the thruſting of an Iron red hot into their bowels, which made a quick diſpatch of them) and therefore to aſcend to the deſcription of a third ſuperlative degree of ſin, our Saviour thinks fit to uſe that mention of the puniſhments in the valley of Hinnom.

S. You have by this plenteous diſcourſe on this word prevented my doubt, which would have been, whether the laſt only of theſe ſins, and not the two former, make a Chriſtian liable to Hell fire: for now I perceive the thing meant by that word is that torture in the valley of Hinnom. And that uſed to expreſs a third greater degree of puniſhment in another world anſwerable to that third degree of ſin; and that nothing elſe is to be collected from it.

I ſhall only trouble you with one ſcruple in this matter, and that is, whether all kind of calling Racha, or Fool, i. e. all contumelious ſpeaking, of a greater or leſſer degree, be ſuch a ſin, puniſhable in a Chriſtian in another world? Of contumelious ſpeaking.

C. I ſhall anſwer you, 1. By interpoſing one Caution obſervable in theſe words: It is not all uſing of thoſe or the like words which here is ſet down under that ſad Character, but that which is the effect and improvement of cauſleſs immoderate anger; for you ſee they are here ſet as higher degrees of that. And therefore ſecondly, thoſe ſpeeches that proceed from any thing elſe, particularly when they are ſpoken by thoſe to whom the Office and duty of Chaſtiſing others belongs, as Maſters, Teachers, Superiours, in any kind, (nay, perhaps equals too, who in Charity are obliged to reprove their Neighbour, and not to ſuffer ſin on him) and by them are firſt, done to that purpoſe, that they may by theſe Goads wake them out of a lethargy of ſin; and again, ſecondly, are done ſeaſonably, ſo as they are in prudence moſt likely to work a good effect; and thirdly, upon great and weighty cauſes; and fourthly, without ſeeking any thing to themſelves, either the venting of inordinate Paſſion, or the ambition and vanity of ſeeming ſeverer than others, or ſo much better than thoſe whom they thus reproach; theſe all this while are not ſubject to this cenſure or danger. And of this nature you may ſee in the New Teſtament theſe ſeverals, Jam. 2. 20. O vain man, i. e. literally Racha: Matth. 23. 17. Ye fools and blind, ſpoken by Chriſt; and again, Verſe 19. and Luke 24. 25. Ye fools, &c. and Gal. 3. 1. O fooliſh Galatians; and Verſ. 3. Are ye ſo fooliſh? Which is directly the other expreſſion [Thou fool] which now you will ſee and diſcern eaſily (if you conſider the affection of the Speakers) to be out of Love, not cauſleſs inordinate Paſſion, and ſo not liable to the cenſure in this Text. But then thirdly, there is little doubt but that all Detraction, Cenſoriouſneſs, Backbiting, Whiſpering, (that ſo ordinary entertainment of the world to buſie our ſelves when we meet together, in ſpeaking all the evil we know, or perhaps know not, of other men) is a very great ſin here condemned by our Saviour, and upon his Advertiſement timely to be turned out of our Communication, as being moſt conſtantly againſt the Rule of doing as I would be done to; no man living being pleaſed to be ſo uſed as the Detractor uſeth others.

S. I beſeech God to lay this to my heart, that by his aſſiſtance I may be inabled to ſuppreſs and mortifie this inordinate paſſion, that my nature hath ſuch inclinations unto: to that end, to plant that Meekneſs, and Patience, and Humility, and Charity in my heart, that may turn out this unruly creature; to arm me with that continual vigilance over my ſelf, that it may not ſteal upon me unawares; but eſpecially to give me that power over my tongue, that I may not fall into that greater condemnation.

But I ſee you have not yet done with this Theme; for before our Saviour proceeds to any other Commandment, I perceive he buildeth ſomewhat elſe on this foundation in the four next Verſes, [Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the Altar, &c.] Be pleaſed then to tell me, 1. How that belongs to this matter; and 2. What is the duty there preſcribed?

C. For the dependence of that on the former, or how it belongs to it, you will eaſily diſcern, if you remember that old ſaying, That * Repentance is the only plank to reſcue him that is caſt away in the ſhipwrack. Our Saviour had mentioned the danger of raſh anger and contumelies, &c. And becauſe through humane infirmity he ſuppoſes it poſſible that Diſciples or Chriſtians may thus miſcarry, he therefore adds the neceſſity of immediate Repentance and ſatisfaction after it.

* Pœnitentia unica eſt poſt naufragium tabula. Tert.

S. What is the duty there preſcribed?

C. It is this. 1. Being reconciled with the Brother, Verſ. 24. and agreeing with the adverſary, Verſ. 25. i. e. uſing all means to make my peace with him whom I have thus injured. For the word [be reconciled] ſignifies not here [to be pacified towards him] for he is not here ſuppoſed to have injured thee, for if he had, the anger would not be cauſleſs: but [to pacifie him] to regain his favour, (and thus the word is uſed in the Scripture-dialect in other places) confeſſing my raſh anger and intemperate language, and offering any way of ſatisfaction, that he may be moved to forgive me, and be reconciled to me; which till he do, I am his Debtor, in his danger to attach me, as it were, to bring me before the Judge, and he to deliver me to the Baily or Sergeant, and he to caſt me into priſon, &c. i. e. This ſin of mine unretracted by Repentance will lie very heavy upon my ſcore; and without Satisfaction to the injured perſon, will not be capable of mercy or pardon from Chriſt: Which danger is ſet to enforce the duty. The ſecond part of the duty is, that the making this our Peace is to be preferred before many other things, which paſs for more ſpecious works among us; as particularly before voluntary Oblations, which are here meant by the gift brought to the Altar, ſuch as thoſe of which the Law is given, Lev. 1. 2. Not that the performance of this duty is to be preferred (being a duty to my Neighbour) before Piety, or the duties of true Religion toward God; but before the obſervation of outward worſhip, ſacrifices, oblations, &c. Mercy before ſacrifice, Matth. 9. 13. and 12. 7. And that thoſe offerings that are brought to God with a heart full of wrath, and hatred, will never be acceptable to him. Our Prayer, expreſt 1 Tim. 2. 8. by [lifting up of holy and clean hands] muſt be without wrath; or elſe (like the Faſt, Iſai. 58. 4. [Ye faſt for ſtrife and for debate] and the long prayers, Iſai. 1. [when the hands were full of blood]) it will be but a vain oblation in God's account, like Cain's, when he reſolved to kill his Brother. Of Reconciliation. καταλλάγηθι.

S. Is there any thing elſe you will commend to me out of theſe words, before we part with them?

Of the time of calling our selves to account for trespasses.

C. Yes, 1. That the time immediate before the performing of any holy duty, of Prayer, of Oblation, of Fasting, of receiving the Sacrament, &c. is the fittest and propereſt time to call our selves to account for all the trespasses and injuries we are guilty of toward God and men, [If thou bring thy gift, and there remembrest, Ver. 23.] That, it seems, is a season of remembring. 2. That though the not having made my peace with those whom I have offended make me unfit for any such Christian performance, (and so require me to defer that till this be done) yet can it not give me any excuse to leave that Christian performance undone, but rather hasten my performance of the other, that I may perform this also. He that is not yet reconciled, must not carry away his gift, but leave it at the altar, Vers. 24. and go and be reconciled, and then come back, and offer his gift. He that is not in Charity (or the like) and so unfit to receive the Sacrament, must not think it fit or lawful for him to omit or neglect that Receiving, on that pretence, (or if he do, it will be a double guilt) but must hasten to recover himself to such a Capacity, that he may with clean hands and heart thus come to God's Table, whensoever he is thus called to it. 3. That a Penitent reconciled sinner may have as good confidence in his approaches to God, as any, [Then come, Verse 24.] 4. That the putting off or deferring of such businesses as these of Reconciliation, satisfaction, &c.) first, is very dangerous; and secondly, the danger of it past reversing, when it cometh upon us. And 5. that there is no way to prevent this, but in time of life and health, quickly, instantly to do it, the next hour may possibly be too late. Agree quickly while thou art in the way. Vers. 25. 6. That the punishment that expects such sinners is endless, indeterminable: the [till thou hast paid] Vers. 26. is not a limitation of time, after which thou shalt come out, (any more than [she had no children till she died] is a mark or intimation of her having children after death) but a proposal of a sad payment which would never be finished and discharged; the paying of it would be a doing for ever.

S. I thank you for these supernumerary Meditations. I hope they shall not be cast away upon me.

Sect. VI. Of Adultery.

I shall detain you no longer here, but call upon you to proceed to the next Period, which I see to begin in like manner with a Commandment of the old Law, Thou shalt not commit Adultery; and the same introduction to it which was to the former, Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time] which, by what I before learnt of you, I conclude should be [to them of old time] or to the ancient Jews, Exod. 20. 14. I shall propose no more scruples in this matter, but only crave your Directions for the main, what you conceive forbidden here in that old Commandment.

The severals forbidden under that head.

[a] Θυμός.
μοιχεία, πορνία.

C. As in the former, God by Moses restrained all the accursed issues of [a] one kind of sensuality, that of anger; so in this place of the [b] other, this of lust. And naming the chief breach of this kind, that of Adultery, i. e. lying carnally with a married woman, he forbids also all other acts of uncleanness which are not conjugal. Thus have some of the Jews themselves interpreted the word which is used in the Decalogue, and so in the Scripture and good Authors, and in common use, Adultery and Fornication are taken promiscuously to signifie all manner of uncleanness, of what kind, or in what manner soever committed: Of which though some kinds seem to have been permitted the Jews, yet this Permission is not to be conceived to extend any farther than the benefit of legal impunity, (not that they were lawful or without turpitude.) And, that some other kinds of them which tended not to the multiplying of that people (as Polygamy did) were by their Law severely punished, you shall see Deut. 22. but more severely by God himself, as Numb. 25. So that under the letter of that old Commandment are contained not only the known sins of Adultery and Fornication, but all other kinds of filthiness, mentioned, Rom. 1. 24, 26, 27, 29. where there are four words that seem to contain all sorts of it under them; [c] Fornication, [d] Villany, [e] Immoderate desire, [f] Naughtiness: and so again, 2 Cor. 12. 21. Uncleanness, fornication, lasciviousness; and Gal. 5. 19. Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, and idolatry. Which last word in that and other places seems a word meant on purpose to contain all such kind of unclean sins under it, because they were so ordinary in the idolatrous mysteries of the Heathens; most of the rites and secrets of their Religion being the practice of these filthy sins. So Eph. 4. 19. and 5. 3. In both which places, as also before Rom. 1. 29. and Col. 3. 5. the word there rendred [g] Covetousness in the three latter, and greediness in the first, signifies that irregular desire, and so those Heathenish sins which (here also Col. 3. 5.) are called [h] idolatry. I would not give you any more particular account of these sins, which are not to be named, but desire God to fortifie you with all care and vigilance against them, grounded in a sense and hatred and detestation of them, as of the greatest reproach to your nature, grievance to the Spirit of God, defamation of Christianity, (where-ever they are to be found) and as sins of such a nature, that as they have had the fiercest of God's judgments revealed against them, (many Cities and Nations remarkably destroyed for them) so when they are once in any kind indulged to, they are apt to break out into all baseness and vileness, and are therefore called by St. Peter, abominable idolatry, 1 Pet. 4. 3.

S. The good Lord of all purity, by the power of his sanctifying grace, preserve me from all such taints, to be a Temple of the Holy Ghost. But what else is reducible to this Commandment of the Law?

Reducible to it.

C. 1. All desires of these sins consented to, although they break not out into Act. 2. All morose thoughts, i. e. delaying, dwelling or insisting on such thoughts, phansying of such unclean matters with delectation. 3. The feeding my lust with luxurious diet, inflaming Wines, &c. or other such fewel and accentives of it, &c.

S. What now hath Christ added to this old Prohibition?

Of looking on a woman to lust.

C. You have it in these words, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

S. What is the meaning of that?

[i] Adultera mens est,—Intus adulter erit, Ovid.

C. That he that so looks, &c. First, signifies his [i] heart to be adulterous, though himself be not, through want of opportunity, &c. Secondly, that he shall by Christ be censurable as the adulterer under the Law.

S. But what is the full importance of looking on a woman to lust?

C. It is not only [to look to that end that I may lust] (as some are willing to interpret here, by this means making looking to be sinful only in order to that end (that lusting) without designing of which they conceive the looking it self will be no fault) but either [to look so long till I lust] or else

[to satisfie my lust (though not with the yielding to the corporal pollution, yet) so far as to feed my eye, to gaze, to dwell on the beauty of other women.] As in the Law, the fastning the eyes on the Idol, considering the beauty of it, is, saith Maimonides, forbidden, Levit. 19. 4. and not only the worship of it. I shall give it you in the language of the Fathers who have thus interpreted it. [k] He that stands and looks earnestly; Theoph. He that makes it a business to look earnestly upon gallant bodies and beautiful faces, that hunts after them, and feeds his mind with the spectacle, that nails his eyes to handsome faces; Saint Chrysost. And again, Not he that desires that he may commit folly, but looks that he may desire. And again, God hath given thee eyes, that seeing the creature, thou maist glorifie him and admire him. And the use of employing them any other ways than thus, is an abuse. An example of this we have in the two wicked Elders, Susan. vers. 32. who being denied the farther enjoying of their lusts, command to uncover her face, that they may be filled with her beauty. And there is mention of the like in another Apocryphal Author, 1 Esdr. 4. 19. gape, and even with open mouth fix their eyes fast on her; and Ecclus. 9. 5. and 8. Gaze not on a maid, the Greeks read it, [l] Look not on her, as if thou wert a learning her, lest thou be ensnared by her complexion, or colour, or beauty in her cheeks; for so I suppose the [m] right reading imports. So again, Ecclus. 41. 21, 22. gazing upon (the Greek signifies [n] contemplation) another man's wife, and a curious earnest beholding his maid; for so the word there rendred [being [o] overbusie with her] seems rather to signifie, and is used by the Fathers to expresse the very thing we now speak of: and so it is 1 Tim. 5. 13. and Ecclus. 42. 12. [p] Look not earnestly on any man for beauty. As therefore there was an [q] immoderation and fault in anger, so in looking. If (saith Chrysostom) thou wilt look and be delighted, look upon thine own wife, and love her continually; but if thou lookest after [r] other beauties, thou dost both wrong her (letting thy eyes rove other where) and thou wrongest her whom thou lookest on, medling with her illegally; for thou touchest her not with thy hand, yet with thy eyes thou dost. To this St. Peter refers, 2 Pet. 2. 14. Eyes full of adultery; there being an adulterous look as well as an adulterous embrace; the former forbidden by Christ as well as the latter by Moses.

[k] ὁ βλέπων, or, as Chrys. reads it, ὁ ἐμβλέπων γυναῖκα.

[m] ἐμμανῶς not σπιλιμίως.

[p] ἐρωτικοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς μὴ βλέπε τὸ κάλλος περιεργάζου, Niceph. Basil. Orat. β. of one that was in love with her father, and durst not let it be known, of whom he saith, δεῖ ψυχῆς ἐθαλαμεύσαι τὸν ἔρωτα, she bedded her love in her heart, it being very dangerous to let it out: the very thing which is called the committing adultery in the heart. [q] πικῶ. [r] ἀλλότριον κάλλος. Eccl. 9. 8. so v. 9. μὴ καθίσῃς παρὰ γυναικὶ μὴ κάθου σύνολον, Sit not at all with a woman that hath an husband.

S. I had not thought this prohibition of Christ had been so severe, but seeing it is the opinion of the ancient Fathers, that the words are thus to be interpreted, and that the feeding of the eye, yielding to satisfie that with unlawful objects, (the beauty of any but our own wives) and the stirring up of fire within (which is apt to be kindled by that means) is here forbidden, I shall no longer doubt of it, but resolve (and with Job make a Covenant with my eyes) that I will not behold a maid, i. e. please my self with the contemplation of her beauty! much less indulge my self the liberty of any farther degrees of this kind, any of those dalliances that are so ordinary among men or women, and are either effects of lusts already inflamed, or else provokers and inflamers of it: and the Lord give me grace to make good this resolution. But then, if it be a fault thus to behold, will it not be so also in the woman that is thus beheld, (as the patient in adultery sins as well as the agent) especially if she take as great pleasure in that, and deck and set her self out to that end that she may be thus looke on?

C. S. Chrysostom answers that Question also, That it is a great fault, and a kind of Adultery in that woman that thus not only exposes and prostitutes her self to the eyes of men, but so dresses and sets her self out, and calls to her the eyes of all men; if she strike not, wound not others, she shall yet be punished, for she hath mixt the potion; prepared the poison, though she hath not given the cup to drink: yes, and hath done that too, though none be found that will drink of it. It seems, a piece of Christian chastity there is required of women in this kind, that is not generally thought of.

S. I shall trouble you no longer with this matter, only I desire to know, what the two other verses in this period, of the eye and hand offending thee, have to do in this place. Of the eye and hand offending.

C. They are the preventing of an objection, after this manner: Upon the giving of that severe prohibition, men will be apt to object, O, but it is hard not to love that which is beautiful, and not to behold what is loved. To this foreseen objection he answers before-hand; It is hard and unpleasant indeed, but more unpleasant sure to be a frying in Hell. It were better to pluck the very eye out of the head, to cut off the hand, even that which were most useful and honourable, than to be cast into Hell. Much more when that is not required, to cut off, or pull out those members, but only to turn away the eye from the alluring object, to keep the hand from immodest touches and dalliances: Nay, (saith Chrysostom) This is a most milde and soft precept; it would have been much more hard, if he had given command to converse with, and look curiously on women, and then to abstain from farther commissions of uncleanness with them.

S. But, what hath the hand to do with that business of looking?

C. The mention of it is by way of analogy or reduction to that former precept, and doth imply that that former prohibition of looking is to be extended to all other things of the like nature; all libidinous touches, &c. And whosoever abstains from the grosser act, and yet indulgeth himself such pleasures as these with any but his own wife, sins also against this Law of Christ.

S. Shall we now hasten to the third Law here mentioned? It is about Divorce. What was the state of this business under the Law? Sect. VII. Of Divorce.

C. The Ten Commandments mention nothing of it, and therefore you see the præmial form is changed; not as before [ye have heard that it hath been said to them of old] (the character of the Commandments) but only, [It hath been said:] which notes that there is somewhat in Moses's writings about it, though not in the Ten Commandments. And what that is, you will see, Deut. 24. 1. to the fifth, to this purpose, That he that hath married a wife, and likes her not for some uncleanness which he hath found in her, he is permitted to give her a bill of divorce, and send her out of his house; and in that case she may marry again: and though her second husband do so too, or die; yet the former husband is not permitted to take her again for his wife. To which that Christ referred, and not to any interpretation of the Pharisees, appeareth, Matth. 19. and Mark 10. where the Pharisees cite Moses for a testimony to authorize their opinion; and Christ denies not that, but tells them, that for the hardness The permission under Moses.

of their heart it was given them, and reduces them to the first institution of marriage, as that which though it brought not with it then the obligation of a command, yet shewed what was always best, and most acceptable to God; which now Christ by his New Law commands distinctly, though it were not so required of the Jews before in that more imperfect state of obedience, because of the hardness of their hearts, i. e. because they were such an unruly stubborn people, that if they should have been inhibited or restrained from putting away a wife which they liked not, they would have been likely to have killed those hated wives, that so they might have married again: (which is intimated in that speech by way of reply to Christ's Law, Matth. 19. 10. where the very Disciples of Christ express their opinion, that it were better never to marry at all, than thus to be bound to a wife; and Christ answers them, not by denying such inconvenience possibly to follow, but by asserting the necessity of marriage to some men, which must make them content to bear with some inconveniences, Vers. 11.) So again Mark 10. 4, 5. though that which is said by Moses in point of divorce be called a precept, Vers. 5. yet it is but a sufferance, Vers. 4. i. e. a precept of permission, or not holding them up to that high pitch of the first institution of marriage: not a commanding, or so much as advising them to put away their wives (in such other cases besides that of fornication) not indeed wholly freeing the practice from some turpitude; but yet a tolerating or permitting, or not forbidding them to do so for some time, till the season of more perfect commands should come; and withal a commanding, that when a Jew (contrary to the first institution of marriage, and to that which was always best) shall put away his wife, or refuse to live with her, he shall then give her a bill of divorcement in her hand, which was done in favour to the hated wife, who was free to marry another in this case. This is the brief state of this matter under the Old Testament, nothing in the whole business precept, but only permission, or toleration of such divorces for that time of their more imperfect state, somewhat agreeable also to the peculiarity of Gods œconomy among that people; for the multiplying of whom it is certain that polygamy, or the having more wives than one, was allowed them by God, and practised by the holy men of that Nation, and that allowance so continued till the coming of Christ, who, it seems here, reduced all to the first institution of marriage, that the man and the wife shall be one flesh, Matth. 19. 5. Under which (it seems by St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. 2, 3, 4.) is contained and intimated the womans having power of the husband's body, as before the man had over the womans. This design of multiplying this people exceedingly might perhaps have some influence on the matter of divorces also, because, supposing the husband to have such a vehement dislike to the wife, that he would not be brought to live conjugally with her, it would from thence follow, through the prohibition of the womans marrying more husbands (which was never permitted any, though the husband might marry more wives, and so would be the more likely to abstain from the loathed wife, when he might have others freely) it would, I say, follow from hence, That unless it were lawful for the husband to give a bill of divorce in this case, the hated wife would be kept from ever having of children by any as long as that husband lived: Whereupon it is commanded that in this case, when the husband doth thus vehemently dislike the wife, and cannot or will not bring himself to love or live conjugally with her, he shall give her a bill of divorce; which law indeed is particularly in favour of the unfortunate wife, and gives her power to be married to any other except to that former husband, Deut. 24. 4. (and to the Priest, Levit. 21. 7.) and so is thus far in order to that great end of multiplying that people, which would much be hindred, if every hated wife should be denied this liberty to marry again, and propagate by some other man; which had it not been for that Law, she might not have done, but must in this case have remained childless as long as that unkind husband lived: This, I say, makes this Law of permitting divorces, and marriages after such divorces, seem to be given by Moses in order to multiplying or propagation. And accordingly is that of Mal. 2. 16. to be rendred, If thou hatest her, put her away: In case of vehement dislike, dismis her by bill of divorce, that so she may marry some other that will be more kind to her.

Retrenched by Christ.

S. What doth Christ now in his new Law, in this matter of divorce?

C. He repealeth that whole Commandment, Deut. 24. 1. and imposeth a stricter yoke on his Disciples. For coming now to give more grace than the Law brought with it to the Jews, he thinks not fit to yield so much to any considerations, particularly to the hardness of mens hearts, as to allow Christians that liberty, so contrary to the first institution of wedlock, but raiseth them higher to that pitch, which, when it was not commanded, was yet most excellent, and principally approved by God and all good men, and now becomes necessary by being commanded by him. And therefore now he clearly affirms of all such divorces, that whosoever thus puts away his wife, as the Jews frequently did, causeth her to commit adultery, and he that marrieth her committeth adultery; and if after such divorcement he himself marry again, he committeth adultery, and is in that respect sadly liable, Matth. 19. 3. That is, in brief, that the bond of wedlock now under Christ is so indissoluble, that it is not the husbands dislikes which can excuse him for putting away his wife, nor his giving her a bill of divorce which can make it lawful for her to marry any other, nor for any other to marry her, who is, for all this bill, still indissolubly another man's wife.

Christ's Law concerning divorces.

S. But what, is no kind of Divorce now lawful under Christ?

C. Yes clearly, that which is here named, in case of fornication, i. e. If the wife prove false to the husbands bed, and take in any other man, it will then be lawful by Christs Law for the husband to give her a Bill of divorce, i. e. legally to sue it out, and so put her away. The reason being because of the great inconveniences and mischiefs that such falseness brings into the family; children of anothers body to inherit with (or perhaps before) his own, &c. Which sort of reasons it is, together with the dominion of the husband over the wife, that this matter of divorce (now under Christ) is chiefly built on, (and not only, as might be imagined, that of the conjugal contract; for that being mutual, would as well make it lawful for the wife to put away the husband, which is no where permitted in the Old or New Testament) this liberty being peculiar to the husband against the wife, and not common to the wife against her husband; because, I say, those family-inconveniences do not follow the falseness of the husband as they do that of the wife; and because the wife hath

by

by promise of obedience made her self a subject, and owned him as Lord, and so hath none of that authority over him (an act of which putting away seemeth to be) which he by being Lord hath over her.

S. Is there no other cause of divorce now pleadable or justifiable among Christians, but that in case of Fornication?

C. I cannot define any, because Christ hath named no other.

S. But methinks there is a place in St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. 12. from whence I might conclude that Christ hath named some other. For when Saint Paul saith that the brother, i. e. believer, having an unbelieving, i. e. heathen, wife, if she be willing to live with him, he must not put her away, he prefaceth it in this manner, To the rest speak I, not the Lord. Whence I infer that in Saint Paul's opinion Christ had not then said that unbelief was not a lawful cause of Divorce, and consequently I conclude that Christ had left place for some other cause beside fornication: and therefore I should ghess that the naming of fornication there was not exclusive to all other causes, but only to those that were inferiour to it, (and that would make it contrary enough to what was by Moses permitted, to wit, [for every cause] Matth. 19. 13.) and that if there should be found any other cause as great as that, it might be conceived, comprehended under that example (named) of fornication: and then I shall be bold to interpose my opinion, that sure, if the wife should attempt to poison or otherwise take away the life of the husband, this would be as insupportable an injury as adultery, and so as fit a cause of a divorce as that. 1 Cor. 7. 12.

C. You have proposed an objection of some difficulty. I must apply answer to it, by dividing it into parts, and making my returns severally. 1. That in that place, 1 Cor. 7. if the words [speak I, not the Lord] did belong to the words immediately following, to wit, those which you name, and if those were to be understood of Divorce, your collection from thence would be reasonable. But I conceive that they belong not to the case of Divorce, but of malicious desertion, either more generally, when one will not live with the other; and then it may be truly affirmed, that Christ spake not of that particular, and that the Apostle doth strictly forbid such desertions: or else that they belong to the 15. verse precisely, and so to that particular case of Desertion, when the unbeliever will not live with the believer, the Heathen particularly with the Christian; and then Saint Paul's determination is, That upon her or his departure, the believer, man or woman, shall not be in bondage, (i. e. so far inslaved, or subjected, that he or she should do acts prejudicial to their Religion, for that end that she may continue with her husband, or he with his wife) and of this it may also truly be said, that Christ had said nothing; and so [this speak I, not the Lord.] If either of these interpretations be acknowledged, then the ground of the whole Objection is taken away. And if it be objected again, that by that liberty of Saint Paul's, the woman-believer, being put away by the Infidel-husband, is permitted to live continually from him, which seems contrary to Christ's saying, That he that putteth her away, except in case of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery, (for if by that absence from him she be caused to commit Adultery, how can it be lawful for her to live from him?) To this I answer also, 1. That if all this were granted, it would yet be nothing to the present purpose: for it would conclude only against Saint Paul's judgment that he did contrary to Christ's in giving this liberty; not that Christ had said this, which Saint Paul said he had not said, which is the only thing that this objection was designed to prove. But then 2. that the case here spoken of by Saint Paul, being, as was said, the case of malicious desertion, differs from that other of Divorce for other causes besides Fornication. 3. Though that which Saint Paul here saith, be somewhat which Christ hath not said before, and so an example of (I, not the Lord] yet it is not opposite or contrary to what Christ had said: for though Christ say, that he that divorces (not for Fornication) causeth his wife to commit adultery; yet sure his meaning is only, that, as much as in him lies, he causeth her, by putting her to some ill exigents, which may perhaps tempt her to harlotry, but not that he forceth her to this infallibly, or irresistibly; for sure it is possible one who is so divorced may live chaste, yea, and single ever after. And that this is the meaning of that phrase, [causeth her to commit adultery] you may be assured by this, that Christ mentions it only as an aggravation of the man's fault, who by this puts her on that hazard, of which he is nowhit less guilty, though she resists that temptation, and escape that danger. But then still this is a distinct case from that of the Infidels deserting of his believing wife, for that being Saint Paul's case only, was not spoken to by Christ. Thus you see the place to the Corinthians cleared: I shall only (by the way) add, that v. 12. the understanding those words [to the rest] as if they were opposed to the [married] ver. 20. (as though he spake now to the rest, i. e. those that are unmarried) is a mistake, caused either by not marking that in the prohibition of Christ, mentioned immediately before, the exception of Adultery must be supposed (for that being supposed, the sence will run thus, But to the rest, i. e. to those married persons to whom Christ spake not particularly, i. e. to the married that divorce not for Adultery, but maliciously desert one the other) or else perhaps by the sound of the Greek word, which would then be better rendred, for the rest, or [to the rest] referring not to persons, but things, [concerning the rest, &c.]

Having answered now the first part of your Objection, I proceed to the second, and answer, That there were again some reason in the inference, if first Saint Paul had thus affirmed the former, (which we have shewed he did not,) and secondly, if there could be produced any cause so justifiable for Divorce as Fornication, (in the latitude of the signification) or Adultery is. But of this I am perswaded that there can none be produced, because in all considerations none is so great and irreparable an injury as this, none that Repentance can so little set right again, (the possibility of which is one great reason why other injuries are not thought fit by Christ to be matter of Divorce.) For though it be possible some other sins may be as great or greater than Adultery, (as Idolatry, Heathenism, for example) yet because this is not so contrary to and destructive of the Conjugal state, therefore it is not thought fit by St. Paul to cause Divorce, (nor, as appears, by Christ neither:) though to cause damnation (which is far greater punishment than Divorce) it be abundantly sufficient. As for the having attempted the life of the Husband, which leads me to answer the last part of the Objection) I shall make no doubt to say, This is not equal to the having committed Adultery. For first, it appears that though it was attempted, yet it was not acted, (for if it had, that would have made a real real Divorce indeed) and the attempt, 1. is not so punishable as the act; and 2. it may by Repentance be repaired again, and the rest of the life be the more happy and comfortable with such a Penitent wife; and this very possibility is considerable. And that which was the reason why the believing husband is advised not to put away the unbelieving wife, [for he knows not whether he may not convert and save the heathen wife by living with her] hath place here also. To this purpose I will tell you a story of a Master and Servant, which you may accommodate to Husband and Wife. Les Digueirs (after Constable of France) had learned that his man that served him in his Chamber was corrupted to kill him: Being in his Chamber with him, and none else, he gives him a Sword and Dagger in his hand, and takes another himself, then speaks thus to him; You have been my Servant long, and a Gallant fellow, why would you be so base as to undertake to kill me cowardly? Here be weapons, let it be done like a man; and so offered to fight with him. The Servant fell at his feet, confessed his vile intention, begged pardon, promised unfeigned Reformation. His Master pardoneth him, continues him in place of daily trust in his Chamber; he never hath treacherous thought against him after. So you see this crime may be repaired again, and no danger in not Divorcing. But then secondly, If there were danger of being killed still, yet may the inconvenience of living with one who hath been false to the bed be beyond that. Love is strong as death, jealousie cruel as the grave; the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame, saith Solomon. And if that continual Jealousie be thus caused, what a Hell is that man's life? and that is far worse than Death, especially than the mere danger of it: and beside, if she also have repented of her Fornication, and the husband be satisfied that she hath so, yet the disgrace of having been so used, and perhaps the continual presence of a base Brat in the family, will be yet more unsupportable than that possible danger of losing a life. For you see how ordinary it is for men to contemn their lives, to endanger, nay oft actually to lose them, rather than part with Reputation, or any such trifling comfort of life, on this maxim of the natural mans, That it is better to die, than to live miserably or infamously. And though Christianity curb that gallantry of the world, yet still it commands us to contemn life when it cometh in competition with obedience to Christ; which here it doth, or may do, if Christ command (as his words affirm he doth) this not-divorcing for any kind of cause but Fornication. The same might be said in divers other things, where we are apt to interpose the excuse of extreme necessity (i. e. danger of losing our lives) when through any passion or interest we are not inclined to do what God bids us do: Where 1. if we did thus die, it were Martyrdom, and that the greatest preferment of a Christian. 2. Seeing it is but danger, and not certain death, we may well intrust our lives in God's hands (much more our estates, which are not so near to us) by doing what he bids us; and think them there safest, when so ventured. And so I have satisfied your scruples.

Vide in the life of Les Digueirs.

Not equal to that of adultery.

S. Other scruples in this matter of Divorce I think I could make to you; but I hope neither you, nor I, by the blessing of God, shall ever have occasion to make use of the knowledge of such niceties.

Sect. VIII. Of Swearing.

I shall hasten you to that next Period, which contains a Prohibition so necessary to be instilled into young men, lest the sin get in fashion, and that root so deep in them, that it will not suddenly be weeded out; and that is, of Swearing. Be pleased therefore after Christ's method in delivering, and yours formerly in expounding, to tell me the meaning of the old Commandment, which by the style of the Preface, [Ye have heard that it hath been said to them of old time] I collect to be the third of the Ten Commandments.

The third Commandment against Perjury.

C. The first part of it, [Thou shalt not forswear thy self,] is clearly the third Commandment; but the latter part [But shalt perform to the Lord thine oaths,] is taken out of other places of the Law, to explain the meaning of the former, and to express it to be, as literally it sounds, against Perjury, and (under that head) particularly the non-performance of promissory oaths.

S. But the third Commandment is in Exodus, [Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain:] Is that no more than [Thou shalt not forswear thy self?]

C. No more undoubtedly in the primary intention of the phrase, if either Christ may judge, who here saith so, or if the importance of the words in the Original be observed. For to take or lift up the name of God, is an Hebrew form or phrase signifying to swear; and the word [vain] and [false] is all one; as 1. the Hebrew Writers generally acknowledge, 2. that of [[a] idle word] enforceth, Matth. 12. 36. being there applied to that not only vain but false speech, verse 24. [He casts out devils by the Prince of devils:] 3. because the very word that Exod. 27. is rendred [b] vain in the third Commandment, is used Deut. 5. 20. in the ninth Commandment, for (and is so rendred by us) false witness; and so Psalm 24. 4. lifting up the soul unto vanity (that phrase of lifting up the soul referring to that form of swearing by the life) is expresst in the next words, sworn deceitfully. By all which it is clear, that [to take God's name in vain] is [to forswear one's self.] And consequently, that to that sin of Perjury is assigned not only a terrible portion in God's future, flow, but sure retributions, (so great, that among the Heathens the torments of Hell were thought peculiarly to belong to perjured persons, and the very word which signifies [c] an oath, is by them turned into the [d] name of that place which avenges the sins of this life) but even the remarkable strokes of God's hand even in this world, strange open riots and invasions, and ruins on mens estates oft-times, but more often secret strokes of his hand, and blasts of his mouth, cursing, and poisoning, and wasting the estates of those that are guilty of that sin. This is the importance of that peculiar Character set upon that sin in the close of that Commandment [the Lord will not hold him guiltless;] all God's plagues attend, and will infallibly overtake him. You will see it Zach. 5. 4. in the Emblem of the flying roll, that entreth into the house of the thief, and into the house of him that sweareth falsely by God's name; and it shall remain in the midst of his house, and shall consume it with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof. This remaining and consuming the whole house with the timber and stones, is no single curse, but that which extends to the blasting and extirpation of whole families; and the flying roll is an intimation of the Indiscernibleness, Swiftness, Fiercens, and Unavoidableness of this judgment. And perhaps it would be worth your while to observe this sin abroad in the world, how it is haunted by Divine vengeance, and particularly one special part of it, Sacrilege, (which is punctually the sin in Zachary, stealing and perjury together, and that heightned by being an invasion of God himself) a sin clearly against againſt the firſt Table, (as may appear by St. Paul's joining it with Idolatry, as ſtealing with ſtealing, adultery with adultery, Rom. 2. 22) and reductively, if not principally, againſt this of Perjury; of which it is a branch. First, By not paying or performing of vows, which is here ſaid to be commanded by that Law by which Perjury was forbidden, and is broken not only by Ananias his detaining what he himſelf had vowed to God, but by purloyning, or invading, or alienating whatever is by others conſecrated to God: Secondly, Becauſe the Jewiſh cuſtom being to adjure men, as it is ours to impoſe an oath; and that adjuration forcing men to ſpeak, and ſo to ſwear to any thing ſo propoſed, (as appears by Chriſt and the high Prieſt, Matth. 26. 63, 64.) and ſo the anſwering falſly upon ſuch an adjuration being as direct perjury as if one had voluntarily taken an oath and violated it; and moreover the conſecration of Lands, Revenues, Goods moveable and immoveable to God, for the uſe of thoſe that wait on his ſervice, being ordinarily done * with a curſe (ſuch as that in Zacharies Roll, or the Pſalmiſt's Prophetick imprecations of Judas) on the ſacrilegious invader, and that curſe a mixture of an imprecation and an adjuration; the conſequence is clear, That this ſin is very properly reduced to this Commandment: and though in reſpect of many other aggravations of it, it be a breach alſo of many other Commandments, and particularly a contemning of God, a thinking him ſo tame as not to revenge ſuch violations that immediately touch his own property; yet in the main part of it, it is a taking of God's Name in vain. And then I ſhould be too troubleſom to you to ſhew you the fearful judgments that in this word have attended it, in many hundred illuſtrious examples, ſuch as would be ſufficient to mortifie the moſt ravenous appetite, (which alone ſets the covetous vulture upon it) by aſſuring him that every coal thus fetcht from the altar will not fail to burn the whole neſt; that every prey thus ventured on will curſe and conſume the whole heap of treaſure, and undo him that meant ſo to have enriched and raiſed himſelf by it. I ſhall leave you to make up this obſervation to your ſelf.

Punishment of Perjury.

That ſin a branch of Perjury.

* Cum anathemate.

S. But is nothing elſe reducible to this old Commandment?

C. Though Swearing, ſimply taken, be not reducible, (for, beſides that the expreſs words of Moſes plainly permit it, [Thou ſhalt ſwear by his name] Deut. 6. 13. and 10. 20. the † Fathers ſay plainly, That to ſwear under Moſes was lawful;) yet idle, fooliſh, wanton, (ſure, prophane, blaſphemous) uſing of God's name may be reſolved to be there forbidden by reduction.

† Oecumenius, &c.

S. What then hath Chriſt ſuperadded to the old Commandment?

C. A total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf, making that as unlawful now as perjury was before.

S. Are no kind of oaths now lawful to a Chriſtian?

C. That you may diſcern this matter clearly and diſtinctly, you muſt mark two circumſtances in our Saviour's ſpeech. 1. That phraſe, verſe 37. [but let your communication, &c.] from whence one univerſal rule you may take, That to ſwear in ordinary communication, or diſcourſe, or converſation, is utterly unlawful. 2. You muſt apply our Saviour's prohibition to the particular matter of Moſes his Law forementioned, and that was peculiarly of promiſſory (not aſſertory) oaths; and then adding to that the importance of the word [ſwear] as it differs from adjuration, or being ſworn, (taking an oath adminiſtred by thoſe who are in authority) you have then a ſecond rule, That all voluntary, but eſpecially promiſſory, oaths, are utterly unlawful now for a Chriſtian.

Chriſt's interdict of all ſwearing, in Communication.

All voluntary oaths.

S. What do you mean by voluntary oaths?

C. Thoſe that no other impellent but my ſelf, or my own worldly gain or intereſt, extort from me: For of theſe you muſt reſolve, that if my oath be not either for the glory of God, (as Saint Paul's oath, Rom. 1. 9. Gal. 1. 20, &c. which were to ſtand upon record to poſterity, and to confirm the truth of God being in his Epiſtles, whereas in all the ſtory of his converſation in the Acts, we never find that he did ſwear) or for the good of my Neighbour, (wherein generally I as a private man am not to be Judge, but to ſubmit to the judgment of the Magiſtrate legally calling me to teſtifie my conſcience, or to enter into ſome oath for the good and peace of the Publick) or ſome ſuch publick conſideration, but only for my own intereſt, &c. it is utterly unlawful.

S. Why do you add, but eſpecially promiſſory oaths?

C. Becauſe thoſe are moſt clearly here forbidden, both by the aſpect theſe words have on the precedent, Thou ſhalt perform thy oaths; and by the Precept of St. James in that matter, Chap. 5. 12. Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay, i. e. Let your promiſes and performances be all one, (the firſt yea referring to the promiſe, the ſecond to performance) which he there mentions as a means to make all promiſſory oaths unneceſſary: for he that is ſo juſt in performing his word, there will be no need of his oath; and he that doth uſe oaths in that matter may be in danger to fall into lying or falſe ſpeaking, which is the meaning of thoſe words which we there render [‖ Leſt you fall into condemnation.] ‖ μὴ εἰς ὑπόκρισιν πίπτητε i. e. ψευδολογίαν.

S. What is the meaning of thoſe ſeverals that follow, Neither by * Heaven, &c. May it not be, that I muſt not ſwear by them, but only by God? or not ſwear falſly, ſo much as by them?

C. No, but clearly this, that thoſe leſſer oaths taken in by ſome in civility to God, whom they would not invoke in ſmall matters, but yet would uſe this liberty of ſwearing by other inferiour things, are now utterly unlawful; a Chriſtian muſt not uſe any of thoſe. Becauſe every of theſe are creatures of God (whoſe whole Being conſiſts in reference to him) and not to be ſubjected to his luſt to be toſt and defamed by his unneceſſary oaths.

* ὄμνυμι δ' ἱερὸν αἰθέρ', ὄικησιν Διός. Soph. Menalippe.

Swearing by all inferiour things.

S. What is meant by the poſitive precept in the cloſe [but let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay?] Is it as you expounded St. James [Let your yea be yea, &c.] i. e. Let your promiſes and performances be anſwerable to one another.

C. No, there is difference betwixt the Phraſes: [Let your yea be yea] ſignifies that, (as on the other ſide, yea and nay ſignifies levity, 2 Cor. 1. 19.) But [Let your communication be yea, yea,] is this; In ordinary diſcourſe you may uſe an affirmation (that is, one yea,) and if occaſion require an aſſeveration (that is, another yea;) and ſo again a negation, and a phraſe of ſome vehemence (as a redoubling) to confirm it (that is, nay, nay;) and this will ſerve as a good uſeful means to prevent the uſe of ſwearing, by aſſigning to that purpoſe ſome ſuch aſſeveration which will ſerve as well; and therefore Christ doth not only forbid any more than this, but in a manner direct to the use of this, or that which will help us to perform his precept.

S. There is yet one thing behind, the reason that this is backed with, for [whatsoever is more than this, cometh of evil:] What is meant by that?

C. Either that it cometh from the evil one, Satan, who makes men unapt to believe without oaths, that so he may make the free use of them the more necessary; or from evil, i. e. that great kind of evil among men, * the breaking of promises, from whence this custom of adding oaths proceeds, because they cannot be believed without them. By which is also intimated, that oaths are here by Christ forbidden, not as things in themselves evil, but as things which are not to be used but in affairs of special moment, a reverence being due to them, which are therefore not to be made too cheap by us.

* So Joseph. l. 2. de Bel. Jud. c. 12. of a special sort of Jews, who, saith he, avoided all swearing and counted it worst than perjury, ἤδη γὰρ ἤδη καταγνῶσθαι φασι τὸν ἀπιστούμενον δίχα θεοῦ, He is already condemned that is not believed without swearing.

Sect. IX. Of Revenge, or retaliating evil.

S. Be pleased then to advance to the next period, and the foundation of that laid as formerly in the words of the Law, [An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth:] which I see again by the variation of the Preface from that which was prefixt to the Commands of the Decalogue, not to be of that number; and yet is the phrase also varied from that which was prefixt to that of Divorce: There only [it hath been said] but here [ye have heard that it hath been said.] What is the reason of that?

C. It signifies, that, as it is less than a Commandment of the Law, (i. e. is no precept, that every one should thus require an eye of him who had put out his;) so it is more than a bare immunity from earthly punishment to him that should so require, (which, I told you, was all that was allowed in that of divorce.) The truth is, this was by the Law of Nature and Moses freely permitted (and no sin then chargeable on him that did so) that he that had lost any member of his body, might by way of revenge or retaliation, legally or judicially require the like member (of him who had thus injured him) to be taken from him, Deut. 19. 21. though among the Jews, and so, I suppose, the Gentiles also, private men were not to do this on their own heads, but might by legal process go to the Judges and require this due from them.

S. What hath Christ appointed in this matter?

Christ's prohibition of it.

C. It is set down in these words, [But I say unto you, † that you resist not evil.] Where the word which we render [evil] signifies not a thing, but a person, the injurious man, or him that hath done the injury; and the word rendred [‖ resist] notes not that which our English commonly signifies, but peculiarly to retaliate, to return evil for evil; by which interpretation it is directly answerable to what went before [eye for eye, &c.] and so is a denying to Christians that liberty that before was allowed the Jews, that of revenge, retaliation, returning those mischiefs to others which we have received from them.

‖ Ut præpositio ἀντὶ non oppositionem, sed retributionem notet, ut in voce ἀνταπόδοσις & ἀντιμισθοῦν & ἀντιποιεῖν, and as in Sophoc. Oedip. Ἀντιλέξαι is to speak back again, to be allowed vices loquendi, which, saith Oedipus there, is his priviledge to a King; and so ἀνταυχεῖν (presently) to hear the respondent speak. Αὖ τι μοι ἐφεπόμενον τοῦ ἀντάκουσον.

S. What plain places of Scripture be there which prohibit this, so that I may be induced, by the analogy of them, to believe this forbidden here?

C. One plain place there is, which seems to me to be a direct interpretation of this, Rom. 12. 17. [Rendring to no man evil for evil;] so again, v. 19. [Avenging not your selves,] i. e. not thus [Rendring evil to evil:] which is farther explained by the following words, [but give place unto wrath] i. e. leave it to God's revenge, as it follows [Vengeance is mine, I will repay it, saith the Lord.]

S. But how far doth this precept of not revenging extend? To publick Magistrates, or only to private persons one toward another?

In private persons, not in Magistrates.

C. To this I shall answer by these several degrees. 1. That it doth not interpose in the Magistrate's office, so as to forbid him to punish by way of retaliation, if the Laws of the Land so direct him; for his office being to preserve the Kingdom in peace, Christ forbids not the use of any lawful means to that end, nor particularly of this, but rather by the Apostle confirms it in his hand, by saying, [He beareth not the sword in vain] adding, [He is God's Minister, an avenger for wrath, to him that doth ill.] By which is intimated that that sword for vengeance, or punishment of offenders, which naturally belongs to God only, is, as far as respects this life, put into the hands of the lawful Magistrate, with commission to use it as the constitution of the Kingdom shall best direct, either by way of retaliation or otherwise: and what is done thus by him, is to be counted God's vengeance executed by him; and so no more contrary to the prohibition of private revenge, than God's own retributions would be; which yet are mentioned by the Apostle as an argument to prove the unlawfulness of ours, Rom. 12. 19. Avenge not your selves, but rather give place unto wrath, leave all punishment to God, for it is written, Vengeance is mine. By which connexion you may note by the way, that the motive why we should not avenge our selves is (not that which some revengeful minds would be best pleased with, because by our patience our enemies shall be damned the deeper, as some would collect from Rom. 12. 20. but) because the priviledge of punishing offenders, i. e. of vengeance, belongs peculiarly to God, and to none but those to whom, for things of this life, he is pleased to communicate it. Which I conceive to be the reason why upon this ground of vengeance belonging to God only, set down in the end of Rom. 12. the thirteenth to the Romans begins with Obedience to the higher powers, and their being ordained by God, &c. This being thus set, it will follow secondly, That Christ's prohibition belongs only to those who have received the injuries considered (whatsoever they are) under the notion of private sufferers: And those are forbid two things, 1. Taking into their own hands the avenging of themselves: 2. (which is the special thing in this place, the former being not by the Law permitted to the Jews themselves, though among the Heathen it was generally thought lawful to hurt them who had injured us) Desiring and thirsting, seeking and requiring revenge, (even that which the Law of man affords,) with this reflexion on themselves, for the satisfying their revengeful humour. This might Christ very reasonably prohibit, it being before not commanded, commanded, but only permitted by Moſes's Law; though forbid the Magiſtrates thus to puniſh offenders he could not without deſtroying the Law, and giving the worſt of men advantage over the beſt, which indeed to have done would not yet be thought reaſonable for Chriſt, the greateſt part of the world being ſo far from being Chriſtians even now in times of Chriſtianity. It is not therefore made utterly unlawful by Chriſt to proſecute any who hath wronged me, and bring him to legal puniſhment; for that the Law of man, authoriſed and not contradicted by Chriſt, may and oft doth require of me; and there is great difference between revenge and puniſhment: nor is it unlawful to require reparations for an injury done me, when the matter is capable of it; nor again to do the ſame for the good that may accrue to my Brethren by the inflicting ſuch exemplary puniſhment on offenders. But that which our Saviour interpoſeth, is, That to require this for the ſatisfying of my own revengeful humour, beſides or without reparation of the damage received by me, (as generally it is when I require an eye for an eye; for in that caſe the pulling out of his eye will contribute nothing toward the helping me to mine again) or again to require it in contemplation of the further inconvenience that may poſſibly befal me another time, if this paſs unpuniſhed, is thought fit to be interdicted us Chriſtians, who are bound, firſt, by gratitude for what Chriſt hath done to us in pardoning of injuries, to go and do likewiſe, i. e. to pardon and not revenge injuries; ſecondly, by the Law of Faith, to vanquiſh ſuch fears, and depend on God's providence, to defend us for the future; and not to be ſo haſty and ſolicitous in uſing all poſſible means, however unlawful, for the future ſecuring of our ſelves. And all this ſeems to be the literal importance of that phraſe, Rom. 12. 19. [Not avenging our ſelves:] Whatever avenging is lawful, that is not which reflecteth upon our ſelves, and our own immoderate paſſions; whether that of anger, or that other of deſire, a branch of which is this worldly carking or ſolicitous fear, that any patience of ours will bring more ſuffering upon us.

Not againſt legal proſecutions.

From theſe two thus ſet, it will appear, thirdly, what is to be ſaid of wars between one Kingdom and another, which are of a middle nature between the revenge of the Magiſtrate upon the offender within his juriſdiction, and the revenge of one private man upon another (this being between equals, and ſo not of the firſt kind; and yet between publick perſons or bodies, and ſo not of the ſecond) which conſequently will be only ſo far lawful as they agree with the firſt; and unlawful, as with the ſecond.

Of Wars.

S. In what reſpect may War be lawful? Or, is it at all ſo?

C. That it is not abſolutely unlawful, appears, 1. By the Baptiſt's anſwer to the Souldiers, when they came to his Baptiſm, Luke 3. 14. where he forbids them not that calling as unlawful: 2. By Chriſt's commending the Centurion's faith, who was then a Souldier: 3. By Paul's uſing a band of Souldiers againſt the Treachery of the Jews: 4. By S. Peter's baptizing of Cornelius without his giving over the military employment. Now in what reſpect War may be lawful, will appear, if we obſerve the cauſes of it. If it be for the ſuppreſſing of a ſedition or rebellion at home, it is clearly lawful for the lawful Magiſtrate (as having the power of the ſword,) firſt, to preſerve the peace of the Land; and ſecondly, to puniſh and ſuppreſs the diſturbers of it. In which caſe it is impoſſible any ſuch war ſhould be lawful on both ſides; there being but one ſupreme power in any Kingdom, (whether that conſiſt of one, or of more perſons) and to that belonging the power of the ſword, which whoſoever elſe taketh into his hand in any caſe, uſurpeth it, and therefore ought to periſh by the ſword. 2. If it be betwixt one Kingdom and another, then the War may be lawful again, in caſe one Kingdom doth attempt the doing an eminent injury to another, which by a War may poſſibly be averted from thoſe whom the Magiſtrates office binds him to protect. An eminent injury, I ſay, and that which is more hurtful than War or taking up of arms; and that again, when there is no arbitration, or other means of debating ſuch controverſies, or averting ſuch injuries, to be had. And with theſe Cautions, To hurt no peaceable man, as near as may be; To ſhed as little blood as is poſſible; Not to protract it, out of deſire of revenge or gain; Not to uſe cruelty on captives, or thoſe that yield themſelves and deſire quarter; on women, children, husbandmen, &c. To give over War when any reaſonable terms of peace may be had; To take away nothing from the conquered but the power of hurting. In theſe caſes and with theſe cautions, as it is lawful to the higher Powers to uſe arms, ſo it is alſo to others their Subjects that have commiſſion from them, (if they be ſatisfied of the juſtice of the cauſe) it being not imaginable that any Magiſtrate ſhould by his own perſonal ſtrength protect his Subjects, without the aſſiſtance of others with him.

They are not abſolutely unlawful.

S. But is it lawful for a private man for the repelling of any the greateſt injury from himſelf to kill another? Or, if it be not, how can this war againſt (not our Subjects and Rebels, but) thoſe who are out of our power, and over whom we have no juriſdiction, (and ſo we are but private men in reſpect of them) be accounted lawful, ſeeing it is ſure more ſinful to kill many than one?

C. To the firſt part of your queſtion, I anſwer, that a private man may not, by the Law of Chriſt, take away anothers life, for the ſaving his own goods, or the repelling any ſuch kind of injury from himſelf, becauſe life is more than goods: but if his life be attempted alſo, and no probable means to ſave it but by taking away the others life, it may then be lawful to take away his life; Chriſt having interpoſed nothing to the contrary, (where yet he that to ſave anothers life, or rather than take it away, ſhould venture and loſe his own, may be thought to do better and more honourably, in imitating Chriſt who laid down his life for his enemies.) This then being granted, I ſay yet to the ſecond part of your queſtion, that the ſame rule cannot be extended to the making of war unlawful. 1. Becauſe the Supreme Power, who is ſuppoſed to manage the war, hath the ſword put into his hand by God, (which the private man hath not) and that not only to puniſh Subjects, but alſo to protect them. 2. Becauſe it is his duty ſo to do, which he may not (without ſin againſt them, and failing in diſcharge of truſt) neglect: whereas the private man having power of his own goods, may recede from that natural right of his, may deny himſelf, to follow Chriſt; and for his life it ſelf, may better thus part with it, by leaving it to God's tuition, than the Magiſtrate can another man's being entruſted by God to defend it, and by oath bound to perform that part of his duty. And for the number of thoſe whom a War endangers to kill, (if it be objected;) that will be countervailed with the number of those whom it is intended to preserve, whose peace and quiet living, if it may be gotten, is more valuable to them than life it self deprived of that.

S. Well then, supposing war to be lawful, and these two kinds of war to be such, What other kind of lawful wars are there? Or be there any more?

C. It will be hard to name any other; and yet I shall not peremptorily say there is no other, because some other perhaps may be found which will bear proportion to one of these.

What wars are unlawful.

It will be easier to inform you in this matter by telling you what be the special sorts of Wars that are unlawful.

S. What be they?

C. When one Nation fighteth with another for no other reason but because that other is not of the true Religion, this is certainly unlawful: For 1. God hath not given any Nation this jurisdiction over another; and 2. It is against the nature of Religion to be planted by violence, or consequently by the sword: and therefore much more is this unlawful for Subjects to do against the Laws and Governours under which they are placed.

S. But is not Religion the most precious thing of all? What then may we fight for, if not for that?

For Religion.

C. It is the most precious thing indeed, and that to be preserved by all lawful, proper, proportionable means: but then War or unlawful resistance, being of all things most improper to defend, or secure, or plant this, and it being acknowledged unlawful for Peter to use the sword for the defence of Christ himself; to do it merely for Religion, must needs be very unlawful. Religion hath still been spread and propagated by suffering, and not by resisting: and indeed it being not in the power of force to constrain my soul, or change my Religion, or keep me from the profession of it, arms or resistance must needs be very improper for that purpose.

S. What other war is unlawful?

For enlarging Territories.

C. All manner of invasive War for the enlarging of our Territories, for the revenging of an affront, for the weakening of those that we see prosperous, and consequently suspect it possible for them to invade us for the future; or in any case, unless perhaps to get some reparation for some eminent injury done to our Nation, which the Nation cannot reasonably bear, nor yet hope for any other way of reparation.

S. What is required to make it lawful for any private man to take arms?

Commission necessary for each private man.

C. Commission from the Supreme power under which he lives, and to whom he is a subject, and who hath the power of the Sword in his hand: and therefore as in obedience to such, it is possible for a private man lawfully to take arms, even when the Governours do it unlawfully, supposing that he think the cause good upon the Supreme powers undertaking it; so he that takes up arms only for hire or hope of honour, &c. under one who is not his Magistrate, may, though the cause be just for which the General fights, commit sin in fighting under him.

S. What is there more that you think fit to teach me from this precept of not retaliating, or not avenging the injurious?

Christ's command of bearing light injuries.

C. It will be best given you by proceeding and observing what Christ adds on the back of this prohibition, But whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also, &c.

S. What is generally observable from those additions?

C. 1. The occasion of them. 2. The general nature of them, wherein they all agree and accord.

S. What is the occasion of them?

C. Christ's foresight of an objection, which, upon occasion of the prohibition precedent, men would be apt to make, thus; If when one doth me an injury, I may not revenge it on him my self, or require a legal revenge upon him, then by this easiness he will be taught to multiply those injuries, to smite me on the other cheek, when he sees me take that so patiently; to take away my cloak also, if I am so tame as to let him carry away my coat without any payment; to make me go a stage of two miles with him next time, if I take the first oppression so patiently. To this foreseen objection our Saviour answers, by commanding us to perform the former duty, and put this feared hazard to the venture, intimating that this is not sure to be the reward and consequent of such patience; or, to suppose the utmost, if it should be certainly so, yet we Christians must rather submit to this also than give the reins to our revenge on that consideration; we must venture that consequent with Christ, who hath commanded us this patience, and be armed for the worst that can befal us in his service. From whence you see what obligation it is that lies upon us toward the performing of those acts which are accounted so ridiculous among men: Not that we are presently to turn our left cheek to him that strikes us on the right, to give the cloak to him that takes the coat, &c. but to perform the precept of non-revenge, and not to be tempted from it by any foreseen inconvenience; yea, and ready to make that adventure, if I cannot perform that obedience without it, rather let him take the cloak also, than seek ways of revenge for such former trespasses. Which will be nothing unreasonable, if we consider, 1. That Christ can preserve us from farther injuries, if he think good, as well without as with our assistance; and indeed that patience is oft blest by him to be a more prosperous means of this, than self-revenge would be, it being Christ's tried rule, to overcome evil with good. 2. That if we should chance to suffer any thing by obeying him, he will be able to repair us in another world.

S. What now is the general nature of these appendent precepts, wherein they all agree and accord?

C. That they are all tolerable and supportable injuries, both in respect of what is done already, and what may be consequent to our bearing them. For thus the loss of the coat or cloak also is a moderate injury; the smiting on the cheek or cheeks, a very inconsiderable pain, and only valued for the contumely annext to it, which yet Christians had been before, verse 11. (and should after by the sufferings of Christ be) taught to support chearfully; and the going a mile or two a very tolerable injury to the body, or invasion on their liberty, and a very easy post (both among the Jews and the [a] Persians, ſians, from whom the Jews had that [b] cuſtom) being compared with the ordinary ſtages. And from thence appears, 1. The reaſonableneſs and agreeableneſs of Chriſt's commands to our ſtrength, that he provides us ſuch eaſie yokes and light burthens, even when we think he uſeth us moſt hardly: 2. The indulgence which he allows us in matters of greater concernment, where the damage or treſpaſs is not ſo ſupportable. He there intimates a liberty to uſe ſome means to ſave or repair our ſelves (where that may be extremely uſeful, if not neceſſary, to our temporal ſubſiſtence) though not to work revenge on the enemy for what is paſt, by exacting any puniſhment on his perſon, by endeavouring to trouble him who hath troubled us, (which cannot bring in any profit to us.)

[a] The Persian post or stage was a parasange, or thirty furlongs, of which the μιλιον or mile here was but a little above a fourth part, some seven or eight furlongs at most, Agathias l. 2. p. 55.

[b] 'Twas the Cuſtom of the Perſian Tyrants to preſs the bodies of men (as among us teems of horſes) and force them to carry their burthens for a ſtage, i. e. a paraſange, and then to reſt (whence the ſtages were called ἀναπαυλαι) ἑτέρων ἀμοιβαδὸν διαδεχομένων; others ſucceeding them in their turns: See Matth. 27. 32. Mark 15. 21. Luke 23. 26.

S. What now is particularly obſervable from each of theſe, and 1. from the firſt?

C. That for light injuries done to our bodies which leave no wound behind them, nor are the diſabling or weakning of our bodies, nor bring any conſiderable pain with them, we are not to ſeek any way of private, no nor ſo much as of legal revenge; no, though the injury were a contumely alſo, and the putting it up a reproach in the account of the world, and withal a poſſible (nay, a probable) means to bring more upon me of the ſame making. This thus ſet, is my Chriſtian duty, which I cannot omit without ſin; and which for us to perform, or Chriſt to command, is ſo far from unreaſonable, that the contrary, if we obſerve the experience of it, is much more unreaſonable; the ſeeking of revenge ordinarily ſubjecting us to greater inconveniences, to more and more dangerous blows (many times) if we become our own champions, and avenge our ſelves, and to more conſiderable trouble and charge, if we ſeek it from the Court of Judicature.

S. What do you in particular obſerve from the ſecond?

C. It offers me a fair occaſion to tell you ſomewhat of that great queſtion, concerning the lawfulneſs of going to Law.

S. I ſhall moſt willingly make uſe of the occaſion, and deſire your judgment in that point.

C. Going to Law, I conceive, is not ſimply unlawful, becauſe Chriſt finding [c] Courts of Judicature (for matter of Mine and Thine) in the world, did not take that power into his own hands, (Who made me a Judge?) or out of thoſe hands where he found it. In this whole Sermon of ſtrict Precepts upon the Mount, he gives no command in (lays no reſtraint on) this matter any further than what is contained in theſe words, He that would implead thee, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak alſo: The utmoſt of which can amount no farther againſt going to law than this. 1. That it is ſuch a thing that it may be abuſed to the moſt unjuſt oppreſſions, taking away the coat from ones back; and when ſo uſed, it is ſurely unlawful. 2. That I muſt not go to Law with any by way of [d] Retaliation, I mean, for no other cauſe but becauſe he by that means hath diſquieted or injured me; for the Precept of [Let him have thy coat alſo] (being thus interpreted, that I muſt do ſo, rather than go to Law with him) cannot juſtly be extended toward this ſence, any farther than the context will authorize the extending it, and that is only thus far, That rather than retribute to him evil for evil, or retaliate, verſe 38. I muſt even let him take it, and not go to Law with him, i. e. I muſt thus be quiet rather than bear him any malice, or do any thing that ſhall inflame me, or raiſe in me a deſire of revenge againſt him: For any of theſe will make that unlawful to me which indeed was not ſo. 3. That I muſt not go to Law only out of a providence, that the bearing of one injury patiently may poſſibly or probably bring a greater upon me; but think fit to truſt God with the preſerving me for the future, who will be more likely to bleſs and reward my patience and meekneſs with tranquility and proſperity in this life (according to that promiſe of the Pſalmiſt, [The meek ſhall poſſeſs the earth] where the Earth ſignifies the Land of Canaan, a moſt proſperous rich Land; which very words are repeated by Chriſt in this Sermon, Chap. 5. 5. and if there the earth be the Land of the living onely, there will be no great loſs in ſuch an exchange) than any contrary vice of contentiouſneſs or impatience. Or 4. That I muſt not go to Law to recover a coat when I have a cloak left, i. e. for a ſmall unconſiderable poſſeſſion, which is not neceſſary to me, which I may be without, and the recovering of which will not be proportionably gainful to the charge or trouble of going to Law for it. Theſe ſeverals contain the utmoſt that I can imagine that place of Chriſt can be juſtly extended to: All which notwithſtanding, theſe other caſes ſtill remain, which come not under that interdict in its largeſt extent. 1. That he that cannot by any arbitration get his own, nor yet conveniently live without it, may make uſe of the ſetled Judicature of the Land where God hath placed him, ſuppoſing that he fall not into any of the faults before ſpecified, and poſſibly incident to the waging or managing of the juſteſt action. 2. That any one being tenderly affected in conſcience, ſo as to deſire aſſurance that he enjoys nothing but what is juſt for him to enjoy, may lawfully in matter of any doubt or controverſie concerning propriety, uſe the Law to make that deciſion for him; ſuppoſing again that this be ſincerely his intention, and that he reſolve quietly to ſtand to what the Law ſhall ſo adjudge. 3. That he that by this means defends a Widow or Orphan, may very Chriſtianly uſe this means. 4. That he that may thus preſerve himſelf in a ſufficiency to provide for his family, and without it probably cannot, without either craving other mens alms, or expecting relief from God by extraordinary means, may uſe this means to do ſo. 5. That he that may by this means be enabled to relieve the poor, which otherwiſe he could not do ſo liberally, and doth it ſincerely in order to that end, and when he obtains his own, evidences that ſincerity by his performance, is ſtill free from any reſtraint ariſing from that precept of Chriſt: whereas on the other ſide, he that contends for trifles, goes to Law only that he may loſe nothing of his right, or not only to get legal reparations for his loſſes, (whereby that which is juſtly taken from the other that injured him is juſtly reſtored to him which was injured, the one being as well able to bear or ſupport this act of juſtice as the other that of injuſtice) but alſo to give ſatisfaction to his revengeful appetite, (a very carnal, importunate, deviliſh affection) to give the enemy ſome ſmart or pain, which brings in no real gain or eaſe or advantage to himſelf, ſave only that of ſatisfying his vindicative humour, can no way be juſtified or excuſed in ſuch a ſuit. So alſo the ſuing of thoſe which are not able to pay me, (and by my ſuit are but made more unable) when all that I can hope for, is not reparation of my ſelf, but puniſhing punishing of him by prison, or the like restraint on him, that brings in no advantage again to me; this is unlawful and unchristian still.

S. But is there not an objection against going to Law in any case, producible from 1 Cor. 6?

C. It will suffice to answer, That the Apostle's scope there, is only to reprehend going to Law before Heathen Tribunals: which when any men are guilty of, it must signifie either, that there is no Christian among them fit to be Judge betwixt contenders; or else that they would rather chuse an Heathen's arbitration than that Christian's: either of which being very culpable, that which arises from one of them must needs be so, but nothing else upon those grounds. This is agreeable to what Christ had before said, Matth. 18. That if thy brother trespass against thee, (do thee any such injury) and will not make thee amends, thou shalt tell it to the Church; who are there, surely, some tribunal of Christians, who have power to make thee amends, if he will stand to their judgment: and if he will not, Christ then goes farther, Let him be to thee as an Heathen or Publican, i. e. I conceive in that place, not only that he is fit for Excommunication, mention'd in the next verse, but also that thou hast liberty (let him be so to thee against whom he hath trespast) to implead him in any Gentile Tribunal (because he will not stand to the Christian's award) as thou wouldest, and maiest a Heathen or Publican which trades among them, and who is in the interpretation of the Jewish Law, though a Jew, yet a kind of Heathen, or by conversing with them equipollent to one.

S. But may it not from that Chapter to the Corinthians be still prest, that verse 7. it is said, [e] There is utterly a fault among you, because you go to Law one with another.

[e] ἤδη ὅλως ἥττημα, &c.

C. I answer, that the utmost that that infers is only this, That those particular [f] suits at Law that were then among the Corinthians were all unlawful, (which you will have reason to believe, when you find the same Apostle telling them, verse 9. that they did injure and defraud one another; and it is more than probable that their going to Law was used, as here in Christ's Sermon it is supposed, as a means to do so) but it is not concludible from thence, that all other mens suits are so, because possibly not of the same nature as theirs were. But then, secondly, there may be somewhat in the Apostle's using a special word in that place, not any of those more usual [g] words which are without doubt denotations of sin, but [h] another which signifies a going-less; and so may perhaps only conclude the thing which he speaks of, to be no more than comparatively evil, i. e. not so good as patient bearing of injuries and losses ought to be esteemed, which seems to be enforced by the words immediately following in the end of that seventh verse, Why do you not rather suffer injury and defraudation? which will infer, That patience of injuries is a greater vertue and more heroical excellence, a higher pitch of Christian Philosophy and contempt of the world, than going to Law implies, far more than that particular kind of going to Law was approved to be; but not, that going to Law is from that place made in all cases utterly unlawful. Just as losing my own life when I am assaulted by another (rather than I will take away his) is, as even now I shewed you, a high piece of imitation of Christ, who laid down his life for enemies; which notwithstanding, the killing of the invader in that case, when I cannot otherwise save or rescue my own life, is acknowledged to be no sin, because not forbidden by nature, or Christ, whose prohibition (not counsel nor example to the contrary) it is that makes any thing a sin; for where there is no Law, there is no transgression. This I conceive may give hints for the understanding this whole matter.

S. I shall labour to make use of them; and, because this discourse hath a little led you out of the way, recal you into the rode again, and remember you where you left, by demanding what is to be learnt from the third particular, which Christ thought fit to superadd to the matter of retaliating.

Invasion of our liberty.

C. It is this, That the same rule holds for my Liberty that did for my body and estate; that every diminution of it must not inrage me either to a private or legal revenge on the invader. The sum of all is, That small supportable injuries of any kind we Christians must bear without hurting again, or so much as prosecuting or impleading the injurious: in weightier and more considerable matters, though we may use means, first, to defend our selves, secondly, to get legal reparations for our losses; yet even in those, the giving any way to revengeful desires, or desiring to give him any smart or pain, that brings no real gain or ease or advantage to us, save only the satisfying our revengeful humour, is still utterly unlawful.

S. But what is that that follows in the close of this period, ver. 42. [Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee, turn not thou away?] And how comes it in, in this place?

Liberality to all.

C. The substance of it is a command of universal, unlimited liberality (according to our power) to all that are in need, and a direction to one special kind of works of mercy, the lending (without all exaction of Use for the Loan) to those that are in present want, and may, by such present supplies for present exigences, be taught a way of thriving in the world, and getting out from those difficulties of fortune. In which case, the lending for a time, and after that time the requiring mine own again, may do some men as much, perhaps more good, by obliging them to industry and providence and fidelity, than giving to some others might have done.

S. What connexion is there betwixt this precept of liberality, and the non-revenge immediately preceding?

C. It is this, 1. That forgiving and giving, the two special works of our charity toward men, should always go together; one never doth so well as when t'other is joined with it. Revenge will blast our liberality; and the covetous illiberal heart will defame the most perfect patience. 2. That the practice of liberality will help us to think it reasonable not to meditate Revenge, and withal demonstrate our patience of injuries, &c. to be no pusillanimous cowardly act (because I dare not resist him) but only an act of obedience unto Christ, in doing as he hath done, both for patience and liberality; my Christian charity obliging me to one as well as t'other.

S. What now is the ground-work of the next Period?

Sect. X. Of loving Enemies.

C. The repetition of the Old-Law of Loving Neighbours and hating Enemies.

S. Is there any such thing in the law of Moses, or Nature, that we should hate our Enemies, and love none but Neighbours?

C. I

C. I ſhall tell you as clearly as I can, what both thoſe Laws have done in this matter.

S. What hath the Law of Moſes done?

C. For the loving of the Neighbour, i. e. the Fellow-Jew, it hath commanded to love him as thy ſelf, Levit. 19. 18. and not to avenge or bear any grudge againſt him; from which, though it were no excluſion of the like to men of other countries, yet it is very true that the Jews took occaſion of advantage to deny all kindneſs and exerciſe of offices of common humanity to all others, unleſs they became Proſelytes to them. Now this they did without any authority of their Law, which therefore Chriſt, by the Parable of the good Samaritan, ſhews to belong to the loving of (and ſhewing mercy to) others beſide their own country-men, and extendeth the meaning of the word [Neighbour] to all thoſe who are of the ſame common ſtock with us, and are men as well as our ſelves: though the truth is, God by preſcribing the Jew peculiar meats, and forbidding others that were familiarly uſed by the Nations, did conſequently interdict them any ſpecial familiarity of converſe with the Nations, by way of caution, leſt they ſhould be corrupted by them (who were at that time ſo extremely idolatrous and filthy in their practices;) which rule conſequently was to be accounted temporary, and to laſt no longer than the reaſon of it. But then, for the hating of enemies, it is not to be thought that there was any ſuch precept given them, of hating either all but their own countrey-men, or even all their very enemies. Thus much only toward it we find in the Law, that though the Jews were commanded to do courteſies to their enemies of their own country, to bring back an enemies Ox going aſtray, and to help up his Aſs lying under a burthen, Exod. 23. 4, 5. Deut. 22. 1, &c. yet they are forbid to enter any friendſhip, affinity, league with the ſeven Nations, Hittites, Amorites, &c. or to ſhew any mercy to them, but commanded to deſtroy them utterly, Deut. 7. 16. and 20. 16, 17. and accordingly it was practiſed Joſh. 10. 40. and the ſame, in ſome proportion, with other enemy-cities, Deut. 20. 13. Thou ſhalt ſmite all the male with the edge of the ſword; but this with ſome limitations, they were to offer them conditions of peace, and to permit them to redeem their lives, if they deſired it, by ſervitude, ver. 10, 11. The ground of this difference between the ſeven Nations and other enemies of the Iſraelites, is viſibly the nearneſs of the former, and the danger of the Iſraelites being corrupted by them: and ſo 1. this extreme ſeverity was not commanded toward enemies indefinitely, but only toward the ſeven nations, leſt, if any of them were preſerved, they ſhould ſeduce them to their abominable filthineſſes, ver. 18. whereas the proceeding was not ſo ſevere againſt other enemy-cities farther off, from whom there was not the like danger; and 2. it doth not appear that this belonged to any but of that age, in conſideration of the danger of ſeduction to their ſins; for Solomon doth not ſo, but only levies a tribute of bond-ſervice upon them, 1 Kings 9. 20, 21. After the ſame manner were they to deal with the Amalekites, to have war with them for ever, Exod. 17. 16. Deut. 25. 19. and with ſome difference with the Moabites and Ammonites. In all which, nothing can be obſerved contrary to the Law of Nature or Humanity; for the ſame power that the Magiſtrates on earth have over malefactors, the ſame ſure muſt be yielded God over Nations and Governours of them, to put them to death by what means he pleaſe. This execution he was pleaſed to commit to the people of the Jews after a long time of patience, when thoſe Nations had filled up the meaſure of their Rebellion, Levit. 18. 24, 25. So that this [of hating enemies] cannot be accounted of as any common general command, (for it held not generally againſt any but theſe forenamed Nations) but as a ſpecial, particular ſentence of God's, to be at that time executed on them. And although, the truth is, the Jews did generally reſolve it lawful to kill or ſpoil any that were ſtrangers from the Religion of the true God; yet by the limiting of God's command for ſuch execution to theſe forenamed, and that with this reaſon, becauſe they had filled up the meaſure of their iniquities, (which when it is, none but God can judge of) it is evident that this was an error in the Jews; and that the rather, becauſe at this time when Chriſt ſpake, they were ſubject to the Romans, and had no power of the ſword in their hands; in which caſe thoſe former commands of war with Amalek, (much more with other idolatrous Nations, againſt whom it was not appointed) became utterly out-dated, and the Law of Nature was to prevail, which commends love and charity to all men.

The Moſaical Law concerning it.

S. You promiſed alſo to ſhew me what the law of Nature had done in this matter. I pray, what is it?

C. We have no better way now to judge of that, than by the writings and ſayings of the wiſeſt natural men; the ſum of which is this, [i] That all men are to be loved and obliged by us; no man to be hurt or diſobliged, but he who hath firſt injured us: in which caſe the great [k] Philoſopher thinks it as [l] reprovable a thing to love an enemy, as to hate a friend. But withal, the moderateſt, and wiſeſt, and moſt elevated minds, though they would not command or oblige all men to love enemies, do yet commend it as moſt honourable ſo to do, and give many excellent reaſons for it, and conclude, That the wiſe and good man hath no enemy. So that from all this, the ſhort is, That the Jews taking ſome advantage from thoſe forementioned commands of Moſes, and miſtaking them, did think it lawful to hate others of different Religions, i. e. all other Nations, (and the ſame may be obſerved of the Grecians towards the reſt of the world under the title of Barbarians:) but in this did they both againſt the Law of Moſes, as hath been ſhewed, and againſt the Law of Nature, by which hating or hurting is avowed only in caſe of injuries done, and even then alſo the contrary commended: and ſo that which Chriſt hath here to do, is, partly to recal and reform the Jews to the Law of Nature, and to command that which that Law commended; partly to advance, and ſet it higher than the Law of the Jews had required of them before.

The Law of Nature.

S. What

S. What then is now the Law of Christ in this matter?

The Law of Christ.

C. It is set down vers. 44. But I say unto you, Love your Enemies, &c. to the end of this Chapter. The sum of which is that other mens faults or sins against us, nay, against God himself (for the Jews enemies, the people of the seven Nations, Amorites, &c. being most detestable sinners before God, are here referred to in this word, Enemies) give not us any dispensation for the non-payment of that great debt of our nature, love to all our kind. It is true indeed, the passions and affections that our nature is subject to, do encline us to revenge against our enemies; or if we can conquer that, yet we cannot chuse but make a distinction between friends and foes, and at least have a great coldness and indifference to those who have deserved so ill at our hands. But Christ is come to mortifie those affections of rage and revenge; and to lead us (higher than nature would bring us) to affections, and words, and actions of kindness and benignity to those that have expresst the contrary of every of these towards us.

S. But is it not abundantly sufficient, if my affections and behaviour toward mine enemy be not like his to me, unkind, retaliating of injuries, &c? Is there any more required of me?

C. Yes undoubtedly of a Christian; who is to transcribe that copy, that Christ's own dealing with us, when we were enemies, did set us. I must not only negatively, not hate, or curse, or pursue with injuries; but positively love, and bless, and do good, and pray for my greatest enemy.

Of loving.

S. What is meant by loving him?

C. That denotes the affection of charity and kindness and benignity toward him: 1. Wishing him all the good in the world, but that especially which he most wanteth, the good of his Soul, conviction of sin, reformation, &c. 2. Pitying and compassionating him, and that the more for being my enemy, because that implies a sin in him, which is of all things the most proper matter of compassion; 3. Being cordially affected toward him.

S. What is meant by blessing him?

* blessing, εὐλογίτε.

C. The word in * Greek, and the opposition to cursing, (i. e. evil or bitter speaking) noteth kindness and friendliness of language, giving them all friendly and courteous words, who have nothing but railing and evil speaking for us; commending in them whatever is capable of our praises, though they do nothing but defame and backbite us.

S. What is meant by doing good to them?

C. All outward real effects and actions of charity: Such are alms, if they be in want; feeding, giving to drink, clothing them, when they are hungry, thirsty, naked; comfort, if in any distress; counsel, if in any difficulty; rescuing their goods, &c. if we see them in danger; admonishing them in a friendly manner, and such as may be most likely to prevail with them, when we see them falling into any sin; reproving and correcting fatherly, when we see them fallen: In a word, contributing our utmost to the good of their bodies, estates, families, reputations, but especially their souls; and all this without any tincture of revenge or rage mixing with it.

Praying for enemies.

S. What is meant by praying for them?

C. Desiring of God for them whatsoever they want: 1. Grace for amendment of life; 2. Pardon of sin, with an expression of my free pardoning them; 3. All other blessings temporal and spiritual which they stand in need of. And because the practice of this is such a stranger to the world, I shall (at once to prove and exemplifie this duty) set you a copy of it, a very antient form transcribed from St. Basil, one of the holiest Champions of the Church of Christ, which from him you may not fear to use or imitate.

A Prayer

A Prayer of St. Basil's translated out of a Greek Manuscript in the University-Library of OXFORD.

O Long-suffering and eternal King, that for the condemnation that came by the Tree, wert lifted up on the Tree, (and taken from this Earth by that shameful death) and hast shewed forth thy self to all that chuse to follow thy steps a pattern and copy of long-sufferance and patience, that offeredst up thy intercession to thy co-eternal Father, for those very fighters against God which crucified thee: Do thou, O Lord, thou the same lover of mankind, afford thy mercy and pardon to all that are enemies to us, which either by treachery, or reproach, or contumely, or envy, or by any other means, through the treachery or calumny of the Devil, that lover of hatred, have expreſt their malice or madneſs againſt us: Change their counſels from that miſchievous, to a ſweet Chriſtian temper of gentleneſs; infuſe into their hearts ſincere unfeigned love; bind them faſt to us in the inviolable bands of Spiritual friendſhip; and by what means thou knoweſt moſt fit, make them partakers of thy pure life. As for thoſe that love us, or for thy holy Names ſake do adminiſter to our bodily neceſſities, repay them with the riches and abundance of thy gifts, and vouchſafe them the lot and portion of faithful and wiſe Stewards; and for thoſe that out of good affection have remembred our infirmities, or have prayed for us, reward them with thy plenteous grace. To thoſe that have commanded us miſerable unworthy Creatures to pray for them, grant thoſe things that be profitable for them, and yield them thoſe requeſts of theirs which tend to their ſalvation, and ſend them from thy holy place thy rich mercies and bowels of compaſſion. And, O thou Father of Compaſſions, pity all thoſe that truſt in thee, draw all to the Divine love of thee: be thou preſident in all things, and aſſiſtant to all, together with us thy ſinful and unprofitable Servants, and make us all Heirs of thy Kingdom; for to thee it belongs to ſhew mercy, and to ſave us, O our God, for thine is the power for ever. Amen.

S. This is a duty of ſome difficulty: what help can you direct me to, to facilitate the performance of it?

C. Many conſiderations there are which will tend to that end. Three there are here named. Conſiderations to facilitate this duty.

S. Which be they?

C. The firſt is the example of God, who ſheweth mercy to ſinners who are his enemies; and, in the outward diſpenſation of temporal bleſſings, giveth as liberal a portion many times to the wicked, unthankful provokers, as to his good ſervants; and for the common advantages of life, Sun and Rain, diſpenſeth them generally in an equality to all. And then for us to do the like is a God-like thing, the greateſt dignity that our nature is capable of. The firſt.

S. What is the ſecond help?

C. The conſideration of the Reward which God hath decreed for ſuch who do this, and that proportioned to their actions; viz. Retribution of good for evil, of mercy and happineſs, though we are ſinners and enemies. Whoſoever doth but think of that, how much the joys of Heaven for eternity are beyond the pleaſure of a little revenge for the preſent, will never think fit to make ſuch an unequal exchange, to loſe ſo rich a reward for ſo poor a pleaſure. The ſecond.

S. What is the third help?

C. The conſideration of what is done by all others, the vileſt and wickedeſt men in the world. For ſuch were the Publicans accounted, and yet they could think themſelves obliged to love their friends, and ſatisfie that obligation; they could uſe Civilities and courteous Compellations and Salutations to their Neighbours, &c. And if we, who are bound to exceed the Scribes, and Phariſees, the ſtricteſt Sect among the Jews, ſhall be but in the ſame rank with Publicans, (who are other-where put with Heathens and Harlots and Sinners) the vileſt and moſt abominable of all men, this will ſure be a great reproach to us Chriſtians. The third.

S. What other Motives can you add in this matter, why I ſhould love my enemies?

C. 1. That by this means I ſhall conquer my ſelf, my unruly paſſions, which is a moſt glorious heroical piece of Victory. 2. That by this I ſhall preſerve my ſelf in a great calmneſs and quiet of mind; which thoughts of revenge wholly deprive me of. 3. That this is of all other the moſt probable way of overcoming my enemy; Revenge being a means of exaſperating and inflaming him, Charity of melting him. Which if I do, I firſt get a Friend for an enemy; and ſecondly, have the honour and claim to the reward due to them that convert ſinners from the error of their ways. 4. That this is a way of excelling all other men in the world, none but Chriſtians thinking themſelves obliged to do this. 5. That this is the ſpecial way of Chriſtian Perfection, and is ſo called in the cloſe of this Chapter, Be ye perfect, as your Father which is in Heaven is perfect. In ſtead of which St. Luke reads, 6. 36. Be ye merciful, &c. noting this Mercy or Alms or Benignity to Enemies to be the higheſt degree of Chriſtian Perfection. Five Motives more.

S. I beseech God by his renewing quickning Spirit to mortifie the contrary sin, and work this truly Christian grace in my heart. You have past through the fifth Chapter, and so Christ's Reformations of and Additions to the old Commandments: I will not question why Christ reformed or improved no more of them, it is sufficient to me that he hath not; which being an act of his wisdom, it is not for man to question, but acquiesce in.

C. You judge aright; yet do I conceive that three other Commandments of the second Table Christ hath also improved in this Sermon. The eighth, that against stealing, he hath improved into doing unto others all things which we desire should be done by them to us, Chap. 7. 12. The ninth, that of not bearing false witness, he hath improved into not judging, Chap. 7. 1. The last of not coveting, into taking no thought, Chap. 6. 25, &c. And for those three you may have patience till you come to those places, and then you shall have them explained to you.

Sect. XI. Of the fifth Commandment.

As for the fifth (which is the only one of the second Table which will then be left out) there may be particular reason for it, because that honour of Father and Mother, obedience to Superiours, Magistrates, &c. was by the Jewish Law advanced so high, even to the prohibiting of thoughts of evil against such (which, say the Jews, is the only case wherein thoughts are prohibited) that there was no need, or almost possibility, of setting it higher in respect of the degree. And for any thing else in that matter, it will be worth your marking, that Christ medled not with it. Though he were, as God, the King of all Kings, and might have changed or disposed of their Dominions as he pleased; yet he was not pleased to make any alteration, but to continue and settle all in that course wherein it had formerly been placed by God himself, living in subjection to the known Laws, paying tribute to Cæsar, and not so much as accepting the judicial cognizance of an offence when he was put upon it: so that what he added to Moses in this matter was only greater reverence and awe to the Father, or Magistrate, or Civil power, not any retrenching of his former rights. In which he was so extremely careful, and tender above ordinary, that whereas Moses among the Egyptians, when he was but a private man, did take upon him to exercise an act of judicature on the Egyptian which wronged the Israelite, Exod. 2. 12. Christ would never do any such thing, but left the woman taken in adultery, and other offenders, to the ordinary legal course, and would not upon any importunity usurp or take upon him any thing in that matter. By which, if you please, you may discern how far from the practice and Gospel of Christ are those Doctrines of ambitious men, which have made Christian Religion a ground or excuse of moving and disquieting of States, and shaking if not dissolving, of Kingdoms.

Christ meddles not with Dominion among men.

S. What Doctrines are those?

Doctrines of Sedition.

C. I had rather you should be ignorant of them; yet those which are so famous, that you will hardly escape the knowing of them, I shall mention to you, that you may be careful to avoid them. 1. That of some adorers of the Papacy, viz. That the pretended Vicar of Christ, as successor of St. Peter, hath two Swords given him by Christ, the Spiritual, and the Temporal; and that by that means he hath power to dispose of all the Kingdoms of the World, and in case of Heresie, to excommunicate Princes, and absolve all Subjects from their bands of Allegeance to them. A thing so ridiculous to be affirmed of the Pope as Christ's Vicar, (if it were supposed that he were so, beyond all other Bishops, when, as I have already shewed you, Christ himself absolutely disclaimed all such power, and, beside that he gave no Sword, but only Keys, to Peter, most sharply reprehended him for using the Sword, though against the apprehenders of Christ himself) that more considerate Papists discerning this, and yet unwilling to devest the Pope of that so long usurped power, have found it necessary to pretend another Tenure for him; and therefore style the Pope not the Vicar of Christ (for that would give him no power, so much as of a Civil Judge) but the * Vicar of God, whom he hath set up to be his Vicegerent over all the World: a doctrine too senseless to need, and not so much avowed as to expect, a confutation. Of which whole matter it is enough to observe, that it is set as a Character of Christ's greatest enemy, Antichrist himself, that he shall exalt himself above all that is called God, i. e. (as it is ordinarily interpreted) above all the Kings of the Earth. All that will be useful for you to learn is the unchristianness of those actions in Subjects which are built on such Antichristian principles as these, such as are Rebellion, Treason, Sedition, attempting the commotion of States, on colour of Religion; or any other title or priviledge from Christ (or any Vicar, or Officer, of his) to do so; defaming, speaking evil of Dignities, &c. 2. A second Doctrine of this nature is that which some speculators and nice wits have pitcht on, by mistaking of some Scriptures; and not fore-seeing the dangerous consequents of it, viz. That all † Dominion (whether of any private man over his own Possessions, or of a King over his Subjects) is founded in Grace, i. e. That no man hath right to rule others, or even to possess any part of his own inheritance, but he who is in the favour of God, a gracious spiritual person. A Doctrine absolutely destructive to all Government and to all Community; every man that thinks himself godly, (as when so much advantage is to be made of it, every ill man will either think, or, which is all one in effect, pretend himself to be) having by this Doctrine authority to rebel against any, to despoil any, whose power or wealth is an eye sore to him, there being no other Judge on Earth, but his own censorious, or mutinous, or covetous humor, to pronounce infallibly of any man; whether he be a Child of God, or no. As for the falseness of it, it were sufficient to say from Christ, That God sends his rain on the unjust as well as the just; and therefore the latter of them hath not the Inclosure of the good things of this world, whether riches or power: Or secondly, That we are forbidden to judge before the time; and therefore if it were granted that none but the just hath that title, yet were there noway of defining who is just in this life; nor consequently of disseising the wicked of his inheritance: And thirdly, That he that is not now within that Covenant of Grace may be within it to morrow; and therefore that that Doctrine would bring in all uncertainty and confusion. But I conceive there is a Chapter in the New Testament that is most of it set on purpose against this Doctrine, as against a branch of the Heresie of those that then called themselves Gnosticks; it is 1 Tim. 6. And if you please, because it is not readily understood, I will give you a Paraphrase of it, for the former part of it, which most specially concerns this purpose, 1 Tim. 6. 1. Those Christians which are servants under yoke, (i. e. Bondslaves to Heathens) must perform all that service and obedience to them which belongs to them by the Laws of servants among the Heathens, that the Profession and Doctrine of the Gospel

Gospel or Christianity be not evil spoken of by those Heathens, as it will be, if they see men prove the worse servants for being Christians.

Vers. 2. And those Christians again that have Christians for their Masters, must not despise them, or detract any part of that obedience which is due to them, upon pretence, that by being Christians they are become their equals or brethren: but let them rather consider that their Christianity obliges them to perform most diligent service to them, because the Faith and love that constitutes men Christians, consists in [a] helping and assisting one another to do good, which is all wherein their service consists. And that this be the practice of all servants, do thou, who art to instruct them, take care by thy Doctrine and Exhortation.

[a] So ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι & ἐνεργεσίας signifies: ἀντιλαμβάνω is not to partake; (that is συλλαμβάνεσθαι) but to take up at the other end, (as in carrying a flasket) and so help to bear the burthen, or, (as ἀντὶ signifies pro) to take up and bear any weight in anothers stead, i. e. to help or assist, and particularly to take care of, as Isai. 26. 2. ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι ἀληθείας, that take care of the truth: and ἐνεργεία is in an active not passive sence, as Acts 4. 9. (the only place besides where it is used) it signifies doing good, not receiving it.

3. And for those Gnosticks (mentioned verse 20. with the same character there set upon them as here) which teach Libertinism instead of the Doctrine of Christianity and Piety;

4. This you may observe and mark of them, that they are puft up with an opinion of [b] knowledge (whence they take their name) whereas indeed they know nothing, and study nothing but [c] disputings, and verbal controversies, which have no matter of substance in them, and this studying is a kind of [d] disease in them, or distemper, at least an effect of it: and all that comes of it is, envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings.

[c] So ζητήσεις & συζητήσεις signifie.
[d] νοσῶν.

5. Odd kind of [e] discourses of men that have their minds perverted, and have [f] lost the truth, and have taken up an opinion (which caused the Apostle's speaking of them at that time) that the [g] Christian Religion is a gainful trade, a means of helping one to secular advantages (as that a Servant shall be made free by that means, &c. which occasioned this discourse,) From such teachers and doers as these, do thou separate thy self; express thy dislike of them by some means, exercise some part of Ecclesiastical [h] censure by way of discipline upon them.

[e] Διατειδὴ, a discourse παρεδιατειδὴ, a discourse out of the way,
[f] So ἀποστερῆσθαι signifies.
[g] ἐυσέβεια.
[h] So ἀΐδιον noteth.

6. As for that opinion of theirs, That the Gospel or Christianity is a gainful calling, though it be not true in that sence wherein they use (or whereto they apply) it; yet in this other sence it is most Orthodox, That Christianity with a competency is all the wealth in the world.

7. For it teacheth us this, That having brought no treasure with us into the world, it is certain that we shall carry none out; and therefore,

8. If for the time that we live here, we have enough for the necessaries of life, food and raiment, (as any man that useth those means that Christianity directs to shall never fail of them (we shall in this be * sufficiently provided for.

* That is the meaning of ἀρκεσθησόμεθα τούτοις, in these we shall have enough, or with these we shall be satisfied; nor as we render, [Let us therewith be content] for it is in the future tense, and in the Indicative, not the Subjunctive Mood, and, ἀρκῶσθαι is properly to have enough, and so αὐτάρκεια v. 6. having enough of his own, without inordinate means to get it. So the Syriack renders it [wherefore meat and cloathing are sufficient for us] ܟܦܝܢ from ܟܦ or ܫܦ both in sence and sound sufficio, differing from the Latin word, only in the Latin termination.

9. But they that will not be thus satisfied, but will be rich, lay up treasures in this world, (and so for power and authority) and make Religion a means to procure them, they do by this ingulf themselves into all the dangers and temptations in the world.

This place you see is directly confronted against that doctrine; and if you will consult 1 Cor. 7. 20. and explain those words, [Let every man in that calling whereunto he is called, therein abide] as the context will enforce; you will find this to be the result of them, not that it is unlawful for a Christian to improve his estate or condition in this world, (for verse 21. the Apostle advises slaves to obtain their freedom, if they can) but to shew us, that to think our selves free from any obligation of this world by virtue of our Christianity, is to make Christian liberty a pretence to the satisfying of our concupiscence or carnal desire, and so a thing most unchristian in those Gnosticks, which there also are spoken against by this Apostle.

By all this you see this Doctrine as punctually prevented, as if it had been by Prophecy foreseen so long before, it being indeed the Doctrine of the then present Gnosticks, (as will farther appear by what is said of them distinctly, 2 Pet. 2. 10. That they despise dominion, and fear not to speak evil of dignities: and so, Jude 8. [k] they set at nought dominion, evacuate, take it away;) then in latter times by the Schoolmen revived; and of late by others brought back into the world again. The observing this antidote against it will secure you from many hurtful practices, of which this last age hath been fruitful beyond all others. Some other Doctrines there are of this same making very fatal to Government, especially to Monarchy: but instead of insisting on them, I shall put you in mind of this great truth, that Christ and his Disciples were, of all the Doctors that ever were in the world, the most careful to preserve the Doctrine and practice of Allegeance, even when the Emperours were the greatest opposers of the Christian Religion: and if ever you mean to be accounted a follower of them, you must go and do likewise.

S. But I pray give me here leave to insert one question concerning those Emperors, which is thought to be of some difficulty, Whether Christ in acknowledging allegeance due to Tiberius Cæsar, whose predecessors had so lately changed the ancient Government of Rome by the Senate, did not by that act of his Example give Liberty to us, that we may lawfully yield our allegeance to any unjust prevailing power whatsoever it be.

Christ's Example pretended for submission to the prevailing power.

C. The state of the Government of Rome at that time when Christ lived, must be considered distinctly what it was. It is true indeed, that Julius Cæsar had (not many years before) wrested the power out of the Senates hands, and changed the Government violently: but before this time of Tiberius, whereof now we speak, the business was so accorded between the Senate and the Emperors, that the Emperor now reigned unquestioned without any competition of the Senate: In him the power was quietly seated, the money superscribed with his Image, and Edicts sent out in his name, and he lookt upon by all (without any rival) as inferiour to God only. In which case of his acknowledged power, Christ being born in his dominions, thinks not fit to make a question of his right, where there was none made by the Romans, or to diſpute Cæſar's title (howſoever acquired by violence at firſt) when they from whom it was taken did acquieſce, and diſputed it not. Which caſe how diſtant it is from other forcible uſurpations, (where the Legal Sovereign doth ſtill claim his right to his Kingdoms, and to the Allegeance of his ſubjects, no way acquitting them from their Oaths, or laying down his pretenſions, though for the preſent he be over-powered) is eaſily diſcernible to any who hath the courage and fidelity to conſider it, and is not by his own intereſts bribed or frighted from the performance of his Chriſtian duty. It being withal moſt certain, That it belongs not to the Conveniences or Advantages of Subjects, to determine or prevail any thing in the buſineſs of Princes rights. I have briefly anſwered your ſcruple, and thus far inſiſted on this theme, though a little out of the way, becauſe the Fifth Commandment of the Law is the only one of the Second Table, that the following of Chriſt's method in this his Sermon doth not preſent to our conſideration, and yet was fit enough for you to learn ſomewhat of, above what you had in the Catechiſm of the Church.

Sect. XII. Of the duties of the firſt Table.

S. But why is there nothing here added by Chriſt concerning the duties of the Firſt Table, which immediately reſpects God? For that I conceive is clear, that no one of them, ſave only the Third, that about Swearing, hath yet been touched by our Saviour in this Sermon.

C. Beſide the Wiſdom of God, which even now you acknowledged ſufficient in this matter, many Reaſons might be farther rendred for this courſe of Chriſt's; eſpecially this, That the duties of the firſt Table were under Moſes ſet high (and explicated) enough already, and Chriſt needed not to repeat, ſave only what he meant to improve, or farther to illuſtrate and explain, and therefore repeated them not. Now for this a farther Reaſon may be rendred, taken from the different œconomy or adminiſtration of things under the Old and New Teſtament. Under the Old Teſtament God reſided among the Jews himſelf in his Divine Nature, (without taking upon him our fleſh) revealing himſelf to Moſes in the Mount, and in Viſions and illuſtrious Apparitions to him and other of the Patriarchs, and to the people continually in the Oracle, and ſo immediately diſpoſed of all things, that the Government of the Jews was by their Writers ſtyled the [1] Government of God himſelf. This Revelation of himſelf, and immediate reſidence among them, might make it fit and proper for him to give them Precepts for the Worſhip of God, (and for all kind of duties of that kind) as diſtinct and punctual, clear and high as could be: And ſo indeed it was an explicite elevated Law of Piety in general, to love the Lord their God with all their heart, with all their ſoul, with all their mind, and with all their ſtrength. And for the particulars of outward Performances, there were ſo many Cautions, ſo many Ceremonies, ſuch ſtrict performances of all kinds, that Chriſt did rather think fit to take off from the weights of thoſe burthens, than to add to them: And it is a common obſervation, That the Ceremonial part of the Old Teſtament Law, and all that which was Typical and preſignificative of ſomewhat to come under Chriſt's Kingdom, was then (as all poſitive Laws) obligatory only to them to whom it was given, i. e. to the Jews, but not to the reſt of the (then) Gentile or (now) Chriſtian world, no not to the very Proſelytes under the Old Teſtament, that came and lived among the Jews, but only to the Natives, and to thoſe that would be Proſelytes of Juſtice, i. e. would be in their Obedience as perfect Jews as they. But the ſtate of the Goſpel being of another œconomy, God the Son pitching his Tent in our nature, taking our very humane fleſh and ſoul upon him, and becoming very man among us, it was now moſt reaſonable that he ſhould heighten our obligations of duty (to that Nature which he had thus heightned and elevated to an higher pitch of dignity, by aſſuming it) and by giving us in our fleſh ſuch ſublime, viſible, elevated copies of charity toward all mankind, require us readily to tranſcribe them; eſpecially when he had alſo taken off ſo much of the former burthen of Ceremonies from our ſhoulders, and ſo leſſened our weight, and yet given more grace, than before was allowed under the Law, to ſuſtain it.

ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν, Jo. 1.

S. This is a very reaſonable account of this matter; but why then is one of the four Precepts concerning God (that of Perjury) mentioned and improved by him, and none elſe?

Perjury reſpects men as well as God.

C. The reaſon is clear, becauſe though that Commandment concern God, by calling him to witneſs whenſoever we ſwear, and by calling him to witneſs a lie, (which is a great vilifying of God) if we ſwear falſly; yet ordinarily it reſpecteth men alſo, and that more principally, becauſe they are wronged by my perjury, the promiſſory oath being indeed a means of ſecuring my Brother of any thing which I promiſe him, and the breaking of that, the betraying of this fortreſs which was to have ſecured him: and therefore it is obſervable in Saint James's prohibition of ſwearing, that he adds to the negative precept, this as the affirmative command, Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay, &c. i. e. Let your word be as good as an oath, be you moſt ſtrict in making good or performing your promiſes. And that I conceive to be the pitch to which Chriſt deſired to raiſe us in this matter, that we ſhould be ſo punctual in performing our promiſes to men, that they might not need an oath from us, to believe us in any thing; and ſo that we ſhould never ſwear at all, or, if we did, never have excuſe or pretence to do ſo. And to conclude this particular, you may mark that Chriſt having taken our fleſh upon him, the generality of all his Sermons and Precepts do chiefly reſpect our Brethren, (meekneſs, obedience, peaceableneſs, mercifulneſs;) and even for the other ſort of precepts, that concern God, he is content they ſhould ſometimes give way to theſe duties to our fellow-Chriſtians; I will have mercy, ſaith he, and not ſacrifice, Mat. 9. 13. and in the buſineſs of the Sabbath again, I will have mercy and not ſacrifice, Mat. 12. 17. i.e. When both cannot be performed, he prefers the work of charity, or mercy to our brethren, before the outward duties toward God himſelf.

Of the firſt Commandment.

S. I muſt now intreat but one favour more, (and it is from your own example in that former of honouring the Parents) that having not elſewhere as yet explained theſe three Commandments of the Firſt Table to me, you will now pleaſe to do it, (with what brevity you pleaſe, (as you did even now the Fifth Commandment) becauſe they be not directly in your way in this place) and then I ſhall hope to put all together, and ſhall conceive my ſelf to have received ſufficient light for the underſtanding of the whole Decalogue. I ſhall ſuppoſe my requeſt granted, and beſeech you to begin with the firſt, [Thou ſhalt have no other God's but me, or before me] What is the general importance of that Precept?

C. That

C. That we must acknowledge the God of Israel to be God, and as firmly resolve that there is no other God before, or beside him.

S. What is it to acknowledge him to be God?

C. To perform to him those several parts of duty which belong from a creature to his God.

S. Which be they?

C. I shall need but to name them, because they have most of them been formerly (and will hereafter on peculiar occasions be) explained to you. Such are Faith, Hope, Love, Fear, Trust, Honour, Worship, and Prayer to him, and that in all the parts of Prayer, both in imploring his mercy, and the grateful acknowledgment of what hath been received from him; which is proportionable to Sacrifice, which always among Jews and Gentiles was resolved to be God's peculiar. And you may observe that there is such a sympathy and concent betwixt the first Article in the Creed (and the first Petitions in the Lord's Prayer) and this first Commandment, that the due explication of them, (which hereafter I shall give you) will be a Comment upon this Commandment. Duties to God.

S. I will then expect till those seasons, and proceed to the second Commandment; What is the prime importance of that? Of the second Commandment.

C. It is the arming and fortifying our hearts against all other rivals that may possibly interpose to divert that honour and worship that are due from us to God only. The Heathen World, by that snare to the eye, that tempting bait of Images, and some Carnalities that were ordinarily annext to the use of them, were brought to the worshipping of a many false, or no gods, and some of them the basest, meanest creatures in the world. The Jews contrarily were disciplined by God to the worshipping of the one, invisible, infinite Deity, that had never been seen in any resemblance, and was therefore so to be worshipt, in a place and a manner peculiar to him, and appointed by him. And the making of Images at that time being generally by the Gentiles designed to be worshipt, and the danger being very great, that the Jews would be corrupted by them, (though when that danger was not observable, they were not only counted lawful to be made, but set up sometimes by God's own appointment, as the Pictures of the Cherubim, &c.) this being eminently true of the graven or molten Images (which were by their Ceremonies of Consecration conceived to become the bodies of their god inspirited by them) they were strictly forbidden by God, and the last of them, that of embossed Images, became (as it is thought) unlawful to a Jew either to make, or to bow in their presence, though they did not perform any worship to them. And although that great strictness did not extend to all or any of the other Nations, and consequently not to us Christians; yet God's Jealousie of a rival being a thing wherein all mankind are concerned, especially Christians, the performance of any Divine Worship to any Creature in the World, and the very use of any other thing in the service of God which is by others worshipped, and by which we are in any imminent danger to be corrupted, is to be conceived forbidden to all Christians by the force of that Commandment. So also all that vileness and filthiness which was wont to be used in their Idol-feasts; (which hath been the subject of [m] another Discourse.) Besides this Negative part of the Commandment, other particulars there are to which the Affirmative part extends: as that, bowing down, adoration or bodily worship is due from us to the one true God, (though not to those idol false gods) a tribute peculiarly due to him, which hath made and redeemed our bodies as well as souls, and this debt must in any reason be paid to him; and the worshipping of God in spirit and in truth, John 4. 23. (which is only set in opposition to the worshipping on that Mountain, and in Jerusalem, i. e. to the Samaritan and Jewish worship) is no way exclusive of, or contrary to this external worship of the body, when it is bestowed on the one true object, and hath the fervency and sincerity of the soul going along with it; for then sure that (even bodily) worship is performed in spirit and in truth, whatsoever those words signifie; the spirits which we have, not ceasing to be such, when they are yoaked and joined with bodies. Images. [m] Of Idolatry. Duties of the Second Commandment.

S. What is the importance of the Fourth Commandment? Of the Fourth Commandment.

C. It is a designation of time for the special performing of God's publick worship. For the worship it self being first setled, the branches together with the object of it agreed on, in all reason some time should be set apart for the publick special performance of it. And the Precept in this matter given to the Jews, although it have something in it Typical, viz. the strict rest for that whole day, which imported a rest wherein all Christians are concerned, the ceasing of our whole life, from our own works, i. e. from sin, the true meaning of the Christian Sabbath, Isai. 58. 13. (and therefore the Fourth Commandment is interpreted by our Church Catechism to signifie to us the necessity of our serving God truly all the days of our life;) and secondly, although being a Positive Precept, given particularly to the Jews, it be not punctually in every particular obligatory to us Christians (that live not by their Laws) yet will it conclude, from the equity of that command, many things of use unto us. As 1. that it is not only lawful, but (for a publick community of men) necessary, to set apart some set times for God's service, and by the same reason some set places, set vestments, gestures, and other the like Ceremonies, such as may best both comply with, and help, accompany, and heighten our spiritual performances unto God. 2. That what is thus set apart to God's use, is said to be sanctified or hallowed, i. e. to have a [n] separate respect due to it, such, as that it must not ordinarily be mixed with profane and common uses: which is also the importance of the Rest joined with the hallowing, the not mixing our worldly employments with our divine performances. 3. That the remembrance of God's special mercies is a fit hint or occasion to pitch upon some day, or time, or place, &c. in relation thereto, and thus to discriminate it from others. Such was the [o] Creation of the World mentioned there, and the Resurrection of Christ in the Christian Church; and yet this latter not appointed to supplant or swallow up the former, but only, as it deserved of us Christians, to be preferred before it, as for some hundreds of years in the ancient Church, the Jewish Sabbath It is somewhat Typical and Positive. The equity of it to Christians. Set times to commemorate mercies.

[n] So διχωρίσθηναι, Eccles. 33. 8. is set to signifie that holy separate state bestowed ἐν γνώσει κυρίου, in or by God's knowledge, on one day above another, according to the notion of the Hebrew קדש both for hallowing and separating. [o] The Creation and Resurrection. τὸ σάββατον ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἑορτάζειν, ἵνα τὸ μὲν δημιουργίας ᾖ σύμβολον, τὸ δὲ ἀναστάσεως, *Clem. was was retained in (a great part, at leaſt, of) the Chriſtian Church together with the Lord's-day, and the ſervices proportioned to them both, but the latter preferred before the former: and if in every week, or month, or year, we ſhould ſet ſome time apart to commemorate God's mercy in the Creation, and all his other acts of gracious providence belonging to our preſervation, it would be no ſuperſtition, but an act of piety, in any ſingle Chriſtian, or (if authority ſhould think good) in any publick ſociety of them. So likewiſe the Birth, Paſſion, Aſcenſion of Chriſt, the Deſcent of the Spirit, the Birth or Martyrdom of the Apoſtles and Saints of Scripture, and any remarkable temporal deliverance, or (in proportion alſo) any matter of humiliation, any ſin or judgment on a Kingdom, &c. will by the example of God himſelf (both in that Fourth Commandment, and in other Feaſts and Faſts preſcribed by him) be reſolved on to be fit ſeaſons and opportunities to conſecrate ſome conſiderable part of our time (yea and of our wealth alſo) unto God. 4. That as God did then, ſo (Chriſt having tranſmitted his power to them) the Apoſtles and ſucceeding Church of God now may very reaſonably diſpoſe of us in matters of this nature, and direct all it's members into ſome uniform way, at ſuch ſet times, in ſuch ſet places of the Worſhip of God: and that they have ſo done, appears both by ſome mentions of the Lord's day in holy Scripture, and by the conſtant ſuffrage of the Fathers of the Church ſince that time; which is a ſufficient obligation on all Chriſtians to a due, conſtant, diligent obſervation of it, over and above that of the Fourth Commandment.

The Lord's day.

S. How is the time thus ſet apart to be employed?

How to be employed.

C. To the practice and advancement of Piety in private and in publick: in private, to private reading, prayer, thankſgiving, meditation, &c. in publick, to publick exerciſe of the ſame, publick reading, prayer, preaching, inſtructing of youth, (by the hand of the lawful Miniſter, authoriſed to be a publick perſon both from God to us, and from us to God) together with the uſe of the Sacraments, (in ſuch manner, and with that frequency, as ſhall ſeem good to thoſe to whoſe charge we are committed) with all due care, reverence, and zeal: not ſlightly, or formally, or profanely, but ſo as will beſt tend to the encreaſe of piety and charity, to the benefit, not enſnaring, of mankind, the Sabbath (and all ſuch inſtitutions) P being made for man, i. e. for man's good, and Chriſt (being God) the Author of this Poſitive Law, having delivered it with that reſpect to Moral duties, that the outward part of it (that which concerned bodily reſt) ſhould yield place to works of mercy or pity to our ſelves or others; and conſequently that man, and eſpecially the Chriſtian, ſhould not be ſo enſlaved to it, but that he hath power over it, to do what is moſt to his other Chriſtian ends of charity, mercy, &c. on that day. I ſhould ſpend a larger time on this Commandment, to give you a diſtinct apprehenſion of it, and to enforce the duties of the day (as they now belong to us) more earneſtly, but that it comes in with ſome violence in this place; and therefore I ſhall add no more of it.

P Periculum animæ impellit Sabbatum. Proverb. Heb. & Sabbatum datum eſt in manus hominis, non homo in manum Sabbati.

S. I am well ſatisfied with that proportion which you have afforded me, and ſhould here conclude your trouble, had not the mention of the days of the Birth, Paſſion and Aſcenſion of Chriſt, and of the births and martyrdoms of the Apoſtles and Saints of Scripture, made it a little neceſſary for me to require your aſſiſtance and direction in that matter, to tell me whether you think it firſt lawful, and then either commendable or neceſſary, to retain ſuch Feſtivities in the Church, or indeed any, beſides that of the Lord's day already inſiſted on.

Of Feſtivities.

C. That the obſervation of ſuch other Feſtivities is lawful, I ſhall firſt make appear to you: And that I may do it the more fully, I ſhall faſten upon ſome one of them (by analogy with which the reſt will alſo be concluded) and it ſhall be the firſt and the principal, that of the Nativity of Chriſt.

Of Chriſtmas.

And to vindicate the lawfulneſs of that obſervation againſt gain-ſayers, I ſhall think my ſelf obliged to clear this propoſition, That the celebration and commemoration of the Birth of Chriſt is under no moral or Chriſtian prejudice, is no way contrary, but altogether agreeable to the Doctrine of the New Teſtament and the frame of Chriſtian Religion.

S. That you may do this, I ſhall mention to you in order, the prejudices which it is conceived to be under. 1. The Riot which is commonly uſed in the celebrating of this Feſtivity. 2. The ſin of Will-worſhip. 3. Of ſuperſtition in the beginning and continuing of it. Will you begin firſt with the firſt of theſe?

The Riot unlawful.

C. I will, and firſt acknowledge to you, that all riot or exceſs is a ſin, and that far greater and more culpable in a Chriſtian than in any man elſe, particularly than in a Jew, whoſe promiſes of an earthly plenty are not near ſo contrary and unreconcileable with corporeal exceſſes, as are thoſe ſpiritual joys, which are the Chriſtians eminent (if not only) portion both in this and another life. But then ſecondly, It is as certain, that Feſtivities are very ſeparable from riot or luxury in a Chriſtian Common-wealth. The Heathen Feaſts and Sacrifices had little elſe in them: gluttony and drunkenneſs being the preſcribed worſhip and way of approving themſelves to ſome of their idol-gods, and uncleanneſs the deſign of others; if not openly in their Temples, yet ſecretly in their receſſes and myſteries: and ſo both ſorts recommended to them under the opinion of piety and holineſs.

The Feſtival lawful.

But the Chriſtian Feſtival being wholly made up of Chriſtian dainties, (Chriſtian inſtruction, Prayers, Thankſgiving and Alms, and not feeding corporally, ſave in the Sacrament only) is perfectly free from having any degree of luxury or exceſs intrinſecal or eſſential to it. As for the cuſtomary hoſpitality or good chear of thoſe ſeaſons, that (though it be a decent attendant on the Feſtivity) is not yet of the eſſence or ſubſtance of it; and therefore the exceſſes and vices of men, which alſo are but occaſioned at moſt, and not cauſed, by that good chear, are not in any equity imputable to that, much leſs to the Feſtivity it ſelf: the Prayers and Praiſes on that day (wherein the Feſtivity conſiſts) being ſurely free from the guilt of ſo much, as of occaſioning that riot. And indeed what uſe would there be of Laws or Magiſtrates, if it were not in their power (without utter aboliſhing the Feſtivity) to reform ſuch exceſſes as theſe? Mean while, it is every man's duty to take all care to remove this ſcandal, and purge this duty from ſuch blemiſhes as theſe, to be moſt ſtrictly temperate at ſuch times wherein Chriſt entred into the world to bring all purity into it: and then this will ceaſe to be an objection, if as yet it be one.

S. This

S. This first prejudice hath been easily removed by you: please you to proceed now to the second, the charge of Will-worship that lies on it.

C. This charge is wholly a mistake, whether you respect those which now observe, or those which first instituted this Festivity. In those which now retain that usage, and observe it in obedience to the Canons of the Church, and no otherwise, it proceeds from that moral principle of obedience to Superiours, which is a duty owing to the Fifth Commandment of the Law, as immediately and directly as chastity is to the Seventh. And for those who first instituted it, without any precedent command from others (and so are the only persons in whom it can possibly be called Will-worship) they will be also very far from any fault or guilt deriveable from hence: It being clear that even among the Jews some feasts have been instituted by themselves without any command of God, the feast of Purim in the book of Esther, and the feast of Dedication, 1 Mac. 4. 59. and the latter of them used in Christ's time in the New Testament, and approved by Christ's presence at it. And so the third, and sixth, and ninth hours of prayer were received only by Jewish custom or Law of their own, not of God's enacting, and yet are observed by the Apostles, Acts 2. 15. and 3. 1. and 10. 9. And indeed the case is clear, that any thing of this nature, of free-will-offerings, &c. is likely to be the more, not the less, acceptable for being voluntary.

The objection of Will-worship answered.

See Tr. of Will-worship.

S. What say you then to the third prejudice, that of Superstition?

C. That is a calumny also. For if the word superstition be taken in the proptiety of the notion either of the Greek or Latin, for the worshipping of [q] Dæmons, or the souls of dead men; then can it not without blasphemy (and making our God and our Christ (which alone are worshipt in that Festivity) a Dæmon, or spirit of a mere dead man) be affixt to this institution: or if it be taken improperly and abusively, for the placing of that sanctity in such days and performances which belong not to them, then will not this be any way appliable to the observation of this day: For the Birth of Christ (the business and occasion of this Festivity) is certainly a mercy of such a quality (whether we consider our own wants, or the no other way imaginable to repair them, or whether the strangeness of this way, or the goodness united to the wisdom of God in designing it) that it cannot well be overvalued by us, especially when it is affirmed by Christ himself of Abraham, (the representative of all faithful Christians, as well as father of all Jews) that he rejoiced to see this his day of birth, or coming into the world, with all attending it, John 8. 56. And again, when the Angel himself expresses it by the title of good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people, Luke 2. 10. because this day is born to you a Saviour, &c. And lastly, when (as an essay of that joy) the whole heavenly host, verse 14. join together in the Doxology, Glory to God on high, &c. and (as the Writer to the Hebrews applies it to this very matter of the time of God's bringing Christ into the world) All the Angels of God worship him, Heb. 1. 6. All which being considered as our copies and examples; there will be little reason to fear that a transcript taken so far short of the original should have any criminous excess in it; the greater danger is, that we offend on the other side. And secondly, for the services performed on this day, they are looked upon by us but as they are, as acceptable tributes and acknowledgments unto God, in the way (prescribed by him) of praise and thanksgiving, and so there is no appearance of excess or superstition in those neither. Thirdly, For the instituting or setting apart a day for this duty every year, this cannot be an excess; 1. Because a duty cannot be performed without the circumstance of time, and that it is a certain set time, tends only to the securing of the duty of some time against the frailties of men and disturbances of the world, which might otherwise supplant and rob it of all: And 2. because the Angels doing it on the very day of Christ's Birth, will not only be an evidence of the fitness (which is more than lawfulness) of doing it on a set day, but withal an example to us, both to observe the duty, and fix the time of performing it. And seeing they cannot be imitated by us exactly by our bearing them company on the very day, the next and most natural way of endeavouring it, is to do it on the anniversary return of that day. Fourthly, If the strict abstaining from the labours of the ordinary calling on that day be the thing charged with the excess, the answer is clear, That that Rest is agreeable to what God hath appointed on all days of Festivity and Fasting, and so proportionable to God's examples, and is also in it self absolutely necessary to a day of the publick service of God: the works of the calling being unreconcileable with the solemn Assemblies, and worldly thoughts very fit to be ceremoniously laid aside, that they may not intrude too rudely and mix with those services. And then what's so agreeable to God's patterns, and proper and natural toward so good an end, cannot be thought an excess, or culpable in that respect. Fifthly, For the setting apart this set day, the 25. of December, (which by some is doubted whether it be the day or no, and thence is made guilty of strengthening men in blindness and superstition) I answer, 1. That if indeed the day were mistaken, yet the matter of the mistake being of no greater moment than the false calculating of a day, (which were it (once) never so accurately set, the least slip in Chronology or want of exactness in Calenders would alter it again) the mistake will sure be very pardonable in those who verily think they are not mistaken: And as long as those who are supposed to be in this errour do perform the business of the day as completely and substantially on a mistaken day as they could do on the true one (if it were revealed infallibly which it were) the excuse of blameless ignorance will wash away greater errours than this of the day, supposing it were an errour. But then, secondly, there is little reason to doubt but that this which we now observe is the very day. For the testimony of Saint Chrysostom is clear for the tradition of it, out of the [r] Censual Tables at Rome, wherein the day is set down; affirming, that they [r] which knew those records exactly, and that had a long time celebrated it as from an [s] ancient Tradition, had now sent them knowledge of it. And so both the Greek and Latin Churches, which had very sharp contentions about the time of keeping of Easter, have yet agreed uniformly in this, asserting it from the * Tradition of the Church. In the next place, For the Character which Saint Paul sets on the observation of daies, Gal. 4. 10. (and to which the Fathers affix the Title of Superstition)

As also of Superstition.

tion) I answer, That it is most clear, that that place belongs not at all to Christian feasts. The words there may possibly refer to Jewish feasts, (as may seem probable from the mention of their willingness to be under the Law, ver. 21.) and then the days] will signifie Sabbaths; the months] New months; the times] their Anniversary feasts; and the years] their Sabbatick years and Jubilees. And in this interpretation those words will no way prejudge the Christian Feasts. For though the Jewish observations were Feasts like these, yet were they not forbidden as Feasts, but only as Jewish (now when they were out-dated by Christ) and so as ill symptoms in Christians, intimating their preferring of Judaism before Christianity, and depending on those legal observances for Justification. But it is also possible that the words to the Galatians may refer to Heathen observances, and so the mention of the Heathenism in which they had lived, ver. 8. doth seem to incline them; and Saint Ambrose interprets them accordingly; and then the meaning will be, that they [x] observed Ominous daies, as the Gentiles were wont to do; would not begin any business or journey upon such or such [y] daies, the day after the Calends or Nones, &c. And these again have nothing common with this or other Christian Festivities: for on them we may begin any enterprise that is reconcileable with the devotion due to the day; and that labour or travelling is not so, it is not [z] from any evil abode, but from the nature of the employment not very suitable with the publick services of the Church.

The Objection from Teaching the commands of men, answered.

C. I must first admonish you what is meant by that phrase [Teaching for Doctrines] It is the affirming that such a thing is the [a] pleasure, i. e. command or will, of God; and the affirming that of the commands of men, is the same crime as to put the King's broad Seal to a deed of my own, or his stamp and impression on that which is not his coin. And thus to pretend a Tradition of the Jews, which was an invention of their own, to be a Law of God's enacting, or to set it up against any known Law of God's, is the crime noted by that phrase; and nothing else but what shall bear some analogy with that. And therefore still this is no way chargeable here on those that acknowledge this to be an Ecclesiastical Institution, and do not so much as pretend it to be prescribed by Christ, and which seek not thereby to supplant any thing that is appointed by Christ, but do it upon a Christian occasion, in perfect subordination to and compliance with all other Moral and Christian Laws or Institutions; and this as instrumental to an end commanded by Christ, the commemorating of his birth, praising and praying to him; and for thus doing pretend not to any higher Authority than may appear to belong to it.

[a] Δόγμα.

The Authority by which Christmas stands in the Church.

S. You have now sufficiently cleared it from those prejudices which might fasten any ill character upon it: Please you now to proceed to inform me what that Authority is by which this Festivity pretends to stand in the Church of Christ; for that will be necessary to be superadded to the bare lawfulness of it, to render it either necessary or fit to be observed by us.

C. The Authority by which it stands in the whole Church is that of the practice of the Primitive Universal Christian Church: Not that we have any certain evidence of the time of its beginning, but that the immemorial observation of it is an argument of the Primitive, if not Apostolick Institution of it. And thus indeed do the Ancient Fathers in their Homilies upon that day speak of it, as of a most ancient usage. Thus the very ancient Author of the Constitutions mentions a day solemnized in remembrance of Christ's birth: And Origen, one of our first Writers doth not only [b] vindicate that place of Gal. 4. from having any thing contrary to the Christian Feasts, (which were ridiculous, if there were none such) but also mentions the [c] Feast of the Innocent Infants, (which is now attendant on the Nativity, and cannot be imagined ancienter than that) as that which was by the holy Fathers, according to the Will of God, commanded to be for ever celebrated in the Church. Soon after him S. Cyprian hath a Treatise on this day. And Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of Julian the Apostate, above 1300 years ago, mentions it (as his design to cover his Apostatical intentions) that he went solemnly to the Christians Church, and worshipped God [d] on that holy-day in January which the Christians called Epiphany: which day being mentioned so anciently as a known Festival of the Christian Church, gives not only to that day, but to Christmas, which that concludes, a far greater antiquity than that time of Julian's, on occasion of which it is there mentioned. And so saith Saint Chrysostom, that though till his time the observation of it on Decemb. 25. was not fixt at Antioch, yet from Rome over all the West it had been so observed from the most ancient Records of Christianity.

[b] Against Celf. l. 8.

By this, and much more that might be produced, it appears to be at the least an Ecclesiastical Institution, very early received over all the West, and the far greatest part of Christendom, and within 400 years universally solemnized; and sure this is a very competent Authority (when withall it is so probable, that it may be more, according to a rule of the Fathers, That every ancient and general usage, whose beginnings are unknown, may be resolved to be of Apostolical institution or practice) to oblige the continuance of so pious a solemnity in the Church, according to that of Saint Augustine, That [e] all that acknowledge themselves sons of the Church, observe the Festivals of the Church; (in which number he places [f] this of the Nativity in the Front) to which it is consequent, that they which observe them not, disclaim this Sonship, and cast themselves out of this family, upon a temptation much too slight to own or excuse an act of such unkindness to themselves, and ingratitude to the Christian Church, which designed it so much to their advantage. To this head of the ancientness of this institution in the Universal Church I shall add but one evidence more, and it is this, That as most of the first customs or institutions of Christianity were taken (by some light change) from the customs of the Jews, (Christ's Baptism from their washings at the Initiation of the Jews and Proselytes in the Temple, the Sacrament of the Lord Supper from their Loaf and Cup of Benediction after Supper, our Easter from their Passeover, the Christian from the Jewish Pentecost, and many other the like) so it was in this matter also. The beginnings of all months, and seasons, and years, were kept [g] Festival among the Jews: In like manner the Feast of the Dedication of the Temple, the anniversary commemoration

[g] Domin. 1. Advent. See Targum Hier. in Gen. 1. 14. where the use of the Sun and Moon for seasons & days & years, is expresst by [Let them be for the sanctifying by them the beginnings of months and years.] commemoration of the beginning (or birth as it were) of that house of God (as among other people * the birth-days of Cities, the day wherein the Trench was first cast up) hath usually been solemnized. And then, as the Temple was a type of Christ, (and he said by himself to be greater than the Temple, as the substance which the Temple fore-shadowed, his Flesh the Walls, and his Divinity the Glory which inhabited it,) so are these two, the Type and Antitype, the Feast of Dedication among them and the Nativity among Christians, most perfectly answerable the one to the other. And proportionably as among them the beginnings or Calends of every month were kept holy, so here twelve days together (one for every month) are joined to attend the Calends or Nativity of Christ. And all this, as it is a fair compliance with Gods institution among the Jews, so sure is it an argument of the Antiquity of the observation, that it is thus imitated from the Jews, for that signifies it to have been begun about that great time of Reformation, before the Jews Ceremonies were quite abolished, as the Egyptians Jewels were then taken from them, when the Israelites departed out of the Land, and began their journey toward Canaan. As for this particular Church wherein we live, there is little doubt but that this Festivity is of the same standing with the first Plantation of Christian Religion among us. If we reckon that from the conversion of the Saxons (to which the name of English is properly affixt) it is then [h] most clear by the Records of King Ethelbert. But if we speak of the Britans, then as their conversion is much more ancient (and Tertullian's testimony is clear, that the British Islands were converted to Christianity before his time) so if there be any truth in that objection which some men have made against the celebration of this Feast among us (viz. that some Heathen usages are retained in it) this will be yet an higher evidence of the antiquity of this Festival in this Nation, so far as to render the original of it, if not Apostolical, yet very Primitive and near the [i] Apostles age: that being the time of the conversion of the Nation from Heathenism: and if it were not of the usage of this Festivity also, it is not imaginable how any Heathen custom should come to be adherent to it. This, I suppose, may help to recover this Festivity to some competent part of that reverence which in reason is due to Christian Antiquity in point of ceremony or observation (in a Kingdom especially where common usage is Common Law, the best that any man holds his estate by) and awake us to a more pious, Christian, spiritual, and not to a more voluptuous, carnal, Heathenish observance of it.

Sir Henry Spelman in his Anglic. conc. an. Christi 605. [i] An Argument of this may be taken from the name of this day (in the Ancient Monuments) Mid-pinter dæg i. e. Mid-winter day. For this will conclude (if the imposition of the Name were answerable to the Nature of the season, and if the 25. of December (with the Western Church) be granted to be the day of Christs Birth) that when that name was first applied to Christmas day, the day was then not far removed from the Solstice, and that by calculation must be not long after our Saviours time. See Baron. in Apparat. and Bishop Mount. in his Answer to him.

I have detained you long on this Theme, (and longer than you had reason to expect when you first proposed your question about it) on purpose to shew you the proper basis on which this and other the Festivals of the Church are fastned, and to vindicate them from the little exceptions and envies which are raised against them, and by this one example to recommend to you that uniform obedience which is due from you to the commands of that Church wherein you were born, which, of all others in the Christian world, hath most adhered to the Universal Church of the first and purest ages, which is known to have censured and turned out Aerius for this (among other Heresies) his opposing and condemning the Festivals of the Church. The usefulness and advantages of which I shall now no farther enlarge to recommend unto you.

S. I thank you for what I have, and have no reason to quarrel the length of it.

You have now gone through that whole work with convenient brevity, the explaining all the Commandments to me, (save only those three which you bid me expect ere long in your farther progress) both those mentioned by Christ, and those omitted by him, and so you have obliged me beyond your first undertaking. I shall now detain you no longer, but desire you to proceed to the next, the sixth Chapter of Saint Matthew, in that Sermon on the Mount, and consider what first we shall fall upon.

LIB. III.

S. What is the first general aim or design of this next part of the Sermon, beginning Chap. 6?

Sect. I. Three parts of divine Worship.

C. The regulating of three Christian duties, Almsgiving, Prayer and Fasting. Three so necessary considerable offices of a Christian, that learned Divines have resolved them to be the three special Christian Sacrifices or [a] acts of divine worship: the first out of our Estates, the second of our Souls, the third from our Bodies; which are the three principal parts of a man, every one therefore obliged to pay its tribute of acknowledgment to the Creator.

[a] Aquin. 2. 2. qu. 85. art. 3. ad 2. Tria fundamenta legis, say the Arabians, see Abul Faraii de Arab. Mor. p. 29. Partes fidei, saith Al Gezal, Foundations of the Law, and sorts of Faith.

S. I shall then presume them worthy of our distinct survey, and to that purpose pitch upon that first which I see first placed, that of Almsgiving, and expect what method you will propose to me as most proper to give me a clear sight of what Christ hath thought fit to represent to me concerning it.

Of Almsgiving.

C. I shall reduce it summarily to these two heads. 1. A duty supposed; 2. A caution interposed for the regulation of this duty.

S. What mean you by the duty supposed?

C. I mean this, that the duty of Almsgiving here mentioned, is not so much here commanded by Christ, as presumed and supposed, as a duty that both the Law of Nature and of Moses required of all men (Heathens and Jews) before, and therefore need not to be commanded by Christ, but only to be thus honourably mentioned by him as a duty that he meant not to evacuate, but confirm; so far, that he that would not obſerve it ſhould be unworthy the title of a Chriſtian, nay of a Jew or Heathen man, all Laws ſo ſtrictly exacting it of him. Thus you ſhall find it mentioned with the other two, Faſting and Prayer, by Raphael the Angel, Tob. 12. 8. as the three prime Branches of Piety or Goodneſs accepted and rewarded by God.

S. The duty being ſo neceſſary, and yet only toucht on or named here, you may pleaſe a little to explain it to me.

C. I will, by telling you, 1. That it is the ſame duty (expreſt by the ſame word) that Mercifulneſs is in the fifth Beatitude: but then 2. That it ſeems here to be reſtrained to that one kind of mercifulneſs which conſiſts in giving, and that peculiarly of relief corporal to them that want it; and therefore it will not be pertinent in this place to ſpeak to you of any branch of Mercifulneſs, but of that which we ordinarily call Giving of Alms.

S. What do you think fit to tell me of that?

C. Only theſe two things, as moſt proper for your direction in this duty: the firſt, for the ſubſtance of the duty; the ſecond, for the moſt convenient manner of performing it.

S. What for the ſubſtance of the duty?

C. That I am bound by all Laws of Nature, of Moſes, of Chriſt, as God hath enabled me, to relieve thoſe that are in want, the hungry, the naked, the fatherleſs and widow, and others deſtitute of worldly ſuccour, the doing of which is called [b] Pure Religion, or Worſhip, by Saint James, chap. 1. 27.

[b] καθαρὰ θρησκεία.

The manner of performing it.

S. What directions have you for the moſt convenient manner of performing it?

C. This is one eſpecially (which Saint Paul, 1 Cor. 16. 2. hath given me occaſion to think on) that every rich man, or thriving man, every one that hath either conſtant revenue or profitable trade, ſhould lay by him in ſtore, as God proſpereth him, for the uſe of the poor; dedicating yearly, or monthly, or weekly, ſuch or ſuch a proportion for this purpoſe, and ſeparating it from the reſt of the heap that it may be ready for ſuch uſes as the providence of God ſhall offer to us.

S. How will this beſt be done?

C. By a yearly valuation of my in-come, whether of Rents, or Gains by trading, and ſetting a part a reaſonable proportion of that, and then dividing that groſs proportion into as many parts as there be weeks in the year, and then every Lord's day (according to the Apoſtles direction) or otherwiſe weekly, to put into the poor man's bag, or box, or pocket, ſuch a juſt proportion, which from that time I am to account of as none of mine, but the poors propriety, which I cannot take from them again but by ſtealth, that I ſay not Sacrilege. This way of ſetting apart before-hand will be very uſeful both for the reſiſting of covetous thoughts, which will be apt ſtill to intercurr, when objects of Charity offer themſelves; and alſo for the having proviſion ready at hand, to give when we would be willing to give, which otherwiſe would ſometimes be wanting; and the doing this thus weekly, will make the ſum thus parted with ſo inſenſible, that we ſhall not miſs out of our eſtates what is thus conſecrated.

S. But I pray what proportion yearly ſhould I thus deſign?

The proportion of it.

C. The exact proportion or quotum I cannot preſcribe you, the Scripture having defined nothing in it, but (by commending liberality, and voluntary and chearful giving) rather intimating that there is no ſet proportion to be defined, but to be left to every man's own breaſt how to proportion his free-will offering. For although one place there be that ſeems to require all to be ſet apart for this purpoſe that comes in by way of gain from God's proſpering hand, to wit, that juſt now mentioned, 1 Cor. 16. 2. where he appoints that every one ſet apart [c] treaſuring up whatſoever he hath gained, or thrived, or been proſpered, (not, as we render it, as God hath proſpered him; for it is not [d] as] but [e] whatſoever]) yet it appears that that was in a peculiar caſe at that time, for the relieving the poor Chriſtians at Jeruſalem, who were ſo many, and ſo few to relieve them then, that all that could be ſpared was little enough for the turn; and therefore that can no more make a rule for all other times (unleſs when there is the like occaſion and conjuncture of circumſtances) than the having all common then, and bringing all to the Apoſtles feet, will be exemplary to us. I ſhall only, for your better direction, give you the beſt light I can, which will be by theſe gradations. 1. That the Jews, the people of God, were bound by the Law to ſet apart the Tenth of all their encreaſe every third year for the uſe of the poor. Every year you know the tithe was paid to the Levites; and when that was done, then another tithe was to be ſet apart, which for two years was to be eaten in a feſtival manner at Jeruſalem, and the third year it was for the fatherleſs and widow, i. e. for the poor, whoſe portion conſequently was (in effect) a thirtieth part yearly of their encreaſe; for to that proportion (you know) a tenth part every third year being diſtributed into three parts, and each of thoſe three aſſign'd to each year, will amount. But then 2. other commands there were given to thoſe Jews concerning the poor, as of permitting them to leaſe in the field, lending them without uſe, reſtoring the pledge before night, and other the like, and all this a Jew was bound to; he ſinn'd againſt the Law if he did it not. This was his [f] righteouſneſs, Deut. 24. 13. i. e. that degree of mercy which the Law required of him; in ſtead of which the Greek Tranſlators uſe a word ſignifying [g] Alms or Pity, the ſame which is in this place of Chriſt's Sermon: (and it is farther obſervable, that in this place ſome very ancient copies in ſtead of this word which ſignifies Alms, have another word ſignifying [h] righteouſneſs) all which ſignifies ſome degrees of Almſgiving to be required by the Law, without performance of which a Jew cannot be accounted righteous: And ſuch were thoſe third years tithings, and the reſt forementioned. But then 3. beſides this * Righteouſneſs of the Jew, or that proportion required to his being a righteous Jew, there was another higher degree among them, called [k] Mercy, or Goodneſs, or Bounty, or Charity, which, ſay their Interpreters, is more than righteouſneſs, [l] exceſs or abundance of righteouſneſs. Thus ſhall you ſee thoſe two words many times put together, not as equivalent, but one an higher degree than the other; Dan. 4. 27. Break off thy ſins by [m] righteouſneſs, and thine iniquities by ſhewing [n] mercy to the poor; the mercy ſet laſt, as being higheſt. So Micah 6. 8. What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do [o] juſtice, and and love ° mercy? So when the compariſon is made by the Apoſtle between a P Righteous man and a * good man, Rom. 5. 7. the good man is this merciful-minded man, which far exceedeth the other. By which you ſee that he that will be a good, a pious, a merciful Jew, he muſt exceed thoſe terms which by the Law the Jew was bound to, i. e. muſt allow to pious uſes much more than the thirtieth part of his encreaſe every year. And this Law and direction being by God himſelf given to his own people the Jews, may deſerve ſo far to be conſidered by us, as it is an evidence of God's opinion or judgment then to that his own people. But then 4. though this be not a Law now binding us, as not given to us; yet being a Law of charity and mercy to my poor Neighbour, which for the ſubſtance of it is an eternal law of Nature, there will be ſmall reaſon for a Chriſtian to think himſelf diſengaged from that quotum or proportion which even the Jews (who were conſidered as in a ſtate of imperfection) were obliged to: ſave onely that this is now left to their own freedom which was before commanded; and it were ſhame that a Chriſtian thus left to his own freedom, ſhould come ſhort of what a Jew was brought to by conſtraint. But 5. on the contrary ſide, the more perfect law of Chriſt, and the more grace, and the more light (brought into the world by him) requiring higher perfection now, than before by law was required, (ſo that except our righteouſneſs exceed theirs, we ſhall not enter the Kingdom of Heaven,) may very juſtly be deemed to require a greater proportion of us now in works of mercy than of them was then expected. From whence it will be conſequent; 6. That as our r righteouſneſs muſt exceed their righteouſneſs, ſo our * mercy their mercy: i. e. that to be a righteous Chriſtian, (i. e. ſuch an one as performs what the law of Chriſt requires of him for Alms-giving) it is neceſſary to ſet apart much more than a yearly thirtieth of his revenue or encreaſe; and to be a merciful or benign or pious Chriſtian, much more again than that is neceſſary. But then 7. the Chriſtian (as alſo the Jewiſh) law in this matter doth not ſo conſiſt in an indiviſible point, as that any ſet proportion can be defined, lower than which would be the ſin of Parſimony, and higher than which the ſin of Prodigality; but is allowed its latitude, within which it may move higher or lower without ſin: yet ſo, as it may on one ſide be ſo low, that it will be unchriſtian love of money; and on the other ſide ſo high, (if it be to the cauſleſs neglecting and expoſing his own children and family) that it may be wretchleſs prodigality: Which two extremes being by the help of the former directions avoided, the rule will be, That the more liberal we are to them that want, or the more liberal in ſetting apart for them, to provide them a plentiful patrimony, the more acceptable it will be in the ſight of God, and the more liberally rewarded; according to that of the Apoſtle, 2 Cor. 9. 6. He that ſoweth bountifully, ſhall reap bountifully. By which, I conceive, is meant not only God's abundant retributions of glory in another world, but even his payments of t temporal plenty and bleſſings here, to thoſe who have been willing to make that Chriſtian uſe of that earthly talent committed to their Stewarding.

S. Do you believe that liberality to the poor is likely to receive any ſuch reward in this life? The reaſon of my Queſtion is, becauſe if there were any ground for the Affirmative, I ſhould conceive it a moſt convincing motive to all, even the moſt worldly-minded men, to caſt their bread thus upon the waters, if it ſhould return to them again in this life with increaſe. Liberality being a thing pleaſant and delightful even to fleſh and blood, to the moſt covetous-minded man; and nothing imaginable to deterr any from the practice of ſo lovely a duty, were it not for the fear of diminiſhing our ſtore, or bringing our ſelves to want by that means. I ſhall therefore in great earneſt deſire to hear your opinion in that point.

C. I make no doubt of this truth, That mercifulneſs and Chriſtian liberality is the ſureſt way to plenty and contentment in this life; ſo far from ever being a * means of impoveriſhing any, that it is moſt conſtantly (when exerciſed as it ought) † a means of enriching them. And that you may not think this a phancy or ſpeculation or groundleſs confidence in me, I ſhall tell you, that I conceive there is not any one thing (temporal) for which there are ſo many clear evident promiſes in the Scripture, as this. For the giving you ground of Faith in this; I will name you ſome. And a foundation I ſhall lay, Deut. 26. 11. where there is by God preſcribed a form of prayer to be uſed by him that hath made an end of tithing all the tithe of his increaſe the third year, i. e. that, beſides the Levites and Feſtival tithing, hath alſo paid the poor their patrimony, (as appears by the reſt of the Verſe, and which till it be done, the third year tithing is not made an end of.) And the form preſcribed gives the man that hath ſo done, liberty and priviledge of claim and challenge to all kind of earthly bleſſings, Verſe 13. Then thou ſhalt ſay before the Lord thy God, I have given to the ſtranger, to the fatherleſs, &c. and thereupon, Verſe 15. Look down from Heaven, and bleſs thy people Iſrael, and the Land which thou haſt given us, a Land flowing with Milk and Honey. The mention of the Milk and Honey, and affluence, is an interpretation what that bleſſing is which is there prayed for ſo confidently, to wit, temporal plenty here: And God's preſcribing this form of prayer is argument enough that God will grant it to him, i. e. to every one that having performed this condition, doth humbly in prayer require the performance of ſuch promiſe. Only by the way, theſe two things muſt go together inſeparably, performance of the condition, and then prayer to God. According to that of the blind man in the Goſpel, that whoſoever is a worſhipper of God, and doth his will, him he heareth. Other places fit to be ſuperſtructed on this you have in the Pſalms of David, Pſalm 41. 1. Bleſſed is he that conſidereth the poor and needy, and what kind of bleſſing this is, appears by the context, The Lord will deliver him, preſerve him, keep him alive, bleſs him on the earth, &c. And beſides others, one remarkable place that Book affords, Pſalm 37. 25. I have been young, and now am old; yet ſaw I never the righteous forſaken, nor his ſeed begging bread. What is meant by the righteous there, will be evident, if you adviſe with Verſe 21. The righ- teous sheweth mercy and giveth; and Ver. 26. The righteous is ever (or all the day) merciful and lendeth. His liberality is supposed such and so continual (all the day merciful) that one would think it enough to exhaust his patrimony, to bring him, at least his posterity, to want and beggery; and yet in all David's observation, he had found by experience (so far as to make an Aphorism of it) that none were ever brought to want by that means: But, as it follows for confirmation of this truth, Ver. 26. His seed is blessed; his posterity are as prosperous as if their Father had digged through the Mine into Hell (where the Poets thought [a] riches dwelt) to fetch out treasure for them. Where although the rule do not necessarily hold so far, that no other means can make a merciful man poor, (for perhaps negligence, suretiship, some other sin lived in, and bringing a curse upon him, may; and mercifulness not prove antidote sufficient to secure him against all other poison) yet thus far it doth in David's observation hold. 1. That that never brings any man to want; (whatever else may, that will not.) 2. That it is an ordinary means to help to more wealth, to enrich the posterity, to bestow temporal blessings on them: a benign favourable influence this hath upon all that belongs to him. And this (which David mentions as an Aphorism of his own observation) I believe I might extend to all ages, and challenge any Historian of past, or Observator of present times, to give one instance (out of his knowledge to the contrary) of any Christian Almsgiver that ever brought himself or his posterity to want (nay, that did not thrive and prosper the better) by that means. Some notable examples I have known in my time for the confirming what I now say, but could never yet hear of any to the contrary. To these I shall add a few places of testimony also out of the Proverbs of Solomon, 11. 24. There is that scattereth, and yet encreaseth, i. e. One sort of scatterers there is that encreaseth by scattering; and there is no cause of doubt but that the merciful is this kind of scatterer, which farther appears by the opposition in the rest of the Verse, There is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty. It is indeed a strange thing that scattering should be a means of encreasing, (giving, of having) and withholding, of poverty, (keeping, of not having:) but when it is considered how all temporal plenty is of God's disposing, how by his blessing and opening his hand all things are filled with plenteousness, and by his withdrawing his auspicious influence all things become improsperous, moulder and crumble into nothing, there will be small difficulty in believing God's promise for such kind of difficulties as these. Besides, the following Verse makes it farther clear that it belongs to this matter. Verse 25. The liberal soul shall be made fat, and he that watereth shall be watered also himself. And selling of corn being an act of liberality, Verse 26. in opposition to him that withholdeth it, it follows, Blessing shall be upon his head: and Verse 28. The righteous, i. e. the liberal again, (as opposite to him that trusteth in riches) shall flourish as a branch, i. e. be very prosperous. And although it follow in the last Verse, That the righteous shall be recompenced on the earth, i. e. meet with afflictions and punishments here; yet is that common state of good men reconcileable with temporal blessings here, as may appear, Mark 10. 30. He shall have an hundred fold more in this life, houses, &c. but this with persecutions, the Christians portion, along with them. So again, Prov. 13. 22. A good man leaveth his inheritance to his childrens children. Where if the good man be the same that is meant by that phrase, Rom. 5. 7. it will be distinctly pertinent to this matter (and so the context would enforce in the following words, and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just:) but if it be a more general word, yet then also this of the merciful will be contained under it. So again, Prov. 14. 21. He that hath mercy on the poor, happy is he. So 19. 17. He that hath pity on the poor, lendeth to the Lord: The vulgar read it, [lendeth unto the Lord upon use] (as Tobit. 4. 9. where it is said of the liberal almsgiver, that he layes up a good treasure for himself, the word which we render [b] treasure, signifies a sum of money put out to use) and that which he hath given, will he pay him again, and (it being lent upon use) pay him with use and interest also. On occasion of which place I remember an ancient story in Cedrenus (how true I know not) of a Jew, as ancient, saith he, as King Hezekiah's time, that having read this place, and weighed it, resolved to try whether God would be as good as his word, gave all that he had but two pieces of silver to the poor, and then waited and expected to see it come again; but being not presently answered in that expectation, grew angry, and went up to Jerusalem, to expostulate with God for cheating him by this unperformed promise. The story goes on, that he going on his way, found two men a striving, engaged in an unreconcileable quarrel, about a stone that both, walking together, had found in the way, and so had both equal right to it, but (being but one, and not capable of being divided) could not both enjoy; and therefore to make them friends, he having two pieces of silver, doth upon contract divide them betwixt the pretenders, and hath the stone in exchange for them: having it, he goes on his journey, and coming to Jerusalem shews it to the Goldsmith; who tells him that it was a Jewel of great value, being a stone faln and lost out of the High Priest's Ephod, to whom if he carried it, he should certainly receive a great reward. He did so, and accordingly it proved; the High Priest took it of him, gave him a great reward, but withal a box on the ear, bidding him Trust God the next time. The story, if true, is an instance of the matter in hand; if not, yet an embleme or picture of it. So again, Prov. 22. 9. He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed, for he giveth of his bread to the poor. Where the Affirmative promise is most punctual, and the reason to confirm it most remarkable, being but the repetition of the thing it self, (as principles are fain to be proved by themselves) the bountiful-minded man shall be blessed, why? because he is bountiful, i. e. no other Argument is needful to prove it but this; the promise, infallible promise belonging peculiarly to such. And Prov. 28. 27. He that giveth to the poor shall not lack: a most definitive large style of promise, from whence no exception is imaginable, if we had but faith to depend upon it. And lest you should think that this referred only to the state of the Jews under the Old Testament, and belonged not at all to us Christians; you may 1. observe that these Proverbs of Solomon are not truths peculiar to that State, but extensive even to us Christians, and more peculiarly to faithful Christians, than to them, many of them. 2. That in the Gospel one place there is that repeats in sence one part of one of these places, that of 19. 17. [He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord,] to wit, Matth. 25. 40, 45. [Inasmuch as ye did it to one of these, ye did it unto me.] And then why may not the latter part belong to us also? 3. One plain promise of temporal things there is in the Gospel also to those thoſe that part with any of their goods for Chriſt's ſake, (and ſuch ſure are the Chriſtian Almſgivers that do it in obedience to Chriſt's Law, and charity to fellow-Chriſtians) Matth. 19. 29. and that in a general unlimited ſtyle, excluding all exception, Mark 10. 30. There is no man that hath left houſe, or brethren, &c. and Lands, i. e. worldly goods; but he ſhall receive an hundred fold in this time (the firſt lower Harveſt, this ſeaſon of Retributions) Houſes, &c. i. e. temporal bleſſings here, and then over and above in another world, everlaſting life: only with a mixture of perſecutions, as Saint Mark (or Saint Peter, who had asked the queſtion which occaſioned this Speech of Chriſt's, and whoſe Amanuenſis Saint Mark was) hath it: As before I told you that Prov. 11. 31. after all thoſe temporal promiſes to the Almſgiver, it is added, He ſhall be recompenced, or receive his portion of afflictions in the earth. By all theſe teſtimonies from the Word of God, both in the New and Old Teſtament, I conceive this doctrine as clear as any in the Scripture, That the promiſe of temporal plenty to the liberal is ſo diſtinct and infallible, that it can be no leſs than 1. a very groſs ignorance of plain Scripture not to obſerve it; and 2. an act of arrant infidelity not to believe it. Which I take to be the meaning of thoſe words, Luke 6. 35. Love your enemies, to wit, thoſe which will never repay you thoſe expreſſions of love, mentioned Verſe 34. and do good, and lend (even to them from whom you ſo little expect any retributions) [c] diſtruſting nothing (ſo the Greek ſignifies, doubting, fearing, diſtruſting nothing; as Eccleſ. 22. 22. [d] fear not, and Chap. 27. 21. is [e] without hope, and 2 Mac. 9. 18. [*] deſpairing, and in all the Bible in no other ſence but that of diſtruſt and deſpair) or making no doubt but that God will repay thee, though he to whom thou giveſt do not; at leaſt never fearing that God will ſuffer thee to be the poorer for want of that which in obedience to him, and dependence on his promiſes, is thus liberally laid out by thee. Agreeable to which is that Apoſtolical ſaying of Barnabas in his Epiſtle, † Make no doubt to give, neither murmure when thou haſt given: give to every one that asketh thee (where [h] not doubting] before [giving,] and [* not murmuring] after it, is a paraphraſe of the phraſe which I render † diſtruſting nothing, in St. Luke) And 3. it is a ſtrange (unreaſonable as well as) unchriſtian ſin, not to practiſe a duty which is in its own nature ſo amiable, ſo agreeable to our humour and diſpoſition as we are men, that to him that believes, and ſo reſts ſecure of this one particular [that he ſhall not be the poorer for what he parts with on theſe terms] there is not the leaſt objection or temptation imaginable againſt it, though even the covetous man himſelf were allowed to be the objector.

S. I cannot but acknowledge the truth of your premiſſes, and reaſonableneſs of the concluſion from them, and only marvel what artifice the Devil hath gotten to enſnare men by, and keep them from doing that which is ſo agreeable to their humors and diſpoſitions, even as they are partakers of but ingenuous nature. God melt the heart and open the hand of the obdurate world, and teach us the due practice of it.

I ſhall preſume you have no more neceſſary to be added to the explication of the duty here ſuppoſed [and thou when thou doeſt Alms:] I ſhall call you from thence to the ſecond particular mentioned, the Caution interpoſed, and deſire to know what that is.

C. The Caution is, That we do not our alms to be ſeen of men, or uſe any means in the doing of them to have glory of men, to be praiſed or commended by them. For this is an infirmity very ordinarily inſinuating it ſelf in our beſt actions, to blaſt and defame them in the eyes of God; every man being apt to deſire to be better thought of by man for the performance of this duty, eſpecially if he be an exceeder in it. Of Vain-glory.

S. But were we not commanded before, that our light ſhould ſhine before men? What is that, but to do our good works ſo that men might ſee them?

C. To this I ſhall anſwer, 1. By telling you that the performance of duties to God may be either publick, or private; the one in the Congregation, the other in the Cloſet: the former ought to be as publick as it may, that ſo it might be more exemplary, and tend more to the glorifying of God; and to that the ſhining of our light belongs: the ſecond, as private as it may, to approve our ſelves the more to God, and to demonſtrate that it is only our love and obedience to him, and not our deſire of the praiſe of men, that moves us to do what we do; and to this ſecond ſort of performances this Caution here pertains. And though this be more illuſtriouſly obſervable in the two following duties of Prayer and Faſting, yet will it hold in ſome meaſure in this alſo; the Church being deſigned for giving alſo, and every Chriſtian anciently wont to bring ſomewhat to the Corban every time he came to Church, a remainder of which cuſtom we have ſtill in the offertory at the Sacrament. Letting our light ſhine before men.

2. That there is great difference betwixt doing our good works ſo that men may ſee them, and doing them to be ſeen of men; and again, between doing them ſo before men that they may ſee, and glorifie our Father in Heaven, and that we may have glory of men. The former, if it have not the latter to blaſt it, (and if it be truly ſo, it excludes the latter) is only a Chriſtian charitable care that my good actions may be exemplary to others: the ſecond that they may be matter of reputation to my ſelf. The former reſpects only God's glory, and not mine own; the ſecond mine own vain aery credit here, and not (or more than) the praiſe or glory of God. The firſt is a moſt divine Chriſtian act, an expreſſion of great love of God, and deſire to propagate his Kingdom, of great love of my Brother, and deſire to make all others as good as my ſelf, by ſetting them ſuch Copies on purpoſe to tranſcribe: the ſecond is an evidence of great paſſion and ſelf love, and impatience of having our reward put off to ſo long a date as the reverſion in another world. And conſequently theſe two are very different, and accordingly are moſt diverſly rewarded: The firſt with a great degree of glory, for the glory we have brought to God's name; the ſecond ſo odious in the ſight of God, that even our almſgiving, or beſt actions are eaten through by this means (and ſmitten as the gourd with the worm) and come to nothing, find no reward in another world; the little reputation gotten here and affected by us, muſt ſerve our turns as the only reward we are to hope for: which ſhews the unhappineſs and folly of this ſin of vain-glory, it robs us of all the reward that our moſt eſteemable, acceptable free-will-offerings, our works of mercy, can hope for from God.

S. Is this deſire to be ſeen, and have glory of men, a ſin, or no?

C. I muſt return anſwer by theſe degrees. Firſt, That that part of our conſtitution that is ſo pleaſed with a little, mere, empty, vain blaſt of air, which ſignifies ſo little when had, and (like the the wind) is ſoon and cauſeleſly changed into the contrary, is a very pitiful piece of carnality; and if it be indulged to immoderately, or if it thrive ſo well in us as to become the principal or chief mover in any, eſpecially in our beſt performances, it is then a ſinful and very culpable piece of us, not only depriving us of all other reward which awaits good actions, but * withal cheating the ſoul, and poſſeſſing it with that which is directly contrary to that love of God, and value of his acceptance, which is neceſſary to denominate the beſt things good. Secondly, from this it follows, that any one who is ſtrongly enclined to this, is obliged not only to pray againſt it, but to deſign ways to mortifie it; not only by conſidering the huge vanity and withal danger of it, but by repreſſing deſires of it, repelling injections of ſuch fancies, giving them no ſtay upon the Soul, and working ſome acts of revenge, at leaſt ſelf-denials, in this kind: as ſometimes in ſome indifferent things (which might lawfully be done, but yet have no kind of goodneſs in them, nor are viſibly ordinable to any good end) to deny himſelf the doing or ſaying them, if that principle of vain-glory ſuggeſt them, and nothing elſe, (eſpecially if that ſuggeſt them any thing ſtrongly;) and in brief, having and keeping a ſtrong guard over this weak part, that it neither cauſe danger, nor betray to loſing the reward. Thirdly, that the love of God, the value of his acceptance, and the comfort of a good conſcience, ought to be ſet up againſt this uſurper, and made the principle of all thoſe actions which have any thing of good in them; and that thoſe things of which theſe do not, or cannot own to be the principles, be not reflected on as things of any weight, or that add any thing of worth to any man, nor (if they may be as a diverſion innocently taken in) purſued with any deſign for their own, or that acquiſitions ſake, ſave only as that may advance a ſuperiour end. This being ſaid on one ſide, I conceive it perfectly lawful on the other ſide. Firſt, to look on a good reputation as on a good eſtate, i. e. as a very proper engine to do good with, and that neither to be prodigally miſ-ſpent, nor poſſeſt unprofitably. And if the heart be ſincere (and not as it is ordinary in covetous perſons, that pretend to wiſh for great eſtates only to do more good, but at preſent do little good with what they have; and when they get more, are forced to diſcern and diſcover the fallacy they had put upon themſelves) and if the ways of acquiring it be direct, ſuch as God may be moſt likely to proſper, i. e. doing things ſubſtantially, and not only ſuperficially good, (not uſing of tricks and deceits or fucus's to ſet out beauty, but a perfect wholeſom diet, yet not excluding the addition of faſhionable ornaments, ſuch are wit, chearfulneſs of diſcourſe, &c.) and then deſigning this acquiſition (thus regularly gotten) only to pious uſes, the glory of God, the benefit of others, and the man's own living as profitably as he can, fruit to his account; If, I ſay, theſe Cautions be taken in, I conceive it very lawful both to enjoy, and to acquire, and ſeek a good reputation: whereas to do this either for it ſelf alone, abſtractedly from ſuch explicite deſign, or in a ſuperior degree for that, than for t'other nobler end, or immoderately and intemperately and with tranſportation for that; this makes it preſently ceaſe to be ſo.

* πρὸς ὄνησιν τοῦ δαυμαδίνται ἢ μαλακίαν τῆ τόνῳ τ' ἀρετῆς ἐιωδὲν ὑποχαλᾶν. Photius ep. 32.

Deſire of a good reputation lawful in ſome caſe.

So alſo the being pleaſed with it.

Secondly, the being pleaſed with this, when it comes (either deſigned or not deſigned) in order to, or in proportion with this good end, is perfectly lawful: and it will be judged whether it be ſo or no, by this; whether the deſign of the good end be as intenſe as this pleaſure is (I ſay not ſo ſenſibly delightful, but as conſtantly and induſtriouſly purſued as this is ſenſibly delightful) or whether the contrary be diſcernible upon ſtrict ſurvey and entire judging.

The ſafeſt courſe.

Thirdly, the good work being ſecured upon the right or good principle, and reputation being either not ſought at all, or ſought explicitely (or habitually) in order to ſome real good (living the more profitably, &c.) if praiſe do come in to the actor, (as many times earthly bleſſings do, Matth. 6. 33.) I conceive it may be taſted (ſimply as it is ſuch) as a refreſhment to the weary, and encouragement to the labourer (among the reſt of God's bleſſings) and ſo as Wine moderately uſed, if it do cauſe ſome gladneſs in the heart, I cannot lay guilt on that. But the ſafeſt courſe is (eſpecially where the inclination is naturally ſuch as makes the utmoſt caution neceſſary) before I deliberately taſte this pleaſant liquor, to conſider to what good uſe of mine or others it tends; and, if I find to none, to abſtain from ſipping of ſuch delicacies. But if any ſuch uſe be (not only poſſible, for almoſt every thing is ſo, but alſo) viſible, or but ſtrongly probable, I know not that that ſhould be neglected, or not purſued, only to deny my ſelf that praiſe which I foreſee, if I taſte, will be pleaſant to me. Laſtly, in performing of things in themſelves pious, or directly ordinable to a pious end, if I either deſire or feel pleaſure from praiſe, it will be eaſie enough to judge (and to keep my ſelf from deceit in judging) whether I do ſo (either wholly or immoderately) for my own praiſes ſake, or elſe for the good that is in the action, or that may come from the praiſe, and only ſecondarily and moderately (and in ſubordination to that) for the pleaſure of praiſe to my ſelf. And that is the matter in hand; and therefore every man is left to paſs judgment on himſelf, and to take care that he do not loſe the ſubſtance for a wretched ſhadow, or (worſe than ſo) * weaken that pretious flame within him, the love of God (which ſeldom wants allays, but rather all acts of heightning it) by indulging to a little falſe love of himſelf in his ſenſual capacity.

* Δι' ἐπαινῶν τὸ γλυκὺ τῶν χρὴ θεὸν πόνων πέφυκεν ὁπικαταβρίζειν, καὶ τ' σπρκὸς ἀναζωπυροῦνται ἡδοναί. Phot. ep. 32.

S. But if it be lawful to receive and taſte the pleaſure of praiſe, why is it not lawful to deſire or deſign it?

Deſigning of praiſe differs much from receiving or taſting it.

C. I anſwer, That the deſigning of praiſe differs much from the receiving or taſting it. The end deſigned in any action is one of thoſe things, which (as being eſſential to the action) gives it the denomination; which of any thing that is but accidental or extrinſecal, cannot be ſaid. From hence it follows (to this matter of the praiſe of men) that in a ſpiritual action to deſign the praiſe of men, though but as a ſubordinate end, is to mix a ſecular with a ſpiritual work, and that will defile it, and maim it, and rob it of the reward. But if it be deſigned as the principal end, then firſt it makes it ceaſe to be ſpiritual or Chriſtian, (and the reaſon is clear, for to its being ſo, ſpiritual, or vertuous in the Chriſtian ſence, † all muſt concur, the principal or motive, and the end or deſign muſt be Chriſtian and ſpiritual; and if either of thoſe be wanting, it is not vertuous: And if it be thus principally deſigned to the praiſe of men, not of God, then that neceſſary end is ſomewhat, and that ſomewhat is wanting;) and ſecondly, it renders the whole action conſidered together a groſs diſſimulation or hypocriſie, and an interpretative impiety, in preferring the praiſe of men before before the acceptance of God, which is directly contrary to all justice and duty; and thirdly, a sacriledge, in prostituting a sacred thing to so vile uses. So likewise, when the action is matter of duty, and so necessary, as being under precept, it is also necessary that it be done principally in obedience to God's precept: and if it be not so, but either only or principally for the praise of men, then still it is, 1. no obedience to God; and 2. if it be abstaining in matter of a negative precept, it is an evidence that the person more fears the dis-reputation of men than the displeasure of God; or if it be in matter of affirmative precept, it is an argument and testimony again, that he will do more for the praise of men than to approve his obedience to God; or if it be, though not principally, yet subordinately, for the praise of men, then again it is a maim in that obedience. Only in indifferent actions, if we design them to that praise that is proportionable to them, and do that not immoderately, but in such a temper of appetite as is regular, and answerable to the lawful desires of any other worldly blessing (for that the praise of men is such, appears by its being proposed as a reward in Scripture; and that it is not only the advantageousness of it to us, in respect of the benefiting others by that means, either by our authority or example, that makes it a blessing, appears from hence, because it is a blessing (and the contrary a curse) even after death, when, as we have received our reward in Heaven, so we cease to be capable of making use of our authority to the edifying of others) then there is not from either of the two former considerations any such obliquity to denominate it a crime, though yet there is enough to keep down that which, by having designed a good end, might from Indifferent have grown Vertuous, from advancing to that dignity, to continue it in that lower Form or Classis of Indifferents, as a kind of Non-proficients or unprofitable servants, which with good usage might have improved or ascended higher, but have neglected to do so.

But now on the other side, for the coming in of praise undesigned in any of all these, it is but accidental to the person or action, and so that of which I am no way guilty (as, of what I have designed I clearly am:) and being not culpable in the coming of it in, and being a blessing of God in it self, certainly to reject a blessing of God's cannot be my duty; but, on the contrary, to look upon it as a blessing of God's, a performance of some part of his promise to his servants, and a testimony to their performances; and so to bless and praise him for it, is strictly and absolutely a duty. And as it is a duty so to acknowledge and bless God for it; so simply to taste it as it is, i. e. as a blessing of the earth, sent me by God's providence, and to enjoy it as such, with that pleasure and thanksgiving which is proportionable to it, is no irregularity, and so no fault in me; nor is in this case made such by any, either ill or secular principle, or design, motive, or end; for it is supposed that these are both spiritual and Christian. In brief, it must be resolved in every action, that that which is merely accidental (as the consequents or shadows) must be solemnly distinguished from that which is essential (as the motive and end are) that which is merely extrinsecal from that which is intrinsick, and so consequently must be done here; and if it be, this difficulty is answered.

Praise of men considered as a temptation to inordinate pleasure.

S. But what if the praise of men, that comes in to me, tempt me to immoderate and excessive pleasure and transportation: may I do or say that which will probably bring me that praise, and with it that temptation?

C. In that case as I foresee, so I must fortifie my self against that temptation, and either wholly deny my self liberty to take that pleasure, or take special care to moderate it; and if that prove successful to me, or till it prove unsuccessful, it is clear I am not bound to abstain from that action upon that objection only.

S. But what if having formerly and frequently had this warning against this temptation, and having been thus fortified, I have yet constantly been foiled as oft as I have met with the temptation, and so judging by my own experience, have no reason to hope the contrary if I am again so tempted: am I not then bound to abstain from that action, whatever it be, which will probably bring in that praise, which will certainly bring that temptation?

Three sorts of actions considerable in this matter.

C. I answer, that in this case the matter of the action is to be considered, and supposing that not to be bad or sinful, (for then there is no question but I am bound to abstain from it, without the addition of this farther charge against it) it may then again be of three sorts: either first, indifferent, under no precept or prohibition; or secondly, necessary, under precept, and so matter of duty; or thirdly, that which is neither of these, neither indifferent, nor yet necessary, but yet vertuous and excellent, more than is required by strict duty, and so better, and that to which God promises reward.

Indifferent.

S. What if it be indifferent, neither ill, if it be not done, nor better, if it be?

C. Then there is no question but the foresight of the danger and weakness ought to restrain me from that indifferent action.

Commanded.

S. What if it be under precept?

C. These precepts commanding such or such actions are to be supposed Affirmative precepts, which therefore do not binde * to do them always. And if it be indifferent whether it be done at this time, or no, i. e. neither commanded to be done at this time, nor better to be done at this time, then supposing some other season to be less obnoxious to the temptation, I am to abstain now and do it then. As in case it be in all respects indifferent whether I pray or give an alms now, or at another time, I am to chuse that time wherein I foresee least of that danger from that temptation.

* Ad semper.

S. But what if it be at a time when it cannot be neglected without some breach of duty, as an act of Affirmative precept may by some concurrence of circumstances become duty at some one time; must this danger deterr me then?

C. No, it must not, for that were actually to sin, to avoid the danger of possible or probable sinning.

S. But what if the action be not necessary at that time, i. e. not under precept, but yet of that nature, that the more frequent it be the better it is, as whatsoever number of hours of daily prayer be affirmed or supposed the Christian's duty, if it be yet another hour beyond the former, (that intercepting no other business, buſineſs, to which I am obliged by ſtrict duty or charity) what is then to be affirmed?

Better. C. This falls into the third ſort of things at firſt enumerated, thoſe that are better, but not neceſſary; excellent, or rewardable, but not under precept. And of them the difficulty is greateſt; becauſe, as there is not particular precept to make the doing of them neceſſary, ſo there is not ſimple indifferency to make the omitting them as good as the doing of them. But yet the reſolution may be this, That though I am not bound in that caſe to do that excellent thing, (for, by its being not neceſſary, but excellent, that is ſuppoſed) yet I may lawfully do it, if the advantage that is in my view, to the glory of God, the good of my brother, &c. be above the proportion of the danger of falling into ſin, that I incurr by attempting it.

S. But what if the danger be greater or more viſible than the advantage is?

C. Then to him that apprehends it ſo, it is not lawful.

S. But what if the danger and advantage be equal, or apprehended to be ſo?

C. Then from that equal balancing of their circumſtances, nothing can be defined as yet; but then ſome other circumſtance may be conſiderable, and direct me to define it lawful to do that excellent thing, which is thus ſuppoſed to be in the even poiſe betwixt the advantage and the danger. For then, firſt, the conſideration that it is beſt in it ſelf, will incline to make it lawful, and nothing hinder it to be ſo: For as, when there is neither danger on one ſide, nor advantage on the other, that which is beſt, is lawful certainly; ſo in reaſon it is to continue, when, as there is addition of danger, ſo there is of advantage proportionable. But then, ſecondly, there is another circumſtance which makes the difference conſiderable. For he that doth that better action in order to that advantageous end, prudently and induſtriouſly, is accepted by God according to his intention and endeavour, though it fall out that that advantage do not follow; and ſo though that advantage be not certain, the vertue, and acceptableneſs, and reward of his action is certain: whereas on the other ſide, as the falling by that tentation is not certain in it ſelf, ſo it is far from being at all intended by me, but all fortifications made uſe of by me to the contrary, and ſo further ſome matter of hope left, that though I have hitherto conſtantly faln, yet I ſhall not now be ſo weak or unhappy. And thirdly if I do fall, yet there being nothing of my choice, at leaſt deliberate choice, or intention in that, (but only a treachery of ſome weak part of fleſh about me, which againſt my deliberate will, and my Prayers to God, and faithful endeavour, betrays me to it) I ſhall hope this will paſs for an humane frailty, if I do ſo fall: and the exceſs of the charity or love of God, and zeal to advance his glory, will be able to cover ſuch a ſin as this; as the Martyrs conſtancy and perſeverance in confeſſing the Faith of Chriſt, did cover ſome greater ſins, viz. killing themſelves, rather than they would have any villany committed upon them.

S. But will not my foreſight of that danger oblige me to prevent or avoid it? and if I do not ſo, will not that ſin become deliberate and voluntary to me, if I deliberately and voluntarily venture my ſelf into that temptation?

C. In the preſent caſe, I do not voluntarily venture my ſelf into that danger, as voluntary ſignifies that which I do either upon the free motion of my own will, or upon ſome carnal end or motive of my own, (as it would be, if either the thing deſigned by me were not better, or not lawful:) for it is clear, I venture the hazard only in intuition of ſome good to others, or of ſomewhat otherwiſe tending to the glory of God; and were it not for that, I would not venture it. And ſecondly, though I venture deliberately the poſſible, nay, probable, danger of falling; yet I do alſo deliberately and induſtriouſly fortifie my ſelf that I may not fall, and that is matter of ſome hope that I may eſcape. And if ſtill, through humility and fear and caution, I do not hope it actually; then though it be lawful for me, nay, perhaps better, to abſtain from that better upon that fear, becauſe that fear proceeds from one exceſs of love, (and every exceſs of love to God denominates the action better) yet if it fall out that the exceſs of love lie the other way, and incline me ſtrongly, and ſo carry me to that other purſuit of the glory of God in benefiting of others, even to the deſpiſing my own danger of ſin (I ſay not, ſin, but danger of ſin) in that purſuit; I ſuppoſe this will be ſtill lawful to me, being cauſed by ſo noble an impellent, i. e. only by the exceſs of love. And if in the event ſome ſin thus fall from me, it will be but frailty ſtill, reconcileable with my loving of God, and ſo with the continuance of his love to me.

S. I have by my queſtions given you occaſion to beat this matter of the praiſe of men very thin; be pleaſed now to give me the ſum of all in few words.

Deſire of glory of men is a ſin. C. It is this, That the deſire or deſign of the praiſe of men in the beſt action is ſurely a ſin, as a deflexion to the creature; and if it be the principal motive of our actions, then a waſting ſin, unreconcileable with charity or the favour of God, (for it ſeems the praiſe of men rules in us, and not the love of God:) but if the love of God be the principle, or prime mover of our actions, and this other, of the deſire to be ſeen of men, do only ſteal in as a ſecondary carnal intereſt of our own; then, though it be a ſin ſtill, and ſuch an one as will deprive us of all future reward of that good work to which it is adherent, yet, through God's mercy in Chriſt, and his equitable interpretation of our infirmities, it will not prevail ſo far as to ſeparate between God and us eternally, or to caſt us out of his favour. Mean while this favour, which he finds that is thus guilty of this blaſting ſin, will give him but little encouragement or comfort to indulge to it, when he knows that when it is the chief in his heart, (the principle of his actions, or ſuperiour to the love of God in him) it is then an act of arrant infidelity, and little mercy to be expected then; and even when it comes in but as a ſecondary, (appendant to his good deeds done out of a right principle) it is yet then a means to deprive him of all the reward or benefit of his beſt actions, his Almſgiving, Prayer, and Faſting, yea, and brings him low, to a very ſad ſtate here, and to a (comparatively) mean one hereafter. All which he that will adventure for a little paultry praiſe, that meer blaſt and wind and breath of ſinful men, is ſure very ill adviſed.

S. This being ſo unhappy a ſin, and yet ſo hardly gotten out of us, what means can you direct me to, to prevent it?

Means to prevent it. C. 1. A conſideration of the price it coſts us, [Ye have no reward of your Father which is in Heaven]

or [they have their reward] here, and so none behind in another world. 2. A resolution before-hand, never to make my good deed more publick than the circumstances (necessarily attending the present occasion) extort from me. If I do every good deed in the season and place that God represents the object to me, let him alone to provide for his own glory that is to rise from it; and therefore I shall not need in that respect to use any artifice to publish it, under pretence of making my light shine before men. Therefore I say, the second means will be a resolution not to make my good action more publick than it needs must, as by blowing a trumpet, or using any means proportionable to that, though in a lower degree, to call mens eyes toward me; or to do what I do (on purpose and by choice) in the market-place or street, or places of publick meeting and concourse; (for so the word rendred Synagogues signifies.) But 3. rather on the other side, if I find that humour of vanity getting in upon me, to labour for the greatest secrecy imaginable, (for that is meant by that high phrase of [not letting the left hand know what the right hand doth]) which, by the way, gives also a very useful advertisement for our direction in our dispensing of alms: Not to do them so much to the Beggar in the street, (who 1. is here (by accident) literally forbidden, v. 2. [not in the streets,] and 2. for the most part is a disorderly walker, and not the fittest object of such charity, (relief of his wants, without requiring his labour, being the nourishing his idleness) and withal 3. the publickness and openness which is necessary to the giving to him, is most useful and instrumental to our vain-glory) as to the poor labourer in secret, the House-keeper that comes not abroad, and yet needs aid and relief most truly, to support the burthen of a numerous hungry family, and withal cannot be any temptation to our vain-glorious humour, at least, is not so probably as the other. 4. The contemplation of the reward that attends my contempt of the praise of men, a thousand times more, even in kind, than that which the vain man attends to; to wit, to be praised of God openly before Men and Angels, in a full quire, all looking upon us and applauding, (whereas a few spectators of sinful men is all that can here be compassed:) and not only being praised, but rewarded also. And to fortifie you better, you may observe 5. that no person that receives the praise of men with any gust, is ordinarily able so to carry it, but it shall be discerned by those that are long near him; and when it is discerned, it is a quality generally looked on in others with so much contempt by all men, even by those that are guilty of it, that it really takes off more from the reputation of the best performances than any one ordinary vice can do: And then the less this is discerned by the person himself, the more unhappy are the fruits of it to him, and he yet the more mean; as he that thinks he is admired by all, and is deceived in it. This, as it is prodigiously true in a meer animal gloriæ, excessively taken with this pleasure, so it is proportionably in any other, that being so in a less degree, is yet too far so as to be discerned; and if, by careful concealing (without mortifying) the humour, it be not universally discerned, yet still those that do discern it, which generally are the wisest, and also the most censorious, (whose discerning it, is of most concernment) will accordingly judge of him. And if particular care be not taken of this, this humour will be the most contrary to the good end which alone is pretended to make it pardonable, and the most destructive of it of any thing.

S. I conceive you have now gone through the first of the three things, and fully satisfied all my scruples: God grant my obedience and practice and observation of your directions may be as perfectly complete, and impartial, sincere, and universal. I shall call you now to proceed to the second, beginning at the fifth, and extending to the 16. verse. In all which I expect what you will observe unto me.

Sect. II. Of Prayer.

C. The same general parts that before; a Duty supposed, and a double Caution interposed. The Duty supposed is Prayer; that great prime branch of the worship of God, required of all that acknowledge God to be God, and most reasonable for all that acknowledge 1. the World to be ruled by his Providence; 2. themselves to have any need of his grace or pardon; or 3. that hope for any reward from him in another world.

S. I shall desire your direction in divers particulars concerning this duty: And first, How many sorts of prayer are there?

The sorts of it.

C. There is first Prayer of the heart, and of the tongue. Prayer of the heart, when the Soul sighs out its desires unto God; and of the tongue added to that, which is then Vocal Prayer. 2. There is either publick or private Prayer. Publick of two sorts: First, in the Church; secondly, in the Family. 1. In the Church, or meeting together of all that will join with us, called together by tolling of a Bell, &c. And this very useful and necessary, 1. for the publick Testimony of our piety; 2. for the stirring up and inflaming of others; 3. for the making of those common publick requests wherein all that meet are concerned, (as, for all men, the whole Church, the Rulers and Magistrates of that Community wherein we live, for pardon of sins, the gift of Grace, preservation from danger, and all other things that as fellow-members of a Church or State we may stand in need of;) 4. for the prevailing with God, (the union of so many hearts being most likely to prevail, and the presence of some godly, to bring down mercies on those others whose prayers for themselves have no promise to be heard) especially if performed by a consecrated person, whose office it is to draw nigh unto God, i. e. to offer up prayers, &c. to him, and to be the Ambassadour and Messenger between God and Man; God's Ambassadour to the people, in God's stead, beseeching them to be reconciled; and the peoples Ambassador to God, to offer up our requests for grace, for pardon, for mercies, to him. Then 2. in the Family, which is a lesser Congregation, the Master or Father of which is to supply the place of the Priest (and to provide this Spiritual food for all that are under his power and charge, as well as their corporal food) and to ask those things which in that relation (of members of the same family) are discerned to be most needful for all there present. Then for Private prayer, that is of two sorts again; either of Husband and Wife together, (who are as it were one flesh, and have many relations common to one another, and yet distinct and peculiar from all others) or of every man and woman single or private from all others, in the Closet, or other place of retiredness.

S. Having mentioned the sorts, you will please also to mention the parts of Prayer.

The Parts.

C. Those are set down by S. Paul, 1. Tim. 2. 1. Supplications, Prayers, Intercessions, Giving of thanks. [a] The first seemeth to refer to Confession and acknowledgment of sin, and beseeching pardon for it. A neceſſary daily duty both in publick and private, for our ſelves and others; only in private fit to be more diſtinct and particular, by way of enumeration of the kinds, and acts, and aggravating circumſtances of ſin. The [b] ſecond is the petitioning or requeſting of all things neceſſary for our bodies or ſouls in all our capacities, either as ſingle or double perſons; as members of Families, of Kingdoms, of Chriſtendom, of mankind it ſelf. The [c] third is the interceding or mediating for others, offering up prayers for friends, for enemies, for all men, eſpecially for our Lawful Governours, Kings, and all that be in authority, Spiritual or Civil. The [d] fourth is the returning our acknowledgments to God for all benefits received by us or others: being bound by the rule of gratitude, to be mindful of what we have received; by the rule of piety, to acknowledge God's hand in beſtowing them; of charity, to be ſenſible of whatever good any part of mankind hath been partaker of from that great Spring of goodneſs, as well as our ſelves; and by all theſe, to expreſs all in our Prayers and addreſſes to Heaven.

[d] εὐχαριστίαι.

S. My next enquiry muſt be, how often this duty muſt be performed?

The times.

C. This great duty, conſiſting of theſe ſo many parts, muſt be performed frequently by all and every Chriſtian, without any ſlackning or intermitting of it; but how frequently, there is no precept, in this place, or any other Scripture: which argues, that though the ſubſtance of the duty be under particular precept, yet the frequency is left (after the manner of other free-will offerings) to every man's own conſcience and prudence, as occaſions and circumſtances ſhall direct. Yet from the commands and examples of Scripture ſome ſpecial directions we may take with us. As 1. That one day in ſeven is to be ſet apart for this purpoſe, (though not to be all ſpent in the performance of this one duty, yet) for this duty to be carefully performed both in the Church, the Family, and in private; and that with more ſolemnity than ordinary. 2. That other times, taken notice of by the Church, either by way of commemoration of particular paſſages in the ſtory of Chriſt, of his Saints, &c. or by way of commemoration of ſome notable benefits received, or on occaſion of particular urgencies, &c. be by us ſolemnly obſerved alſo, according to the rule of the ancient Catholick, or of the preſent particular Church wherein we live, in like manner as the Jews obſerved their days appointed them by Law. 3. That no man omit to perform this duty, at leaſt morning and evening, every day; this being ſolemnly required of the people of God, directed by the law of piety to begin and cloſe all with prayer, (which the very Heathens could judge neceſſary) and being the leaſt that can be meant by that precept of the Apoſtle, of praying without ceaſing, or continually: Which is thought by many to extend no farther than in proportion to the [e] daily ſacrifices among the Jews, which were conſtantly every morning and evening; but by none interpreted, or conceiv'd interpretable, to any lower proportion. But then 4. the examples of holy men in Scripture do add unto this number, ſome more, ſome leſs. David in one place ſpecifies the addition of a third, at morning and at evening, and at noon-day, will I pray, and that inſtantly, i. e. in a ſet, ſolemn, intenſe, earneſt addreſs, Pſal. 55. 17. (and ſo Daniel, Chap. 6. 10.) and this of noon-day is the ſame with the ſixth hour, which is a time of prayer, Acts 10. 9. uſed by St. Peter. Others again obſerved the ninth hour, i. e. about three of the clock in the afternoon, as Peter and John, Act. 3. 1. which is there called an hour of prayer, (it ſeems, commonly obſerved) and by going up to the Temple, it is likely that publick prayers were uſed at that time, (or if not, it is clear it was to pour out private devotions) and this ſuperadded to the former is a fourth time. And there is little doubt but that the third hour, i. e. nine in the morning, was an hour of prayer alſo, as will appear by Acts 2: 1. compared with ver. 15. and then that is a fifth time. And the evening prayer being anſwerable to the morning, and ſo uſed at ſix in the evening, as the other at ſix in the morning, the cuſtom of godly men hath been to ſhut up the evening with a compline or prayer at nine of the night, and ſo that is a ſixth time. To which David ſeems to add a ſeventh, Pſal. 119. 164. ſeven times a day do I praiſe thee: where praiſing being the fourth part of prayer, may be a denotation of the whole duty: although the truth is, the phraſe ſeven times may poſſibly be taken not ſtrictly to ſignifie that number, but as a phraſe or form of ſpeech to denote frequency. Theſe directions put together, (and pondered and compared with the leiſure that every man hath from the duties of his calling, and with the great invaluable benefits of prayer, and with the power of importunity, i. e. frequent coming to God in prayer, acknowledged by Chriſt, and with the concernance of thoſe things which we may ask and obtain by prayer, (above moſt other things which we ſpend a great part of our time on) and with the reaſonableneſs of giving God a liberal portion out of our time, as well as our eſtates, who hath allowed us ſo much beſides to our own uſes) will be very helpful to any that will judge diſcreetly what is to be done in this buſineſs; and then ſtill you muſt add this reſolution, that what is well done and well weighed for circumſtances, being for the ſubſtance a duty commanded, the more of it is performed, it will be the more acceptable to God.

The Forms.

S. From theſe Scruples ſatisfied, give me leave to proceed to another: What kind of forms my prayers may, or muſt be preſented in.

The lawfulneſs of ſet forms.

C. In this there are two queſtions couched. 1. Whether any ſet form of Prayer be Lawful to be uſed. 2. if it be, Whether any other may be uſed. And then, what directions may be had for that. To the firſt I anſwer poſitively, That ſet forms of prayer are lawful, both as the word [ſet] ſignifies premeditate limited forms, as oppoſed to extemporary; and as it ſignifies preſcribed, and for ſome occaſions and uſes commanded. That it is lawful to uſe a ſet determinate form of words, either written or faſtned in our memory, is apparent both by the example of Chriſt, who in St. Luke bids us when we pray, ſay, Our Father, &c. (not only pray after this pattern, as the words in St. Matthew may be interpreted; but uſe theſe very words, When you pray, ſay, Our Father, &c. Luke 11. 2.) and of John Baptiſt, who taught his diſciples to pray in ſome form, though we know not what it is, Luke 11. 1. as alſo of the Prieſts under the Law, by God's appointment, that uſed a ſet form of bleſſing the people, Num. 6. 24. and of our Saviour himſelf, who uſed a part (if not the whole) of the 22 Pſalm upon the Croſs, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me, &c. and of the Church of the Jews, and Chriſtian Churches through all times, who have had their Liturgies, as ways and forms of ſerving God publickly, and as means to preſerve the true Religion from all all corruptions in Doctrine. And to theſe Arguments may be added one more, of common obſervation, That even when the Miniſter (or whoſoever is the mouth of the reſt) prayeth, though in a form of his own preſent extemporary effuſion, yet at that time all others preſent are limited to his conceptions, and pray in as ſtinted a form as if what the Miniſter prays were read out of a Book, or dictated by his memory. That it is alſo lawful to uſe a ſet (as that ſignifies a preſcribed) form of prayer, is as apparent, 1. by Chriſt's preſcribing one, which he would not ſure have done, if it had not been lawful to have uſed it being preſcribed; and ſo alſo, 2. by the other examples mentioned, which are moſt of them preſcriptions; 3. by the no objection againſt the uſe of them; for ſure, if it be lawful to uſe them, it is lawful to preſcribe them at ſome time, and for ſome uſes, (for that a thing in it ſelf acknowledged and proved to be lawful, ſhould by being commanded by lawful Authority become unlawful, is very unreaſonable, unleſs Lawful Magiſtrates be the onely unlawful things) and at other times to uſe other liberty is not forbidden, and ſo hereby there is not any invaſion or tyranny uſed upon our Chriſtian liberty; 4. by the great benefit that accrues to the Congregation in having diſcreet well-formed prayers, and ſo not ſubject to the temerity and impertinencies of the ſudden effuſions; and the ſame ſtill in conſtant uſe, and ſo not ſtrange or new to them, but ſuch as in which they may with underſtanding go along with the Miniſter, and by the help of their memory the moſt ignorant may carry them away for his private uſe; and generally thoſe that want ſuch helps, are by this means afforded them: and laſtly, by the conſideration of this one ſpecial farther advantage of them, viz. that by means of preſcribed Liturgies the unity of Faith and Charity is much preſerved.

Of other unpreſcribed forms.

S. Well then, ſuppoſing theſe Set-forms to be lawful in themſelves, and lawful to be preſcribed, another queſtion you taught me to ask, Whether any other may be uſed but ſuch?

C. Yes doubtleſs: For the Church being obeyed in the obſervance of the preſcribed Liturgy in publick, permits ſometimes (and upon ſpecial incidental occaſions preſcribes) other forms in the Publick Congregation, ſo it be done prudently, and piouſly, and reverently, and to edification; and ſo alſo in the family, or in Viſitation of the ſick, if the particular condition of one or other do require it: and in private, in the Cloſet, it is not ſuppoſed by our Church but that every one may ask his own wants in what form of words he ſhall think fit; which that he may do fitly and reverently, it will not be amiſs for him to acquaint himſelf with the ſeveral addreſſes to God, which the Book of Pſalms, and other parts of holy Writ, and all other helps of devotion will afford him, either to uſe as he finds them fit for the preſent purpoſe, or by thoſe patterns to direct and prepare himſelf to do the like.

The qualification of Prayer.

S. What qualifications be required in our prayers to make them acceptable to God, or prevalent with him?

In the Perſon.

C. Three ſorts of qualifications. One in the perſon that prayeth; and that is, that he lift up clean hands without wrath or doubting, i. e. 1. That he be purified from all wilful ſin, bring not any unmortified wickedneſs with him for God to patronize. 2. That he have charity to his brethren, and humility; the two contraries to wrath. 3. That he come with confidence to God's throne, aſſuredly believing that if he ask what he ought, and what God hath not decreed againſt, God will grant it him either in kind, or by giving him that which is better for him. For this a Chriſtian is bound to believe, that God is the hearer of prayers, that they which ask ſhall have: only this with theſe limitations, unleſs God by his All-ſeeing eye judge ſomewhat elſe better for us, or by ſome particular decree hath determined the contrary; as when the deſtruction of a Nation is determined, then though Noah, Daniel, and Job intercede for it, they ſhall only ſave themſelves, but not the Nation.

In the Prayer.

S. What other ſort of qualifications is there?

C. In the prayer it ſelf. As 1. That the matter of it be juſtifiable; ſuch things as God hath promiſed to give his children: or when that is doubtful whether it be ſuch or no, then with ſubmiſſion to his wiſdom as well as his will, if he ſeeth it beſt for us, and not otherwiſe. 2. That the things that belong to our ſouls, and wherein God may moſt be honoured, and our neighbour benefited, be moſt and primarily deſired. 3. Zeal or fervency. 4. Attention, as it is contrary to wandring idle thoughts; which (though they are very apt ſtill to interpoſe, and no hope ever to be wholly without them, yet) muſt be laboured againſt, and by the uſe of all means probable repelled, and pardon for them asked ſolemnly of God. 5. Conſtancy and perſeverance in asking, commended to us, by the Parable of the importunate Widow. 6. The uſe of ſuch bodily reverence, ſuch geſtures and poſtures as may both help to inflame our zeal, and be a fit companion of our ſpiritual worſhip. And 7. ſometimes adding to our prayers Vows of voluntary oblations, after the example of Jacob, If God, &c. and thoſe either when we pray to receive any ſpecial mercy from God, as Jacob did; or by way of gratitude and acknowledgment to God, when we have received them. Gen. 28. 20.

Thoſe that muſt follow our Prayers.

S. What is the third ſort of qualifications?

C. Thoſe that are to follow our prayers. 1. Obſervation of God's returns to our prayers; and in that of God's gracious providence in denying what would have been leſs fit, and granting that that is more. 2. Returning him the thanks, and the glory of all his grants and denials. 3. Conſidering and ſetting a value on this great unparallel'd dignity and prerogative of a Chriſtian, in talking and converſing, and prevailing with God; no difficulty of acceſs, no doubt of acceptation. 4. Raiſing from his mercies a ſtock and treaſure of confidence for the future, together with a love of him; and by his denials, learning to make fitter addreſſes the next time. 5. Expreſſing our gratitude for his mercies by our acts of charity and bounty to our brethren that ask of us, or need our aid; and, in caſe of precedent vow, paying that which we have vowed.

The Cautions.

S. If there be nothing elſe which you will add concerning the Duty ſuppoſed, be pleaſed to proceed to the Cautions interpoſed in it?

Of vain-glory.

C. The firſt of them is common with that in the matter of almſgiving, that the deſire to be ſeen or praiſed of men for our piety do not interpoſe in our devotions: to that purpoſe, that it be not done in Common Assemblies, (meaning thereby not the Church, or publick assembling to that purpose in the house of God, as the word [f] Synagogues might seem to import, but any place of publick view, where men use to be Spectators) nor in the corners of streets, i. e. places chosen on purpose as most conspicuous, (for he that is in the corner of streets is seen by all in either street;) but that our private prayers (which peculiarly are here spoken of) be as private as may be, in the Closet, and the door shut; and, as near as we can, no eye but that of Heaven admitted to behold us. For if, in a duty wherein God is so nearly concerned by way of honour, and our selves both in duty and for the obtaining our needs, we can take in so poor an accession as the consideration and desire of the praise of men, it is most just that that should be our reward, and no other expected from God for us.

[f] συναγωγαῖς.

S. What is the second Caution?

Of vain repetitions.

C. That we use not vain repetitions.

S. What is meant by that phrase?

C. The word in Greek is a proverbial word, referring to a person whose name was Battus, and a fault that he was observed to be guilty of; which, seeing it is now uncertain what it was, we shall best gheſs of by the context here, particularly by the reasons that are here annexed to the Cautions. 1. Because by this we shall be like the Heathens, who think to be heard for their much speaking. 2. Because we shall be like them in thinking that our many words help God to understand our meaning, which he knows before we begin to pray. By which it is plain, 1. That all repetition in Prayer is not forbidden, because all such is not against either of those reasons; and withal because both David in his Psalms (particularly, Psalm 136.) and Christ in his Agony, used the same words in prayer many times. 2. That the thing here forbidden is somewhat that the Heathens were guilty of; as before, the Hypocrites were of the vain-glory. 3. That the thing most probably to be fixt on, is this, the tumbling out of a many unsignificant words, (as the Heathen Tragedies express their manner) or the same words over and over again, not out of fervency of mind, but to lengthen out the prayer as long as they can, counting this length of words a good quality, or that that makes it either more powerful or more acceptable with God; which indeed was the peculiar fault of the Gentiles, the Jews rather using conciseness and brevity in their prayers. From all which it follows, that the bare length of prayers, any farther than either the necessity of our several wants or the fervency of our zeal requires, or than may tend to the inflaming of our zeal, is not acceptable to God, or like to prevail with him; but rather to do the contrary, if it be affected by us: which is farther evidenced by the manner of that prayer which is here by Christ commended to us, as a pattern and form of ours to be ruled and directed by, Our Father, &c. A very concise and short Prayer.

Of the Lord's Prayer.

S. Being by our Saviour's speech and our progress (in attendance thereon) fain upon the Lord's Prayer, though I have formerly in the explication of our Church-Catechism learnt somewhat of the understanding of it; yet it being a prayer of such special weight and difficulty, I shall again desire your particular directions for the understanding of every part and branch of it distinctly. And first, is there any thing that from the general fabrick of the words you would observe to me?

C. Yes, this one thing, that our first and chief care ought to be the glory of God, advancement of his kingdom, and obedience to his will; i. e. the setting up God in that excellence that belongs to him; which is the sum of the three first Petitions: And then after that, the care of our selves, and those things wherein we are most concerned; the sum of the three latter. To which if we annex the Doxology [for thine is the Kingdom, &c.] which is the reflecting on God's glory again, the observation will be enlarged, that the Glory of God, &c. ought to be our first and last care; and all that is good to our selves, taken in only as it may best consist with that, on each side enclosed and bounded and limited with it. Just as we read of the Liturgy used by the Jews, that of the eighteen prayers used in it, the three first and the three last concerned God; and the rest between, themselves and their own wants. But the truth is, the ancient Greek Copies have not those words of Doxology: and there is reason to think that they came in out of the Liturgies of the Greek Church; where (as now in many places) the custom was, when the Lord's Prayer had been recited by the Presbyter, for the people to answer, by way of Doxology, (as after the reading of every Psalm a [Glory be to the Father,] &c.) For thine is the Kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

S. Please you then to enter on the particular survey of this Prayer. Where first occurs the title which we bestow on God in it, which I already conceive as a means to raise up our hearts to him, and a ground of Confidence that he can and will hear our prayers. But what is the particular importance of it.

Our Father.

C. First, That we look on God as Children on a father, with all reverence, and love, and gratitude, as on him who is 1. our Creator, and Father of our Being; 2. more particularly set out to us in that relation than to any other sort of creatures, (as Plato said, God was a [g] Maker of other things, but a [h] Father of Men.) Secondly, That all the acts of a father on earth are by him performed to us, but in a far higher and more excellent degree, as far as Heaven is above Earth. Such are 1. His begetting us anew to a lively hope, i. e. his giving us his Spirit, the principle of spiritual and celestial life: 2. His continuance of assisting grace to preserve what he hath begotten: 3. His, first, preventing, secondly, exciting, and thirdly, illuminating grace, as a kind of education to our Souls: 4. His providing an inheritance for us in another world, not by the death of the Father, but by the purchase of the Son, to be instated on us at our death; (which is the coming out of our non-age, as it were.) And (besides all this, wherein he is a father to our souls and spirits) many, nay, all kind of paternal acts to our very bodies, which we owe more to him than to our earthly parents who begat them: as also the feeding, preserving, maintaining, adorning, and at last crowning of them. Thirdly, By this title, and in it that particle [Our,] we 1. signifie our belief of God's free bounty and fatherly respect to all our kind, and that we labour not to ingross or inclose it to our selves; 2. we extend our prayers to them as well as to our selves; 3. we express our faith, and reliance, and total plenary dependence on him as ours, and without whom we can hope nothing; 4. by the adjoining of this title [which art in Heaven] we celebrate his infinity, immensity, all-sufficiency, and all the rest of his Attributes,

[g] ποιητής.

Attributes, whereby he differs from our fathers on earth, i. e. from men, and the honourableſt of creatures.

S. From the Title you may pleaſe to deſcend to the Petitions: and firſt to thoſe which concern God; of which (all together) if you would teach me any thing, I ſhall be ready to receive it.

C. I ſhall from thence only trouble you with this, That the form of wiſh rather than prayer retained in all thoſe three, different from the ſtyle of the three latter, doth contain under it a ſilent prayer to God, to take the means or way of performing this into his own hands; and by his grace or providence, or however he ſhall ſee fit, to take care that, by us, and all mankind, His Name may be hallowed, His Kingdom may come, His Will be done, &c.

Hallowed be thy Name.

S. What is meant by the firſt Petition, [Hallowed be thy name?] And firſt, what by God's name?

C. By his name is meant himſelf; God in his eſſence and attributes, and all things that have peculiar relation to him: It being an ordinary Hebraiſm that [* thing] and [word] [k doing] and [ſpeaking] [l being called] and [being] [m name] and [eſſence] (as [his Name ſhall be called Wonderful,] i. e. he ſhall be a wonderful one) ſhould be taken promiſcuouſly the one for the other.

* πρᾶγμα & ῥῆμα. k διοσιὸν & διλογίη. l κλησθήσεται & ἔσται. m ὄνομα αὐτῦ & αὐτός. n קדש

S. What is meant by hallowing?

C. The n Hebrew word, or Syriack dialect, in which Chriſt delivered it, ſignifies to ſeparate from vulgar common uſe, to uſe in a ſeparate manner, with that reverence and reſpect that is not allowed to any thing elſe, in that notion that holy is oppoſed to common or profane. Thus is God hallowed, when he is uſed with a reverence peculiar to him above all other things; when ſuch power, majeſty, dominion, goodneſs, &c. are attributed to him that are competible to nothing elſe. Thus is his Name hallowed when it is reverently handled; his Word or Scripture, when weighed with Humility, received with Faith, as the infallible Fountain of all ſaving truth, applied to our Souls, and the Souls of our hearers, as the inſtrument deſigned to our endleſs good, the Power of God ordained to Salvation. Thus is his Houſe conſecrated to his ſervice; his Prieſts deſigned to wait on him and officiate; the Revenues of the Church inſtated on God for the maintenance of his lot or Clergy; the firſt day of the week among us (as among the Jews the laſt) ſet apart for the worſhipping of God publickly and ſolemnly. And every of theſe is hallowed, when it is thus according to the deſign uſed ſeparately, when none of theſe mounds (to fence each) are broken down, but all preſerved from the inrode of ſacrilegious profaners.

S. Having explained the ſingle terms, what is now the meaning of the Complexe, or Petition?

C. I pray to God that he will be pleaſed, by his grace poured into my heart, and the hearts of all men, and by the diſpenſation of his gracious providence, to work all our hearts to ſuch a reverence, and awe, and ſeparate reſpect unto Him, his Majeſty, his Attributes, his Works of Grace, his Name, his Word, his Day, his Miniſters, his conſecrated Gifts, (the patrimony of the Church, devolved from him upon the Miniſters thereof) that the ſins of ſacrilege, and profaneneſs, and Idolatry, and irreverence, and indevotion, &c. may be turned out of the World; and the contrary vertues of Chriſtian piety and reverence and devotion ſet up and flouriſh among us.

S. O bleſſed Father, Thus be thy Name hallowed by me and all mankind.

Thy Kingdom come.

Pleaſe you now to proceed to the ſecond, [Thy Kingdom come.] And firſt, What is meant by Gods Kingdom?

C. The exerciſe of Chriſt's Spiritual Regal Power in the hearts of all his Servants and Subjects, or Diſciples, that give up their names unto him, 1. here in this imperfect Kingdom of Grace, where the mortifying of every unruly affection is the erecting of a throne for Chriſt; much more the uniform obedience of a whole World of humble, pious, meek, peaceable, charitable Chriſtians, when God by the power of his Grace ſhall be pleaſed to new form and mould the univerſality of Chriſtians into the temper of his Chriſt; which though we know not whether it will ever be, yet it well becomes us to endeavour and pray for it: 2. In the great final doom of all enemies, and crowning of all Saints, which ſhall be attended with a Kingdom which ſhall have none end, Chriſt giving up the Kingdom to his Father, and all his Saints being taken in to reign with him for ever.

S. What do you mean by praying that this Kingdom of God may come?

C. I pray that God by his Grace, inſpired into my heart, and the hearts of all men, and by his bleſſed diſpoſal of all things below, will ſo begin to ſet up his Kingdom in our hearts immediately, ſo weaken the power of the adverſary and the malice of oppoſers, that it may by degrees of flouriſhing daily encreaſe; and that all other things which are in his purpoſe may be orderly compleated; till at laſt this mortal compounded Kingdom which hath ſo much mixture of infirmity and ſin and rebellion in it, be turned into a Kingdom of perfect holineſs and immortality.

S. O come, Lord Jeſus, come quickly into thy Kingdom of Grace here, for the illuminating and preventing, for the purging and cleanſing, for the regenerating and ſanctifying of our Souls, for the beſtowing on us that precious bleſſed grace of perſeverance; and in the Kingdom of thy glory, for the perfecting and accompliſhing of us hereafter.

Thy will be done.

Proceed we to the third Petition, [Thy will be done on Earth as it is in Heaven.] What is meant by God's Will?

C. His commands whatſoever they are, but eſpecially thoſe which are delivered to us in the Goſpel by Chriſt.

S. How is his Will done in Heaven?

C. It is performed by the Angels, who are his miniſtring ſpirits, doing thoſe things in the governing of the world below, and of every of us, which he appointeth them to do. And this which they are thus appointed, they do willingly, chearfully, ſpeedily, and without neglecting any part of it.

S. What do you mean by the doing it on Earth?

C. The obedience of all men here below.

S. What then is the full importance of the whole Petition?

C. We

C. We pray to God that he will ſo inſpire his grace into all our hearts, and ſo direct us by his providence, and aſſiſt us to performance, that we may obey him in all his commands here on earth willingly, readily, cheerfully, ſpeedily, impartially, (or ſincerely, without indulging our ſelves to any kind of ſin, in the omiſſion of any part of our duty to him) as his Angels daily obey his commands in Heaven.

S. Bleſſed Lord, give us this grace to will, and aſſiſt us to perform.

From the Petitions that reſpect God, we may now proceed to thoſe that reſpect our ſelves more particularly; though by your explication I perceive that in thoſe which reſpect God we are nearly concern'd alſo.

C. It is true in ſome kind, but not ſo immediately and particularly as in the latter three; of which one thing you may obſerve in general, which yet I cannot conveniently declare to you, till I have explained to you the particulars.

Give us this day our daily Bread.

S. Be pleaſed then to do that, and firſt in the former of them [Give us this day our daily bread] to tell me what is meant by Daily bread.

C. By bread is meant all the neceſſaries of life. By [daily] ſomewhat which the word in Engliſh doth not diſtinctly ſignifie, yet well enough expreſſeth the ſence of it. For thus it is: The word in Greek may come from a word which ſignifies [o] the day approaching, whether that be the now inſtant day, or elſe the morrow, that is (in the Scripture ſence of the [p] Hebrew anſwerable to it) the future, the remainder of our lives, how long or ſhort ſoever it is, (which time, becauſe it is uncertain, men ordinarily make this an excuſe for their covetouſneſs, that they may lay up for their age, and ſo the older they are, they grow the more covetous:) If we fetch the word rendred [daily] from hence, it will then denote, ſo much as ſhall be ſufficient or proportionable for the [q] future or remainder of our lives, which in our prayers we beſeech God to take into his care, and to diſtribute unto us this day, that is, (as Saint Luke interprets it) [r] daily, or day by day. Another way there is of deducing the word which we render [daily] ſo that it ſhall ſignifie that which is agreeable or fit for my [ſ] being or ſubſiſtence; not ſo as to reſtrain it to the loweſt proportion with which a man can ſubſiſt or live, but that which is [t] agreeable to his condition taken with all its circumſtances, for that is it which is called his Being; and then it will be exactly agreeable to Solomon's prayer for food convenient for him. And ſo in either ſence the prime importance of this Petition is, Lord, give us day by day that which ſhall be ſufficient for the remainder of our lives.

ἄρτον ἐπιούσιον. [o] Ἐπιοῦσα. [p] סחר and ſo alſo אחר rendred ὄπισω χρόνου, Deut. 32. 29. [q] Ἐπιοῦσα, ἐπερχομένη. [ſ] ἀναγκαῖον τῇ ἑκάστῃ οὐσίᾳ ἡμῶν ἀρμόζων, Phavor. Panis diminſi noſtri, others.

S. You ſaid, this was the prime importance of it, which ſeemed to imply that there was another; what is that?

C. The moſt obvious and natural ſence I call the prime ſence, becauſe the words do firſt yield it; that is (as I told you) all that belongs to the bodily neceſſaries of this life, food and raiment; but a ſecondary ſence there is, which though the word yield but in the ſecond place, yet is a more weighty conſiderable ſence, to wit, as Bread imports in a ſpiritual acception the food of the Soul, the grace of God, without which the Soul can as little ſuſtain it ſelf as the body without food; and then the daily bread is that meaſure of continual grace which will ſuffice for the remainder of our warfare here, which we beſeech God day by day to beſtow upon us, to aſſiſt and uphold us in all our wants, and refer the care thereof unto God, who, we are confident, careth for us.

S. I beſeech God thus to care for us all, and give us day by day for the remainder of our lives all things neceſſary for our Souls and bodies.

Forgive us our treſpaſſes.

You may now pleaſe to proceed to the next, i. e. the fifth Petition, [Forgive us our treſpaſſes as we forgive them that treſpaſs againſt us.]

C. There will be little difficulty found in that. To forgive, is, to abſolve, pardon, free from puniſhment; and the word treſpaſſes ſignifies all manner of offences againſt God: the word in Greek is * debts, which is a Syriack expreſſion to ſignifie ſins. And it ſeems to be thus occaſioned. Every man is bound to perfect exact obedience to God by the condition of the firſt Covenant, and that under an heavy penalty, if he fail: He then which hath ſo failed, is thus God's debtor to puniſhment; which if it be not forgiven him, Satan God's officer will fetch out a Writ againſt him, caſt him into priſon, and there leave him (till he hath paid the uttermoſt, i. e) eternally. We therefore pray to God to remit theſe debts of ours, the payment of which would go ſo deep with us. And whereas we add [as we forgive them, &c.] that is only a mention of a qualification in us (made neceſſary by Chriſt, to make us capable of that remiſſion of God's) and as an Argument to enforce that Grant, by profeſſing our ſelves freely to pardon all thoſe that by any injuries done to us are become our debtors, i. e. might juſtly in ſtrict Law be by us proſecuted to puniſhment.

* ὀφειλήματα.

As we forgive.

S. Lord, grant us all this free pardon through the ſatisfaction of Jeſus Chriſt, for all our ſins; and give us grace thus to forgive all others that have injured us, as freely as we hope for pardon from our God.

Lead us not into temptation.

I ſhall lead you to the laſt Petition, which ſeems to be made up of two members, [Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from all evil.] What is meant by temptation firſt, then by God's leading into it?

C. By temptation is meant any allurement of pleaſure or profit, or determent of danger or evil, which may bring me to fall into any ſin. [To enter into ſuch temptation] (as Mat. 26. 41. the phraſe is uſed) ſignifies ſo to be involved with either of theſe that I cannot get out. [x] To make to enter, or to bring, or to lead into it, (which are all one) is to occaſion our thus entring, or being involved: which God may do by leaving us, or by withdrawing his grace. So that the meaning of this Petition is, not, that God would not permit us to be tempted, (which is the lot of all, eſpecially the moſt godly men, James 1. 2, 3.) but that he will not ſo forſake or leave us to our ſelves, ſo deſtitute, and withdraw his grace, ſo deliver us up (in time of temptation, either through proſperity or adverſity, or Satan's aſſaults) that we be not able to extricate our ſelves, that he will not leave us to be overcome by temptation; for ſo [to be tempted] Gal. 6. 1. ſignifies, the word being of a real paſſive ſignification, (of which nature there be many in the New Teſtament) and ſo noting the being overtaken alſo, the being enſnared by ſin, wrought on by temptation: for the poſſibility of that only is it, the the conſideration of which will move us to reſtore ſuch as be already overtaken, which is the ſubject of that verſe.

S. Lord, do not thou thus leave or forſake us in time of temptation, ſo far as that we be overcome by it.

But what is the importance of the other member of the Petition?

C. The former was only negative, for not bringing us to this great hazard by forſaking or deſtituting us; the latter is poſitive, for deliverance from temptation; not again from falling into it, but from being overcome by it: which God may do by either of theſe ways. 1. By giving us a proportionate meaſure of ſtrength or grace to bear it and move under it, how heavy ſoever the preſſure be; or 2. by tempering the temptation to our ſtrength, and not permiting the aſſault to be over-heavy. And that God will do this (by which of theſe means he pleaſes) and deliver us from the power or hurt of temptation, (which then only becomes evil when we are overcome by it) is the ſum of that ſecond part of the laſt Petition, Deliver us from evil, or out of evil: whether by that we mean the evil one, Satan, the Artificer and deſigner and improver of temptations; or the Temptation it ſelf, either that of our own luſt, or the world, and enemies of Piety. Deliver us from evil.

S. Lord, be thou thus ſeaſonably pleaſed to reſcue and deliver us (when we ſhould otherwiſe ſurely be overcome) by the power and aſſiſtance of thy mighty grace.

I now remember you told me, one thing would be obſervable from the general view of theſe three Petitions, which, having now explained them, it will be ſeaſonable to afford me.

C. It is this; the order wherein God is wont to diſpenſe his ſpiritual gifts unto us, by the order wherein Chriſt directeth us to petition them. Thus, God 1. gives grace to ſanctifie (that Manna from Heaven, that Bread of Life, without which we are not able to live to God.) 2. He pardons ſins to them that are thus fitly qualified to receive his pardon. 3. He aſſiſteth and upholds from falling into ſin, i.e. He firſt Sanctifieth; ſecondly, Juſtifieth; thirdly, gives grace to perſevere. And in this order we muſt deſire and pray for theſe ſeveral degrees of grace.

S. What now have you to add concerning the Doxology added to theſe Petitions?

C. This, that whether it were delivered by Chriſt, (and taken either out of David's form, 1 Chron. 21. 9, 11. or out of the ancient forms of the Jews) or whether it were by after copies annexed out of the Liturgies of the ancient Greek Church, it is a very fit form of acknowledgment to God to enforce the granting of the Petitions; eſpecially thoſe three which reſpect God; thus, [Thy Kingdom come] for [Thine is the Kingdom:] [Thy will be done] for [Thine is the Power:] [Hallowed be thy Name] for [Thine is the Glory] for ever and ever. The firſt of theſe is the acknowledgment of God's Dominion due to him over the world; and is not (nor can be) ſaid in earneſt by any but thoſe that reſign up their Souls for him alone to reign in, as the ſole Prince and Monarch of their Souls: He that retains one rebel-luſt out of God's obedience, doth mock him when he repeats thoſe words. The ſecond is, the acknowledgment of God's Omnipotency and All-ſufficiency, as the Fountain of all that grace and ſtrength we beg for; and he that cannot rely on him for all that is neceſſary for this life and another, doth reproach him when he ſaith Thine is the Power. The third acknowledgeth the thanks, the honour, the glory of all we are or have, to be due to him from whom all is received; and he that can impute any thing to himſelf as his own acquiſition, can never be thought in earneſt when he ſaith [Thine is the Glory.] The Amen that concludes, is but a ſolemn ſtyle of the Jewiſh firſt, and then Chriſtian Church; either noting the faith of him that prayes, and confides that what he here prays for ſhall be granted; or, only a recollection of all that is before prayed for by the ſpeaker (by which all that are preſent, uſe to make themſelves partakers of the ſeverals, and to expreſs their joining in each with him) [So be it.] Anſwerable to what is at length in our Litany [We beſeech thee to hear us, good Lord.] The Doxology. Thine is the Kingdom. The Power. And the glory. Amen.

S. I perceive after the recitation of this Prayer, one appendage there is which cometh in as it were in a Parentheſis, before our Saviour proceeds to the next matter [For if we forgive men their treſpaſſes, &c. verſe 14, 15.] What is the meaning of that?

C. It is a returning by way of review, or giving a reaſon of one paſſage in the former Prayer, (and but one, as if that were the moſt hugely important of any) to wit, why thoſe words [as we forgive them that treſpaſs againſt us] were interpoſed; namely, becauſe in God's forgiving of us, he hath a peculiar reſpect to our free pardon and forgiving of other men; as appears by the Parable, Matth. 18. 35. where he that had his debt forgiven him by the King, yet going out and challenging his fellow-ſervant, and exacting payment from him, hath the former forgiven debt moſt ſadly brought upon him again; and this applied there (ver. 35.) particularly by Chriſt to every of us, who from our hearts forgive not our brethren their treſpaſſes. And therefore whoſoever prayeth for forgiveneſs in this prayer, doth not only oblige himſelf to forgive all others, but he doth even curſe and bring down imprecations upon himſelf, and deſire God in effect never to pardon him, if he be not thus qualified by pardoning of others. It will therefore be moſt abſolutely neceſſary for every man that takes this prayer into his mouth, firſt to put all malice, deſire of revenge, or grudge, out of his heart; or elſe his prayer ſhall be turned into a curſe to him: and that is the importance of this paſſage. Prayer for pardon obligeth to forgive.

S. You have paſt through the ſecond period of this Chapter, the weighty duty of Prayer; together with the Cautions and Directions belonging to it. Let us now by your leave advance to the third, reaching through the next three Verſes, 16, 17, 18. Moreover when thou faſteſt, &c. Where firſt, I pray, what is the importance of the phraſe [Moreover] becauſe that was not formerly uſed in the ſecond of the three? Sect. III. Of Faſting.

C. It firſt noteth, this duty not to be ſo ordinarily and frequently taken notice of as the former, (and therefore a note of remark is prefixt to it.) Secondly, that this is alſo a duty neceſſary to be ſuperadded to the practice of the other two, if we will be Diſciples of Chriſt; it being a part of the worſhip of God alſo, eſpecially when it cometh in conjunction with them.

S. Well then, I ſhall preſume you will continue the ſame method in handling this which in the former two you have obſerved; by taking notice of, 1. a duty ſuppoſed, 2. a Caution interpoſed. I ſhall deſire to receive receive firſt what you will recommend unto me for the Duty which is here ſuppoſed, [thou, when thou faſteſt.] What kind of faſting is here ſpoken of?

C. Not the ſolemn preſcribed Faſts of the Jews, (for thoſe were not to be concealed or diſſembled) ſuch as the great day of Expiation, called the Faſt which God hath choſen (deſcribed Iſaiah 58. in thoſe expreſſions which are ordinarily thought to belong to the weekly Sabbath-day, but both there and Levit. 16. 31. and 23. 32. and Num. 29. 7. moſt clearly belong to that day of Expiation;) nor thoſe other three added to that under the time of the ſecond Temple: but days of private Faſting, that every one preſcribed themſelves as free-will-offerings, ſome once, ſome twice, ſome oftner, every week, denying themſelves their lawful ordinary food, commonly not eating till the going down of the Sun, and then very moderately alſo. Which exerciſe as Chriſt diſlikes not, but rather approveth it by his mention here; ſo he deſires to free and reſcue it from the vain-glorious deſign of Phariſaical Hypocrites in the uſing of it. But before you will be well capable of hearing and aſſenting to your duty in this of Faſting, or denying your ſelf your lawful food, it will be neceſſary, by way of preparative, for you to know your duty in reſpect of ſobriety; or what eating and drinking (abſtracted from the ſuperaddition of this duty of faſting) is lawful for Chriſtians. For as he which is not advanced ſo far in the School of Nature as to obſerve rules of Juſtice, will ſcarce be a fit auditor of the doctrine of Almſgiving premiſed; ſo certainly, he that hath not ſubmitted himſelf to the rules of Sobriety, will be hardly brought to hear of Faſting: and beſides, the truth is, that the unjuſt mans alms will avail him little, and as little the Drunkards or Gluttons faſts. And therefore it will not be amiſs awhile, before we proceed, to take in the conſideration of this duty of Sobriety.

Of Sobriety.

S. I acknowledge the reaſonableneſs of the Propoſal. What then do you mean by Sobriety?

C. That temperance in eating and drinking which (whatſoever may be ſaid of it under the Old Teſtament among the Jews, who being allured to the ſervice of God (eſpecially) with the repreſentation of temporal promiſes, of plenty, &c. could not ſo fitly be interdicted the liberal uſe of meats and drinks, but might be allowed ſomewhat in that matter which is not allowable to Chriſtians, at leaſt might be ſo far permitted the exceeding of thoſe ſtrict terms of Sobriety without danger of the like puniſhment) is now ſtrictly commanded Chriſtians in the New Teſtament, and that under threat of damnation to him that frequently, or willingly and indulgently, offendeth herein. Thus 1 Cor. 6. 10. it is ſaid of [y] drunkards, that they ſhall not inherit the Kingdom of God: Where the word is not to be reſtrained to thoſe who drink to beſtiality, to the depriving themſelves of the uſe of their reaſon, that drink drunk, as we ſay; but belongs to all that drink wine or ſtrong drink intemperately, though through their ſtrength of brain they be not at preſent intoxicated by it. So Gal. 5. 21. among the works of the fleſh, which they that do ſhall not inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, there is mention of [z] drunkenneſs, and revellings or comeſſations, or exceſs in eating. So Rom. 13. 13. both are together forbidden, * ſurfeitings, or exceſs in eating, and drunkenneſſes, or exceſs in drinking. And ſo 1 Pet. 4. 3. [a] Exceſs of wine, comeſſations and drinkings. And on the other ſide is ſobriety commanded, 1 Theſ. 5. 6. 8. And Titus, Chap. 2. it is mentioned as a ſpecial deſign and end of the appearing of Chriſt, that we ſhould be inſtructed to walk (juſtly, and piouſly, and) ſoberly in this preſent World. The firſt of thoſe three referring to our duty to our neighbour, the ſecond to our duty toward God, and that of ſobriety to our duty toward our ſelves, (nothing tending more to the preſervation of our ſelves than that; and nothing being more hurtful and more unagreeable with that charity which we owe to our ſelves, our bodies as well as ſouls, than intemperance) and ſo in thoſe Three is the whole duty of man comprized.

* κῶμοι & μέθαι.
[a] οἰνοφλυγίαι, κῶμοι, πότοι.

S. How many ſorts of exceſs in eating and drinking be there, to which Sobriety is oppoſed?

Exceſs in eating and drinking, of two ſorts.

C. The exceſs is of two ſorts: one in the quantity, when we eat or drink to the over-charging of the body; and the ſobriety contrary to that, is the eating and drinking no more than agrees with the health and good temper of it, though we do allow our ſelves the pleaſures and delights in choice of meats, &c. Another exceſs there is in the quality or delicacy of meats or drinks, and a ſtudied care and purſuit of ſuch as are thus moſt delightful; and the ſobriety contrary to this, is when we content our ſelves with that meat and drink which is neceſſary or uſeful to the health and ſtrength of our bodies, and neglect or deſpiſe all other delicacies.

In Quantity.
Quality.

S. Are both theſe kinds of exceſſes condemned, and ſobrieties commanded us Chriſtians?

C. Some difference there is in this matter. The former of thoſe exceſſes is ſo expreſly forbidden, that he that uſeth it, is excluded from the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6. 10. Gal. 5. 21. And conſequently the contrary ſobriety is ſtrictly commanded under that heavy penalty. But the ſecond kind of exceſs is not ſo certainly and expreſly forbidden, nor the contrary ſobriety ſo diſtinctly and peremptorily commanded under penalty of excluſion from the Kingdom of Heaven, to him that uſeth that exceſs only in the choice of meats that are moſt delicious. Yet becauſe it is not improbable that the words in the original do belong and extend to quality as well as quantity, i.e. to exceſs in either, (and the [b] word uſed for drunkards and drunkenneſs, comes from the word that ſignifies [c] ſweet as well as ſtrong wine) and becauſe there are two conſiderations which make this exceſs in the quality or delicacy to be unagreeable to the compoſition of the Evangelical rule of life, I cannot but ſay that this kind of ſobriety is commanded alſo, and that the contrary habit to it deſerves to be deemed a ſin.

Two conſiderations pertaining to the latter.

S. What be thoſe two Conſiderations?

C. 1. The hope of eternal life and endleſs ſpiritual joys, that are propoſed to us in the New Teſtament; which if they be ever ſuffered to enter into and fill our hearts, will produce a diſ-eſteem and mean opinion, and in time a contempt and ſcorn, of all carnal delights and pleaſures, will bring us to an uſing (the pleaſant part as well as the profitable of) the world as if we uſed it not, and (ſo we may have food convenient for us) a not caring for any choice or ſuperfluity, an abſtaining purpoſely from all ſupervacaneous pleaſure. The ſecond conſideration is the duty of charity and liberality to our poor brethren, required of us and recommended to us in the Goſpel: In which, he that fares deliciouſly, and takes care (not only for the preſerving of the health and ſtrength, but alſo) for the pleaſing and entertaining of his palate, will ſurely be leſs able to diſcharge his duty; that ſupervacaneous pleaſure bringing a ſuperfluous expence and charge along with it. Theſe two conſiderations will will make it very hardly ſeparable from ſin, for any man to allow himſelf this ſecond kind of exceſs: Though I ſhall not be over-forward to pronounce damnation to him that is guily of it; 1. becauſe I am not ſo ſure that there is in the New Teſtament any particular direct immediate command againſt it; 2. becauſe the vertue of ſobriety, eſpecially in this ſecond ſort, conſiſts not in any one point indiviſible (ſo that it ſhould poſſibly be reſolved, that he that eateth this kind of meat ſinneth not, and he that eateth any more delicious doth ſin;) 3. becauſe there is no certain rule by which to define delicious meats, that being moſt delicious to one which is leſs to another; 3. becauſe indeed to a temperate healthy man the plaineſt and ordinarieſt meats are moſt delightful and pleaſing alſo. On which and the like reaſons I ſhall not make haſte to condemn or terrifie any man in this matter, nor tell him, the abſtaining from delicacies is by any expreſs precept required of him; but only mention to him theſe ſeven things. Firſt, that it is a vile and unchriſtian thing to ſet the heart upon ſuch mean carnal delights: Secondly, that what I can conveniently ſpare from my ſelf, I ſhould reſerve for thoſe that do or may want it: Thirdly, that there is exceſs in the quality as well as quantity of meats and drinks; and that the exceſs in, or indulgence to, the former, is a moſt forcible provocation to the latter, which is acknowledged a damning ſin: Fourthly, that a Chriſtian may do better to deny himſelf lawful pleaſures, than to do all that is not unlawful: Fifthly, that the end of eating and drinking is the preſervation of health and ſtrength, and not the delighting the palate: Sixthly, that though a well tempered healthy man's appetite ordinarily demands thoſe things that are fitteſt for him, and conſequently in that caſe the ſatisfying the appetite may not be amiſs, yet firſt, the appetite is oft intemperate in its demands: oft demandeth this or that, which by ſome cuſtom it hath been uſed to; and then that cuſtom being equivalent to a diſeaſe ſometimes, ſometimes the author of ſome real diſeaſe, that diſeaſe ſhould be cured, and that appetite mean time not obeyed: ſecondly, the appetite is tempted many times by the object, either really preſent, being ſet before us, or imaginarily, being repreſented by the phanſie; and then the motion of the appetite is no argument of the meetneſs of ſatisfying it. Seventhly, that faſting (or abſtinence wholly) is alſo a Chriſtian duty, to be uſed ſometimes. And by theſe rules I ſhall leave any prudent and ſincere Chriſtian to direct himſelf in this matter, and deſire him in the fear of God to be careful that he offend not againſt that Chriſtian neceſſary duty of ſobriety in any kind.

S. But may not Feaſting be lawful now among us Chriſtians, and ſo delicious fare?

C. Feaſting, as it is an expreſſion of thankſgiving to God, and celebration of ſome act of his mercy; as it is an act of hoſpitality for the receiving and treating of others as well as our own family; as it is a means of preſerving and encreaſing mutual love and charity among men, is certainly now lawful and commendable: But all theſe ends and uſes may be provided for without luxury and delicacy, (only variety perhaps will be uſeful in ſundry reſpects) and again without any man's overcharging himſelf, and therefore will never be an excuſe or apology for either. And as for honeſt mirth and chearfulneſs, it will not at all be provided for by immoderate or delicious eating or drinking, but rather hindred by it; raiſed tumultuouſly perhaps by that means for the preſent, but then apt to degenerate into ſcurrility, &c. and withal attended with bitterneſs in the ſtomach, with ſatiety and drowzineſs, which is moſt contrary to it. In brief, the true Chriſtian Feaſting is when the poor and rich meet at the ſame common entertainment, and they that want partake of others plenty in the ſame common meal, contrary to the [d Every man his own ſupper.] Where for one to be drunken, i. e. to eat or drink exceſſively, is as great a ſoleciſm as for another to go away hungry. Of Feaſting. d Ἴδιον δεῖπνον. 1 Cor. 11. 21.

S. I ſhall hope to lay that doctrine of Sobriety to heart, and ſo to be in ſome meaſure qualified for that ſuperſtruction and ſuperaddition of Faſting, which occaſioned this diſcourſe. Which becauſe you reſolved to be a duty ſuppoſed in a Chriſtian, and acceptable to God under the Goſpel, I muſt firſt deſire the ground or reaſon of that affirmation. Of Faſting.

C. 1. Becauſe it is here in the ſame manner joined with the two former, Almſgiving and Prayer, which are unqueſtionably ſuch duties. 2. Becauſe it is here promiſed a reward by Chriſt, if it be not blaſted by vain-glory. 3. Becauſe it is foreſeen by Chriſt to be that, that men are apt to expect praiſe for among men. 4. Becauſe Chriſt in other places approves, if not commands, the uſe of it; only affirms the ſeaſon for his Diſciples to faſt, to be then not ſo agreeable, becauſe the Bridegroom was with them, Matth. 9. 15. But when the Bridegroom ſhould be taken away, i. e. after the death and departure of Chriſt, then ſhall they faſt in thoſe days. 5. Becauſe Chriſt bringeth in the Phariſee boaſting that he faſts twice in a week, and lays no manner of cenſure on him for ſo faſting, but only for the pride in boaſting of it: and (I remember) it is Saint Chryſoſtom's direction, that we ſhould only avoid the Phariſees pride but not neglect his performances: as on the other, forſake the Publicans ſins, and retain his humility. 6. Becauſe it was prevalent with God (being joined with Prayer) to the working of miracles, Matth. 17. 21. and ſo again probably Acts 1. 14. for the obtaining the preſence of the holy Ghoſt in a ſpecial manner, Acts 2. 1. and uſed by the Apoſtles before the Ordination of Miniſters, Acts 13. 3. and 14. 23. 7. Becauſe the performance of this is thought by Saint Paul, a ſufficient occaſion for a temporary parting of man and wife, 1 Cor. 7. 5. which otherwiſe he would not adviſe; which ſignifies this to be an employment of weight among Chriſtians. 8. Becauſe it is mentioned by St. Luke as a part of the worſhip of God, joined with Prayer, in Anna, Luke 2. 37. of whom it is ſaid, That ſhe departed not from the Temple; e ſerving, or worſhipping, God in prayers and faſtings night and day; of which, I conceive, this is the importance, That ſhe conſtantly frequented the Temple at the hours of Prayer, (not that ſhe dwelt or continued always there; for ver. 38. there is mention of her coming thither) and uſed conſtant obſervations of faſting, and in ſo doing worſhipt God. 9. Becauſe Cornelius his viſion, which brought him to Chriſtianity, is mentioned to have been at a time of his faſting and praying. 10. Becauſe of the many good ends and uſes to which faſting is proper, and in reſpect of which it looks yet more like a Chriſtian vertue, than conſidered as a bare abſtinence from a meal it doth. A duty. e λατρεύουσα, ſtain, to perform this act of that which in general Chriſt requireth of his Diſciples. 2. As an act of [f] revenge, which you find among the effects of godly ſorrow, and parts of repentance, 2 Cor. 7. 11. and ſuch may faſting be, if on conſideration of (and by way of puniſhment on) my former plenitude and luxury, I now think fit thus to puniſh my ſelf. 3. As a means of expreſſing my humiliation for ſin, in time of God's wrath lying upon a Nation or any particular perſon, and for the averting of that wrath: to which faſting hath been always counted very agreeable, and found to be very ſucceſsful, both in the Old Teſtament and in all Stories of the Church. 4. As a means to fit any man the better for the performing the duty of Prayer as he ought. To which purpoſe he that doth not acknowledge its propriety of uſefulneſs, is certainly a man of a ſtrange making; much diſtant from the beſt ſort of Chriſtians, whoſe experience will ſure commend it to him. 5. As a means to enable me to the performing of works of mercy, by giving that to the poor which is ſpared from my ſelf; which therefore ſhould be always obſerved in either publick or private faſts which we keep religiouſly, that we may never be the richer for what is thus ſpared, leſt we ſeem (or be tempted) to faſt for covetouſneſs, as others do for ſtrife, Iſaiah 58. To which purpoſe it is that you ſee here Alms, and Prayer, and Faſting, joined together by Chriſt, not to be divided by us. If the meal we faſt from bring any thing to our purſes, it will not be accepted: For, Iſai. 58. the Faſt which God hath choſen, or that which is acceptable to him, is ſaid to be that when we break the bread to the hungry, &c. 6. As a means to abate the deſires and luxuriances of the fleſh, and make the body more tractable and tame, and patient of receiving the dictates of Reaſon; and to ſubdue in it inclinations toward uncleanneſs, when thoſe are likely to prove too ſtrong for us. To which purpoſe that faſting ſhould be uſeful, it will not be hard for any man to gheſs that conſidereth the cauſe of carnal deſires in the Body, and that old ſaying, That without Ceres and Bacchus (the belly-deities) Venus, or incontinent deſires, grow cold.

S. Is all kind of faſting then acceptable to God?

C. No certainly: To faſt out of ſorrow or mourning for the death of a friend, is not ſo, (though not ſinful neither.) To faſt to ſave the charges of eating, to be the better able or more at leiſure to tranſact buſineſs of the world, is not ſo (though again not ſinful.) And by theſe you will gheſs at ſome other kinds alſo. Yet you may mark ſtill, that one thing there is in all faſting, to wit, ſelf-denial, which though it is not by every one that faſteth propoſed as an end, yet if it be ſo propoſed, by ſo doing that Faſt ſhall be acceptable to God.

An obiection againſt Faſting being a duty.

S. I have yet one Objection againſt all which you have ſaid in this matter, and it is this, That all this while you have not mentioned any command or precept of Faſting in the New Teſtament, and therefore do I not believe there is any ſuch: and for the Old Teſtament, though there be a command for the obſervation of the great day of Expiation every year, yet, firſt, that was only obligatory to the Jews; ſecondly, it was a Publick Faſt, and not pertinent to this place, which ſpeaks of Private Faſts; thirdly, if it ſhould be thought to concern us, yet being but once in the year, it would not be conſiderable. From all which, it being ſuppoſed that there is no Precept now particularly obliging us Chriſtians to faſt, it may ſeem to follow, that faſting is not now acceptable to God.

Anſwered.

C. To your whole Objection I anſwer, 1. That there is no neceſſity of a precept of Faſting, to aſſure us that it will be acceptable to God: there was no precept for voluntary oblations under the Law, (ſave only a direction, when they were offered, that they ſhould not be offered maimed, &c. as here there is, that we ſhould not blemiſh our faſting with deſire of praiſe of men) and yet they were accepted; and many other evidences have been produced to prove the uſe of faſting to be acceptable to God, though not commanded. 2. Though there be no explicite command of faſting in the New Teſtament, yet from the nature and conſtitution of the Goſpel it may be collected that there are in ſome caſes ſome tacite commands of it: As when all degrees of uncleanneſs, all ſatisfying the deſires of the fleſh, are forbidden, ſave only in lawful matrimony, and no allowance of polygamy or concubines. To him that finds himſelf unable thus to live in conjugal chaſtity, the uſing of means which may help to it are tacitely commanded by God; and ſo conſequently Faſting, if that be the only means left him, (as many times it is.) And then, as to the Diſciples that could not caſt out that Devil which would not go out but by prayer and faſting, it is accounted infidelity by Chriſt not to uſe that means, Mark 9. 19. ſo will it be the like unchriſtian ſin in him that uſes not this means, ſo neceſſary to ſo neceſſary an end. The ſame may be ſaid in caſe the Magiſtrate under whom we live preſcribes the obſervation of it, or whenever any man ſeeth it neceſſary, or very probable that we ſhall be hindred from the performing of ſome duty (which he owes to the glory of God, or edification of his brethren) unleſs he faſt that day. Laſtly, the caſe may be ſo ſet, that a man may diſcern himſelf able without any detriment to his health, or danger of ſhortning his life, &c. to uſe frequent faſting, and withal by that means much advance his ſpiritual ends, have greater vacancy for holy employments, greater ſtore for works of mercy, &c. and then ſure in this caſe the commands of praying and mercifulneſs will be alſo tacite commands of faſting. So that though there be not any particular explicite precept, obliging every man whatſoever under pain of ſin to faſt ſimply, thus, or thus often; yet tacite commands there may be to them that are by any of theſe circumſtances fitted for it: and even to thoſe that for the preſent are not, it will yet be fit to be conſidered and counted of as a duty that they may be concerned in; and that if in no other reſpect, yet in this, that they are' Chriſtians who aſpire to an angelical life and inviſible joys, and ſhould therefore deny (and by that wean) themſelves of thoſe ſenſual, corporal pleaſures of eating and drinking, ſo far as to preſervation of life and health, and to their duty to themſelves, may be agreeable.

S. How often then ſhould a Chriſtian faſt?

Times of Faſting.

C. By what hath been ſaid you will gheſs it unlikely that I ſhould undertake to preſcribe poſitive ſet rules for this; the duty I ſhall leave to you as a voluntary oblation for you to offer as frequently as prudence joined with due care of your health, and as piety and the Spirit of God ſhall prompt you, and only tell you theſe three things. Firſt, that the Phariſee faſted twice every week, and that that was never cenſured in him as a piece of Phariſaiſm or hypocriſie, or fault of any kind, but as commendable, if he had not boaſted of it. Secondly, that every Chriſtian ought to have his ſolemn ſet days for the performing that great and weighty duty of Humiliation, in calling himself to account for all his ways, and confessing his sins to God more particularly; and those days should not be too slow in their returns, lest his Soul be too deep in arrears, and so unwilling to come to accounts at all. It is very reasonable for every man or woman of leisure to set apart one day in the week for this turn: or if the whole day or any other part of it may not thus be spared from the business of his calling, yet the dinner-time that day may be borrowed from eating, and thus more usefully employed without any disturbance to his other affairs. And he that useth not some such constant course (which yet on special occasions may be altered) will be in great danger to be found and censured a neglecter of the duties of a Disciple of Christ. Thirdly, that over and above this common duty of all men, some other wants there are or may be in this or that man, to the repairing of which, Fasting may be very instrumental, as hath been shewed; and so proportionably is to be more frequently used by them who have this need of it; of which their own Conscience in the fear of God is left the Judge. All this hath been said of Private Fasting, because that is peculiar to this place: For Publick Fasting, the direction must be had from the Laws where we live; which so far at least oblige every one, that he offend not against them either contemptuously, or with scandal.

S. I shall now desire Gods direction and grace to incline me to the performance of this my duty, so as may be acceptable to him, and to pardon me for my former omissions of it, which truly have hitherto been very great.

You may please now to proceed to the Caution interposed, wherein I shall presume it superfluous for you to say much, having twice already insisted on it, in order to Prayer and Almsgiving.

The Caution in it.

C. The Caution is it self in plain intelligible words, [When you fast, be not as the Hypocrites, of a sad countenance, for they (disfigure, we read; perhaps the word only signifies) vail, or cover their faces, as mourners were wont to do, that they may appear to men to fast] but (rather than so) do thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face, (for thy outward guise, appear in thy ordinary countenance and habit; for the Jews were wont to anoint themselves daily, unless in time of mourning) that thou appear not to men to fast, but to thy Father which is in secret; that thou maist appear desirous to approve thy self to him only, who only is able to reward thee.

S. You have now past through those three great Christian duties, which by their so near confederacy here, and by what you have said of them, I find so linked together, that it is very reasonable we should set apart some time for the joint practice of them all together: For though it may be fit to give alms when I pray not or fast not, and to pray when I neither give alms nor fast; yet sure my fasts wherein the expence of a dinner is saved, should be joined then with Almsgiving (to wit, giving to the poor that which is thus spared) and always with Prayer. God give me a heart thus to practise it.

Sect. IV. Of the desire and love of wealth.

Having thus far advanced, you may please to proceed to that that follows, which I perceive to be a new matter, [Lay not up for your selves treasures upon earth, &c.] and so on in one continued thread to the end of the Chapter. Of all which what is the chief summary importance, you may briefly tell me.

C. There are two things to which all the ensuing sixteen Verses belong, and the second of them appendent to the former, into which the discourse insensibly glides. The former is, for the mortifying of all desire and love of wealth: the latter for the moderating our worldly care or secular providence, which I told you would serve in stead of (and might be laid up by us as) an improvement of the Tenth Commandment, [Thou shalt not covet.] The former is set down in the six ensuing Verses, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24.

S. Why do you refer these words, Lay not up, &c. to the mortifying of desire and love of wealth?

C. Because a Treasure is a metaphorical word, to signifie that which men desire and love most importunately, and set their heart upon; and so the prohibition of laying up our treasure on earth, is in effect the forbidding to love, or desire, or set the heart upon any earthly riches as a possession; but only to use them so, as may most improve our future account, i. e. by liberal dispensing of them to raise a bank which may enrich us for ever in another world. For the enforcing of which prohibition and exhortation, he mentions, 1. The vanity and uncertainty of worldly riches; which evidences how unfit they are for our hearts to be set upon. One kind of them, that which consists in costly vestments, the Moth, a poor despicable creature, can and doth destroy and make useless: another kind, our Corn, and other the like Fruits of the earth, (of which the Fool so applauded himself, that he had store for many years) [g] eating (for so the word rendred Rust doth signifie) whether of men, or (the ordinary attendants of granaries) vermin, bringeth to nought; or if you will retain the word in our Translation, [Rust] it must then be taken in that notion as it belongs to Corn in the field, and is called [h] Smut, when by some wind or the like the grain is smitten or blasted, and made good for nothing. And then for money, or our any other kind of treasure, never so closely and safely lockt up, thieves can and ordinarily do break through and steal it from us. And it is observable that that Moth, and the like, are [i] bred in the things themselves; and so those kind of possessions are subject to these destroyings when no outward violence approaches them: and that is a mighty evidence of the vanity and uncertainty of riches, that many times vast estates and possessions do insensibly, no man knows how, crumble and moulder to nought, rich men without any visible expences come to arrant beggery, and all the providence in the world cannot keep them from it, but rather betrays them farther; the greater their love of money is, the swifter their ruine follows them. And 2. the infatuating power of riches, when we come once to love them, to resolve to have them, (which Saint Paul, 1 Tim. 6. 9. calls, [k] they that will be rich) and to that purpose to serve or wait upon them, which way soever they lead us: Our hearts are then so wholly set upon them, that we cannot at all serve God, or endeavour to approve our selves to him. This our Saviour proves by the contrariety of the commands of these two Masters, God and Mammon; for if their commands might be subordinate one to the other, they might both have their answerable obedience; God in the first place, and Mammon or worldly wealth in the subordination. But God's commands being contrary to Mammon's, i. e. to those courses which are necessary to the getting of riches, he that will grow rich (that is bent on that design) must give over all hope of being (or passing for) God's servant.

S. What be the commands of God that are so unreconcileable with the service of Mammon, or vehement desire of wealth?

God's commands unreconcilable with Mammon's.

C. 1. His command of doing justice, exact justice, as that excludes all violence, fraud, oppression, &c. 2. That command of the justice of the tongue, in performing of promises, though to the greatest hindrance and damage, and in not slandring any for the wealth of the whole world. 3. His command of absolute contentment in what state soever I am set by him. 4. That command of selling, and giving to the poor; i. e. if otherwise thou canst not relieve thy indigent brother in distress, but by selling somewhat of thy own, then to do that, though it be most unlike to prospering or thriving in the world. 5. That command of freedom and ingenuity of spirit, of unconcernedness in these worldly, inferiour, transitory things, of self-resignation, dependence on God's providence for our daily bread; instead of all the carking infidelity of the worldling. And 6. That precept of earnest desire and contending for peace. 7. That of meekness, patience, praying for enemies.

S. How are all those so unreconcilable with Mammon's commands?

C. You will discern it in the particulars. 1. Mammon prescribeth violence to every man, oppressing the poor righteous man, any that stands in our way to our espoused gain. 2. Mammon commands (not only despising our faith in performance of disadvantageous promises, but also) false accusing, blasting, defaming of any which are likely to keep, or get any preferment or possession that we have a mind to; as in the example of Jezabel toward Naboth it appears, when her husband had a longing after his Vineyard. 3. Mammon commands a perpetual unsatisfiedness, a kind of dropsie-thirst, infused still more and more at the encreasing of our plenty: Mammon will not be thy friend, but on condition thou shalt be more importunate in getting wealth, more passionate in making court to Mammon after this increase than thou wert before; and so generally you may observe it, the more possessions men attain to, still the more covetous they grow. 4. Mammon commands tenacity, a most strict keeping of our own; nay, a perpetual desire of being a purchasing, of making some new bargains, of enlarging the walk; and if Christ require to sell and give, you see the rich man, Mammon's servant, presently leaves him, he goes away very sad, because he was very rich. 5. Mammon hath all manner of slavish tremblings, cowardly, uningenuous fears for his subject's task, (quite contrary to self-resignation) a dismal thoughtfulness at every apprehension of danger, a perpetual carking and hovering over his wealth, and a venturing on any the most unlawful, unchristian practice, whenever that great Law of self-preservation, (as Mammon tells him) i. e. the law of Mammon, but of no other Law-giver, (I am sure not of Christ) suggests it to him. 6. Mammon commands War (for enlarging of dominion of possessions) that more glorious name of piracy, which Saint James seems to have considered, when he saith, Wars come [1] from our pleasures, Jam. 4. 1. which are surely those pleasures consequent to the delight or lust of the eye, desiring to have, verse 2. It being most clear, that covetousness puts men upon all the most furious War, and contentions, and quarrels in the world. 7. Mammon sets men upon the most malicious acts of revenge of any thing: The covetous man hath still so many enemies in his black book, so many quarrels to answer, injuries to repay, trespasses to revenge, that his whole life is a kind of hell to him; not knowing how to be quit with every of them, he is fain to treasure up quarrels many years together, and study nothing but the payments of such debts. Other contrarieties might be mentioned between the commands of God and Mammon. God commandeth to keep the heart, Mammon the wealth, with all diligence, or above all keeping: God commands sorrow for sin, Mammon sorrow for losses: God commands confession of Christ and all Christian truth, and never more than when it is most opposed, when it is like to bring most danger to the confessor; Mammon commands prudence, wariness, time-serving, never hazarding any thing for truth's sake: The righteous is bold as a Lion; when the Mammonist, with his wealth and heaps before him, dares not quatch without a licence from Mammon, and assurance that it shall cost him nothing. These and an hundred more contrarieties evidence the truth of our Saviour's general speech [That no man can serve two Masters] brought home to this conclusion, You cannot serve [illegible] and Mammon, and from thence enforce the prohibition of [not laying up our treasures upon earth] or setting our heart on worldly riches; which is the main importance of those six verses. But beside, there is a positive exhortation in these verses to charity and liberality, which is meant by laying up our treasure in heaven, i. e. so laying out our wealth, as that it may bring us in those everlasting returns, as Christ explains the phrase by the like in another place, Give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in Heaven; and, Make you friends of the unrighteous, or transitory, or unstable Mammon, (contrary to the true durable riches) that when you fail, they may receive you, i. e. (by an Hebraism) you may be received (as, this night they shall require thy soul, is all one with, thy soul shall be required) into everlasting habitations. And besides other benefits of your liberality, this will be one, That when you thus lay up your wealth by giving it to God and his poor children, your heart, which duly follows that treasure, will have no temptation to fasten on the earth, but on heaven: where our treasure dwells, our hopes are laid up, our joy is to be expected, and so there will our hearts be also.

[1] ἐκ τῶν ἡδονῶν.

S. I shall not trouble you longer with this matter, it being so obvious and plain, only methinks two Verses there are in the midst of these which sound not to this matter, and are somewhat obscure; I beseech your help to direct me to the meaning of them: they are Vers. 22, 23. [The light of the body is the eye; if therefore thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thy eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness?]

C. These words, as they are mostly interpreted concerning the goodness or ilness of intentions, are not indeed very pertinent to the business in hand, of liberality, and of love of money; you may therefore give me your patience, while I give you the natural genuine interpretation of them, and then you will discern how pertinent they are to the present matter. To which purpose, I shall first tell you what is meant by a single and an evil eye; secondly, by light and darkness; thirdly,

by

by the similitude here used; and then, fourthly, how all belongs to the point in hand.

S. What is meant by the single and evil eye?

C. The word [m] single signifieth in the New Testament, liberal; the single eye, liberality, bounty, distribution of our wealth to the poor. So Rom. 12. 8. He that giveth [n] in singleness, or, as our margent readeth, liberally: 2 Cor. 8. 2. [o] The riches of their singleness, we read, liberality: chap. 9. 11. [p] To all singleness, we read, to all bountifulness; and vers. 13. [q] Singleness of distribution, we read, liberality of distribution, or liberal distribution: Jam. 1. 5. That giveth [r] to all men singly, we read, liberally. Contrary to this, the evil eye signifies envy, covetousness, unsatisfiedness, niggardliness, and all the contraries of liberality. So Matth. 20. 15. Is thy [s] eye evil, because I am good? i. e. Art thou unsatisfied therefore, because I have been more liberal to another? thou hast thy due, why art thou discontent or unsatisfied? So Matth. 7. 21, 22. Out of the heart cometh the evil eye, i. e. envy, covetousness, unsatisfiedness. (For this is observable, that envy is generally set as the opposite to all liberality, and God by the [t] Fathers is said to be without envy, meaning most liberal and bountiful.) The word which is here rendred * evil, being equivalent to [x] an Hebrew word which signifies the greatest degree of illiberality or uncharitableness; and the word eye being added proverbially, perhaps because that part hath most to do in covetousness, which is called The lust of the eye, 1 John 2. 16.

Liberality.

S. What is meant by light and darkness?

C. By light, Christianity, or the state of the Gospel. We are of the light and walk like children of light. And darkness, contrary to that, unchristian heathenish affections or actions.

S. What is meant by the similitude here used?

C. That as in the body of a man the eye is the directer, shews it what it should do, and if it be as it ought, directeth it the right way; but if not, leadeth into most dangerous errours: so in the man the heart (mentioned immediately before) if it be liberally affected, having laid up its treasure in heaven, and fastned it self on it, will direct the man to all manner of good Christian actions; but if it be covetous, unsatisfied, worldly, hard, illiberal, it brings forth all manner of unchristian, heathenish actions. And then if the light that is in thee be darkness, if the heart in thee be unchristian, heathenish, how great is that darkness? What an unchristian condition is this?

S. I shall not now ask you how all this belongs to the point in hand.

C. It is indeed plain enough already, that it belongs perfectly to the business. And this is the sum of all. 1. That liberality and charity in the heart is a special part of Christianity, hath a notable influence toward the production of all Christian vertues, and a main argument and evidence it is of a Christian to have this grace in him. 2. That uncharitableness, worldly-mindedness, unsatisfiedness, uncontentedness, envy, covetousness, is a sin of a very ill effect and consequence; betrays a man to all most unchristian sins, fills him full of iniquity, (according to that of Saint Paul, 1 Tim. 6. 10. for the love of money is the root of all evil, &c.) and is a sad symptom, where-ever we find it, of a great deal of ill besides. All which comes in very pertinently on occasion of those words, Where the treasure is, there will the heart be also; and is a foundation for that appendent affirmation [You cannot serve God and Mammon.]

The influence of it on all Christian vertues.

S. You have fully cleared this difficulty, and passed through the first of the two things contained in the remainder of this Chapter, that which pertains to the mortifying all desire and love of wealth. God make it successful in my heart, to work all covetous earthly affections out of it, and plant all contrary graces of liberality and mercifulness in their stead.

You will please now to proceed to the other thing, the moderating of our worldly care and providence, in the following words, [Take no thought for your life, &c.] and that taking its rise from the former [Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought, &c.]

Sect. V.

Being come unto this, I cannot but remember my self, and put you in mind that you formerly told me, that I might reserve my expectation of this, as of an improvement of the Tenth Commandment of the Decalogue: How may that be cleared?

Of the Tenth Commandment.

C. By observing the importance of the negative part of that precept of the Law, which is directly the prohibition of all covetous thoughts, and desires of other mens possessions, (expresst after the manner of the Hebrews by enumeration of particulars, the house, the wife, &c. and by way of analogy, the honours as well as wealth, all considered as the possessions of other men.) This prohibition immediately contains a positive command of contentedness with our present estate, whatever it is, without any desire of change, murmuring, repining, disquieting of others: and so thus much is contained in that Old Commandment: A greater and superiour degree in which matter, is this of not taking thought for the morrow: for that prohibition doth not only restrain our appetites from roving to that which is other mens, from disquieting and disturbing of others, and (as the last Commandment is described, Matth. 10. 19.) the depriving (in thought, and endeavour, and wish) the labouring to get away from another man that which may by his loss (and not otherwise) accrew to me; but this of not caring for the morrow, is the not disturbing or disquieting my self, the turning out all worldly thoughtfulness out of my breast, and not only those which are terminated in anothers loss or damage.

S. Will you then be pleased to proceed to that Christian pitch which is here set down?

C. I shall now proceed to that point, which takes up all the verses to the end of this Chapter, and in it only detain you with two things. 1. The precept or doctrine of worldly thoughtfulness. 2. The inforcements of it, shewing how reasonable it is to be observed and practised, though it seem a strange doctrine.

Of worldly care.

S. To begin with the first, what care and solicitude is it that is here forbidden?

C. It is set down in these three several phrases. First, [y] Take no thought for your life, what you shall eat, or what you shall drink; nor yet for your body, what you shall put on, Vers. 25. Secondly, [y] Take no thought, saying, what shall we eat, &c. Verse 31. And thirdly, [y] Take no thought for the morrow, Verse 34. From all which, it appears that the thing here forbidden is that, what-ever it is, which is the full importance of the Greek word, rendred [[z] taking thought] which being derived by Grammarians from

[a] μεϊζον νῦν. from a phraſe which ſignifies in Engliſh to [a divide the mind] doth then ſignifie a dubiouſneſs of mind, or anxiety; and that a want, (or littleneſs) a defect of Faith, Verſe 30. a not believing as we ought, that God that gives us life and bodies, will allow us means to ſuſtain one, and array the other. Saint [b] μετεωρίζεσθε Luke expreſſes it by a word which we render [b] doubtful mind, or careful ſuſpence, but ſignifies hanging betwixt two; as not knowing how to reſolve whether God will do this for us or no. Or, perhaps, it [c] μετέωρον θηρεύσεως. Eccleſ. 37. 14. is a figurative ſpeech from a word ſignifying a [c] watch-tower, or high place, whither men get up to ſee what is coming, which is an argument of great fear and care in them. Now that I may give you the clear evidence of the Chriſtian doctrine in this matter, I will deliver it diſtinctly in theſe few Propoſitions. Firſt, That this is a truth (infallible truth) of God's, That God will for the future provide for every ſervant of his, food and raiment, a competence of the neceſſaries of life. This truth may appear by the promiſes to this purpoſe in the Scripture. Two there are of this nature, that the Margents of our Bibles in this place refer to: Pſal. 55. 22. Caſt thy burthen on the Lord, and he ſhall ſuſtain thee: 1 Pet. 5. 7. Caſting all care on the Lord, for he careth for you. To which you may add Chriſt's promiſe, that If we ask we ſhall have, if we ask not amiſs, ſaith S. James; which ſure we do not, if we ask but what he taught us to ask, this day our daily bread, i. e. (as in the explication of the Lord's Prayer was ſhewed) day by day thoſe things that are neceſſary for the remainder of our life. Many other promiſes you will obſerve to the ſame purpoſe, and particularly this in this place by way of expoſtulation, Verſ. 30. ſhall he not much more cloath you, O ye of little faith? intimating ſtrongly a promiſe that he ſhall, and requiring faith or belief of this promiſe at our hands. Secondly, that want of faith or truſt in this promiſe, not believing this truth, is a piece of the damning ſin of infidelity, ſo charged here upon them that believe it not, Ver. 30. Thirdly, that any carking ſolicitude for the future is an argument of this diſtruſt, this not daring to rely on God's providence and God's promiſe, and ſo an unchriſtian ſin.

S. But is not every man commanded by the Apoſtle, 1 Tim. 5. 8. to provide for his own, eſpecially thoſe of his own houſe or kindred? And if he doth not, defined to have denied the faith, and to be worſe than an Infidel? Sure then, this want of thoughtfulneſs and ſecular providence will rather be infidelity.

Providing for our own.

C. Becauſe you lay ſuch weight upon that one place of S. Paul to Timothy, and ſeem to think it ſo contrary to this preſent doctrine of our Saviour, (which if it were, it would yet be more reaſonable to bring S. Paul to our Saviour by ſome commodious interpretation, than to evacuate the force of all our Saviour's diſcourſe on this matter by this one place of S. Paul) and becauſe Rom. 13. 14. the Apoſtle's caution, being rightly rendred [make not proviſion for the fleſh to coveting] or [turn not the care or providence for the fleſh into coveting or getting away other mens goods] (forbidden in the Tenth Commandment) ſuppoſes that this proviſion for the fleſh is apt to be ſo abus'd; I ſhall therefore firſt endeavour to give you a clear view of that place, for there is ſome miſtake in it, and you will diſcern it by this view of ſome few verſes in a brief Paraphraſe. Verſ. 3. Let thoſe widows which are widows indeed, (i. e. which have neither husbands nor children to relieve them) be reſpected and relieved by the Church. Verſ. 4. If any widow having no husband, hath yet (as it follows) children or grand-children, let them, i e. thoſe children, learn firſt to ſhew piety or kindneſs to their own houſe, i. e. to their parents, and ſo [d] repay or requite them for their paternal care, do what their parents had done to them, (ſee Verſ. 16.) Verſ. 5. But the widow that is perfectly ſuch, i. e. hath [e] no children to relieve her, ſhe doth in that ſolitude and widow-hood hope on God, and continue in ſupplications and prayers (at conſtant times) night and day. Verſ. 6. But ſhe that liveth luxuriouſly is dead while ſhe lives. Verſ. 7. And do you give ſuch rules as theſe, that they may be blameleſs. Verſ. 8. But if any man or woman do not provide for, or relieve thoſe that belong to them, eſpecially thoſe that are of their family (as the parents muſt be reſolved to be) he or ſhe hath denied the faith, and is worſe than an infidel. Verſ. 9. Let none be choſen to be a widow which is leſs than ſixty years old, &c. You ſee this whole diſcourſe is to ſhew what kind of perſon might be fit to be choſen to be a widow in the Church, one to be maintain'd out of the Churches ſtock; and among the reſt of the qualities requir'd of her, this is one, that ſhe muſt be one that hath no child able to maintain her, to provide for her: The word ſignifies (more generally) to [f] take care of, as a Father of a child, or as a child here of a forlorn deſtitute parent. And then ſtill that differs much from the notion that worldly phancies affix to this place, thinking themſelves oblig'd to provide eſtates and riches for them, whereas the words cannot be extended to command any more than this, That every maſter or Miſtreſs of a family muſt take care of, and relieve their parents, and thoſe of their family, (or which remain in their [g] houſe or family,) and then that will not come home to that thoughtfulneſs, or ſecular fore-caſting, to which in your objection it was applied. The ſhort is, the place refers to the duty of the rich, not to let the Church be burthened with relieving their poor kindred, eſpecially their parents, which are of their family) have a right to live in their houſe, and a propriety to be maintained by them, or that they do take care for and relieve them, (ſtill ſuppoſing they are able to do it:) and ſo this belongs nothing to ſaving of wealth for them, but ſpending it on them when we have it, and not laying it on the charge of the Church to do it; and that will ſufficiently weaken your argument. But then ſuppoſing this of ſecular fore-caſting and providing for neceſſaries of life to be the thing here ſpoken of (as it is apparent it is not, but only [h] relieving the parents out of what we have) then, to take away all ſcruple, and to reconcile this prohibition of Chriſts with this preſent of S. Paul's, it will be neceſſary to add a fourth Propoſition, That for preſent ſupplies, a Chriſtian not only may, but muſt uſe thoſe lawful and proper means that are ordinarily in his power to uſe to the attaining that end: and this is ſo far from diſtruſting of God, or not depending and believing on him, that it is indeed a ſpecial act of this faith, the doing of what he requires us to do, and without our doing of which he hath not promiſed to ſupply us. His promiſes, which are the object of our faith, are not abſolute but conditional promiſes: they require and ſuppoſe a condition to be performed on our part, and then give us a right to the thing promiſed, and not before. Every man therefore muſt do ſomewhat himſelf to provide for his own, (and not to do ſo is infidelity in S. Paul's ſtyle; juſt as the Diſciples are called faithleſs, for not caſting out of the Devil, that would not be caſt out but by prayer and Faſting, i.e. for not uſing that means to caſt him out, Mark 9. 19.) muſt endeavour to be inſtrumental to God's providence, and not fly to his extraordinary protection, when his ordinary is afforded us. God doth not uſe to multiply miracles unprofitably; nor at all, but for the begetting or confirming of our faith: which cannot be the caſe when we neglect thoſe means of making good God's truths, which are already by him afforded us: but only, when all lawful means have been tryed improſperouſly, then it will be God's ſeaſon to ſhew forth his extraordinary power. In the mean time, it is ſufficient that he offer us means to bring us to that end which he promiſeth; and if we neglect thoſe means, and ſo fail in our performance of the condition required of us, we thereby diſcharge him of all obligation to make good the promiſe to us; which was not abſolute for him to do without us, but conditional, for him to do if we failed not in our parts.

for

S. But what are thoſe means required on our parts, as ſubſervient to God's providence in feeding and clothing us?

C. I ſhall firſt name you ſome that are ſuch means; and then others that are miſtaken for ſuch, and are not. The true means you may know in general by this mark, that all means perfectly lawful, (i.e. all things that are proper to that end, and are no way prohibited by God) are ſuch, and all unlawful are not. But then particularly, firſt, Labour and diligence in ones lawful calling is ſuch a lawful means; As in ſpiritual, ſo in temporal things, if we * labour, or work, God will † cooperate. As in the war with Amalek, when Iſrael fights, God will fight with them: Poverty is the Amalek, our honeſt labour is our fighting againſt it, (and therefore the idle perſon is called, 2 Theſſ. 3. 6, 7, 11. [1] a diſorderly walker; the word (being military) ſignifying one out of his rank, one that is not in file to fight againſt his enemy) and when we are thus employed, God our Captain hath ſworn that he will have war, will fight againſt that enemy, with us, for ever; and that, as the Lxxii. read in that place, * with a ſecret hand aſſiſting him that is thus buſied, proſpering him inſenſibly that is thus employed: A ſure bleſſing on the laborious, Prov. 10. 4. The hand of the diligent maketh rich; and, on the other ſide, he that will not labour, ſaith the Apoſtle, let him not eat: which is there a piece of Apoſtolical diſcipline, to beſiege idleneſs and ſtarve it up; and that an image on earth of what is done in Heaven, it being the rule of God's ordinary providence, that they that neglect the means ſhall not obtain the end. This promiſe being conditional (as all others) not to the idle, profane fiduciary, but to the faithful labourer; the abſolute Stoical depender on Fate may ſtarve for want of induſtry, die for want of phyſick, and be damned for want of repentance; and all this not through too much, but too little faith, the not taking the means along with him, which were predeſtined by God to bring him to a better end.

Means ſubſervient to God's providence in ſuſtaining us. Labour. * ἐργάζεσθαι. † συνεργῶν. [1] ἀτάκτως περιπατῶν, ἀτακτῶν. * ἐν ἡσυχίᾳ ἐργαζομένους.

S. What other ſort of means is there required of us by God to this end?

C. Prayer to him for our daily bread; the condition without which there is no one thing which we have promiſe to receive from him: Ask, and ye ſhall have, &c. but not otherwiſe. So elſewhere, the worſhipping of God is joined with the doing of his will, to make us capable of God's hearing.

Prayer.

S. What other means?

C. Honeſt thrift; the not ſpending upon our luſts, our vanities, thoſe good things of this world that our labour and prayers have by God's bleſſing brought in to us. For the prodigal may ſtarve as well as the ſluggard; he that drinks out his bread, as he that doth not earn it. God hath not undertaken for any ſin, that it ſhall not ruine us: his protection is like that of the Law, for them only that travel in the day and in the rode; not for the diſorderly walkers in any kind, that have any by-path, or night-work to exhauſt that treaſure that his providence hath, or is ready to beſtow. And the ſame that I ſay of luxury, may be ſaid of other harpies and vultures, that leave men oft-times as bare as the high-way robbers; that fly ſin of cloſe adultery, that eats out ſo many eſtates, yea, and that other of ſtrife and contention, that peſtilence, as it were, that walketh in darkneſs, and devours the wealth as well as the ſoul. And there are no reparations to be expected from God for ſuch loſſes. One means more there is to which God's promiſe of temporal plenty being annexed, we may well add it to the former, The exerciſe of acts of juſtice and mercy. Bring you all the tithes, ſaith God by Malachi, into my ſtore-houſe, Mal. 3. 10. i. e. both the Prieſts and the poor man's tithe, and prove me now herewith, If I will not open the windows of heaven, and pour you out a bleſſing, &c. To which purpoſe the Jews had a proverbial Speech, † Pay tithes on purpoſe, that thou mayſt be rich. And there are many places of Scripture to the ſame purpoſe which before were mentioned; and threatnings on the contrary, that the withholding more than is meet ſhall tend to want. To theſe may perhaps be added another means, having alſo the promiſes of long and proſperous life annexed to it, that of meekneſs and obedience; of which ſaith the Law, their days ſhall be long in the Land, flowing with milk and honey; and the Goſpel, that they ſhall poſſeſs the earth: as alſo it is affirmed of Godlineſs in general, that it hath the promiſes of this life, i. e. of ſo much of the proſperity of this world as ſhall be matter of contentment to them. Now theſe being by God deſigned as fit and proper means to the qualifying us for the performance of his promiſe, (his providing of ſecular ſufficient wealth for us) and the condition required on our parts, it will be but the believing of a lie, for any man to neglect theſe ſeveral means required on his part, and yet to claim or challenge the end promiſed on God's part: in the ſame manner and degree as it is for the impenitent ſinner remaining ſuch, to believe and challenge the pardon of his ſins and ſalvation.

Thrift. Acts of mercy. † Da decimas in hoc, ut ditęſcas.

S. I cannot but conſent to this truth, and acknowledge the fitneſs of the means, which you have mentioned, as truly ſubſervient to that end.

But you told me, There were alſo ſome were miſtaken for ſuch means, but are not: What are thoſe?

C. 1. Secular wiſdom, policy, contrivance, (for though this ſeem ſometimes to obtain that end, yet firſt, there is no promiſe made to it; ſecondly, it many times faileth of the deſign; nay, thirdly, it hath oft-times a moſt remarkable curſe upon it. 2. Hoarding up all that comes, pinching the back and belly to fill the bag. 3. Going to Law, and contentiouſneſs. 4. Tenacity, not giving or lending lending to thoſe that truly want; the griping illiberal hand. (Give, and it ſhall be given unto you, not elſe.) 5. Immoderate care and ſolicitude; loving and courting of the world. 6. Deceit and injuſtice; and eſpecially, Sacrilege and Perjury. Each of theſe in the eſteem of the world are the faireſt way to wealth, yet in the event prove the ſtraight rode to curſes and poverty. It is a ſnare to devour that that is holy, ſaith Solomon, and after vows to make enquiry; and that ſnare meaning treachery to the wealth as well as the Soul. See the flying roll, Zach. 5. 2. (which was formerly mentioned,) and the curſe that it brought with it, Verſ. 3. And that entring into the houſe of the thief, and of him that ſweareth falſly, Verſ. 4. i. e. on his family alſo, and it ſhall remain in the midſt of his houſe, and never leave haunting it, till it conſume it with the timber and ſtones: that which a man thinks would be beſt able to endure, the firmeſt part of an eſtate, moulders and crumbles away between the fingers of the perjured perſon; noting this to be a conſuming ſin, (and a conſumption is an hereditary diſeaſe, an embleme of which is to be ſeen, Num. 5. in the perjured woman, Verſ. 27. The water that cauſeth the curſe, ſhall enter into her, and become bitter, and her belly ſhall ſwell, and her thigh rot, thoſe two parts of the body that have relation to the poſterity.) 7. Diſtruſt of God's promiſe, for ſure never any man got any thing of God by not truſting him: He that will not take his word, muſt find out ſome other pay-maſter. 8. Oppreſſion, violence, ſpoiling of others, (though that ſeem a ſure preſent courſe to bring in wealth) for the threat of the Prophet Iſai. 33. 1. belongs to ſuch, Wo unto thee that ſpoileſt; when thou ceaſeſt to ſpoil, thou ſhalt be ſpoiled. Men are ſeldom ſuffered to taſt any of the fruit of thoſe ſins, leſt they or others ſhould fall in love with them.

S. You have now abundantly diſcharged your promiſe, in ſetting down the true, and the pretending means.

Have you any more Propoſitions now to add to the four already mentioned in this buſineſs?

C. Only theſe two. 5. That he that uſeth theſe true means appointed by God, and diſcards the falſe ones ſuggeſted by the world, by Satan, or by his own ravening ſtomach, is more ſure of not wanting for the future, is better provided for a comfortable old age, and a thriving proſperous poſterity, than all the worldlings's arts can poſſibly provide him. He that gives over all anxious thought for himſelf, enters into God's tuition, and then ſhall ſurely be never the poorer for not caring. 6. That the uſing of unlawful (though never ſo ſpecious or ſeemingly neceſſary) means to the getting or preſerving of worldly wealth, or the neceſſities of life, is a moſt direct piece of infidelity, moſt clearly forbidden in the phraſe of Taking thought: This being the diſtruſting of God and his authorized means, and flying to the witch with Saul, or rather the Devil, to help us to it; the ° dividing our minds or * hanging betwixt two; or rather indeed forſaking of one, and cleaving to the other; diſclaiming God and his providence, and truſting to our ſelves and our own artifices. And this ſure will be granted to be the greateſt fury, the greateſt perturbation and anxiety of mind imaginable, which thus drives us out of our Reaſon, our Chriſtianity, to thoſe courſes which are moſt contrary to both.

S. I conceive the ſum of your whole diſcourſe on this matter is this, That for the good things of the world, God having made promiſe to give them to his ſervants, and his promiſe being conditional, requiring at our hands the uſe of means to obtain the thing promiſed, It is our duty to uſe thoſe means, labour and prayer, &c. and then ſo fully to truſt God for the performing his promiſe, as never to have anxious or dubious thought about it; never to flie to any any unlawful means, to provide for our ſelves. And by this way of ſtating, I acknowledge our Saviour's ſpeech here fully reconciled with Saint Paul's command of providence, whatſoever that might be thought to ſignifie, and ſo with Chriſt's praying for temporal bleſſing, &c.

Anxiety.

I have only one ſcruple wherein I ſhall deſire your ſatisfaction, whether God doth not ſometimes leave men deſtitute of food and raiment, and how then it can be infidelity to be anxious in that point? or, How can God's promiſe of caring for us be ſaid to be performed?

C. I anſwer, 1. That it is not ordinary for men to be left deſtitute of food and raiment; and though ſometime it cannot be had but by begging of it, yet God having in his providence deſigned the rich man to be his Steward, (the wealthy man's barn to be the poor man's ſtore-houſe) no man is left deſtitute that is afforded this means. 2. There being ſo many other means (forenamed) required of us to be inſtrumental to God's providence, it will hardly be found that any man is left thus deſtitute, who hath not firſt been wanting to himſelf; and ſo the whole matter will be imputable to his default, and not to God's. 3. That if the utmoſt be ſuppoſed which is imaginable, that ſome one be left ſo far deſtitute as to come to ſtarve, yet may the promiſe of God remain true and firm; for that promiſe obligeth him not to eternize the life of any: which being ſuppoſed, that he ſhould die by famine is as reaſonable and reconcileable with this promiſe, which can extend no farther than that he will ſuſtain us as long as he ſees it fit for us to live, but no longer) as that he ſhould die by ſword or peſtilence; and that death will be as ſupportable as many other diſeaſes and deaths, of the Stone, Strangury, Dyſentery, &c. 4. That ſuppoſe God do thus deſtitute us, yet our anxiety or ſolicitude, our uſing of unlawful means, can never be able to relieve or ſecure us; whatſoever we can in this caſe call to our relief, God can curſe and blaſt alſo, and make it as unable to help us as the Reed of Egypt: and though ſometimes God permits unlawful means to offer us help, when lawful fail us, to make trial of us, whether we will uſe them, and diſtruſt God (who ought to be truſted and relied on, though he kill us) or no; yet is it far more ordinary for thoſe who have fled to all manner of diſhoneſt means of encreaſing wealth, to come to abſolute beggery and diſtreſs and contumelious ends, than in any mans obſervation it will be found for the truſters in God to do. 5. Why may it not be thought and found true upon every man's ſelf-examination, that ſuch deſtitution, whenever it befals a child of God, is a puniſhment of ſome ſin, which God in mercy ſees fit to puniſh here, and not in another world? As particularly, that of littleneſs of faith in this matter; as Peter's ſinking, Mat. 14. 30. was a puniſhment of his fear, and doubting, and little faith, which ſome good men are very ſubject to, and whereſoever it is found, may expect to be puniſhed, as being it ſelf a ſin, and containing in it ſo many other ſins. 1. The ſin of diſobedience to Chriſt's command here, in his [take no thought] Verſ. 31. 2. The ſin of infidelity, not truſting, and ſo denying

(in actions at leaſt) God's veracity, the attribute wherein he chiefly glories; giving him the lie, as it were, an affront and contumely to the Almighty. 3. The ſin of worldly-mindedneſs, placing our care and affection on ſuch baſe and inferiour objects, incurvation of the immortal Soul to a thing ſo much below it, and robbing God of his due, that peculiar Creature of his, the heart, ſo naturally his, and moreover ſo importunately begg'd for by him: not to mention many other ſins, which conſtantly follow this ſolicitude, (where it is once entertained, not as a tranſient paſſion, but a Chronical diſeaſe) though not conſtantly the ſame, as indevotion, impatience, unmercifulneſs, cowardice, worldly ſorrow, maligning of others, &c.

S. Having thus largely explained the Prohibition, you may pleaſe to add in one word what is the contrary Chriſtian duty that is here commanded by Chriſt?

Praiſing God.

C. Praiſing God for our preſent wealth, and truſting him for the future.

S. What do you mean by the former?

C. Praiſing him four ways. 1. By acknowledging the receipt; 2. uſing it, and rejoycing in it; 3. miniſtring, or communicating to them that have not; and 4. if any thing ſtill remain, keeping it as inſtrumental to God's providence for the future, laying up what God gives us to lay up.

S. What do you mean by the latter?

Truſting him.

C. 1. Believing his promiſe; 2. obeying his directions in the uſe of his authorized means, and none elſe; and 3. referring the ſucceſs chearfully to him, and praying to him for it without doubting.

S. I conceive you have done with the Precept or doctrine, which now I ſee how fitly it is annexed to the former matter of not ſerving of Mammon, 1. As an Anſwer to the Mammoniſt's reaſon or motive to his ſerving of Mammon [that he may not be deſtitute on the morrow:] 2. As an improvement of that former exhortation, to which it may be ſeaſonably ſuperadded, but would never have entred or have been admitted without that harbinger. I beſeech God to ſink it down into my heart. To which end, I preſume you will give me your aſſiſtance by proceeding to the ſecond thing propoſed from our Saviour's words here, the Inforcements of this duty, ſhewing how reaſonable it is to be obſerved by a Chriſtian.

Seven inforcements of it.

C. I ſhall proceed to that, and give you the inforcements as they lye. A firſt inforcement is the conſideration of what God hath done to us already. 1. He hath given us life it ſelf, which is much more, and a far greater act of power and mercy, than to give food for the continuing of that life. 2. He hath given us the very body we take ſuch care of, and that is much more again than the raiment that muſt clothe it. And thoſe he hath given without any aid of ours, without our uſe of (direct or indirect) means, and therefore, no doubt, can provide ſufficiently for the ſuſtaining of both. And for his willingneſs to do it, if we truſt and relie on him, thoſe very former mercies of his are pawns and pledges of it. God (ſaith a Father) by giving, becomes our debtor. Every mercy from ſo good a Father, comes forth Twins; a gift and a bond together; a preſent payment, and a future pawn; a ſum paid down, and an annuity made over: the having beſtowed favours, being his greateſt obligation to continue them. When we can begin with the Pſalmiſt, Pſal. 100. It is he that made us, then we may confidently go on, We are his people and ſheep, &c. And then, O go your ways into his gates with thankſgiving, not only for paſt mercies, but in confidence of future alſo, his mercy is for everlaſting, &c. A ſecond Inforcement is taken from the example of God's providence toward other creatures: Firſt, for food, from the Fowls of the air; Secondly, for raiment, from the Lilies of the field. For food, in that thoſe Birds without any trade of Husbandry, of ſowing or reaping, &c. are by the providence of God ſufficiently ſuſtained, (Nay, of many birds it is obſerved, they are fatteſt ſtill in coldeſt and ſharpeſt weather:) Nay, that ſort of birds that St. Luke mentions, Luke 12.24. the Ravens, are a creature, that, if Job or the Pſalmiſt may be believed, Job 38. 41. Pſal. 147. 9. hath more of the providence of God illuſtrious in it than any other. Naturaliſts have obſerved of that creature, that it † expoſeth the young ones as ſoon as they are hatch'd, leaves them meatleſs and featherleſs, to ſtruggle with hunger, as ſoon as they are gotten into the world; and whether by dew from Heaven, a kind of Manna rained into their mouths, when they gape (and, as the Pſalmiſt ſaith, Call upon God) or whether by flies flying into their mouths, or whether by worms bred in their neſts, as ‖ ſome think, or by what other means, God knows, God feedeth them. And therefore perhaps it was, that that creature, to make its return of gratitude to God, flies preſently on his errand to feed the Prophet Elias in the Wilderneſs: In which this was ſure very obſervable, that that creature which is ſo unnatural as not to feed it's own young ones, did yet at God's command feed the Prophet: as ſometimes thoſe bags of the Miſer are opened liberally to God's children (at their death, in building Hoſpitals, &c.) which had been ſhut to their own all their life. This example ſignifies, (and being uſed by our Saviour, proves) That God can, and will ‖ do the ſame to us much more, and accordingly our Saviour ſhuts it up with an expoſtulation, [Are not you much better than they?] Man is a much more conſiderable creature than thoſe birds, man is the Monarch of all them, (and the life of my Lord the King is worth ten thouſand of theirs;) and therefore ſurely a far greater part of God's providence than they, and ſo more ſure to be competently provided for, though no thoughtfulneſs of his contribute to it. But then this muſt be taken with ſome Caution along with it: not that we ſhould neither ſow nor reap, becauſe the Fowls do neither; but that we ‖ ſhould take no anxious thought as they neither ſow nor reap; that it is as unreaſonable for a Chriſtian to diſtruſt God's providence, to bury his ſoul in an anxious care for earthly things, though the very neceſſaries of life, as for the Raven to be ſet to Husbandry. Had men acquired but as much Religion, dependence, truſt, reliance on God by all the Preaching of the Goſpel, by all the cultivation of ſo many hundred years, as nature teacheth the young Ravens as ſoon as they are hatcht, viz. to gape toward Heaven, and ſo in a plain down-right, natural, inarticulate way, to call on God, the Mammoniſt idol would ſoon be driven out of the world, and a cheerful, comfortable dependence on Heaven (in deſpight of all our jealous, traitorous fears, that worldly hearts betray us to) taken in ſtead of it, an obedient ſubmiſſion to Gods direction in uſing thoſe means that he directeth us to, and then reſigning all up into his hands to diſpoſe of, with an [if I periſh, I periſh] and [I will wait upon the Lord which hideth his face, and I will look for him] and [Though he kill me, yet will I truſt in him.]

‖ Φιλεῖ δὲ ὁ Θεὸς τοῖς ὅτε αἰσχίοις ὄντα τὰ οἰκοθεν μηχανᾶσθαι οἵοις τε ἐσιν, ὧν μὴ πονησὶ μὲν, ἀπορωμένοις τὰ ἔσχατα ὀπιπυρῶν τε καὶ συλλαμβάνεσθαι. Procop. Vandal. 1. ‖ μὴ μεριμνᾶν.

The other example concerning Raiment from the Lilies of the field lies thus; God in his forming of the World hath beſtowed a ſtrange proportion of natural beauty and ornament upon the Lilies, that grow in every field or Garden, though thoſe are of a very ſhort duration, and being not ſenſitive, do contribute nothing to their own beauty, but moſt evidently the whole work is wrought by God only, and all the care and ſolicitude and temporal advantages of gold, and the like artificial bravery, cannot equal or compare with that natural beauty which God hath endowed them with. Which conſideſiation, as it may well leſſen our deſire of the gallantry in clothes, and mortifie our pride which they feed in us (the utmoſt that we can attain to in this kind being not comparable with that which is in the vegetable, i. e. meaneſt living Creatures;) ſo may it give us a fiducial reliance on God for all things of this nature, who ſure can clothe us as well as thoſe, and will certainly provide for us ſuch raiment as is convenient for us, by our uſe of ordinary means, without our anxious care and ſolicitude for the future.

S. What is the next enforcement of this duty?

C. An argument taken from our own experience in things of ſomewhat a like nature, Ver. 27. For the ſtature of ones body, or the age of ones life, (the ſame * word ſignifies both, but is thought in this place, to denote the former only) every of us know and confeſs, that our care and ſolicitude can do nothing to make any conſiderable addition to it. Now certainly, the lengthning of the life for a few days or hours is not ſo great a matter as life it ſelf; nor the tallneſs or ſtature of the body, as the body it ſelf, (for what matters it how tall a man is?) And therefore it being ſo confeſtly the work of God only to diſpoſe of theſe leſs things, our ſtature, &c. how much more reaſonable is it to believe that the ſame God, without any anxious ſolicitude of ours can and will conſerve our life and body, by giving us thoſe things which are neceſſary to their conſervation.

S. What is the next enforcement?

C. The contrary practice of the Gentiles, Verſ. 32. The Heathen indeed, who either acknowledge no God at all, or deny his providence over particular things, do uſe this kind of ſolicitude, † ſeeking vehemently and importunately for all theſe things, i. e. for food and drink and clothing for the remainder of their lives, or for ſuch a proportion of wealth as will be able thus to furniſh them till their lives end. And this may be allowed or pardoned them, that have no better principles to build on, but would be a ſhame for Chriſtians to have gotten no higher, by the acknowledgment of the true God, and his particular providence and care over all Creatures, (but eſpecially over us men, for whoſe uſe all other Creatures were created) and by the doctrine of Chriſtianity, which teacheth us faith or dependence on Chriſt for all, and deſires to mortifie all love of the gains and pleaſures of this world in us, (by promiſing us a richer inheritance than this earthly Canaan) and to work in us an indifference and untroubledneſs of mind for all outward things, and many other graces in order to this, which no Heathen could ever arrive to.

S. What is the fifth enforcement?

C. It is ſet down in theſe words, Ver. 32. [For your heavenly Father knoweth that you have need of all theſe things,] i. e. Theſe things that are neceſſary for you (and others you need not ſeek after) God knows you have need of, as well as you; and that God is your Father, and cannot be ſo unkind to you, as not to be willing to beſtow them on you; and that Father an Heavenly Father, and conſequently is perfectly able to beſtow them.

S. What is the ſixth enforcement?

C. This, that there is a far more eaſie, Chriſtian, and compendious way to all theſe neceſſaries of life, than our ſolicitude or anxious care; to wit, the ſetting our minds upon our higher intereſts, minding and intending of thoſe joys in another life, and that way of Chriſtian obedience which will lead us to them: which if we do thus intend, God hath promiſed to give us theſe neceſſaries of life, as an appendage or addition over and above; Piety having the promiſe of this life as well as of another.

S. What is the ſeventh enforcement?

C. Becauſe the time to come, for which we deſire to lay in before-hand (and by that means lay a double burthen on that part of our life which is preſent, to provide for it ſelf and that other alſo) will, when it cometh, be able to take care and make proviſion for it ſelf. The Manna that came down from Heaven to the Iſraelites, fell every day, and therefore there was no need of laying up in ſtore, (and if it were done, it putrified) of reſerving any part of the preſent portion; for, for the time to come, they were ſure to be as plentifully provided as for the preſent they were: and ſo the providence of God, that hath brought us in a preſent ſtore, will be able and ready to do the like for the remainder of our lives, when it comes; and therefore all that we ſhall acquire by this ſolicitude before-hand, is only to accumulate trouble and diſquiet upon our ſelves, viz. beſides that due labour and induſtry which we owe to God, (as ſubſervient to his providence) and to our ſelves for our preſent ſubſiſtence, ſo much more alſo as will ſecure us for the future; which what is it but to multiply toil upon our ſelves, above the proportion that God hath deſigned to us? Whereas the trouble that belongs to every day for the maintaining of it ſelf (i. e. the labour and ſweat that we eat our bread in) is ſufficient for that day, without our artifices to encreaſe it, and requires too much (rather than takes up too little) time of diverſion from the duties of piety, to theſe ſo vile inferiour offices. The duty being thus largely enforced, and our hearts by ſo many Engines and Pullies raiſed from this earth of ours to that principal care of celeſtial joys, it may now be thought reaſonable to hearken to Chriſt in a prohibition which was never given to men before, and ſo this hard ſaying will be ſoftned; this circumciſion of the heart, amputation of all thoſe ſuperfluous burthenſom cares of the World-ling or Mammoniſt, will be found ſupportable to the Chriſtian. I ſhall need add nothing to ſo plentiful a diſcourſe of this ſubject, but my Prayers, That we all be in this the true Diſciples of Chriſt, Scholars and Practiſers of this heavenly leſſon.

LIB. IV.

S. I See there is yet, after all the trouble that your charity to me hath coſt you, another occaſion and opportunity ſtill behind, ready to tempt you farther to continue your favour to me, in leading me through the Seventh Chapter, wherein this Sermon on the Mount is concluded. You may pleaſe therefore to enter upon that, and tell me what you find eſpecially conſiderable in it.

C. One ſtrict particular Chriſtian precept I find in that Chapter, which, before I told you, will do well to be added to thoſe many that the former Chapters have afforded, as an improvement of the Ninth Commandment of the Law; and the four general ones; with a concluſion of the whole Sermon.

S. What is the particular precept you ſpeak of? Sect. I.

C. It is ſet down poſitively in the five firſt Verſes, and then a limitation, or explication, or caution added to it, Ver. 6. The Precept is Negative, Not to judge other men, Ver. 1.

S. Why do you make that an improvement of the Ninth Commandment? Of the Ninth Commandment.

C. The Ninth Commandment is, [Thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs againſt thy Neighbour.] That primarily forbiddeth thoſe falſe teſtimonies in judicature which are born againſt i. e. are born, and are harmful to any of) our Neighbours, i. e. any other man. Then, ſecondly, all perverting the courſe of judgment, by bribes, &c. Thirdly, all kinds of detraction, backbiting, whiſpering, wronging, or defaming any, open contumely, or wounding with that ſword of the tongue moſt ſecretly; all kind of lying or falſe ſpeaking, which may any way hurt any other. As for thoſe untruths which, although they are ſuch, are yet ſo far from being deſigned to the hurt of any, that they are perhaps truly gainful to all that are concern'd in them, (as in that known caſe, when a raging furious perſon purſues another to kill him, and asks a by-ſtander which way he went, and that by-ſtander, knowing what he will do, if he either ſay nothing, or do not directly miſguide him, ſhall thereupon, to ſave one from the ſin of killing, and the other from being kill'd, ſay that which is not true) I cannot tell how to reduce this, or the like, to this Ninth Commandment, becauſe this untruth is no ſin againſt my Neighbour (the purſuer or purſued) or hurtful to him, but on purpoſe deſigned to their greateſt good: whatever is amiſs in it muſt be reduced to ſome other prohibition, either as a variation from that attribute of God's, who is Truth it ſelf, and who muſt be imitated in that, as in juſtice of our actions, &c. (and accordingly when it is ſet down as a damnable ſin to do evil that good may come, Rom. 3. the Apoſtle inſtances in a lye, when by occaſion thereof God's glory is more ſet out) or elſe as a breach of that contract which is betwixt all men, that our words ſhall be agreeable to truth. Now theſe which I have named being the chief (if not only) things forbidden in this Commandment, it will eaſily appear, that the prohibition of judging my brother is a yet higher pitch than what is thus forbidden in, or readily reduced to this Commandment, as you will grant when ye ſee what Judging is. Officious untruths.

S. What is meant by Judging? Of Judging.

C. 1. All raſh and temerarious, 2. all ſevere, unmerciful cenſures of other men.

S. What mean you by raſh cenſures? The ſorts of raſh Cenſures.

C. Such as are not grounded in any manifeſt clear evidence of the fact, but proceed from my jealous and cenſorious humour; being ſtill forward to conclude and collect more evil of other men than doth appear to me. As 1. when by ſome indifferent actions done by my Fellow-Chriſtian, and, appearing to me) I ſurmiſe ſome other evil thing not far diſtant from that, and which may poſſibly be ſignified by it, but is not ſo neceſſarily: or 2. when another man's action being capable of two interpretations, the one faſtning evil upon it, the other not, I take it on the evil ſide, and cenſure him for that action, for which, perhaps, God the ſearcher of hearts will never judge him; (or, in caſe God ſees it to be evil, but I do not, then however thus to judge, is in me temerarious judgment;) or 3. when any other man hath done any thing apparently evil, yet from thence to infer a greater guilt in him than to that action neceſſarily belongs, as the action being perhaps capable of extenuation by circumſtances, for me to deprive it of thoſe extenuations, and paſs the judgment which would belong to it abſolutely conſidered; or 4. upon the commiſſion of one or more ſingle actions, not ſufficient to build up an habit, or argue a malignity in the agent, to cenſure him as guilty of that habit or that malignity, this is ſtill temerarious judgment: which commonly proceedeth, whereſoever it is, from pride, ambition, vain glory, or from envy, malice, uncharitableneſs, and ſelf-love, from one or more of theſe, and falls under the judgment due to the ſuſpicious, contumelious, whiſperer, buſie-body, &c. Quite contrary to that charity that hopeth all things, believeth all things, thinketh none evil; to that humility that thinketh better of others than of our ſelves; that peaceableneſs which Chriſt commendeth to us; that kindneſs and pitifulneſs in bearing one anothers burthens, and ſo leſſening them, and not making them heavier by our cenſures.

S. What mean you by unmerciful cenſures? Unmerciful Cenſures.

C. Thoſe which have no mixture of mercy in them, Jam. 2. 13. The precept of forgiving thoſe who have wronged me is by Chriſt improved in ſome kind, and extended even to thoſe offences which are done againſt God, ſo far as that I be obliged by it to look upon them (in others) in the moſt favourable manner, (as on the other ſide I ſhould be moſt ſevere in the examining and judging my ſelf) and always remit of that rigor and ſeverity which the matter is capable of, as knowing that my own beſt actions muſt be lookt on favourably by God, and not ſtrictly weighed by him, or otherwiſe they will never be accepted by him.

S. To what purpoſe is all that which in this matter is added to this prohibition in the reſt of this period?

C. It is, firſt, a determent from this ſin. Secondly, a direction how to avoid it. The Determent this; to conſider how fearful a thing it were, if God ſhould judg us without mercy; and how reaDeterment from them.

Direction how to avoid them.

ſonable it is, that he ſhould ſo do, if we be ſo unmerciful to other men. The Direction, to reflect our eyes and cenſures, every man upon his own ſins, and there to buſie them in aggravating every one into the ſize that juſtly belongs to it; by this means to pull down my own plumes, to abate my proud cenſorious humours, and then thoſe will appear but motes in another man, which now do paſs for beams with me. He that is truly humbled with a ſenſe of his own ſins will be willing to wink at faults in another; at leaſt not to improve and enlarge them, not to cenſure and triumph over them.

S. What is the limitation or caution, or explication of this Precept added in the ſixth verſe?

A limitation of this prohibition.

C. The ſum of it is this, That this Precept of not judging is not ſo unlimited, that it ſhould be unlawful for me to cenſure or think evil of any man: as in caſe he be an open prophane perſon, expreſt by a Dog or Swine, the one a creature ſo accurſed, that the price of him was not to be conſecrated; the other ſo unclean, that it was forbidden to be eaten by the Jewiſh Law; and both of them Emblems of an habitual impenitent Sinner, 2 Pet. 2. 22. The firſt, again, intimating ſuch as bark and rave at all good Exhortations, contradicting and blaſpheming, Acts 13. 45. the ſecond thoſe that, though they blaſpheme not, yet by the impurity of their lives, ſhew the ſecret contempt of their heart. This ſacred Exhortation of not judging or cenſuring is ſuch, as they are not to expect any benefit from; this act of Chriſtian Charity is too holy and ſacred a thing to be caſt away on ſuch Swine and Dogs, who are firſt uncapable of it, and then will make ſuch ill uſe of it: and if in ſtead of judging the offender, you go about to exhort with never ſo much Mildneſs (which is the wiſeſt and moſt charitable Chriſtian way in this matter) they will contemn your Exhortations, and repay them with Contumelies in ſtead of Thanks.

The dogs and ſwine are not concern'd in it.

S. But what, may I never paſs judgment on another man, unleſs it be ſuch a notorious offender?

Cenſures which are not unmerciful.

C. Yes, 1. If that which you judge in him be (though neither habitual nor incorrigible, yet) notorious, and evidence of fact make it ſubject to no miſtake of yours. 2. If you extend that Cenſure no farther than that fact, or no farther than what may from that fact be neceſſarily inferred. 3. If you expreſs your Judgment or Cenſure in words no farther than may agree with rules of Charity: As firſt, Charity to him, either in telling it him your ſelf, and ſeaſonably [a] reproving him, or telling it ſome body elſe, to that end that he may reprove him: or ſecondly, Charity to others, that they may be warned and armed, not to be deceiv'd and enſnared by him: or thirdly, Charity to the community, that he may not by concealment of ſome great faults, get into ſuch place of judicature, &c. where that ravenous humour of his, entring in a diſguiſe of ſheeps cloathing, may be arm'd with power to do more miſchief. In all which yet I muſt be very wary, that under this cloak of Charity I do not carry along a malicious, or proud, or wanton, petulant humour of my own, or even an habit of defaming, and flatter my ſelf that Charity is the only mover in me all this while.

[a] Vide Fratern. corrept.

S. But can my judgment be forced? My aſſent or belief follows, and is proportioned to the motives that induce it: As Knowledge cannot chuſe but follow demonſtrative Premiſſes, ſo Belief cannot chuſe but follow thoſe that appear moſt probable; and if I ſee that by a man, by which my diſcourſe leads me to conclude him drunk, &c. can I offend in judging him?

Many other caſes of judging.

C. If my Concluſion be rightly inferred by due Premiſſes, and offend not againſt rules of Diſcourſe, I do not offend in ſo concluding, or in ſo judging, ſo that I keep it within my own breaſt, and do mix mercy with judgment, i. e. take the more favourable part in judging; for no man is bound not to know what he ſees, or not to believe what ſeems to him (judging in ſimplicity) ſtrongly probable. Nay, ſecondly, if he expreſs his judgment to him whom he thus judgeth, on purpoſe to be ſatisfied of the truth of his judgment, or (in caſe it ſhall prove true) to admoniſh, it is ſtill not only lawful, but commendable. Nay, to tell it another to either of theſe purpoſes, it will be ſo alſo.

S. But what if I tell it another, not on either of theſe purpoſes, and yet not on any defamatory malicious deſign neither?

C. Though it be not out of any malicious deſign, or flowing from any ſtitch or grudge which I have to that man, yet it may be a defamatory deſign; for I may have that general habitual humour of Pride or Vain-glory, that for the illuſtrating and ſetting out my ſelf in more grandeur, I may think fit to blaſt and defame every man I meet with; and then that will be ſin enough, though I have no particular malice to that perſon. But if it be not from any ſuch deſign neither, yet ſome of this may mingle with it in the action. Or if neither, then ſtill ſome other evil may; as that of whiſpering, [b] curioſity, meddling with other mens matters, wantonneſs, vain deſire of tatling, telling news, &c. And if any of theſe be it, then will it be ſo far ſinful as the motive or cauſe of it is.

[b] περιεργία, ἀλλοτριοεπισκοπία.

S. But if ſtill it be ſeparated from all ſuch ſinful motive or adherent, and be only produced by ſomewhat neither good nor evil, (as I conceive it poſſible that many words of my mouth, as well as thoughts of my heart, and motions of my body, may be neither morally nor Chriſtianly good nor evil; and that it is not neceſſary for them to be deſigned to any particular Chriſtian end, if only this general care be had, that they be not againſt Charity or Edification:) What is to be ſaid of ſuch judging?

[c] πᾶν ἀργὸν ῥῆμα.

C. Though ſome other words may perhaps be of this nature, as indifferent as Motions, or Turns, or Geſtures of the Body, (and therefore it is not without reaſon thought, that by [c every idle word] Matth. 12. 36. is meant only every falſe word, as hath been ſaid) yet perhaps this of judging another will not be of that nature, being ſubject to more defaults and taints than moſt other things, and that which is here indefinitely forbidden; and if it break forth into words, it is yet more ſubject to evil. But if ſtill it be mentioned only as a Relation (entire and ſimple) of what I ſaw, leaving the concluſion to others judgments, and not interpoſing mine, or only ſo far interpoſing it as to relate truly what concluſion I did then make of it, and what moved me to that concluſion, abſtaining ſtill moſt ſtrictly from adding or concealing ought, or doing or ſaying any thing that hath any tincture from my own pride, cenſorioufneſs, &c. it may ſtill be as harmleſs and blameleſs in me as writing of the honeſteſt hiſtory; or, if not, will yet hardly appear to be prohibited under this of not judging, in this place. But however, becauſe this is the moſt that can be lawful, and ſtill is no more than lawful, (or not ſinful) not arrived to any degree of moral goodneſs; and becauſe it is very apt to fall into evil, and withal, becauſe of the ſcandal that others may take, who by ſeeing a godly man take this liberty, may miſtake it, and go farther, and fall into ſin; and yet farther, becauſe it may be a breach, although not of this, yet of another prohibition, viz. that [of not doing to others what I would not have others do to me] (it being preſumed of all men, that they would not willingly have every fault of theirs made matter of diſcourſe to other men) it will therefore, I ſay, (for theſe conſiderations) concern him to deny himſelf that liberty, if it be but by way of revenge for the unlawful liberty which he hath ſo often taken: and though this he ſhould not be too forward to judge a ſin in others, (leſt he thus fall into the fool's ſnare, cenſure others of cenſoriouſneſs) yet ought he in this matter to be very watchful over himſelf, that he offend not with his tongue.

S. This Precept of not judging I cannot without tears and hearty confeſſion of mine own great guilt in this kind bear home with me; and I fear there are few in this laſt and moſt uncharitable age of ours who have not had their part in it. I beſeech God to reform it in all our hearts, and join this laſt act of Prudence, which this ſixth verſe hath mentioned, with that ſimplicity which in the former five was required of us.

You told me that after one particular Precept, which you have now explained, there followed ſome general Precepts. What is the ſubject of the firſt of them?

Sect. II. Of the power of Prayer.

C. It is concerning that great buſineſs of Prayer, in the five next Verſes 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. conſidered now not as a duty of ours towards God, or an act of worſhip (as it was conſidered, Chap. 6.) but as an Engine or Artifice to fetch down from Heaven the greateſt treaſures that are there, even that of grace it ſelf, or the holy Spirit, as appeareth by the comparing this place with Luke 11: 13. and the ſum of it is this, That Prayer is the Key of entrance into the Father's houſe; that no man ſhall ever fail of finding and receiving good things (particularly Grace, the greateſt good) that asks, and ſeeks, and knocks, i. e. uſeth importunity in Prayer, as a child to a Father, depending wholly on him, and if he be once or twice repelled, returning unto him (with humility, and ſubmiſſion, and dependence, and confidence) again, and never giving over petitioning till he obtains.

S. What is the next general Precept?

C. It is that famous one that I told you was the improving of the Eighth Commandment of the Law, and which the * Heathen Emperour is ſaid to have reverenced Chriſt and Chriſtianity for, and which all the wiſeſt men of the Nations have admired for the beſt and higheſt rule of Juſtice and Charity to our Neighbours, in theſe words, Verſe 12. [All things whatſoever you would that men ſhould do to you, do you even ſo to them.] Which (ſaith he) is the Law and the Prophets, i. e. on which all my duty towards my Neighbour depends, or wherein the whole Law concerning that is fulfilled.

* Severus.

S. How is that the improving of the Eighth Commandment?

C. The Eighth Commandment [Thou ſhalt not ſteal] doth firſt forbid all kind of Robbery, Piracy, Burglary, Stealth, Pilfering, and in a word all invading of any other mans poſſeſſion or propriety, whatſoever moſt ſpecious colour or cauſe can be pretended for ſo doing. Of theſe colours I have formerly touched on one, That of thoſe who found all propriety in, or right to, the good things of this world, not in the Laws of Nations and of Men, but in the favour of God; and by ſo doing, offer all men that are ſo preſumptuous as to think well of themſelves and ill of others, a juſtification for all their rapines, and invading of thoſe whom they malign, or will but pretend to think ill of, that they may devour them. Contrary to which vile and diabolical pretence is not only the profeſt truth of Scripture in this Sermon, that God beſtows the Rain and the Sun-ſhine, (and under thoſe emblems the poſſeſſions of the Earth) upon the wicked and ungodly, but that other known Maxim alſo, That Chriſt's Kingdom is not of this world, that he came not to interpoſe in ſecular affairs (ſuch are the proprieties of men) but diſclaimed having any thing to do to be a Judge, or divider among men; and himſelf pays tribute to Cæſar, though an Heathen, and commands that thoſe things that are Cæſars ſhall be given, or rendered, unto him; ſuppoſing that ſome things there were, and particularly the tribute there, which that heathen-Prince did duly poſſeſs and enjoy. And it is a ſad omen to ſee this doctrine (which is ſo directly contrary to the teaching and practice of Chriſt) to be entertained among Chriſtians, and owned by thoſe (and never by any but by thoſe) who take themſelves to be the deareſt children and friends of God. To this Commandment is reducible alſo the prohibition of all Oppreſſion and Injuſtice, all withholding the hire of the poor labourer, or generally, the borrowing and not paying again. But the higher pitches of this kind are reſerved for this higher precept of Chriſt, of doing as we would be done to, which you will perceive when we proceed to the opening of that.

Of the Eighth Commandment.

Dominion founded in God's favour.

Oppreſſion. Injuſtice.

S. What then is the meaning of this Precept?

C. To love my Neighbour as my Self; or not to ſuffer my ſelf-love to interpoſe or make me partial in judging of my duty to others; but thus to caſt whenſoever I do any thing to my Brother, Would I be well pleaſed to be ſo dealt with by any other? or, If I might have mine own choice, would not I deſire to be otherwiſe uſed by other men? or yet farther, that whatſoever uſage I deſire to meet with at God's hands, (which is certainly undeſerved mercy, pardon of treſpaſſes, and doing good to enemies or treſpaſſers) the ſame I muſt perform to others; for ſo this phraſe [Whatſoever you would that men ſhould do to you] doth by an Hebraiſm import [whatſoever you would have done unto you] which is the [d] ſtyle that this precept is ordinarily read in, and then extends to whatever I deſire that God or Chriſt Jeſus ſhould do to me, i. e. not only all the Juſtice, but all the mercy, and goodneſs, and bounty in the world.

Of doing as we would be done to.

S. I acknowledge the reaſonableneſs of your collection and interpretation, and ſhall from thence ſuppoſe that this great Rule of doing as we would be done to, is the foundation of all Juſtice and Mercy toward men. Now the latter of theſe you have inſiſted on already in the Beatitudes, and therefore I ſhall not importune you again in that matter: but for the firſt, though that be ſuppoſed and pre-required by Chriſt in his precepts of Mercifulneſs and Almſgiving, and conſequently hath been ſuppoſed in your handling them; yet have you not as yet ſpoken ſo diſtinctly of it, but that your more particular deſcending to it may be uſeful to me. Pleaſe you therefore to ſatisfie me in theſe few Queſtions; Firſt, Whether I may make this advantage of this Rule, that whatſoever I ſhall reſolve to bear contentedly from others, I may lawfully do to them; and ſo that if I would would resolve to be content to stand to the injuries another man can do to me, I may then lawfully injure him.

Submitting to injuries, that one may do injuries, unlawful.

C. No man in his right mind can be supposed simply to be willing that injury should do done unto him, and therefore no man is to do any injury to another: and if any man be as you suppose him, it is then to be resolved, that it is for some advantage or gain which he designs to himself thereby; as for example (that which you seem to intimate) that by living by rapine and injustice he hopes to get more than he fears to lose: and then that treacherous contentment is but an artifice of eluding, not of obeying this Rule, an invention of sinning securely, and will be far from being accepted by God or by any reasonable man for an excuse of his injustice. And therefore, secondly, the interpretation of the Rule must be (without any such deceit) that I do nothing to any man, but what I or any honest-minded man would be content to have done to him, if it were put to his choice or option; or, if you please to take it more intelligibly, you must never do that to another, which, if you were that other, you would think to be injustice; or again, you must never seek to advance any gain of your own by the loss or lessening of another man's.

Gaining by anothers loss unlawful.

S. I receive your answer as satisfactory to my first question, which shews me that this rule is not too loose: But then my next and more serious question will be, whether it be not too strict. I demand, therefore, May I not endeavour to gain to my self by anothers loss?

C. I answer positively, you may not; for that is the thing forbidden in the last Commandment of the Decalogue, as it is explicated in the New Testament, sometimes by not defrauding, Mark 10. 19. (where the word in the original signifies the [e] depriving of another, the lessening of his possessions;) sometimes by [f] not desiring or not lusting, Rom. 13. 9. (i. e. not desiring to get from any other man that which is his;) sometimes by not coveting, § 2 Cor. 12. 17. and Luke 12. 15. abstaining from covetousness, (where the word signifies a desire of getting that which is [h] above my portion;) but especially (as will appear by comparing the two parallel places, Matth. 19. 19. with Mark 10. 19.) by loving thy Neighbour as thy self, which is there clearly set, not as the great Precept to contain all the other under it, (as in other places it is the sum of the Second Table) but as the particular importance of the last Commandment. From whence it follows, that it is not lawful to design the gaining of any thing to my self by the diminution or loss of another, for that is clearly to covet his (contrary to the duty of contentment with my own) and to love my self, and to do good to my self by the hurting of him, and that which is called in Ecclesiasticus, chap. 41. 19. [i] deceit in giving and taking, i. e. in bargaining.

Of just dealing in buying and selling.

S. But if I may not thus gain by another, this will take away all buying and selling, especially all trading, wherein the tradesman sells dearer than he bought, and whose very living is by what he gains.

C. It will take away all unjust dealing in buying and selling, all Extortion, Monopolies, Forestalling, Enhansing of Merchandise, Lying, Falsifying, &c. and it is very fit it should do so: but for honest ordinary lawful gains, such as a man may plentifully and comfortably live by, and such as all men will be well content that all others should make by their trades, as a fit proportionable reward both for their present pains and charge, and for their industry and expences in acquiring such a skill or craft, and for the hazard they are subject to, it will not at all lessen them. For 'tis among all men resolved, that every mans art and his pains, and the charges and the hazards he is put to, are ratable, and may be sold, and that it is profitable to each single man, and to Common-wealths that some men of skill and honesty should traffick. and provide those things which are commonly wanted, and make a moderate gain by the selling of them; and the Rule which we are now upon hath nothing contrary to that: for any man would be content, that he that brings him home to his door those things which he wants, and which would cost him much more to provide for himself, should gain one penny in twelve, or the like proportion, which the Masters of every trade know to be moderate on both sides, neither too little nor too much. But if this moderation be not observed, if the gain be any thing considerably either less or more, then it is that the Rule is broken.

S. I conceive that the gaining too little will not break the Rule; and for the too much, I must yet desire more punctual directions.

Selling too low.

C. It is possible you may be mistaken in the former; not only because he that sells too low, may offend against himself and his own Family, and a man is to love himself, (and not his Neighbour only;) but especially because a man may by selling at too low a price get away the custom from, and consequently defraud and injure all others of the same trade with him: as for example; If ten men in a City may all of them live by their (some way of) Merchandise, by the gaining of one penny in every twelve pence which they lay out, it will be possible for one of these men by taking but one half-penny in a shilling to get all the custom from the other nine, and so to sell ten times as much as would otherwise be his share, and by that means to get far more by that under-selling than otherwise he could do; which though it be no injury but advantage to the Buyers, is yet the defrauding of all those other Merchants in that City.

S. I perceive my error, but still conceive that the most ordinary way of offending is in the excess, (and indeed that other way was but an artifice tending to the same end by a different way, by gaining too little to gain too much; by losing one penny, to get nine, and so an excess in another kind also; but I say the ordinary way of offending is in the direct excess) in the gaining too much, or exceeding the rule of moderation: will you now give me some rules to know my duty in that?

Rules to regulate gains.

C. This one rule will serve your turn, Never to endeavour to enhaunse the price of any commodity above the value of it.

S. What way is there to know the value of any thing?

C. That known one, that [k] every thing is valuable for as much as it may be sold.

[k] Tanti valet quanti vendi potest.

S. If that be the rule, the Merchant will be safe enough, for if he sell a thing at never so dear a rate, it seems it is worth it, because it was (which supposes that it can be) sold for it, and therefore hath not done amiss.

C. You mistake the Rule: for unless he that bought it, can sell it at that price again which he was made to pay, or unless he that sold it him, could have sold it to other prudent men at that rate, or unless unleſs that be the ordinary rate of the commodity, that rule was not obſerved: for the meaning of it was not, that any thing is valuable according as any one ſubtil Merchant can have ſold it to any one weak or paſſionate Chapman, but according to what is the ordinary rate of it when it is ſold.

S. But if a man will give me ſuch a ſum for a commodity, do I do him wrong to take it?

C. If you are a Tradeſman, whoſe calling is to furniſh thoſe that want with ſuch commodities, you are not to demand more than thoſe moderate gains: And if you demand no more, it cannot be imagined that he will give you more for it; or if voluntarily he will on his own free motion, not only without any art of yours to raiſe him to it, but even when you tell him it is worth no more, and you are ready and willing to afford it thus, if, I ſay, he will then in bounty, or voluntarily upon any other fit conſideration, give you more, it will in that caſe be perfectly lawful for you to take it.

S. But what if it be a thing which my calling doth not ſo engage me to ſell; if it be my Houſe, or Land, or the like, which I may moſt lawfully keep; may I not ſell that for as great a ſum as I can poſſibly get for it?

C. Though I am not obliged to ſell theſe at any rate, yet if I do ſell them, I muſt ſet a moderate rate upon them, and if I ſell them to one at a higher rate than either any man will give him again, or then I could have had of others, I ſhall for the preſent ſuppoſe that it was by one or more of theſe means that I was enabled to do it; either firſt, that the Buyer was unskilful and weak; or ſecondly, that there was ſome undiſcovered fault or weakneſs in that which I ſold (I mean, which the Buyer diſcerned not) which moved him to be willing to pay that for it, which if he had known thoſe faults he would not have done. And then that concealment again might be wrought, either firſt, by ſome poſitive falſity of mine in down-right denying it, when I knew it was ſo; or ſecondly, by my denying it again, when I thought really that it was not ſo, though it were; or thirdly, by my refuſing to anſwer to any ſuch queſtion about it; or fourthly, by his not making any ſuch queſtion to me. Or elſe thirdly, that the Buyer had ſome ſpecial liking or phancy, or vehement deſire to that poſſeſſion of mine; or fourthly, that it was more convenient and beneficial to him than to any man elſe. And every one of theſe circumſtances will ſomewhat vary the caſe, perhaps it may be worth your pains to ſee how.

Moderate rates of all things.

S. I ſhall therefore call upon you for your reſolution to the ſeveral caſes: And firſt, what is it, if his weakneſs and unskilfulneſs were made uſe of to get from him an higher price?

Impoſing on the weakneſs of another.

C. It is acknowledged by all that this is cheating, or circumventing, taking advantage of another mans weakneſs, and very near the guilt of robbing on the high-way, (which is but the making uſe of another mans weakneſs to deprive him of his goods) nay, of that grand Piracy ſo common unto many abroad in the world, when the ſtronger devour the weaker, upon no other title of right but becauſe they are ſo; and every man thinks he may lawfully do whatever he is able to do, (ſaying with the Atheiſt, Wiſd. 2. Our ſtrength is the law of juſtice, and that which is feeble is found to be nothing worth:) and this is moſt directly contrary to the firſt fundamental Rule; for no man would be willing to be ſo over-reacht, it being (beſides the injury) a moſt contumelious thing to be out-witted, (as to be over-powered) and nothing is counted more unſupportable than ſuch a contumely.

Concealment of faults in a Commodity.

S. For the ſecond, if there were in the Buyer ſome particular deception proceeding from ſome concealment of ſome fault in the commodity: And firſt, if that concealment were wrought by ſome falſity of the Seller in down-right denying it, then if that were knowingly done, I conceive at firſt thought of it, that that muſt needs be a double ſin in the Seller, 1. of lying, 2. of robbing or cheating the other man of ſo much of the price as the conſideration of that fault would have taken off from it. And this is the greateſt meanneſs in the world, to ſacrifice any of my truth to ſo baſe a thing as a little gain of money is. But what if his denying it was upon an errour in himſelf, the fault being unknown to him, (which was the ſecond caſe of concealment)?

C. Though that may have excuſed him from the firſt guilt, that of a lie, becauſe he ſpake as much as he knew, and went not againſt his Conſcience; yet it is clear that by this means he hath made an immoderate gain (though perhaps againſt his will) and the other hath loſt, having not that for his money which he thought he had bought, and might reaſonably be allowed to think ſo, becauſe he might in prudence think the Seller knew, (and yet if there were any imprudence in it, the Seller ought not to gain by that, the folly of the other being not an ingredient valuable in his Commodity, or giving him any title to the others goods, as before:) and therefore I ſhall conclude, that in that caſe, ſo much of the price muſt be paid back again, as came in through that (though involuntary) falſity; and he that doth not think fit to do ſo, may well be preſumed to have falſified wittingly; for he that hath once erred, will be ſorry for his errour, and he that is ſo, will be deſirous to redeem it even with ſome loſs, but will never think fit to gain by it, to be the richer for his ſin, which yet he muſt be, if he reſtore not. And if in either of theſe two caſes it be interpoſed, that it is an old Rule, that the [1] Buyer muſt ſtand to hazards, and conſequently muſt look to himſelf, which would conclude that the Seller is ſafe in ſuch caſes: I anſwer, That that is a Rule of Humane Law, and accordingly that he may be ſafe from the Penalties of the Law, (which looks not any farther than the outſide of the action, (as it is a contract legally paſt) and cannot poſſibly dive into the ſecrets of Conſcience, nor conſequently puniſh what it is not preſumed able to ſee;) but then he ſhall not therefore be ſafe from God, who looks to the heart: and beſides, if all other Laws ſhould allow ſuch Liberty, and free men not only in the Court, but from Obligation of Conſcience as far as concerns that Law, i. e. not command ſuch ſtrictneſs to the Buyer, yet Chriſt may be allowed to improve Laws, even the Civil, Imperial, and the Municipal Engliſh, as well as the Natural and Moſaical Law; and I ſhall here ſuppoſe him to have done it, by this Rule of [doing as I would be done to] which certainly comes home to theſe caſes, no man being ſuppoſed willing to be cheated by anothers falſity, whether voluntary or involuntary; or if he be content to forgive it, when he knows it was involuntary, yet will not he be pleaſed that he ſhould ſuffer or pay for the others errour. This ſame anſwer may alſo be given to (that which is the only ſecond thing which I conceive may may make this resolution of the case to be thought too severe, viz.) the common, if not universal, custom of men to do otherwise. For sure there is no prescribing against Christ's Rule. If former Laws might be heightened by Christ, and so former Permissions evacuated, then sure former Customs, be they never so universal or popular, may well be superseded by so great a Presence as of Christ, who among other things came to redeem us from this errour, (and to stir us up on the other side to oppose it the more, because it was a popular one, being by that very consideration evidenced to be a part of the World, which in our Baptism we abjured) and to shew us that Abundance was not so precious a thing, but that a little well gotten were as great, nay, a far greater wealth, a richer matter of content in this life, than all the vastest Treasures or Revenues. And I pray mark how powerfully Christ hath delivered this, as an Aphorism, to perswade any prudent man to abstain [m] from covetousness, Luke 12. 15. (the word signifies desire (or endeavour) to get more than what belongs to one, the contrary to contentment with the present estate what-ever it is) Because, saith he, [n] the life that any man hath by his possessions (be it life it self, or chearfulness and felicity in life) [o] consists not in having superfluity; he that hath enough, (and that may be had without coveting, without gaining by another mans loss, by ordinary moderate gains) is as happy even for this world (if there were never another) as he that hath the greatest abundance or superfluity: for the very nature of those words tells us, that that is needless, (so abundant and superfluous signifies) and then what is it but burthen that we gain by it?

[n] ἡ ζωὴ αὐτοῦ ἐν τοῖς ὑπαρχόντων αὐτοῦ.

[o] οὐκ ἐν τῷ περισσεύειν τινί ἐστιν.

S. You have by this superaddition to your answer made that doctrine, which did begin to seem a little strict, appear now most perfectly reasonable, and I hope it shall render me the more capable of what you shall farther add to the other cases. To proceed then, What if that deception proceeding still from concealment, that concealment were by the Sellers refusing to answer to such question concerning any such fault or defect in the commodity?

Two sorts of concealment. The first.

C. That refusing to answer must in all likelihood be insidious, and on design to gain more than was due, and that is very gross; though there be not the lie, there is every thing else that was in either part of the last case, and must be condemned accordingly.

S. But what if it was by the Buyer's not making any such question?

The second.

C. Even then the Laws of Justice, as they were known even to natural men, would decry it as unjust in him that sells, in case he knew ought by the commodity which he could believe did really, or would in the Buyers opinion (if it were known) lessen the value of it: for then it is clear, that man means to make advantage of that concealment, and receive somewhat for that which is really nothing, and by him known to be so, though for covetousness he conceal it. This case to this purpose hath been put by a natural [p] man before Christ's time in this form: There was a famine in one City built on the Sea-side, whereupon the Inhabitants of another hearing of it, provided to send out a fleet laden with Corn to relieve them; which consisting of ten or eleven ships, and being all prepar'd, one ship gets out a day before the rest, and comes to the Haven, and straight sells the burden of Corn at what rate was demanded; and that being done, the whole Fleet comes in, and so fully furnishes the City, that it was sold at an ordinary price, perhaps but the third part of the rate for which the first ship had sold. The case being argued in behalf of the owner of that ship, and all the fairer circumstances being considered, (as, that they of the City never ask'd him whether there were more ships a coming, nor stayed to beat the price with him, but gave willingly what he demanded) the resolution is at last, That this was an indirect action, and that this Artifice of his was merely designed to gain from the Citizens that which he had no right to, and which they would not have given had they known that which he knew, and none but he could tell them. And what (saith he) did that man get by this? Forsooth, a little money, and was counted a Knave; encreased his Treasure, and lost his Reputation: and that he conceives sufficient to fright any from the like. And sure, if Christ's Command may not prevail with us as much as sense of honour among them, or if that be counted honourable now, which was infamous and reproachful then, if now it be a creditable thing to circumvent and cheat my Fellow-Christian, to grow rich by tricks and artifices, when Socrates an honest Heathen would venture a Martyrdom in Athens to beat down these and the like vitious customs among his Countrey-men, and resolve that such a death was better than any kind of life; then sure Christianity is ill bestowed on us: We have little considered that he came to make us more like Doves, not more like Serpents, more just, not more cunning, more upright, sincere, unconcerned, despisers of the world, not more shrew'd, deceitful adorers of it, than Jews or Heathens had been before.

[p] Cicero de Offic.

S. Will you proceed then to the third case? Suppose the Buyer have a great liking to my commodity, a vehement desire to buy it, may I not then make him pay dearer for it than otherwise it was worth?

The Buyers fancy valuable in some case.

C. His fancy adds no real worth to the thing; only it is true, that it may be more grateful to him than otherwise it would be; and that I confess is a benefit to him, and if I have really the same fancy to it, or some degree of it, I may value that: and upon these two conditions, (1. That for my fancy I do really prize it at that rate that I demand, and I would not to any other man part with it under; 2. That I deal openly with the Buyer, tell him what I conceive is the real worth, and what my fancy or special liking hath set more upon it) I doubt not but I may demand, and receive a valuable price for it, rating my fancy at so much as I really value it: wherein I must be very careful that I do not deceive my self, and pretend fancy when I mean covetousness. But then secondly, if I cannot truly say this, if it be only that the Buyer is delighted with it, fansies it, not I, then sure it will be worth remembring, that Christian Charity, of which Christian Justice must be always thought to have some mixture, requires me to do that kindness (be it that which is profitable, or only that which is grateful) to any Fellow-Christian, which I can do without any detriment to my self, and so do good to all men without hoping to receive any advantage to my self by so doing, according to the notion which our English translation hath of Luke 6. 35. which yet if the Buyers gratitude make him acknowledge, and repay with some other good turn, the Seller may lawfully receive it.

In some case not.

S. The last case is, If it be more convenient to him that buyes than to any man else, and so more beneficial also, what think you of that?

C. I

C. I doubt not but convenience is a valuable thing, and that a poſſeſſion may be far more convenient to one than to another, and that there is no reaſon but that he to whom it is more convenient ſhould value it higher than any other; and if it be rated by the Seller but according to this proportion, ſo much dearer to him than to another as it will be more beneficial to him, and this be made clear to him, and openly profeſt, if he upon that reaſon of the real benefit which the convenience brings him, and not only upon fanſie again, be truly content to give ſo much for it, it is lawful for the Seller ſo to rate it to him. And yet becauſe that convenience was not the ſame to him that it is to the Buyer, (by which means it falls out, that he that ſhall be paid as much as to him it was worth, though he receive nothing for that caſual advantage to that other) it may very well become the Seller to ſhew kindneſs and friendlineſs in this matter alſo, as before, though I cannot ſay he is unjuſt if he do not; there being this difference betwixt this and the former caſe, that there the fanſie of another was not ſo reaſonably valuable as here the ſuppoſed convenience is, becauſe this will bring him in ſome real gain, that only an imaginary one. All that I ſhall bind you to in this particular (becauſe to make the Buyer pay more for the convenience than otherwiſe I would have ſold it for, is the niceſt caſe, and that, which if it be not, is yet the neareſt being unlawful) is to deal as openly and clearly as you can with the Buyer, and by reaſonable Arguments ſatisfie his Reaſon, that it is reaſonable for him to pay more for this than another, becauſe it will be more advantageous really to him than to any; and that you may be ſure that your covetouſneſs deceive you not in this matter of ſome ſcruple and difficulty, (as it is eaſieſt to ſlip and fall for him that ſtands on a narrow place, and eaſier yet for him that hath a weight on one ſide, and ſuch is covetouſneſs) you may do well to put that (whatever it is) that that man gives more than another would give, into the Corban or poor mans purſe, that ſo what is gained by that [q] happy bargain, having more of Gods bleſſing in it than ordinary, ſhould yield God this acknowledgment by enriching his poor children.

The convenience of the Buyer truly valuable.

[q] εὐσθλα. 1 Cor. 16. 2.

S. But can you allow me no greater liberty than this in buying and ſelling? And if you do not, will this be agreeable with publick weal? Beſides, if you impoſe theſe ſtrict rules of indifference on the Seller, you muſt do the like on the Buyer too; and if he by any indirect means have over-reacht me, he is bound to as much reſtitution as I ſhould have been.

C. I make no queſtion but the ſame exactneſs is required of one as of the other; and I ſhall think it very neceſſary that all the rules that have here been ſet the Seller ſhall be matter of obligation alſo to the Buyer, ſo far as belongs to him, i. e. as far as the rule of doing as he would be done to, doth belong to him: But for any farther liberty to either, you muſt not expect it from Chriſt, who will think you rich enough and happy enough (even beyond the moſt laden worldling, that Mule under a burthen, not a treaſure of Gold, to gall, but not to bleſs him) if you have good food and rayment, and contentment with it. And for the concernments of the Commonwealth in this matter; firſt, it is clear that if the practice of theſe rules ſhould prove inconvenient to any Commonwealth as now it ſtands, this might rather be imputed to the generality of the contrary cuſtom, which will not without ſome difficulty, and perhaps preſent incommodation, be changed: and the ſame might alſo be obſerved of moſt other ſins, which have had the luck to become cuſtomary. But then ſecondly, for the new conſtituting of a Commonwealth, and ſo likewiſe for the prudent well-weighed reforming of any vice in the old, it will be found moſt true, That the rules that Chriſt hath ſet, if they were embraced, would be univerſally moſt gainful; or if they did hinder ſome particular advantages, either of ſome men, or ſociety of men, this would be repaired by other more valuable benefits. More eſpecially theſe Rules would keep the world moſt quiet, and ſo moſt worth living in; and on the contrary, the deſiring more than this, is it that makes the world ſuch a Stage or Theatre of none but Wreſtlers and Fencers, each labouring to ſupplant and wound the other, till at laſt the world is become but a kind of hoſpital of poor and maimed, every man undoing himſelf and his Neighbour too by deſiring to be richer than he. And beſide, you may conſider that the wealth of this world being God's (only God's) peculiar, in his hand to diſpoſe and preſerve and bleſs to whom he pleaſe, and his bleſſing more gainful to us than our own crafts, it is not likely that he will deny it to them that uſe and depend on his Rules in acquiring of it, or give and continue it to thoſe that ſet themſelves againſt him, that [r] will be rich in * ſpight of him: Or if he do, this is an infallible Argument that riches are not the greateſt bleſſings, for then thoſe whom God beſt loves would have moſt of them.

The objection againſt this ſtrictneſs anſwered.

S. But the reaſon why I ſaid theſe Rules were inconvenient to Commonweals, was, Becauſe they would hinder merchandiſe; and the reaſon for that again ſomewhat elſe, viz. Becauſe the hazards peculiar to Merchants are ſo great, that if they have not leave to make uſe of ſuch advantages as you have ſpoken of, and ſeemed to deny them, they will not be able to ſubſiſt at all.

C. You muſt know that all Merchants are (in paſſing a judgment what is moderate and lawful gain) ſuppoſed to take into conſideration thoſe hazards that you ſpeak of, thoſe, I mean, that are univerſally annext to their trade, and ſo are all men of all other callings alſo; and therefore when I ſpeak of a lawful moderate gain, you muſt know, that I count that but a moderate gain which ſufficiently provides for hazards, nay, which takes in farther the conſideration of all other things (which before I named to you, and) which are fit to be conſidered; the charges and pains they are at, and the rate that may be ſet upon their craft or skill, and that heightned more and more according to the difficulty of acquiring it, and the uſefulneſs when it is acquired. Nay, when the skill is in ſuch matters, or in that kind, that it brings in ſome real commodity to others without their doing or paying any thing toward it, it will be more reaſonable for thoſe men in theſe reſpects to value their Trades or Crafts very high, and to expect great gains by them, becauſe what comes in to them is ſuppoſed to be taken away from no body, but withal to bring ſome advantage to others, without any detriment or hazard to them. But then all this being ſuppoſed to be already provided for in the ſeveral Rules that the honeſt intelligent men of every Trade ſet themſelves, it will not be reaſon that the ſame conſiderations of hazards, &c. ſhall be taken in again to heighten the gains yet higher, nor indeed may particular extraordinary loſſes be excuſes to any man for ſo doing: for thoſe, whatſoever they are, were contained in the former mentioned hazards, and every man must resolve to bear his lot, be it worse or better, with patience; or if he be impoverished by such heavy accidents, it will be fitter to seek a subsistence by a Brief, or demand of mens charity, than by enhaunsing the price of what is left, no misadventure being excuse for me to be unjust. And because I now have mentioned mens charity, as a lawful relief for him who cannot thrive by lawful Trading, I shall also add, That if upon helping any man to a good penny-worth, or selling upon bare moderate gains, the Buyer think fit to reward my Justice and Diligence with some reward above the price he pays, (which may be very Christian for him to do in this case, if it were but to encourage upright dealing) there will be no need to make scruple of receiving what is so freely given; but to grow rich by that which is fetcht out of anothers throat, extorted and forced from him, will never tend much to the Comfort or Reputation of any man, nor have much reason to hope for any blessing from Heaven upon it.

S. You have now been sufficiently detained by a view of this Rule as it looks on acts of Justice betwixt men; and for the other branch, the extent of it to acts of Mercy, I told you I should not expect that to be again repeated to me. Only in stead of it, I shall take leave to put you in mind of one thing which may perhaps cost you some time; and yet, belonging directly to this matter of just dealing betwixt man and man, I cannot but think it seasonable for me to demand, and for you to give your judgment of it.

C. What is that?

Of Usury.

S. The known famous business of Usury, of which there are various and distinct opinions, and perhaps the Reasons given for any of them not very satisfactory: I shall expect your opinion of it.

C. You shall have it as clearly and briefly as I can: And first, I must tell you, that the business of Usury is not so clearly stated in the New Testament (and for that among the Jews in the Old, it is both obscure, and only to a fellow-Jew, and so belongs not unto Christians, who are not obliged by their Judicial Laws any further than the equity of them is imitable by us) as that I can set strict and certain Laws to any mans actions from thence, which you will believe with me, when I tell you the one only ground of Objection I have against Usury from the New Testament. It is from an Observation which I made in comparing the Hebrew with the Septuagints Interpretation of the Book of Nehemiah: in which generally the phrase which we render [t] [to exact Usury] is rendred by the Greek, * [to exact] simply, without any Substantive added to it; and so the Greek Noun for requiring or † exacting, signifies there requiring of use: and so 2 Mac. 4. 27. that which is rendred [required it] most probably signifies this receiving of use, the Period being best rendred thus, As for the money, &c. he put it not into any good course, but Sostratus, &c. took the use of it; for unto him belonged the managing of the moneys. From whence (knowing what sympathy or concent there is between the Greek of the New Testament and of the Old) I presently thought that that place of the Gospel, Luke 6. 30. might be explained; where Christ speaking of Acts of Mercy, (giving to every one that asketh) addeth in our translation, [y] And from him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again: Where I conceive the most proper and commodious sence, (and that which will be most agreeable to the context concerning Giving) will be this, From him that [z] receiveth, (not taketh by force, but all one with the word which we render [a] receiving) by way of Loan any of thy Goods, [b] require no usury (according to that Notion in Nehemiah, of requiring, for exacting of usury) of him. Which being, as I said, joined with [giving to them that ask] denoteth a work of Mercy, as indeed lending is a prime way of Mercy; The good man is merciful and lendeth, and, he that is merciful will lend to his Neighbour, Eccles. 29. 1. and many the like. And I remember a most excellent obliging [c] Roman exercised himself especially in this kind of Mercy, lending, and strictly requiring the payment on the day. And Cornelius Nepos saith, he did more good that way, than by giving he could have done; teaching men to be Thrifty and Laborious, whereas giving or suffering them not to repay would have made them sluggish and beggers. Which being supposed, it will follow, that this of not requiring of use, being an Act of Mercy, must, I conceive, be extended no farther than the former Precept of giving was to be extended. Now though the words are in an unlimited latitude, [Give to every one that asketh;] yet ordinary prudence will interpret them so, that if a covetous rich man ask of me, I am not bound to give to him, but only to him whose wants set him on asking. And so consequently in like manner the prohibition or forbidding to exact, take, or require use of him that borrows, belongs not again to the poor or mean Creditor, when a rich man borrows of him, but only when the rich lends to the poor man, to whom a free Loan is a seasonable Mercy. From whence as I should conclude without any demur, that when I lend a poor man, I must not require use (any more than I must deny alms to him that wants it, when I have it to spare;) so I cannot conclude it unlawful from hence to receive from a rich man (I mean, who wants not that alms) what interest or increase he is willing to give me, which is, I suppose, the question resolved. All I conceive necessary to be added by way of Caution is, First, that I take care, that such lending to the rich do not disable me from assisting the poor. Secondly, that I am (as far as morally I can be) sure, that he who pays me this use, is able to do it without eating out or hurting himself, but that he makes greater gain of it by trading or the like. Thirdly, that it be not so done as that it may bring reproach or censure of worldly-mindedness or illiberality upon me, (especially if I be a Clergy-man; for, by the Canons of Antient Councils they are forbidden many things of this nature, which were permitted others) much more that it be not an act of a covetous mind, but only a way of subsisting on that small portion my friends have left me.

The one Christian Precept against it considered.

S. But what must I do, in case the person to whom I thus lent upon use (and in so doing observed, as well as I could, the second Caution, conceived him very probable to make gain by that loan) either by misadventure, or by his own neglects, lose by my loan, or be eaten out by paying me interest?

A caution to this.

C. I answer, That in that case it is the safest course to forbear the interest, and in matters of this nature I conceive it is my duty to take the safest course; and the thinking my self obliged to do so, will make me more circumspect than perhaps otherwise I should be, in examining the condition of the person (of whom I adventure to take use) and being as sure as I can, that I take it not from any

that

that could need my charity, i. e. my lending without uſe. In all this you muſt not think that I am ſo poſitive as in other things I have been, but only, that I ſet you down my opinion, and the grounds on which I build it, and ſhall expect your aſſent no farther than my grounds convince you. For the truth is, after all this which I have ſaid upon that ground, from that paſſage of Saint Luke ſo interpreted, I muſt confeſs that the word which I render [requiring of uſe] may ſignifie ſomewhat elſe, viz. to exact or require back the loan (when it is lent without uſe) for ſo the word to require back that which is lent (contrary to Releaſe) is rendred, Deut. 15. 2. and 3. and ſo Wiſd. 15. 8. and Eccluſ. 20. 15. the Greek word is uſed for calling back a Loan, and ſo indeed the word more uſual is [d] to lend ſimply, as well as to lend upon uſe And then the meaning of the verſe in Luke will be, that as I muſt give to him that asketh, ſo of him that borroweth of me, I muſt not exact repayment, when he is not (through Poverty) able to do it, (for that were an Act of Oppreſſion, or very contrary to Charity; and therefore Iſaiah 9. 4. the [e] word ſignifies Oppreſſors, and Eccluſ. 20. 15. it is ſet down as the character of an illiberal fool, [To day he lendeth, and to morrow he asketh again.]) And if this be the ſence, then it will be ſtill pertinent to the buſineſs of Liberality or Charity in giving and lending, and ſo no farther belong to the matter of Uſury than by Analogy may be inferr'd from thence, viz. That if from a poor man I muſt not haſten or exact the repayment of his debt, but continue the loan to him as long as his diſtreſs requires, then ſurely I muſt not ſell that loan, i. e. take uſe of him. But this ſtill muſt belong only to the rich man's lending to the poor. As for the caſe of the rich man's lending to the rich, there hath appeared nothing in either of theſe interpretations which will oblige to it, or (if he do) which will prohibite the taking intereſt of him: And there is as little to that purpoſe in a third poſſible interpretation of the words (according to the ſound of our Engliſh) of not requiring the legal fourfold of him that hath rob'd me; which though it be not the importance of the word [taketh] which notes only receiving, not rapine, yet is no very improbable rendring of the word [Require] if we compare it with a place in an ancient humane [f] Author. But, as this ſtill belongs not to Uſury at all by any Analogy, but only concludes that the not requiring the legal fourfold of the thief, will by analogy with the former part of the Verſe be reſtrained only to the caſe of the poor (not rich) thief, that by neceſſity is enforc'd to take away ought from thee; ſo do I not know any other ſo much as colour of Text in the New Teſtament which forbids it, nor indeed reaſon nor analogy, either from that great Rule in hand, of doing as I would be done to (for, if I were a rich man, I would, in caſe of convenience or advantage that a Loan would probably bring in to me, be willing to pay uſe for it) or of loving my Neighbour as my ſelf; nor conſequently can I yet affirm it unlawful, ſtill ſuppoſing that the Cautions which I mentioned be obſerved uprightly.

S. I ſhall reſt in your preſent directions, and draw you on no farther in this buſineſs of Juſtice, becauſe I conceive the prime thing deſigned in the Rule on which we have built theſe diſcourſes, is indeed that duty of Mercifulneſs.

C. It is ſo, for in this ſence it will beſt agree with the precept of liberality to enemies, (with which it is joined, Luke 6. 31.) and the promiſe of God here to give to every asker, (of which bounty of God's we that are partakers, ought to do the like for our Brethren) and be a fit introduction to the exhortation that follows of Chriſtian ſtrictneſs, which ſeems to be built on this, and to be but a branch of this great precept, and not a ſeveral from it.

S. What is that Exhortation you mean?

C. That of a great ſuperlative ſtrictneſs in the ways of Godlineſs; not being content to walk in the broad rode that Jews and Heathens have contented themſelves with, (not willing to undertake any thing of difficulty for Chriſt's ſake, and ſo by that means falling into deſtruction) but entring in at the ſtreight gate and narrow way that leadeth unto life, that way which theſe elevated precepts have chalked out to us; and which here, it ſeems, are not propoſed as counſels of perfection, but as commands of duty, without which there is no entring into life, no avoiding deſtruction. Of Strictneſs.

S. What now is the third general Precept?

C. It is a Precept of warineſs and prudence, to beware of Errours, and thoſe whoſe trade it is to ſeduce us to them, and this in the ſix next verſes, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20. and it belongs not to all deceivers of any kind, but particularly to ſuch as profeſs to follow Chriſt, and yet teach falſe and damnable doctrines; which that they may put off to their Auditors or followers the better, they pretend a great deal of holineſs in ſome other particulars. And the ſum of that which he here ſaith to this purpoſe may be reduced to this, Whenſoever any falſe Teacher comes to diſſeminate his doctrine, the ſureſt way to diſcern him will be to obſerve the effects and actions diſcernible in him, or which are the fruits of his doctrine. If all his actions and all the deſigns and conſequents of his doctrine be the advancing of piety and charity of all kinds, then you may reſolve that he is no ſuch (falſe, at leaſt dangerous) falſe Teacher. For firſt, the Devil will never aſſiſt him or put him upon falſe doctrines to ſuch an end, to bring more holineſs and Chriſtian practice into the world. Secondly, ſuch holy Chriſtian practice is not eaſily built upon any falſe doctrine. Thirdly, if the doctrine ſhould chance to be falſe that bringeth forth ſuch wholſom effects, then to him that receiveth it for thoſe effects ſake, and otherwiſe diſcerneth not the doctrine to be falſe, it may be hoped, (through God's mercy in Chriſt to our infirmities) it ſhall not prove dangerous or deſtructive. But if the conſequence or effects that flow naturally from the doctrines which he brings, be either againſt rules of piety or Chriſtian vertue; As 1. if they tend to the leſſening of our love of God, or (under that head) to the aliening our hearts from him, by giving us mean and unworthy notions of him, (contrary to thoſe Attributes of infinite Power, Juſtice and Goodneſs which we ought to believe of him) if they tend to the begetting of preſumption and ſecurity in our hearts, by giving us any ground of hope without purifying and amending our wicked lives, by leaving no place for fear, whatſoever we do, by making us conceit highly of our ſelves, rely and truſt on, and boaſt of our own merits; if they lead us to Idolatry, to the worſhip of ſomewhat elſe beſide the only true God, or to a bare formal out-ſide worſhip of him; if they open the door to falſe or needleſs ſwearing, or to profaneneſs, and neglect of God's ſervice: Or 2. if they tend to injuſtice or uncharitableneſs towards men, or (under that head) head) to disobedience, sedition, rebellion, faction, speaking evil of dignities, acts of Jewish zelots, &c. to the favouring or authorizing of any kind of lust, of divorces forbidden by Christ, &c. to the nourishing of rash anger, uncharitable (either temerarious or unmerciful) censuring, envy, emulation, variance, strife, malice, revenge, contumelious speaking, whispering, backbiting, &c. to the excusing or justifying of piracy, rapine, oppression, fraud, violence, any kind of injustice, &c. to the spreading of lies, slanders, defamations, &c. to covetousness, unsatisfiedness, uncontentedness in our present condition, desire of change, casting the cross on other mens shoulders that we may free our own from it, to dealing with others as we would not be well pleased to be dealt with our selves: or, in a word, if they tend to the discouraging or discountenancing any Christian vertue set down in this or any other Sermon of Christ, or by his Apostles, or to the granting any dispensation or liberty from that Christian strictness in these duties, or in those other of repentance, self-denial, meekness, mercifulness, peaceableness, &c. Then by these marks and characters you may know this to be a false Teacher. Yet not so far this, as that whosoever is guilty himself of any of these sins, shall be (if he be a Teacher) a false one; for it is possible his doctrine and actions may be contrary: but that, if these be the fruits and natural effects of his doctrine, then shall his doctrine be thus condemned; otherwise an ill man he may be, and yet a Teacher of truth; a wicked person, but not a false Prophet.

S. But is it not said of these false Prophets, that they come in sheeps clothing? which sure signifies their outward actions to be innocent. How then can they be discerned by their fruits?

C. I answer first, That the fruits of their doctrine may be discerned, though their own evil actions be disguised and varnished over. Secondly, That though their actions most conspicuous and apparent be good, yet their closer actions (which may also be discerned by a strict observer) are of the making of the Wolf, ravenous and evil. Thirdly, that though they begin with some good shews to get authority, though they enter as sheep, do some specious acts of piety at first, yet they continue not constant in so doing, within a while they put off the disguise and are discernible.

S. What now is the fourth or last general Precept?

C. The sum of it is, that it is not the outer profession of Christianity or Discipleship, (though that set off by propheſying, doing miracles, &c. in Christ's name, i. e. professing whatsoever they do to be done by Christ's power) which will avail any man towards his account at that great day, without the real, faithful, sincere, universal, impartial performing of obedience to the Laws of Christ.

S. But can, or doth God permit any wicked man to do such miracles, &c?

C. Yes, he may; For, the end of miracles and preaching, &c. being to convince men of the truth of the doctrine of Christ, that may well enough be done by those that acknowledge that truth, though they live not accordingly: The miracles done by them being not designed by God to the commendation of the instruments, but to the perswading of the spectators.

Sect. III.

S. Having received from you the full tale of the Precepts you proposed, there now remains only the conclusion of the whole Sermon to be discharged, and then you have paid me all that your promise hath yet obliged you to.

Of Profession of Christianity without action.

C. It is this, (occasioned by the last Precept of doing as well as professing God's will) That the profession of Christianity, lending a patient ear to those doctrines, will, (if it be (as oft it is) trusted to, and depended on to render us acceptable to Christ) prove a very fallacious and deceitful hope. Whensoever any storm comes, any shaking disease or affliction, which gives us occasion to awake throughly, and examine our selves to the bottom, we are not then able to retain any hope or comfortable opinion of our selves, although in time of quiet and tranquillity, before we were thus shaken, we could entertain our selves with such flattering glozes. Hearing of Sermons, and professing of love to, and zeal for Christ, may pass for piety a while; but in the end it will not be so. It is true Christian practice that will hold out in time of trial, and that hope of ours which is thus grounded will stand firm and stable in time of affliction and temptation, at the hour of death and the day of Judgment. This doctrine of Christian duty and obedience is such as can never deceive any man that is content to build upon it. Nor infirmity, nor sin, (committed, but repented of, and forsaken) nor Devil, shall ever shake any man's hold that is thus built, endanger any man's salvation that lives according to the rule of this Sermon; nor shall all the flattering deceitful comforters of the world bring in any true gain or advantage or substantial ground of hope to any other.

And it came to pass when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine. For he taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes.

LIB. V.

S. HAving profited somewhat by your advertisements in that part of knowledge which is most useful to me, I shall endeavour now to give you some account of my proficiency, though it be but in taking notice of my farther wants, (which till you thus opened my eyes I discerned not) and in desiring your help to assist me yet farther, to discern what influence on my life or practice may be had from those very Articles of my Creed which you supposed me to have learnt in my Catechism: But having no otherwise learnt them than to say by rote, and perhaps to understand the words and meaning of them, though I had formerly contented my self with that superficial knowledge, and thought that to be all that was required of me, yet I have now altered my opinion, and by the tasts you have given me, I find my appetite raised to receive what (in order to practice) you shall please to teach me from thence, being strongly perswaded that the bare speculative knowledge of these doctrines, sunk no farther than into my brain, will avail but little to my salvation. Sect. 1. Of the Creed.

C. You have made a right conjecture, and will be confirmed in it, when in your conversing with holy Writings, especially those of the Apostles in their Epistles, you observe how the Articles of our Creed are seldom or never mentioned but as obligations and pledges of our amendment of life; Christ's death, of our Mortification; his Resurrection, of our New life, &c. I shall therefore be perswaded by you to proceed a while on this theme, insisting only (unless it be in passage) on that which is practical.

S. Be pleased then to set out on this journey, and first to tell me once for all, what is the full importance of the word [believe.]

C. To [believe] is (as many other in Scripture) a pregnant word, and contains under it all that is or should be consequent to it. To [know] signifies in Scripture, not only what the word sounds, but also to love, and to do; knowing of God is the whole service of God: and so proportionably to [believe.] And in brief, it hath two parts, a speculative, and a practical; the one but of a piece, the other of the whole heart; or if you will, the one in the brain, the other in the heart; and this latter superadded to the former, it seems, is it that alone is likely to stand us in stead, Rom. 10. 9. If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. Of Belief.

S. What do you mean by a speculative belief? Speculative belief.

C. An assent or acknowledgment of the truth of any thing affirmed in the word of God; as to acknowledge and assent to this truth, that there is a God, that he is our Father, &c. that he sent his only eternal Son into the World to be born of a Virgin, &c.

S. What is the practical Belief, or that of the heart? Practical.

C. The Heart is the principle of Practice, (as appears, Deut. 30. 14. My word is in thy heart [that thou maist do it,] and Verse 16. [to keep his Commandments, &c. and that by Analogy with a ground in nature, the Heart being there the principle of life and motion, moving always, (to which Solomon oft alludeth) and digesting and applying every thing that comes into it, to that end) the Principle, I say, of action, of ordering and directing our wills, and so our lives accordingly; and so the belief in the heart contains in it (in general) all kind of practical Christian Vertues, peculiarly those that according to the nature of the object believed, and the several considerations of it, are most proper to be produced or exercised. Thus to believe there is a God, is to live and behave my self in a godly manner, and so signifies Piety; to believe he is maker of all things, is to commit our souls to him in well doing, as to a faithful Creator, 1 Pet. 4. 19. to believe he is a Father, is to love him with a filial love, to fear him with a filial fear, to honour him as a son his father, Mal. 1. 6. to obey him with a filial obedience, to trust in him, to depend on him, as children on fathers, for all things needful to our souls or bodies. And this you are proportionably to apply to all the severals in our Creed, or objects of our Belief.

S. But is there not some peculiar notation in the Phrase [Believe in?] is not that more than to Believe? Believing in.

C. Some subtil wits have observed such a distinction between believing [a] God, believing in God, and believing on God; but it is not sure that the Word of God hath owned any such distinction or constant difference between them, taking indeed all these promiscuously, and meaning oft-times the same thing by all of them. The distinction which I gave you will, I conceive, do the same work, for which the Schoolmen designed this other, and the several notions of believing in Scripture will be most properly referred to the severals mentioned; either a speculative believing, as in the Devil and wicked Professors, or a practical, in all Saints: and that differenced again according to the notion wherein the Object is considered, as even now was specified; sometimes a terrifying assent, or an assent accompanied with fear, when it looks on the threats, Heb. 11. 7. By Faith Noah moved with fear, &c. sometimes an obediential assent, when it looks on the commands, Psalm 119. 66. I have believed thy Commandments; sometimes a fiducial assent, when on the promises of the Gospel, thy word wherein thou hast caused me to put my trust, Psalm 119. 49. [a] τῷ θεῷ, ἐν τῷ θεῷ, εἰς τὸν θεὸν, ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν.

S. I conceive my self to understand the notion you have given me of believing, and shall labour to apply it carefully to all that follows. You may now please to proceed to the several parts or objects of our Belief. What then is the Speculative belief of God?

C. The firm undoubted acknowledgment, 1. That there is a God; 2. That there is but one God. Of believing in God.

S. What is it to acknowledge him to be God?

C. To acknowledge him in his Essence and in his Attributes. In his Essence, that he is the eternal, immortal, immutable, invisible, incomprehensible, glorious Being, giving being to all, but himself receiving from none; the Being of Beings, the (which was, and is, and shall be) the Lord God Jehovah. His Essence.

His Attributes.

vah. In his Attributes, of infinite goodness, and mercy, and veracity, and wisdom, and providence, and power, and all-sufficiency, his creating, preserving, and just governing and dispensing of all things. All which together make up the severals contained in that which follows in the Creed [In God the Father Almighty, maker of Heaven and Earth.]

S. I shall not trouble you to prove all or any of these particulars to me, because you say they are matter of belief; which although they have grounds in nature, which also would be means of proving every of them, yet shall they by me be received without that kind of argument, being more willing to believe than dispute what from the Scripture, the Apostles and the ensuing Universal Church of God have thought fit to comprise in those Articles; all that I shall now demand of you is, your direction how these severals which you have now named may be reduced to those words of the Creed.

C. Those of his Essence, to the word [God] whose name (proper to him from all others) is [Jehovah] which includes [being] and giving of Being, immortal, immutable, and (by consequence from them) invisible, incomprehensible, and glorious. All which being unexpressible by any positive definition, is best described by (those which I gave you, which are most of them) negative epithets. Those of his Attributes to the word [God] and to the following words; that of his infinite Goodness and Mercy and Providence, to his title of Father; that of his Veracity, both to his being God, who in his nature hath by all men (even Heathens) been conceived free from lying, [Let God be true, and every man a Liar] (absolute veracity belonging to no Creature, but only to God) and to his name Jehovah, which is set in Exodus to note his constancy in performing of promises, his Establishing his Covenant, Exodus 6. 3. and also to the word [believe] which supposes God the great object of our belief, and so true in all his affirmations; that of his Wisdom, and Power, and All-sufficiency, his Creating and preserving of all, to his title of Maker of Heaven and Earth, in which all those severals are expresst: the word [Maker] containing under it not only the beginning, but continuance of all Being; and so first, the disposal, wherein the Wisdom was shewed; secondly, the strangeness of the composure first, and since of daily productions both ordinary and extraordinary, wherein the Power; thirdly, the sustaining, wherein the All-sufficiency; and in all together, the creating and preserving. As for that of his just governing and dispensing of all things, that belongs most peculiarly to the word which we render [b] Almighty, but signifies peculiarly his being Governour, Ruler of all things; which being added to the word Father, signifies that eminent natural right that belongs to all Fathers, paternal dominion, the root of all Power and Government among men, and being in a transcendent manner applied to God, the transcendent Father, contains under it all manner of dominion over the Creature. This title indeed contains his Almightiness and infinity of power over all his Subjects, but withal superadds that other relation of a King and Lord over them. To all which may be added his Omnipresence and Omniscience, of which his very deity and infinity are a ground, his creating and governing all things a proof, and the evident daily footsteps of the former in the whole Creation are sure and manifest evidences and testimonies of it: and of the latter, his delivering, and the exact fulfilling of Prophecies, wherein God hath oft foretold future contingent words and actions of men, which being many times evil and sinful (as particularly the words of the by-standers at the Cross against Christ, punctually foretold, Psalm 22. 8.) he could not be the author or designer of them, or consequently foretel or foresee them in his decree of producing or causing them, but only by vertue of his Omniscience.

S. What now is the Practical part of this Belief of God?

The practical belief in God.

C. The influence that each of these Assents is apt to have upon our lives, (there being a practical as well as speculative Atheism) the living like those that in earnest believe all this: and that is in effect the practice of all those duties which the Church Catechism told you were contained in the First Commandment, which you will remember to have been Faith, Hope, Love, Fear, Trust, Honour, Worship, Prayer, and Thanksgiving to him. That all these are the uses and duties of the first Article of the Creed, will be easily discerned, if you but apply them to the severals in God's Essence and Attributes before mentioned. His veracity is the ground of our Faith; and he that cordially is perswaded of that, cannot chuse but believe in him, Hebr. 11. 11. The same again, when his Promise hath intervened, being backed with his Omnipotence, is the ground of our Hope; and he that knows God hath promised, and resolves that he can neither lie, nor be overpowered with difficulties, will hope on him even in the midst of all temptations to the contrary. And so again, the word [Father] implying his preparing for us an inheritance, 1 Pet. 1. 4. his glorious Excellence, and after that his paternal Goodness and Mercy to us, in feeding us and disposing all (even the saddest) Accidents to our greatest good, is a sufficient motive and ground of Love. His Omnipotence, and his Justice, and again paternal Relation to us, is our ground of Fear: His All-sufficiency, (and the Eternity that is peculiar to him, when all other things are so frail and mutable) of our Trust and dependence on him, and him only: His Regal Power, of our honouring him: His very Deity, of our Worship; and his Goodness, and All-sufficience, and Providence, and Wisdom, of our Prayer and Praises, of all our Petitions and Thanksgivings.

S. The good God of Heaven and Earth so fill my heart with a sense of his infinite Attributes, and the short fading temporary emptiness and nothingness of all Creatures, that I may with a sincere heart and ardent affections, love, fear, obey, worship, and depend on him.

I perceive you have by this means taught me one most useful truth of Practical Divinity (which may well have an influence on all my life after, and fortify me against the dangerous mistakes either of the Solifidian, or the Fiduciary) that I must not be thought to say the first Article of my Creed in earnest, unless my heart be possest sincerely with the power, and my life go on uniformly in the practice of all these Christian Vertues. Will you now proceed to the next Articles?

C. I will.

Sect. II. Of believing in Jesus Christ.

S. That of Jesus Christ (which is next) so far as those pregnant rich titles of the Son of God do import, you have formerly opened to me, and in effect, what it is to believe in Jesus Christ, both to acknowledge the truth of what the new Testament saith of his designation to those three great Offices which denominated him Christ or Anointed, and were the means by which he wrought our Salvation, and so became Jesus;

Jesus; and also to make our vital acknowledgments of all these, depending and relying on this alone Saviour, and by Repentance and new Life making our selves capable of the Salvation wrought conditionally by him, loving, and hoping on him; so again receiving his Kingdom into our hearts, and making those other particular returns mentioned in that former discourse, to which I am content to be referred. [c] Lib. 1. Of the offices of Christ.

The other passages and Articles concerning Christ are so plain and intelligible, that I will not trouble you to interpret them one after another, but content my self with what in general you will observe to me of them.

C. This I shall wish you to observe, That all those Articles of Christ, are by our Catechism brought into this one Summary, That Jesus Christ redeemed me and all mankind: and that not only from the guilt of sin, but, in St. Peter's interpretation, from our vain conversation, i. e. Heathenish wicked living: which is, in effect, The one great necessary to be known of him, is, That he was born, crucified, continued under the power of death, rose again, ascended to, and now sits at the right hand of God, and shall again come to judge the world; all, and each of this on purpose to work Redemption for mankind: which if it be faithfully believed, and applied to the regulating and reforming of our lives, this belief will doubtless be sufficient to the salvation of any who is not able to attain to the understanding of many other difficulties. Thus doth S. Paul resolve to know nothing among his Corinthians but Jesus Christ and him crucified, 1 Cor. 2. 2. (under which head it seems the reprehending of all their carnal sins, Chap. 3. 1, &c. of Incest, Chap. 5. 1. Contentiousness, Chap. 6, &c. comes in very pertinently, each of those being oppositions to the crucified Saviour, who died for us, that he might purify us, and that we might die unto sin) and Rom. 10. 9. pronounces, That he that believes in the heart that God hath raised Jesus from the dead (and that, we told you, contains our rising from dead works by the power of that same Spirit) shall be saved. So 1 John 5. 1. Every one that believeth that Jesus is the Christ, (and piously submits to those offices of his) is born of God: And Chap. 4. 2. Every spirit that confesses Jesus to be come in the flesh is of God, (if that place be taken in the full extent of the words, and not, as indeed the context restrains it, to the spirit of Prophecy) because all Christianity depends on that one belief, if it be cordial; which, beside the great practical doctrines which the several articles will furnish us with, will in the gross read us a Lecture of a most sovereign charity, not to condemn or remove from our Communion any Christian that shall join with us in the acknowledgment of these and those other few necessaries, and live in all manner of duty toward God and man peaceably, and piously, and conscionably, according to this profession; all other less necessary truths, though precious in their kind, being not so valuable as Christian charity and peace, and comunion with all who are fellow-members of our Christ.

S. I shall labour to possess my heart with this charitable lesson: but you mentioned some great practical Doctrines which the several articles would furnish us with: which be they?

C. First, from the birth of Christ, to recount the infinite dignation and bounty of our God, that, to redeem us from the thraldom which our own sins had brought upon us, not only submitted himself to all diminutions and meannesses, and at last mortality of our flesh, but came into the world on no other errand but for this very purpose, that he might die for us, Heb. 2. 14. and John 12. 27. Secondly, from the same again and the necessity of it to our redemption, to consider the justice first, then necessity of our new birth or regeneration: justice, by way of retribution, that if he would for our salvation be born in our flesh of a woman, we should in any reason be born anew in the Spirit, or of God; and then the necessity also, resolving that, (as if he had not been thus born, so) if we be not born again, we shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. Thirdly, from the manner of his conception and birth, to learn the manner of his second birth in our hearts: 1. That as our humane flesh could no way deserve, or by so much as any congruity expect, that Christ should assume it, or be born in it; so could not our souls deserve or expect that Christ should thus spiritually be born in us. 2. As his conception was wrought by the Overshadowing of the Holy Ghost, so no conception of Christ in our hearts is to be had without it. 3. We must prepare Virgin hearts for Christ to be born in, and for that Holy Ghost to overshadow: by Virgin hearts meaning no absolute sinless purity and innocence, which only Paradise could yield; but that renewed purity and recovered Virginity of true Repentance, and sincere resolutions of amendment, which with the humility of that blessed Virgin, expresst by the lowliness of the hand-maid in her Magnificat, and typified in that temper of the new-born Babes, which are of all others fittest for Christ to be born in, both for innocence and humility, (and also with the faith so remarkable in her, Luke 1. 38.) is the only temper which can fit the Soul to be over-shadowed by the Spirit, and for Christ to be formed in it.

Of the Practical Doctrines from thence. From the birth of Christ. From the Manner of it.

S. What from the suffering under Pontius Pilate?

C. A Passive obedience even to death, without any kind of hostile resistance (though, as Christ was, so we should be never so well furnished with armies and legions) against the powers that are by God set over us.

From his suffering under Pilate.

S. What from the death of Christ?

C. First, That great doctrine of Mortification, Putting off the body of the sins of the flesh, Col. 2. 11. and destroying the body of sin, Rom. 6. 6. and putting our sinful habits to a contumelious death, or crucifying the flesh with the affections and lusts, most strictly required by God to our Salvation. And in this you may take in, if you please, a parallel through all the gradations that brought him to his death, that so we may, as the Apostle saith, be planted with him in the likeness of his death. For you see in the story, there was first a consultation held, then he was apprehended, examined, accused condemned, shamed, and crucified. Thus must we deal with our old man, our whole body of sin; first, deliberate and consult about the execution, and to that end chuse our sobereſt Senate-like seasons, when the heat and passions of youth and sin are over, and in the cool of the day, in the calmest temper of our souls, take this weighty business into our most serious consideration: then secondly, as soon as we have consulted, proceed to act, presently apprehend (stop in the career) every course or habit of sin: thirdly, examine it by the Word of God, the commands of Christ, in all the variations from and oppositions to them: fourthly, accuse, and therein aggravate it with all the heightning ning circumstances of guilt and danger: then fifthly, by a solemn full consent of all the faculties condemn this so dangerous a malefactor: then sixthly, spit upon it with all contempt and scorn: and at last give it up to be crucified, never to recover again to any vital actions. And all this, as for any one single habit of sin, so for the whole body, which contains all limbs and severals under it. Besides this, a second practice that Christ's death obliges us to, is, our voluntary chearful taking up of our Cross, and following him, really conforming our selves to the image of the crucified Saviour, and resolving, that if we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified with him. Thirdly, the putting our sinful habits like dead bodies out of the way, lest they offend or infect others, which will be answerable to the burial. Fourthly, the reality and continuance of our mortified state, (answerable to the adjuncts of Christ's crucifixion, death, burial, descent) not only once for all to repent and mortify, but to continue in the soul that death unto sin, sincere and unfeigned, till we in soul rise again to that other diviner life, never to die any more, i. e. never to relapse to our sinful habits, but to persevere in that mortified estate.

S. But before you part with these Articles concerning Christ's death, I must take lieve to put you in mind of one difficulty, which though it may seem to be a speculative difficulty, yet because the explicite belief (or faith it self) of those few things that are contained in this Creed may seem to be a Christians duty, and so a piece of necessary Christian practice, it may perhaps be my duty to enquire, and a culpable omission, if I neglect to ask instruction in it, now that I may hope to receive it from you; and that is, What is meant by [Christ's descending into Hell?]

Of Christ's descent into Hell.

C. Though it be a Christian's duty to believe every part and Article of this Creed delivered down to us by the Church from the Apostles, as a form or summary of sound doctrine, and either the first copy, or an extract (and transcript, as it were) of that tradition, or oral doctrine (That faith which was once delivered unto the Saints, Jude v. 3.) which the Apostles agreed on at the time of their parting from one another to preach the Gospel to all Nations; yet I conceive the agreeing on some one sence, wherein to interpret every Article of it, is not so absolutely necessary, but that some one of them (as this of Christ's descent) may be taken in a latitude, and either not determined to any one interpretation, or resolved to be capable of more; and so the words be received, the particular sence, one way or other, will be indifferent to them that sincerely follow that light which is offered to them: and therefore I conceive it is, that the Article of our Church sets it down in that large indefinite form, [We believe that Christ descended into Hell] adding no other words of binding interpretation to it.

S. But what is your opinion of the sence of that Article?

Two opinions.

C. Among divers others I shall pitch on two opinions, and either of them may be piously believed, having good grounds whereon each of them may be built: the one taken from the opinion and interpretation of many ancient and modern Worthies of the Church, That Christ in the space betwixt his death and resurrection went down locally into Hell, as that signifies the place of the damned, not to suffer there, (for all was finished upon the Cross) but to triumph over Satan in his own quarters, and openly to shew him the victory that by death Christ had gotten over him, over death it self, and over all the powers of darkness. This sence being sufficiently explicated, I shall not enlarge on. The second opinion I shall more at large shew you, and leave you to judge of the truth of it.

The first.

The second.

S. I shall patiently attend while you do so.

C. These words [[d] He descended into Hell] being affirmed of Christ in the Creed, but not found in words in the New Testament, will not necessarily signify any farther than either, first, the places of the New Testament (from whence the Compilers of the Creed may seem to have collected it) will import; or secondly, the use of the phrase among either profane or Scripture-writers will require; or thirdly, the Context, or Circumstances in the Creed will inforce. And all these will not necessarily extend its sence any farther than this, That for the space of three days he was, and truly continued to be, deprived of his natural life. For the first, the Scriptures from whence this Article seems to have been taken are not many, indeed but one, that in the Acts out of the Psalmist, [Thou shalt not leave my soul in Hell, nor suffer thy Holy One to see corruption,] (as for Ephes. 4. 9. He descended into the lower parts of the earth, it belongs clearly either to the Incarnation, or descent to the Mother's womb, which is expresst by that phrase, Psal. 139. 15. When I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth; or else possibly to the grave (called the Mother's womb also, Job 1. 21.) so styled Psal. 63. 9.) Now in that place the word which we render [Hell] may signifie the common state of the dead; the word [[e] Soul] the * living soul, or that faculty by which we live; and the [not leaving this in that] is the not suffering him so long to continue deprived of life, as that his body (as it follows) should see corruption, i. e. above the space of three days; which term, consisting of seventy two hours, is the space required for the Revolution of humours, after which Physicians observe, that the body that continues so long dead, naturally putrifies, which is implied by that speech concerning Lazarus, Joh. 11. 39. By this time he stinketh, [g] for he hath been dead four dayes: So that that place distinctly affirms, that he should not be deprived of his natural life above the space of three dayes, that death should no longer have dominion over him; (which if it be not the importance of that Prophecy in the Psalmist, I conceive it will be hard to find any convincing Prophecy concerning Christ's rising again the third day; (for that of Jonah related in the Gospel, and others which by the Fathers are applied to that purpose, Lev. 7. 17. and Gen. 22. 4. were but Types, not Prophecies) and yet it is said, Matth. 16. 21. That Jesus began to shew his Disciples, (which sure is more than to tell; [h] to shew, demonstrate out of Scripture) [i] that it behoveth him, i. e. that he must for the fulfilling of the Prophecies, rise the third day.) If this be not necessarily the meaning of those words in the Acts and the Psalm, yet I conceive no man can shew convincingly that any other is. Now secondly, for the use of the phrase among Writers of the [k] first sort, it is clear that the [l] word signifies not with them the place of the damned, (no not any peculiar place of happy souls neither) but the common state of the dead. I will give you in the Margent some instances, by which, when you are skilled in those Authors, you may be able to judge.

judge. [m] Many other places might be added, but the Writers which conduce moſt to the explaining of the New Teſtament are the Greek Tranſlators of the Old Teſtament, and therefore among them it will be more pertinent to enquire. Look on the 37. of Geneſis, verſe 35. We render it out of the Hebrew literally, [n] I will go down to the grave to my Son mourning, ſave only that the [o] word which we render [to the grave] cannot in that place be properly ſo rendred; becauſe Jacob believed that his ſon was torn in pieces with wild beaſts, and not buried: and therefore the addition of thoſe words [to my ſon] make it neceſſary to render it in that place thus, I will go mourning out of this life, I will live no longer, ſeeing my ſon is dead; and the [p] phraſe [I will go down to Hades] is meant exactly parallel to this in the Creed [* he went down to Hades] and may very well be thought the fitteſt to interpret it, being the neareſt to it of any in the Scripture. For as to the word which is rendred to go down, it ſignifies in the Original ſometimes to go up, Judges 15. 11. (where yet the Greek Tranſlators uſe the very word which in Greek is rendred to go down) ſometimes to go neither up nor down, as in that place of Geneſis it is clear, Jacob knowing Verſ. 33. that he was not buried, but devoured by wild beaſts. Now for the context in the Creed, compare it with the ſtory of Chriſt's death in the Goſpel, and you will ſee how well it will bear this ſence. To which purpoſe I muſt premiſe this one thing, that a man conſiſts of three parts, a Body, a living Soul, an immortal ſpirit. S. Paul divides [r] the whole man into thoſe three parts, 1 Theſ. 5. 23. and in the Creation of man there is mention of all theſe. The Body is called † the duſt of the earth, of which he was formed; [t] the Soul is called the * living Soul; the [s] Spirit is called the † breath of life, and in other places [r] breath and life. Of theſe three parts Chriſt as man conſiſted, and at his death all theſe three are ſeverally diſpoſed of. His Spirit (that immortal ſoul, which I conceive to be mentioned Luk. 2. 40.) he commended into the hands of his Father, Luke 23. 46. In reſpect of which he is ſaid to be [x] that day in Paradiſe, for ſure Paradiſe and God's hands are all one. His body, that was put in the Grave; and ſo all of him diſpoſed of but the [y] living ſoul, and in reſpect of that, ſaith the Creed, [b] He went into Hades: perhaps not into the place of Hell, as B. Bilſon, nor into Paradiſe, as Broughton, nor into the Grave, for that was ſaid before in the word Buried, (though [c] ſome would have the [d] Greek word which is ſo rendred, refer only to his embalming,) but he was three days deprived of his natural life, (which is properly his [e] living ſoul,) he continued really without exerciſe, or power of exerciſing his vital faculty, taſted that [f] common ſtate of the dead for us; but then, before he was putrefied, i. e. The third day, he roſe again from the dead, &c.

[m] Take this of Fornutus or Cornutus, in his Book called Θεολογία περὶ τῶν θεῶν φύσεως, p. 4. Ἅιδης with him goes for a God, and, ſaith he, is called (Πλάτων, ὅτι μυθόν ἐστιν, ὃ μὴ τελευτᾶον εἰς αὐτὸν, κατάγλαι, ἢ αὐτῷ τὸ κτῆμα γίνεται) Pluto, becauſe there is nothing but at laſt comes to him, and becomes his poſſeſſion: and again towards the end of his Book, Ἅιδης ὁ ἀνχόμενος τὰς ψυχὰς ἀπὸ τελευτᾶον, Hades is the laſt region of the air which receives Souls, and is called ἥυελος, ſaith he, and ἰυελεὺς, a good friend or Counſellor, becauſe it befriends men, διὰ τὸ παύειν ἀνθρώπους ποτὲ τῶν πόνων καὶ φροντίδων, in giving them ceſſation from labours and cares; which is the very thing that the Spirit affirms of the dead that dye in the Lord, They are bleſſed, for they reſt from their labours, Rev. 14. 13. So p. 10. (ὁπόταν ἀφανὴς οἰκῶν) he interprets by ἐν ἀσαφεῖ κεῖσθαι, to be no body knows where, according to the etymology of ᾅδης quaſi ἀειδὴς, an inviſible ſtate, (agreeable to which it is that in the ancient Rhetors, Severus Sophiſta, &c. it is called not Ἅιδης but Ἀΐδης ὕδωρ. ά, & γ'.) And again, ſhewing the original of that Fable, that Hades ſtole away Ceres Daughter, It is, ſaith he, διὰ τὸ ἡδύσμοτον εἶναι χεῖρον τινὰ τῶν σπερμάτων καὶ γῆς ἀφανισμὸν, where again Hades it ſeems ſignifies ἀφανισμὸς, which is uſed abſolutely for death, 2 Mac. 5. 12. and is the very deſcription of death that the Pſalmiſt uſeth, Pſal. 39. 13. Before I go hence, and be no more ſeen, and Heb. 8. 13. γηράσκον ἐγγὺς ἀφανισμοῦ, that which is old is near to vaniſhing or diſappearing: and ſo Heraclitus περὶ ἀπίστων κζ'. ſpeaking of the Helmet of Hades which makes men inviſible, he ſaith, it is τὸ τέλος, the end or death of every one, ὃς ὁ ἀπειλῶν τετελευτηκὼς ἀόρατος γίνεται, to which he that comes, i. e. he that is dead, becomes inviſible. And the Author of the Book of Wiſdom hath a like phraſe, Our ſpirit ſhall vaniſh as the ſoft Air; where ſpeaking in the perſon of the Atheiſt, who acknowledged not the immortality of the Soul, the word ſpirit is taken for ψυχὴ living ſoul. And Bar. 3. 11. καταβηναι εἰς ᾅδην is joyned with ἠφανίσθημεν. [n] καταβήσομαι πρὸς τὸν υἱόν μου πενθῶν εἰς ᾅδην. So Eſth. 13. 7. εἰς τὸ ᾅδιον καταβῆναι; ſignifies only to dye, Ver. 6. (to be killed) being ſpoken by an heathen King, which we are not ſure imagined any Hell. So clearly, Bar. 3. 19. (καταβῆναν εἰς ᾅδην) cannot be imagined to belong to Hell, but only to the vaniſhing tranſitory eſtate of men, who dye, and are ſucceeded by others: and 3 Mac. πλησίον ᾅδου, μᾶλλον δ' ἐπ' αὐτῷ βιβηκότες, [o] לשאלה [p] καταβήσομαι εἰς ᾅδην. [b] καταλύειν εἰς ᾅδην. [c] P. Ramus de Rel. [d] τάφον. [e] Ψυχὴ or נפש [f] To which purpoſe it will be obſervable what Heraclitus in Clem. Al. Str. l. 1. ſets down out of Sibylla an antient Poet, ſpeaking of Sibylla, and undertaking to ſhew how ſhe propheſied even after her death. For, ſaith he, Τὸ μὲν εἰς ἀέρα χωρῆσαν αὐτῆς, that part of her body which went into the air did propheſie, ἐν φήμαις καὶ κλήδοσι, by voices heard in the air, (for ſo φήμη is defined by Varinus, λόγος ἀκλατικὸς μέλλοντός τινος ἐξ αὐτομάτου ἀκουόμενος, & κλήδων μαντεῖα, or θεῖα φήμη, ſuch as was that voice which Plutarch mentions to have been heard by the Mariners, Πὰν μέγας τέθνηκε) The body, or that part which was changed into the earth, bringeth forth πόαν, herb or graſs, and the beaſts that fed exactly on that place, did, by their bowels or entrails, when they were killed, declare to men what was to come. Τὴν δὲ ψυχὴν αὐτῆς δὴ τὸ ἐν τῇ σελήνῃ φαινόμενον περίσωμον οἴεται, As for her ſoul, he conceived that to be that face that appears in the Moon, and that helped the Aſtrologers to divine alſo. Three parts you ſee of a woman, according to that ſo ancient Philoſophy. Of which three, by Death, one, ſaith he, was ſent to the Earth, another to Heaven, a third, εἰς ἀέρα χωρῆσαν, went into the Air; that third I conceive the ſame that the Atheiſt in the Book of wiſdom, Chap. 2. 3. affirms, that it ſhall vaniſh (at death) διαχυθήσεται, ſhall be diſſolved or powred abroad, ὡς χαυνὸς ἀὴρ, as the ſoft (or moiſt) Air, which is there πνεῦμα the breath or ſpirit, viz. that mortal ſpirit in the Atheiſt's Philoſophy, all one with the breath in the noſtrils, ver. 2. but much differing from the immortal ſpirit among Chriſtians. And that which (he thus ſaith) went into the Air, is it which in Chriſt is ſaid κατελθεῖν εἰς ᾅδην, to have gone (or deſcended, though not locally yet from a ſuperiour to an inferiour ſtate) to Hades that ſtate of ſeparation of ſoul from body, which doth not by any neceſſity imply or import the place of the damned in Hell. So in Nicodemus his Goſpel there is mention of the Saints that are in Ἅιδης, and rejoyce there.

Thus Apoc. 6. 8. after the mention of [g] death, is added in our Tranſlation, [h] [and Hell] (but it ſignifies this ſtate of ſeparation, or inviſible ſtate, or continuance in death) was a [i] follower of it, and a [k] companion with it. And that it refers not to that which we call [Hell] (much leſs to Paradiſe) but only to that temporal ſeparation of ſoul and body, may farther appear by the effects there mentioned of it, [There was given them power to kill, &c. with the ſword, with famine, and with death, and with the beaſts of the earth.] And ſo Chap. 20. 14. [l] Death and Hades are caſt into the lake of fire; and Verſe 13. gave up thoſe that were in it. So Eccluſ. 48. 5. He that raiſeth the dead * from death and from Hades, ſure raiſes not out of Hell; and in the Song of the three Children, verſe 65. God's delivering them from Hades will not be extended to Hell, but only to death, as follows in the next words. And ſure Eleazar, that deſires his friend † to bring him on his way to Hades, 2 Maccab. 6. 23. doth not deſire to be diſpatcht to Hell. And that the Antient Writers of the Church (ſome of them at leaſt, of the moſt Antient) meant no other than this by the Article of Chriſt's deſcent ° to Hades, may be gheſt by two antient Paſſages, the one in * Thaddeus Creed, affirmed to be given by him unto the King of Edeſſa; the other in the Primitive Martyr † Ignatius; both agreeing in this, that Chriſt aſcended with many, but deſcended alone: where though the deſcent were (in their words) to Hades, yet Hades cannot there be thought to ſignify the place of the damned, unleſs Chriſt ſhall be conceived to have returned from thence also with a great multitude; which though it were perhaps agreeable with some mens [r] fancies, yet cannot easily be resolved to be the meaning of those Antient Writers, or of that Text to which they refer, That the bodies of many that had slept arose, &c. For I conceive out of * Hell there was not in their opinion any such possibility of rising.

[r] As of those that teach that Christ going to Hell, was met and believed on by the Heathen Philosophers there, and particularly by Plato in the front; and brought them out along with him.

* Some Books there are called the Sibylline Oracles, in all probability written by some Christian, and that an antient one, (about the Emperour Commodus his time, it is by many circumstances most probable.) In the first Book of these, after the Creation and Fall of man, there is mention of his death and mortal state, and (upon occasion of this close, πᾶν δ' ἔθ ὑπεδέξατο ᾅδης, Hades received them all) this account is given of the word Ἅιδης, Ἅιδην δ' ἄυτε κάλεσσαν, ἐπὶ πρῶτον μόλεν Ἅιδαν, Τευσάμενοι θανάτου, γαῖα δέ μιν ἀμφεκάλυψε.

Τοὔνεκα δὴ πάντες οἱ ὀπιχθόνιοι γεγαῶτες
Ἀνέρες εἰν Ἀΐδαο δόμοις εἶναι καλέονται.

Where it is clear what is meant by that word [Ἅιδης] The common state of the dead, when their bodies are laid in the grave, the condition not only of the wicked, nor only of the godly, but of the πάντες ὀπιχθόνιοι ἄνθρες, all mortal men, who, as follows there,

——Εἰν Ἀΐδαο μολοῦντες Τιμὴν ἴσχηκαν,

When they were gone to Hades, were honoured by us: whereas the Giants had their ταρτάρειον δόμον γαιηνὸν, which is Hell indeed, there being no so proper notion of Hell in the Old Testament, as the place of the Rephaim or Giants, Prov. 21. 16. and 9. 18. and 2. 18. in the Hebrew and Greek reading. So in Philmon, Καὶ γὰρ καθ' ᾅδου δύο τείχεις νομίζομεν, Μιὰν δικαίων, χωρίον ἀσεβῶν ἑτέραν.

* In inferno, promptuaria animarum matrici assimilata sunt.

So in the second book of Esdras, Chap. 4. 41. * In the grave, the chambers of souls are like the womb of a woman: where though we render [in the grave] yet without question the Greek was ἐν Ἅιδῃ in Hades; and so Hades is that state of souls in the separation, wherein we conceived there were divers Cells, which all desired to return (and pour back) the souls which were in them to the bodies again, as a woman when she comes to time of Child-birth, desires to bring forth. I have now wearied you sufficiently with an account of this second interpretation and the grounds of it; and I shall add but this, That as it may piously be believed, that Christ did in the space of those three days locally descend, to shew himself triumphantly to the Devils: so they that on the premised grounds resolve it possible, that there may be no more concluded from this Article, but only that Christ being crucified, dead, and buried, continued in the state of the dead, his soul really separated from the body for some space, but not so long till his body should putrefy in the grave, (to which it follows aptly, That the third day he rose again, or was restored from that state) may be pious believers also, and offend nothing against the Creeds or Doctrine of our (or of the Antient) Church, so they do not condemn those others that are contrary-minded. I meant not to have insisted on any such speculative difficulty, yet upon your demand I have given you an account of it.

S. I acknowledge it somewhat distant from your designed method, yet conceive my self to have profited by it, if in nothing else, yet in knowing my duty to my self and others in matters of this nature, which may piously be believed on either side. The Lord grant me the spirit of Meekness and Charity in all things. You will now proceed to that which follows after the Articles of Christ's death, to wit, that of his Resurrection.

The practical belief of Christ's Resurrection.

C. The Practical Belief of Christ's Resurrection is, 1. Our actual rising to new life, as necessary as that of Mortification premised. 2. Our appearing (as he did) to men, and walking exemplarily before them in all heavenly living. 3. Our continuing in a sanctified state of Perseverance, (noted, as I conceive, Rom. 6. 8. by [we shall live with him,] i. e. live this new life, if we do not treacherously ruine our selves again) as Christ did, who being raised from the dead, died no more, death had no more dominion over him, Ver. 9. till by God's mercy we be taken up to bliss. 4. Our depending upon Christ for our Justification, which as well as our Sanctification is an effect of his rising, Col. 3. 3. Rom. 4. 25. and 8. 33, 34. 5. Our hastening this Resurrection, (parallel to Christ's rising the third day) not so wholly immersing our selves with sorrow and humiliation (that grave, as it were, of the mortified soul) as to hinder action and vital performances, but by the power of that Spirit that raised Jesus from the grave, immediately to rise to new life.

S. What is the practical belief of his Ascension?

Of his Ascension.

C. Ascending after, and dwelling with him in divine Meditation, being heavenly-minded, seeking and minding, and savouring of those things that are above, the duty of all those that are risen with Christ, Col. 3. 1.

S. What of his sitting at the right hand of God, the Father Almighty?

Of his sitting at the right hand of God.

C. That phrase of sitting, &c. signifies Christ's reigning, his having all Power given to him: you may see it by comparing Psalm 110. 1. with 1 Cor. 15. 25. In one place it is, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool; in the other, He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. This you have formerly learned to be an union of his Regal and Priestly Office; his giving Commands to his Church, and his interceding with God for his Church, and that so powerfully, as actually to bestow that Grace, that Pardon which he intercedes for. And this is farther noted by those titles there repeated of [God the Father Almighty] that Intercession of his to God being as to a Father (both of him and us) who will, and to a Father Almighty, who is able to grant whatsoever he prays for. And then the practical Belief of this Article will be, First, to give my self up obediently to be ruled by him (in all his Institutions and Commands) and by all those that he hath set in the Church under him to rule over me. Secondly, to depend on his Intercession, to offer up all our Prayers to God in and through him. Thirdly, to receive (and make the holiest use and advantages of) all Grace that shall flow from him. And fourthly, when he is so ready at hand to our Relief, to resolve to look to him in all temptations, and count it our wretchless abuse of his goodness, if we do not persevere in despight of all assaults to the contrary.

Of his coming to judge.

S. What of his Coming from that right hand in Heaven, to judge both the quick and the dead?

C. Our

C. Our conſtant making up our accounts againſt his Coming, as daily expecting a righteous, though a gracious, Judge to ſit upon us, according to thoſe many titles we have of him in holy Writ: as Iſa. 33. 22. The Lord, i. e. Chriſt, (as appears Ver. 17, 18.) is our Judge, our Law-giver, our King, and then our Saviour; 2 Theſ. 1. 8. The Lord Jeſus taking vengeance in flaming fire; ſo the wrath of the Lamb, Apoc. 6. 16. and the ſearcher of the reins and heart (the expreſſion of a Judge) Apoc. 2. 23. A notion which of all others will bring us to a pious awe of him, as of one which will not ſuffer any one ſin to be carried along under the diſguiſe of Religion, or on confidence of his favour; but (againſt all provokers) ſhall come from his Throne (though it be of mercy) in Heaven, to judge us here: one that is not to be moved with paſſions, with bribes, with flatteries, to puniſh or reward according to any other method or rule, but only that of [Every man according to his works.]

S. Will you now proceed to thoſe other Articles, and firſt, that of the Holy Ghoſt?

Sect. III. Of the Holy Ghoſt.

C. The word Ghoſt ſignifies Spirit; which being, by way of Excellence, a title of God's, (God is a Spirit) and ſo here attributed to him, and denoting the Third Perſon in the Trinity, (which is alſo the Fountain and Spring of all Spiritual life in us) is here called Holy: not ſo principally, becauſe he is holy in himſelf, i. e. pure without all mixture or compoſition, either of ſin, or corruption, or pollution, or hypocriſy, or partiality, (and all this in a moſt eminent degree, nothing in the world being thus beſide;) but more punctually, becauſe he is the Author of all Holineſs and Purity in us; that little weak degree of Sanctity that the moſt regenerate among us do attain to, being a Ray and Effuſion of that ſanctifying Spirit, which worketh in us by his preventing, ſanctifying and aſſiſting grace, both to will and to do of his good pleaſure. This the Holy Ghoſt doth by two ways of diſpenſation, 1. Outward, 2. Inward. The outward way was his viſible deſcending upon the Apoſtles, and fitting them with Graces, and inſtating them with Powers to plant and preſerve and govern the Church of Chriſt over the World.

His way of ſanctifying. The outward.

S. What were thoſe Powers?

C. 1. To Preach, and Baptize thoſe that received their Doctrine, and ſo to plant a Chriſtian Church. 2. To confirm thoſe whom they had baptized, and to adminiſter the Sacrament of Chriſt's Body and Blood, and ſo to preſerve or eſtabliſh thoſe whom they had planted. 3. To exerciſe the Power of the Keyes in Cenſures, puniſhing the pertinacious, caſting them out of the Church, that they may be aſhamed, and ſo think fit to reform their wicked lives; and upon approbation of their Repentance and Reformation, abſolving, and receiving them into the Church again; and all this to govern thoſe whom they had planted and confirmed in the Faith. And 4. to ordain others, and commit the ſame power to thoſe which the Holy Ghoſt had ſetled in themſelves, and ſo to provide a Miniſtery of his holy celeſtial Calling, (ſent by Chriſt, as he was by his Father, John 20. 21.) to continue by Succeſſion from one to the other, to the end of the world. All which donations and inſtatings were the acts of the Holy Ghoſt's deſcent, (beſide the extraordinary gifts of Tongues and Miracles, &c. needful for thoſe firſt times, to preach to all Nations intelligibly, and to gain Belief to their Preaching, but not ſo neceſſary after:) and in reſpect of theſe he is ſtyled the Paraclete, which is a word of a larger ſignificancy than any one Engliſh word can expreſs, and therefore is thought fit not to be tranſlated, but retained in other Languages, Syriack and Latine, and will beſt be rendred by theſe three ſeverals, (according to the notation of that word in Greek,) firſt, Advocate, ſecondly, Comforter yea, and thirdly, Exhorter too.

The powers inſtated on the Apoſtles.

S. What do you mean by the Holy Ghoſt being an Advocate?

C. Two things: he came to be an Advocate both of Chriſt, and of us: Of Chriſt, in pleading his cauſe againſt the incredulous World, which is ſet down John 16. 8. and expreſt by a three-fold Conviction (it being the Advocate's part to [a] convince and confute, ſhame and ſilence the adverſary, Tit. 1. 9.) 1. of Sin. 2. of Righteouſneſs, 3. of Judgment.

His office of Advocate to Chriſt.

S. What is the meaning of thoſe three Convictions?

The three Convictions.

C. Among the Jews there were three ſorts of Cauſes or Actions: Firſt, * In criminal matters, which here word for word is rendred [[c] of Sin.] Secondly, for the defending and vindicating of the Juſt and Innocent, called in † Hebrew by a phraſe which is again literally rendred [of [e] Righteouſneſs.] Thirdly, for the condemning of the wicked, which is as literally that which we there read [of * Judgment] Now theſe three Actions the Holy Ghoſt was to manage on Chriſt's behalf, as an Advocate for a Client, againſt the incredulous gain-ſaying world. Firſt, he ſhould convince the world of that great crime committed in not believing, but rejecting of Chriſt, and that by legal evidence of that Law, Deut. 18. 22. (which was on purpoſe to diſcriminate the true Meſſias from all falſe pretenders, Ver. 18.) where it is reſolved, That if the Prophecies of a Prophet come not to paſs, then he is a falſe Prophet; but if they do, he is a true one. And therefore the very coming of the Spirit, after the Aſcenſion of Chriſt, being the thing propheſied by Chriſt in this place, (and ſo his prophecy fulfilled) ſhall be a legal proof of this crime of theirs, in not receiving Chriſt thus teſtified and demonſtrated to be a true Prophet; which ſure was the reaſon why it was not (as Chriſt ſaith) ſo dangerous or irremiſſible to oppoſe Chriſt at his preſence on the Earth, as it would be to blaſpheme or oppoſe the Holy Ghoſt, Matth. 12. 31. Secondly, he ſhould convince the world that Chriſt was a moſt righteous perſon, and moſt unjuſtly crucified, (and ſo vindicate and defend his innocent Client) by his aſſumption to Heaven, and participation of his Fathers glory, (which aſſumption of his is expreſt by that phraſe [* you ſee me no more] both here and elſewhere, becauſe at his Aſcenſion it is ſaid, A cloud received him out of their ſight, Acts 1. 9.) which was a certain argument of his Righteouſneſs, or Innocence. Under which alſo may be contained that imputed righteouſneſs of his to us by way of ſatisfaction, together with thoſe imperfect beginnings of Sanctification wrought in our hearts by the Power of his Reſurrection, and a moſt proper effect of his Aſcenſion, Interceſſion, and exerciſe of his Kingly power in Heaven. Thirdly, he ſhould uſe a third argument to convince the world, to wit, that taken from the judging, condemning, ſentencing, and executing his adverſary, even the Prince of this world, the Devil, who being the firſt contriver of Chriſts death, is now repayed in his kind by way of retaliation, in a manner deſtroyed and ſlain, turned out of his Kingdom, (which is a kind of civil death to him, and so called by the [h] voice in Plutarch) by the silencing of his Oracles, turning out of Idolatry and Heathenish vices, which before without controll had reigned in the world. To which it was also consequent, that all Satans instruments should pay very dear for their infidel rebellious actions, in like manner as Satan himself was used for his riotous behaviour against our Christ.

S. You have shewed me how he was Christ's Advocate, you said also that he was ours: how is he so?

To us.

C. In setting a Ministery to pray and intercede for their several Congregations, (and enabling them in the very Apostles time to form a Liturgy (of which several passages remain unto us at this day) to continue in the Church to that end) and thereby helping our infirmities, and teaching us to pray as we ought.

S. How is he a Comforter?

His Office of Comforter.

C. In divulging that excellent comfortable news of the Gospel, the Promises of pardon and Grace to them that want comfort.

Exhorter.

S. How is he an Exhorter?

C. In the doctrine of Repentance, and of flying from the wrath to come, and walking worthy of that great calling. And in the exercise of all these Titles and Offices (as by a first external means) the Holy Ghost is said to work all manner of Sanctity in our hearts. Besides this, there is an inward means, the secret preventions, excitations, over-shadowings, and assistances of that Spirit, all absolutely necessary to beget and continue Holiness in the heart; and all these attending those outward Administrations (just now mentioned) and constantly going along with them (as breath goes along with words) and hallowing them to the worthy receiver, the obedient Disciple.

Belief in the Holy Ghost.

S. What is it now to believe in this Holy Ghost?

C. 1. To acknowledge the truth of all this, That it is (as from the Word of God it might more particularly appear) as here hath been explained. 2. To accommodate our practice accordingly, to conform it to this Faith. As first, to submit to those Spiritual Pastors, &c. whom the Holy Ghost hath set over us, and for them again to be careful of that flock of which the Holy Ghost hath made them Overseers. Secondly, not to intrude upon or usurp that holy calling without a lawful vocation, and such as may justify it self to be from Heaven. Thirdly, to obey all those several Powers, to come in to the Preaching of the Word, to fit my self for the Sacrament of Initiation, and bring others to it; so again, for Confirmation, and the Sacrament of Christs Body, to examine and shrive our selves, and so eat of that Bread, &c. to fear the Censures, and (if we are under them) by confession, contrition, works of mercy, and all kind of reformation to labour for absolution. And in all these, fourthly, humbly to invoke God's special grace, that it may go along with these outward Ordinances, and to watch and observe, and receive it in the use of them, and lay it up in an honest heart, and bring forth fruit with patience, and neither to resist, repel, nor grieve, nor quench that holy Spirit of God, whereby we are sealed (if we do not betray our selves) unto the day of redemption.

Sect. IV. Of the Holy Catholick Church.

S. What is the meaning of the Holy Catholick Church?

Catholick.

C. The word Catholick signifies Universal, dispersed or extended all the world over; in opposition to the former state of the Jewish Church, which was an incloſure divided from all the world beside, in time of the Law; whereas now the Gospel is preached to all the world, and (by those powers of the Holy Ghost forementioned) a Church with all those ministrations in it is constituted over all the world. This Church is a society of Believers, ruled and continued according to those Ordinances, with the use of the Sacraments, Preaching of the Word, Censures, &c. under Bishops or Pastors, succeeding those on whom the Holy Ghost came down, and (by receiving Ordination of those that had that power before them, i. e. of the Bishops of the Church, the continued Successors of the Apostles) lawfully called to those offices. And in respect, first, of these holy powers and offices; and secondly, of the Holy Ghost, the Author and Founder of them; thirdly, of the sanctity of life that ought to be in these, and all Christian Professors; and fourthly, of the end, the begetting and encrease of holiness, to which the very constituting of a Church was designed; in these four respects, I say, it is that this Catholick Church is called holy.

Holy.

Believing the Holy Catholick Church.

S. What is it to Believe the Holy Catholick Church?

C. To acknowledge that all the world over, by the Ministry of the Apostles such a Church was gathered, and by the Holy Ghost endued with those foresaid powers, (and so shall in some measure continue unto the end of the world; the gates of Hell, i. e. the most fatal dangers, destruction and death it self, being not able to prevail against it) within which whosoever lives and dies (a faithful obedient son of it) shall be eternally rewarded by the great Husband of his Church, our Saviour in Heaven.

The Practical part of it.

S. What is the practical part of this belief?

C. The living peaceably, charitably, faithfully and obediently within this fold of the universal Church, yielding all reverence to the decrees and doctrines of it, and in every particular or national Church obeying them that have the rule over us, labouring to preserve both unity of faith and charity with all our fellow-brethren, both in that and all other particular Churches; and not breaking into factions, parties, divisions, subdivisions, but labouring our utmost to approve our selves holy members of that Holy Catholick Church, by unity, charity, brotherly love, ensuing and contending for peace, and all other branches of Christian purity.

† Of the Communion of Saints.

S. Now follows the Communion of Saints; what do you mean by that?

* κοινωνεῖν. † τῆς φθονήσει κοινωνοῦντι καὶ δόντι; Lucian. Ὄνος. Καν. p. 774. Εὐποιεῖν καὶ κοινωνεῖν, Heb. 13. 16.

† C. I conceive that the word rendred Communion, doth most properly and usually signify Communication, (in that sence as to * communicate signifies to † give, to impart or distribute to others, to make others partakers of any spiritual or corporal gift,) beneficence and liberality: and that either to the bodily indigencies of the poor Saints, as many times in the the † New Testament the word signifies; or else by any other way of charity and mercy, which you know is then greatest when it is exprest to mens souls, by advice, counsel, reprehension, spiritual conference betwixt man and man, and in any kind of effusion of grace from God to us. Thus in S. Paul's solemn form of benediction, after the mention of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, (i. e. his bounty and goodness) and the love of God, (i. e. the same again in another word) is added, * the Communication of the Holy Ghost, (i. e. the liberal distribution of all those gifts which flow from him, the Conduit of all grace) be with you all evermore.

† So κοινωνίαν ποιήσασθαι. Rom 15. 26. To make a contribution or gathering for the poor; τινὶ χάριν, καὶ τινὶ κοινωνίαν διαχαρίτος † εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους, Charity and liberality of administring towards the Saints, 2 Cor. 8. 4. ἁπλότης † κοινωνίας, liberal distribution, 2 Cor. 9. 13. κοινωνία εἰς εὐαγγέλιον, liberality toward the Gospel, i. e. toward the Ministers and propagation of it, Phil. 1. 5. κοινωνία † πίστεως, Philem. 6. liberality to the poor Saints, proceeding from his faith, expreſt, ver. 5, by love and faith to the Lord Jesus, and toward all Saints; faith to the Lord Jesus, and love or charity toward all Saints, by which their bowels were refreshed, ver. 7. συμμέτοχοι, κοινωνικοί, 1 Tim. 6. 18. * κοινωνία πνεύματος ἁγίου.

S. But how do you apply this notion of the word to the matter in hand, I mean to the interpreting of this Article of the Creed?

C. Thus, that it shall contain in it two things especially, according to the two kinds of liberality mentioned, corporal and spiritual. For the first, we find in many passages of the Acts, that at the first Preaching of the Apostles, many came in and believed, and they that did so, sold their goods and possessions, and distributed them to all, as every one had need, Acts 2. 45. and had all things common, vers. 44. and [a] exertised liberality (or charity) toward all the people, vers. 47. And this is called by this very word which we render [b] Communion, but signifies Communication, vers. 42. And then the most literal importance of the phrase, [[c] Communication of Saints, or of the Saints] will be this matter of fact, set down in that Apostolical story, viz. the general practice of all believers in the first age of Christianity, to live together in that most liberal, charitable manner, every man communicating what he had to the others wants, and to that purpose, bringing the price of their estates, and laying it at the Apostles feet, and making them the stewards of their liberality. This was so eminent an act of Christian charity, so lively a character of Primitive Saints, so immediately and remarkably consequent to the Preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, that it may well deserve to be put into our [d] Creed, next after the Article of the Holy Ghost, and as a branch of that of the Holy Catholick Church, meaning that of the Apostles age; and accordingly the Nicene Creed joineth them both in one, the Holy Catholick and Apostolick Church: and then you will presently know what it is to believe this Article, viz. to assent to that relation of Scripture, and from those examples to learn that most excellent Christian grace of Charity and liberality to all the fellow-members of our Christ, and at least to retain some considerable degree of it in the actions of our future lives, remembring that it is the part of the faith of Christ to loosen the misers hand, to enlarge his heart, to melt him into that soft temper, and incline him to make others partakers of that plenty which he hath received from God, to practise that bounty toward all, which we see so hugely exemplified by Christ to mankind.

Two parts of it. Liberality.

[b] κοινωνία.
[c] κοινωνία τῶν ἁγίων.

[d] This interpretation I now see to have been accepted by the learned Hugo Grotius on 2 Cor. 8. 14. Where speaking of the rich mens liberality, Quâ sustentabantur pauperiores, he saith, spectat & hue ea, quam in symbolo profitemur, sanctorum communio, The Communion of Saints in the Creed belongs to this matter. I only wonder why having fain upon this notion, he did not in those Notes apply it to Acts 2. 42. (where the very word κοινωνία in this sence is observable;) and am by that, and some other κεστήεια in those Annot. of his on the Acts and Epistles, inclined to conjecture, That that Volume had not received his last care and survey before his death.

S. What else is contained in this Article?

C. I told you there was another kind of charity and communicativeness, the spiritual expressions of love, which have been, are, and ought still to be among all holy men, all Saints, all Christians. And this is of many sorts, but may briefly be contained in this, The performing all Christian offices of love one to another: first, praying with and for one another, (and he that separates himself from other Christians, and hath not charity enough to pray with them, or that is so proud or malicious, that he will not pray for all men, especially all Christians, when Christ did pray for his very crucifiers, is far enough from this charity;) secondly, praising God with and for one another, a duty continued mutually betwixt us and the very glorified Saints in Heaven, so far as is most commodious to the condition of each, the Saints in rest and joy daily praying for their younger brethren, the Church and the Saints in the camp on Earth praising God for those revelations of his grace and glory to their elder brethren in Heaven. And the very believing this, as a duty that Christianity hath made us to be so much concerned in, will have a full influence on our practice. I need not insist to shew you how.

Spiritual expressions of love.

S. What is the meaning of the Article [Remission of sins?] The words I understand, and conceive them to signifie God's pardon of all trespasses committed against him, the same which you interpreted to me in the Lord's Prayer; but what is to be my meaning when I say, I believe it? Is every man bound to believe that his sins are pardoned?

Of Remission of sins.

C. That the sins of any particular man are actually pardoned to him is not the meaning of this Article, there being no revelation of God's in Scripture (which alone can be the Object of Faith) concerning the state of any particular person, any further than, from the general Promises of pardon to all true Penitents, he shall (upon examination of himself, and finding that he is of that number) be able to pronounce unto himself; or than another, a Minister especially, whose office it is, having a clear view of his Conscience, can pronounce unto him: neither of which being infallible in their pronouncings, it cannot yet be matter of Faith to him. That which is the Article of Faith here, is, That by the death and sufferings of Christ there is pardon and remission to be had for sinners, (which all the legal performances could not help any man to, those being only a remembrance, or [e] commemoration of sins, Heb. 10. 3. no means of power or efficacy to work remission) that the having forfeited our perfect unsinning innocence in Paradise, shall not (on condition we return to God sincerely) be able to exclude us from God's favour and grace here, nor from Heaven hereafter. This Article is so near of kin to the doctrine of the second Covenant, set down in the first part of our conference, that I shall need only to refer you to that place, and not to enlarge any farther on it.

What belief of it is required.

S. But

S. But what is the practical belief of this Article?

The practical belief of it.

C. 1. To ſet our ſelves ſincerely to the performance of that condition, on which the remiſſion of ſins in the Goſpel is promiſed and purchaſed for us. 2. To continue in full aſſurance of hope toward God, that if we perform our part, God in Chriſt will never fail in his. 3. To pray to God in Chriſt daily for his mercy. 4. To continue in the moſt melting ſtate of Humility and Meekneſs, as remembring that all our good that we do, or can attain to in this life or another (Sanctification, or Glorification) is utterly unimputable to us, or any thing in us, and wholly to be acknowledged the purchaſe of Chriſt, who alone hath delivered us from the puniſhment of our ſins, both as that is a deprivation of the viſion of God hereafter, and of his grace here; all the ſtrength that any Chriſtian hath to reſiſt any ſin, being a conſequent of this remiſſion of ſins, i. e. of God's being reconciled unto us in Chriſt, not imputing our treſpaſſes.

S. I ſhall now invite you on to the next Article, The Reſurrection of the body: What is the thing profeſt to be believed in that Article?

Of the Reſurrection of the Body.

C. The certainly future reſtauration or riſing again of this very ſame fleſh of ours out of the grave, which by the curſe of God inflicted on ſin doth go down thither. The puniſhment on all mankind upon Adam's fall, was [Duſt thou art, and to duſt thou ſhalt return] mortality, or a decree for all men once to die. This being an heavy puniſhment indeed, if it had not been allayed or removed by Chriſt, is now by him extremely ſoftned, that though it do ſtill conſtantly befal the univerſality of men, (Death paſſing on all, in that all have ſinned) yet all the bitter noxious part of death ſhall be taken away, as far as concerns the faithful ſervants of Chriſt, the ſting of death being by him pluck'd out, and ſo the Grave turn'd into a Dormitory or retiring-room, a place where the bodies reſt in a ſound ſleep, till they be awakened unto bliſs.

S. But how will it be poſſible for dead bodies (mouldred to aſhes, and then blown over the face of the earth, or devoured by wild beaſts, and thoſe again devoured by worms, or by other men) to riſe again, or return to their former eſtate.

The poſſibility of it.

C. That power that raiſed Jeſus from the dead, will alſo quicken our dead bodies, the laſt trump will call all men out of the duſt, and God, that made all out of nothing, can ſurely reſtore our bodies again to us, however tranſmuted: and that he will do ſo, you have both the plain affirmations of the Scripture, (Chriſt is the firſt-fruits of them that ſleep, and then all the heap muſt one day follow; the head being riſen, the body cannot remain long behind; and at large you have it aſſerted, 1 Cor. 15.) and the judgment of reaſon it ſelf, though not telling us how, yet making it reaſonable to believe that it will be ſo, becauſe otherwiſe our bodies, which are both the inſtruments and copartners of all ſin and all righteous actions and ſufferings, will be left unpuniſhed and unrewarded.

S. What is the Practical belief of this Article?

The practical belief of it.

C. The keeping our bodies in a riſing condition: neither by uncleanneſs, nor drunkenneſs, nor worldly-mindedneſs, nor ſloth, nailing our ſelves to the earth, or mire, or dung-hill; but in Purity, and Sobriety, and Heavenly-mindedneſs, and Induſtry, fitting our bodies for that heavenly, divine condition, to which after the Grave we expect to be advanced. Secondly, the praying to God for this perfection of bliſs, not only to our ſelves, but alſo to thoſe who in ſoul are already entred into God's reſt, that their bodies being joined to their ſouls, they may continually dwell together (like Brethren in unity) that good and joyful life.

S. But what kind of bodies ſhall thoſe be after they be raiſed?

The quality of the bodies raiſed.

C. Spiritual bodies (1 Cor. 15. 44. Firſt, in reſpect of the qualities, ſpiritualized into a high Agility, Rarity, Clarity, and ſuch as will render them moſt commodious habitations for the ſoul, made partaker of that divine viſion. Secondly, in reſpect of the principle of life and motion, which in natural bodies is ſome natural principle; but in theſe is the Spirit of God which ſhall ſuſtain them without eating or drinking, &c.

S. What is the practical belief of this?

The practical belief of that.

C. 1. Endeavouring toward theſe Excellencies here, mortifying and ſubduing the carnal principle, and making it as tame and tractable as may be, and altogether complying with the Spirit. Secondly, raiſing up our ſouls, i. e. labouring that they be, and continue in a regenerate ſtate, and not burying them in that worſt kind of grave, the carnal affections and luſts, which is the moſt dangerous death imaginable.

S. You are now come to the laſt Article, The life everlaſting: What will you afford me to that ſubject?

Of the Life everlaſting.

C. Only this, that the life which we lead here is a finite, ſhort, feeble life, for ſome ſeventy years, if neither enemy, nor diſeaſe, nor diſtemper caſt down this brittle building ſooner; but the life that follows that Reſurrection of the Body is an infinite, everlaſting, endleſs ſtate, in endleſs joys to every true penitent believer, but in endleſs wo to every contumacious provoker.

S. What is the practical belief of this?

The practical belief of it.

C. To weigh and ponder theſe two ſo diſtant ſtates together, and never to think fit to forfeit that eternal bliſs, and incur that eternal wo, for any tranſitory joy, or honour, or gain, or eaſe, or relief from the Croſs, (the companion of the godly in this life) for thoſe few minutes that are allowed us here. Secondly, to uſe and improve that moment here ſo as it may be a foundation of eternity.

S. Before you leave the Article of Everlaſting life, (which I ſee belongs to an eternity of bliſs on one ſide, and of woes on the other) I beſeech you ſatisfy me in one difficulty, which is ready to ſhake my faith, and it is this, How it can agree with God's juſtice and goodneſs, with any kind of equity in him, that the ſins and pleaſures of a few years of ours, that brings us in ſo poor a preſent income of delights and joys, ſhould be paid for ſo dear, with endleſs woes; there being no proportion indeed betwixt this ſo finite and that infinite. Some anſwers I have heard given to this doubt: as firſt, That our ſins are againſt an infinite Deity; and ſecondly, That if we ſhould live infinitely, we would ſin infinitely. But me-thinks theſe are but niceties, which ſatisfie not at all: I believe, I could by ordinary reaſon, and the grounds which you have given me, ſhew you how.

C. You

C. You shall not need, for I shall render you another account of your scruple; and first, tell you that the right understanding of it will prove a piece of Divinity, which as it is a foundation of all good practice, so may chance to stand you in stead for all your future consultations concerning your soul. The true ground of it.

S. What then is the ground of this judgment of God?

C. The choice and option that God hath given all men in his word, either to return and live, or to go on and perish everlastingly: The two kinds of Retributions, two Eternities, which are put into our hands by God, (by way of Covenant) to have our parts in one of them, which soever we shall chuse; the compact being so made between God and us, that they which are offered one, if they will not accept of those terms on which that is offered, do, for that despising, by the tenure of the same Covenant, fall into the other. Indignation and anger and wrath to them that work evil, that go on unreformed in any such course; but to them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, eternal life, Rom. 2. 7. Had there been nothing but Happiness created, and all men decreed to that blissful state, Heaven had been our fate, but not our Crown, our destiny, but not our reward; and a rational man would perhaps have been a disputing, why man should be so eternally happy, why such a short weak practice of Piety should be so hugely and so everlastingly rewarded: And so on the other side, if Hell had opened her mouth wide, and enclosed all, had all men absolutely been decreed to those fatal chains, a rational man would have been ready to tell you, That this [f] were to make men innocent, but to lay blame enough on God: and so there had been little of reason on either side. But God that hath made us rational men, hath provided rational rewards for us, a rational Tribunal and Judicature, a rational bliss and wo; not only every man repaid according to his works, (adjudged to Hell by a righteous Judge, and to Heaven by a righteous Judge also) but even allowed satisfaction to all his scruples; if he come not to bliss, he shall see it is his own wretchless contempt which hath kept him from it. Behold, (saith he by Moses) I set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; eternity of joys in the hand of an easy obedience, a * gracious blessed yoke, (which he that takes upon him cheerfully shall find rest to his soul, live the most admirable joyous life of felicities here, and pass from a Paradise to a Throne) and eternity of miseries to him that will fall in love with them, and to no man else. For God made not death, at least made it not for man, (Paradise was created for him) the everlasting fire was prepared for the Devil and his Angels: but ungodly men with their words and works called it to them, Wisd. 1. 16. committed a kind of riot upon Hell, invaded Lucifer's peculiar, and, if you mark, strive more vehemently for their portion in that Lake of Brimstone, endure more temporal hardship in their passage thither, than any Martyr in his fiery chariot of ascent toward Heaven. And then, I hope, you would, if you were an Atheist, confess, That he that takes such pains for it, is worthy [h] to take his portion with it, to have that pay which he hath merited so dearly. The Choice given us by God to live or perish.

S. I acknowledge my scruple satisfied, and my self obliged (if it be but for the honour and awe I owe to my own soul, if but to save my reputation in the world, that I be not such an abject stupid fool) to retract my choice, to call back the hostages I have given to Satan, those pledges of my soul (whatever faculty hath at any time been sent out to him, in design or hope to bring me in some slight joy) and for the future to set out a more rational, more justifiable voyage.

C. The Lord confirm and prosper you in that resolution, and bring all other imprudent men timely into the same thoughts.

S. But may there not be place for some farther doubt and question in this matter? especially this which I shall now propound to you: How can it be truly said, That the eternity of the sinner's punishment is founded on the choice and option given him by God, when man, in his nature, as now he is, hath not liberty of choice, at least, no indifferency to good and evil, but an invincible proneness and inclination to evil.

C. You have proposed a Question of some intricacy and difficulty, yet shall I give you account of it, so far as may seem of use to you: and I shall do it by laying this Foundation, That the nature of man, created after the Image of God, I mean, his Reasonable nature, hath such an agreement and liking to all that is substantially and really good, (such are all the commands of the Natural and Christian Law) that it still canvaseth on that side, and solicites the will to embrace the good, and prefer it before the pleasurable evil; and generally thus it doth, but when some distemper or disease is upon it: Only the will, which being a free, is not always a regular and obedient faculty, that doth not always hearken to the advice and inclinations of the Reasonable nature, but (the truth is) doth very often very contrary to Reason, and so doth most frequently chuse ill; yet doth it not constantly so, but sometimes it hears Reason, and chuses good. And indeed, this very disobeying of Reason, the not hearing the dictates of the understanding, is an evidence concerning the will of man, that it is no natural or necessary, but a spontaneous, arbitrary, free agent. And it were happy, if Experience did not give us this proof of it. Of Free will.

S. But have you not let fall a passage, which being taken up, will keep this arguing of yours from concluding to your advantage? For when you said, That diseased nature doth chuse that which is ill, is not that also appliable to the will; which since the fall of man is diseased, and so may desire ill, and necessarily desire it, (and be no more blameable for doing so, than the sick man for having a sickly distempered palate and appetite) though Nature, i. e. healthy nature, always desires good?

C. The advantage you have laid hold on against my arguing was purposely let fall that you might lay hold on it; and therefore I shall readily acknowledge the will of man since the fall to be, as you say, diseased, and, as an effect of that disease, so strongly inclined to ill, that, unless it be by the Spirit of God drawn and converted to good, it is not imaginable that it will chuse it. To this purpose therefore it is that Christ, who came to cure the diseased, sent also the Spirit to perfect their cures: and then there is as little doubt, but that the will being by the grace of God recovered to some tolerable health, it may (being thus set at liberty) by the strength of that grace, chuse that good which the Spirit inclines it to, and to which eternal reward is promised by God on purpose to take part with the understanding, and with the vertuous object in the canvase against the sensitive, sitive, and to fit and qualify the good to be chosen by the will, before the evil.

S. It is reasonable which you say; but, Doth not there arise from hence another difficulty? For, if there be an eternal reward proposed by God to the vertuous liver, will not this, to him that doth believe it, become so prevalent a weight, that it must necessarily sink it down that way; and so, first, deprive the will of its liberty to the contrary evil, (and that is as contrary to the judgment to come) and secondly, make the vertuous liver uncapable of reward, who, it appears, doth all for the love of that reward, and not for the love of vertue?

C. Your objection consists of two parts; one presses against the liberty of the will to do evil, the other against the rewardableness of the good which is chosen upon intuition of the reward. The first will be easily answered by experience: for how oft doth he that verily believeth the unchangeable truth of all the promises of the Gospel, and so that eternal reward to vertuous living, permit himself nevertheless to be seduced by worldly or carnal temptations to vicious actions, and so demonstrate that the most pretious reward of eternal bliss doth not so violently weigh down the scale for vertue, but that vice may still possibly carry against it? As for the other difficulty, though it be greater, and withal less necessary for the clearing of the point now in hand; yet because it will not be unprofitable to be considered apart, I will give you my thoughts of it, thus; To add some strength and vigour to the love of vertue, which is not always so strong in man as to incline him to undertake all the difficulties that that course of constant vertue is liable to, God thought fit to propose an eternal reward to him that should persevere in well doing, counting it necessary to do so, because sometimes life it self must be lost in the pursuit. And doing thus, it was a work of his wisdom (for the preventing the force of your present objection, and to accommodate his œconomy to the nature of man, as a rational agent) to take care so to dispose this matter, that as he offered a high reward to excite us to the love of vertue, so the desireableness of this reward might be so qualified as not to extinguish the love of vertue, and so make it unrewardable. And the way to do this, was, First, to propose such a reward as might be most desireable to vertuous minds, viz. a state either distinctly defined to be a state of continual beholding God, of purity, and obeying him for ever, without any temptation to the contrary; so that the desiring that reward pre-requires or includes the love of vertue, (whereas if a carnal paradise had been it, vertue might have been pursued for ends most contrary to vertue, and so have been followed unwillingly; followed, but not loved:) or else, a satisfaction to the mind of man, happiness in general, without defining the manner how, or wherein it particularly consists, save only, that it is the satisfaction of the most excellent part of us, the filling of all our rational thirsts, the gratifying of the man, and not of the beast in us: which kind of reward, as it will be foolishness to the carnal man, (never valued by those that are immersed in the world or flesh, or indeed by any that are not raised to some gust of vertue) so when it attracts such as those to begin the Christian course, and set out in the ways of vertue (as we know fear of torments, and even worldly inconveniences sometimes do) and perhaps renders them for that present (that state of beginners) acceptable, or not unacceptable, to God, supposing that when they come to know vertue, they will love and follow it for it self; yet it never stands them in stead for God's final acceptance, unless they are by him discern'd to be so qualified and inclined, as that they will love and pursue vertue it self when they come to taste of it, and proceed to practise it voluntarily and chearfully (and not only mercenarily) when opportunities are offered for it. Secondly, (as another allay to the desireableness of it) this reward was to be proposed at a distance, and not here to be enjoyed, but hereafter, and the matter of it not evidently to be known (as that twice two make four) but only proposed to and received by Faith, that so the greatness and valuableness of it being certain to attract (and nothing being to be taken off from that; because, 1. being infinite, infinite must be taken from it to make it finite, and 2. being rendred finite, it would then be unsufficient to satisfie the mind of man, which desires to be always happy, and had not that desire put in it in vain, and would lose the sense of present happiness if it should apprehend it would ever cease to be happy,) the want of perfect evidence and place of doubting might take off from that infinite greatness, and so from the force of the argument, to pursue it, and leave it so equally ballanced with arguments on both sides, that none but a vertuous person that apprehends pleasure in present vertue, and hath his love of vertue for it self, to assist the arguments on that side, would ever part with all carnal pleasures and profits (and life it self) in pursuit of it: and accordingly this is observable in the world, that as we easily believe that which we wish, and more hardly that which we have less mind to; so the lover of vertue doth easily come to believe that eternal promise of a spiritual holy life, whereas they that are lovers of pleasures, &c. do either not believe, or not consider it. Thirdly, this reward was to be proposed so immensly great, that no body that thought God wise, could think he would bestow it on any thing that were not extremely good; and so none but he that loved vertue, and consequently thought that that was the greatest good, should be able to believe that God would thus reward them. And so by this way of infinitely-wise œconomy, these two great provisions were made; first, that humane weakness and imbecillity should receive some relief; and secondly, that vertuous performances should be capable of reward, and the contrary of punishment. If this suffice not to answer that difficulty, I have then this farther to adde to it; 1. That God, that hath thought fit to chuse promises as an instrument to attract to vertuous living, will accept and reward him that by the use of that means is brought to that end; and therefore that there is no fear that the desiring or loving of the promises which God hath proposed to us to be desired, and is so useful to add alacrity to the pursuit of dry vertue, which oft brings sufferings along with it, and again to extend the love of vertue to every command of Gods, which other lovers of vertue might possibly confine to some few vertues, charity, liberality, &c. which have most taste in them, will ever rob the love and practice of vertue to which it is joined, as a means to advance and cherish it, of that reward which would belong to it, if it were not by this means thus improved: and 2. That however, he that loves vertue for its own sake, and would do so though there were never an Heaven hereafter, hath nothing to be objected against him, and yet must be acknowledged to do what he doth for the sake of the present pleasure in vertue, satisfaction of conscience, &c. the preferring of which before more vigorous sensitive pleasures is the vertue in him rewardable, and not the no-pleasantness of it. And consequently, there will be no more reason to prejudge the love of vertue in him that loves it for Heavens sake. The greatness of God's rewards hereafter, as the graciousness of Christ's yoke here, being both arguments of God's infinite mercy to us in rewarding that vertue to which we have from him such assistances and invitations, and which is in it self so eligible for it self; but no way Objections against his judging men according to works; wherein it is acknowledged there is infinite mercy to the vertuous, and perfect justice, and nothing of extreme severity, to any. Or lastly, if (to acknowledge the utmost imaginable) the loving vertue for the reward be less excellent, and less rewardable, than loving it for it self, yet being still good and rewardable in a lower degree, it was still fit for God to propose these promises to men, because by that means many are and will be attracted and brought in love with vertue, which would not otherwise have been attracted; and so that infinite number of Christians so attracted will recompence that defect of perfection which arises from the hope of the reward. And this withal tends much to the glory of God (which may justly be designed the end of all) which is most illustrated by this means, That men acknowledge to owe to him the all that ever they receive.

The inevidence of the Promises.

S. I have yet one question more, occasioned by what you have said, and it is this, Why, if the Promises of that eternal reward be so made as to be unevident to men, and to leave them place of doubting, it should be so great a Crime in wicked men not to believe those Promises, or not to embrace Vertue, which their nature gives them so weak a desire to, that they want the assistance of that Belief to incite them to the pursuit of it.

C. To this I answer, That though there is, I acknowledge, in this matter some place of doubting, as in all things that are not demonstrative there is; yet I must farther tell you what doubting I mean, only an unjust, irrational doubting, and such as no prudent man would be moved with, or think sufficient to keep him from pursuing any thing that he would otherwise pursue. For, when probable arguments are highly probable, and have no other reason to incline any to doubt of them, but only that it is possible it may be otherwise, this is the next degree to necessary, and being the highest that the matter is capable of (for there is no demonstrating in morality) any prudent man will be content to build upon it; and he that, upon no stronger grounds to the contrary, will refuse to believe, and by doing so, to pursue his own good, will be accounted extremely imprudent. Where it will be necessary to distinguish of the word doubting: for if by that be meant, (what truly and properly it signifies) that which is founded in an equilibration of Arguments on both sides, then I never thought or said that there was any place of doubting in this matter; for sure the Arguments to prove that Christian Religion is true, and consequently that that eternal reward that is promised to the Lover of Vertue shall be performed, are far greater than any arguments that are or can be brought against it: but the doubting which I speak of is another weaker and more imperfect sort of doubting, which may remain in a man when the Reasons on one side are acknowledged infinitely stronger than on the other, and only do not demonstrate or give evidence, or exclude all possibility (and so doubting) of the contrary. And from hence comes the sin of Unbelief: for when wicked men, having no prevailing Reason to disbelieve, do yet without any just cause (upon this one occasion, that they have not evidence for what they are required to believe, though yet they have no reason to doubt of it) not only not believe and practise what Belief would incite them to, but do act directly the contrary, even that that no prudent man that had but equal Reasons on both sides would ever venture to do; by this it appears, that their love to vice is very vigorous in them, so vigorous, as to make the Assent to the Arguments which are offered to invite us to a vertuous life, not to answer or bear proportion with, but to be much weaker than the Arguments: and that must needs be a great fault in any man, and an argument that he neither cares for Vertue, nor for the reward by God promised to it; for if he did, the infiniteness of the Promise, and the desireableness of it would make abundant recompence for the some kind of uncertainty, i. e. inevidence of it: it being certain, that any prudent man would take any ordinary pains, incur any remote and lighter hazard, in pursuit of any thing that were infinitely desireable, and withal but tolerably probable to be obtained. And for a knowing man to do that which is unworthy of such, and which no knowing prudent man would do, as it is an error in it self, so it is a certain evidence that some habitual vice or prevailing temptation hath been the blinding of him; and from thence doth his guilt arise, and his punishment justly follow.

S. You have now gone over all the Articles; the Lord grant me to live accordingly.

C. Saint Augustine will give you a very considerable saying to this purpose: There be, saith he, two kinds of wicked men, wicked Believers, and wicked Unbelievers. * The wicked infidel believes contrary to the Faith of Christ, the wicked Believer lives contrary to it. And it shall be more tolerable for the men of Sodom in the day of judgment than for such.

* Improbus infidelis credit contra fidem, improbus fidelis vivit.

LIB. VI.

Sect. I. Of the word Sacrament.

HAving thus far enlarged your trouble, I beseech you to explain the Doctrine of the Sacraments to me, because methought at the learning of the Church Catechism there was no part which I could so hardly conquer with my understanding as that.

C. I conceive it very probable, because those being Institutions of Christ, there is little in them wherein your own reason could assist you any farther than that could collect or conclude from Scriptures, wherein those Institutions are set down, first, by way of story in the Gospels, or secondly, by way of doctrinal discourse by Saint Paul, and other Scripture-writers. But yet let me tell you, that there is not a more excellent Breviate or Summary of that which is there scattered to be met with, than those short answers to the questions in that Catechism do afford you. If you please, I will view it over with you. The first Question, you see, is, (How many Sacraments hath Christ ordained in his Church?] A Sacrament in this place signifies a holy Rite, a sacred Ceremony used in the service of God; of which sort of Ceremonies in general there being many in the Church, (some ordained by Christ, some by the Apostles, some by the following Church of several ages, and now accordingly used among Christians, in obedience to Christ and the Apostles in what they ordained, and in imitation of the laudable Canons or practices of the Primitive or antient Church) some few there are which Christ himself when he was here on earth, did ordain and institute; and of those particularly the question is, How many there are of this nature, of this immediate institution of Christ, because those certainly which are such will deserve more reverence from us, and more care and diligence in the use of them, than any others which any inferiour authority, especially that of the after-Church, hath instituted. And to this question the answer is very exact, that there are [only two, as generally necessary to Salvation.] Some other sacred rites Christ did institute for some sorts or cases of particular persons, as Imposition of hands, Heb. 6. 1, &c. But of this kind, wherein all men to whom Christianity is revealed (or that expect salvation from Christ) should think themselves concerned, to which all Christians are strictly obliged, so far as not to neglect them wilfully, or to omit them when they may be had, of this kind, I say, there be only two; First, Baptism, i. e. a Ceremony of washing with water, either by going into a Brook and being dowsed over head and ears in it; or by being sprinkled with water on the face or principal part, as hath been used in these colder Countreys in stead of the former. Secondly, the Supper of the Lord, i. e. the blessing of Bread and Wine, and dividing it among those which are present, in imitation of that which Christ did after his last Supper, and by way of commemoration of that death of his, which immediately followed that Supper, and which (as a special part of his office in working our redemption) we ought frequently to recount and commemorate by way of thanksgiving to him, and present it before his Father, to whose favour we have no claim but through those sufferings.

Two only simply necessary.

S. Will you proceed to the second question [What meanest thou by this word Sacrament?] which is so plain and pertinent to that place wherein it is set, that I shall not need your help, save only to open and clear the answer which is given to it.

Of the Sacraments in general.

C. The answer is, That in this place the word Sacrament is set to signifie an outward visible sign, i. e. not only a holy rite or ceremony, as before I told you, but that a significative, not empty rite, a ceremony set to import and denote something visibly and discernibly, and that something, an inward spiritual grace given unto us, i. e. some special favour and gift of God bestowed upon us, (particularly by the death of Christ;) and this sign or significative rite ordained by Christ himself, of his immediate institution, and designed and consecrated by him to two grand ends; First, as a means whereby we receive the same, i. e. as a means of conveyance, whereby he is pleased in a peculiar manner to make over that grace or favour to us, as also by the right and due use of which we are interpreted to perform our parts, or the condition required of us to make us capable of receiving it, and so are actually made partakers of so much of the grace as at that time is useful for us (such is pardon of sin, God's reconciliation, or favourable acceptance of us, and strength to do what God requires:) And secondly, as a pledge to assure us thereof, i. e. a pawn, as it were, delivered us from God by the hand of the Minister, to give us ground of confidence and acquiescence that those graces or favours are now so made over to us by God, that we shall not fail of our part in them, instantly in that degree as they are proper to our present state, (viz. pardon of sins past, and acceptance of sincere performance, and also grace or strength so to perform) and hereafter in that other superiour degree, for which we must wait till another world, (such are final acquittance or pardon of sin, and a pure and happy condition in another world.) And all this in the same manner as when some promise is made for the future, and a pawn deposited till the promise be performed.

The Sacrament a means of receiving grace.

A pledge to assure us of it.

S. The next question descends from the general consideration of the nature of a Sacrament, to a particular view of the parts of it; and first, how many such parts there be.

The parts of a Sacrament.

C. The answer you have already learn'd, and will be able to tell your self, that as in the notion of a sign or picture (as it is such, i. e. as it is a mere relative thing) there are two parts, first, the resemblance, and secondly, the thing resembled, the second as it were the soul to the former, without which it is a fancy, a chimera, not an image or picture; so in these holy significative rites there is, first, the sign or outward visible part, and secondly, that which is signified by it, the grace or precious treasure that this image is set to represent, or which is to every intelligent man's understanding conveyed under that veil or semblance.

Sect. II. Of Baptism.

S. Having said so much in general of Sacraments, and of the parts of which all such are compounded, I see the next question descends regularly to the viewing of the former affirmations, in each particular to which they belong: And beginning first with the first Sacrament, viz. Baptism, the question is, What is the outward part in that visible sign or form, i. e. I conceive, what is the thing in Baptism which is set to signifie some such grace of God's?

C. Water

C. Water is clearly affirmed to be that ſign; that as among the Jews, when any Proſelyte was received in among them, and entred or initiated into their Church, they were wont to uſe waſhings, to denote their forſaking or waſhing off from them all their former profane Heathen practices (nay, as the Jewiſh Writers affirm, not onely [a] Proſelytes, but natural [b] Jews were initiated by three things, Circumciſion, Baptiſm, and Sacrificing;) [c] ſo by Chriſt's appointment, whoſoever ſhould be thus received into his family, ſhould be received with this ceremony of Water, therein to be dipt (i. e. according to the Primitive antient cuſtom, to be put under water) three times, or in ſtead of that, to be ſprinkled with it, with this form of words join'd to that action by the Miniſter [I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt,] which words being by Chriſt preſcribed to his Diſciples, muſt indiſpenſably be uſed by all in the adminiſtration of that Sacrament. And the meaning of them is double: firſt, on the Miniſters part, that what he doth, he doth not of himſelf, but in the Name or Power of, or by Commiſſion from, the bleſſed Trinity; ſecondly, and more eſpecially, in reſpect of the perſon baptized, 1. That he acknowledgeth theſe three, and by deſiring Baptiſm makes profeſſion of that acknowledgment, which is in effect the ſum of the whole Creed, which that Catechiſm excellently abbreviates by ſaying, That the chief things learnt in thoſe Articles are, firſt, to believe in God the Father, who hath made me and all the world, i. e. all the Creatures as well as Men. Secondly, in God the Son, who hath redeemed me and all mankind, i. e. taſted death for every man, bought out of that ſad thraldom of ſin and Satan as many as were dead in Adam, i. e. every man in the world, though neither Angels nor any other Creature beſide. Thirdly, in God the Holy Ghoſt, who ſanctifieth me and all the elect people of God, i. e. worketh grace effectually in the heart of all thoſe who are obedient to his call or working; for thoſe are the elect or choſen in that place of the Goſpel, where it is ſaid, That many are called, but few choſen, many invited by God, but few which make uſe of that mercy of his, few that are obedient to that Call. 2. That as he acknowledges theſe three, ſo he delivers himſelf up to them as to three undivided Principles or Authors of Faith or Chriſtian Religion, and acknowledges no other as ſuch, (as to be baptized in the name of Paul, ſignifies to ſay, I am of Paul, i. e. to pin my faith on him, in oppoſition to Cephas and all others) to receive for infallible truth whatſoever is taught by any of theſe, and nothing elſe. 3. That he devotes and delivers himſelf up to be ruled as an obedient ſervant by the directions of this great Maſter, a willing Diſciple of this bleſſed Trinity; and ſo the Greek phraſe (into the Name) doth import. And theſe three acts of the perſon baptized, being put together, make up his part, that by way of condition is required of him to make him capable of that grace which the Miniſter from God thus conveys upon and enſures unto him.

Baptiſm among the Jews.

[a] So the Talmudiſts ſay of Jethro, Moſes father in law, בת גיר במילה ובטבילה בשם he was made a Proſelyte by circumciſion and immerſion.

[b] See Talmud. Tract. Repudii. The Iſraelites did not enter into Covenant but by three things, במילה ובטבילה ובהרציות חקרבן by Circumciſion and Baptiſm, and by propitiation of Sacrifice; and ſo the Proſelytes in like manner.

[c] Among Chriſtians.

S. The next queſtion proceeds regularly to the thing ſignified in Baptiſm under the name of the inward ſpiritual grace, which I conceive to denote that favour and ſpecial donative made over from God in that Sacrament; and that ſtiled ſpiritual, as belonging to the Soul of man, or his immortal ſpirit, and inward, as that which is ſignified by the outward ſign, in the notion wherein we ſay, There be two parts of a Picture, an inward and an outward: the man himſelf is the inward part of his picture, or that which is inviſible, the outward being the viſible form upon the Table. So that I ſuppoſe my ſelf to conceive the meaning of the Queſtion: But for the anſwer I muſt crave your aſſiſtance.

C. The anſwer is, That the inward part of Baptiſm, ſignified by, and conferred with that outward Ceremony, is a death unto ſin and a new birth unto righteouſneſs. For the full underſtanding of which, I muſt ſhew you theſe three things. Firſt, what is meant by that death and new birth; ſecondly, how theſe are ſignified by Water in Baptiſm; thirdly, how Baptiſm is a means of working this in us, and a pledge of aſſuring us of it. The explaining of theſe three will be neceſſary to a clear underſtanding of this matter. For the firſt, a death unto ſin, ſignifies a getting out of the power, and from under the guilt and puniſhment of ſin. The living unto ſin is being a ſlave of ſin, i. e. ſubject to it both for task and blows, like the Iſraelites to the Egyptian task-maſters, being in their power to ſet them a drudging in their ſervice, and in their power to beat and oppreſs them. He that liveth unto ſin, or in whom ſin reigns, is a direct gally-ſlave to drudge under it, and over and above the miſery of that, to be tormented by it alſo; and he that is in that caſe, as long as he continues ſo, can neither by any ſtrength of his own get out of that dominion of ſin, as it ſignifies working the works of ſin, (ſinning continually) or as it ſignifies puniſhment due to that ſlave, whoſe very ſervice (i. e. his ſins) binds him over to puniſhment. In plain terms, the natural man, or every man living, conſidered without the grace of Chriſt in his natural eſtate, hath neither ſtrength to avoid ſin, nor means to eſcape puniſhment. Proportionably therefore to this, a death unto ſin is the getting out of theſe gallies, a being reſcued by Chriſt from this neceſſity of continuing and going on in ſin, and conſequently, a being delivered from thoſe puniſhments which are the reward of an unreformed courſe of ſin: both theſe together are ordinarily called mortification, and as they belong only to the ſins of commiſſion, they are a previous diſpoſition to that new birth unto righteouſneſs, (as in every mutation and new production there is a laying aſide the old form, preparatory to the receiving of a new;) but as they belong to ſins of omiſſion alſo (the mortifying of which is the doing what is commanded) ſo are they all one with that new birth.

The inward part of Baptiſm.

A death unto ſin.

S. What then is that new birth unto Righteouſneſs?

C. The contrary to the living to ſin; i. e. It is Chriſt's giving me ſtrength to walk righteouſly, and means to obtain God's favour, the begetting me to that double righteouſneſs that the young tender Chriſtian hungers and thirſts after, the righteouſneſs of Sanctification, to ſatisfy his hunger, (that bread of life to ſtrengthen his Soul) and the righteouſneſs of Juſtification, to ſet him right in the favour of God; (that vital refreſhment that the conſcience ſcorcht with the guilt of ſin ſo thirſts after.) Some difficulty there is, and poſſibility of miſtake, in that which I have now delivered, therefore you muſt weigh it diligently, and obſerve that this death and new birth is neither the reſolving to forſake ſin and live godly; for this is ſuppoſed before Baptiſm, to make the perſon capable of it, (as appears by the next queſtion and anſwer in the Catechiſm:) nor, on the other ſide, the actual forſaking of ſin, and living a new life, (denying ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, and living ſoberly, and juſtly, and godly, Tit. 2.) for that is the conſequent task of him that makes a right uſe of the grace of Baptism for his whole life after, and both these an act of the man, wrought the one by the preventing, the other by the assisting grace of God. But this grace of Baptism is this strength of Christ, of supernatural ability to forsake sin, and live godly, and proportionably a tender of God's pardon and gracious acceptance, pardon of the forsaken sins, and acceptance of the imperfect (so it be sincere) godliness. And that this is the very intention of the Catechism in these words, and not any gloss of mine, may appear by what here follows as the reason of it; For being by nature born in sin, and the children of wrath, (i. e. born with strong inclinations and propensions, which would certainly ingage us in a course of sin, and so consequently make us worthy of wrath, as a child or son of perdition is one worthy to be destroyed) we are thereby made children of grace, i. e. have in Baptism that strength given us by Christ that will enable us to get out of that servile and dangerous state.

This death and birth signified by dipping.

S. You have prevented and satisfied my scruples in this particular: I shall now call you to the second thing you promised me, and desire you to shew me how this death and birth, (or that strength to mortify and to raise up to new life, together with God's Tender of pardon and acceptance, which you have shewed me are the importance of that death to sin, and new birth to Righteousness) are signified by the outward part in Baptism, by the dipping or sprinkling in water, &c.

C. The Water here, is set to signify the purifying Spirit of Christ, which hath that double power in it of cleansing from sin and from guilt; and the antient manner of putting the person baptized under water, and then taking him out again, was set to denote the two several acts of this grace; first, by way of dying, then, of rising again: and the antient custom of doing this thrice, signified (not only the Faith in the Trinity into which they were baptized, but peculiarly) the death of Christ, and his rising the third day; which death and resurrection together, are that Fountain that is opened for sin and for uncleanness, Zach. 13. 1. the original of strength to die to sin, i. e. of new birth, and of the pardon and acceptation proportioned to them.

Baptism the means of working this in us.

A pledge to assure us of it.

S. I shall now want but little of your help for the third Quære, How Baptism is a means of working this in us, and a pledge of assuring us of it. For, if Christ have instituted that Sacrament as a means of conveying both these double graces on us, (as I have already learnt) then is the first part of my Quære answered; and if so, then sure will it be a pledge or pawn to ensure us of it, to give us confidence that if we be not wanting to our selves in our part of the Covenant, either by way of preparation before, (necessary to give us a capacity of this mercy) or of making use of it afterward, it shall on Christs part be infallibly bestowed on us. Having saved you this trouble, I shall take confidence to hasten you to the next stage, which is, to proceed to the next question, which comes in here very seasonably: What is required of persons to be baptized, to fit them for that Sacrament, and make them capable of these benefits of it?

The qualifications required to Baptism. Repentance.

C. The answer refers all to two heads, Repentance and Faith, and defines them excellently, [Repentance whereby they forsake sin] to shew that it is not sufficient to denominate a Penitent, that he grieve, or confess, or slightly resolve against sin; much less that he only grieve with the apprehension of punishment, or wish that he were penitent, unless he do really, and sincerely, and actually forsake sin.

S. But how can such forsaking be required before Baptism, when the strength of forsaking is before affirmed to be given me in Baptism?

A double forsaking, in the heart, and in the actions.

C. This difficulty will be salved, if you observe that there is a double forsaking, one of the Heart, in a general cordial renouncing; the other of the Actions, in a particular holding out in time of temptation: The one is called God's giving us to will, the other to do: the first, I told you, was an act of God's preventing and exciting Grace; the second, of his sanctifying: And both these, when they are wrought in us by the Grace of Christ, are actual forsaking of sin (and so more than the slight resolution, which I told you was not repentance) and yet one of them is much less so than the other, and so may be looked on, and required as preparatory to it. The forsaking of the heart is here meant in this question by repentance, and the forsaking in the actions is that to which the strength is made over in Baptism.

Faith.

S. You will now proceed to the second requisite, Faith, which I see there described to be that whereby they stedfastly believe the Promises of God made to them in that Sacrament: Have you any thing to add to that explication there given of that grace?

C. Only this, that there is first mentioned the Promises of God; secondly, the peculiarity of them; thirdly, the act of faith, what it is, namely, believing; fourthly, the qualification of that act, stedfast believing. For the first, I have heretofore shewn you, that when Promises are the object of faith, those Promises are (as constantly the Scripture sets them down) general, but conditional Promises; general, wherein all are concerned without exception; but withal conditional, requiring or presuming some performances on our parts, without the due observance of which we have no title to the Promises. As for example, in this of Baptism, (which brings me to the second thing here proposed) the promises that are made to us in this Sacrament, (promises of strength and of pardon) require first a pre-disposition in the subject, a resolution of amendment, before God thus obliges himself to give this grace of sanctification or justification; and secondly, the due and diligent use of this grace when it is given: without the first this grace of Baptism is not given; without the second it is forfeited again. As for the act of Faith here called Believing, it is that which is most proper for it, when the object is Promises, as it is here (though when the object is Commands of Christ, the act must be obeying;) and by believing, we mean the relying on and depending confidently on Christ for the performance of his part, i. e. of the promise, in case and on condition of our not failing in ours: and the word stedfast added to it, argues the radication of this act of Faith in an habitual acknowledgment, that Christ will never falsify his word, or fail in giving what he promiseth. This was required in the miraculous cures, to make the patient capable of the benefit of Christ's power, to believe that he was thus able; and here it is required to make capable of those more sovereign benefits, the Spirit and Grace of Christ, and is indeed a qualification of our prayers, to which, when they are rightly qualified, the Spirit and the Pardon, which are the things promised in this Sacrament, shall be assuredly granted.

S. All

S. All this which hath been said concerning the Qualifications required in the person to be baptized, (those being Graces which cannot be expected of Children which have no understanding) hath raised in me that scruple which in the next question is clearly proposed, Why then are Infants baptized, when by reason of their tender age they cannot perform them? i. e. cannot repent and believe. To which I perceive the answer accommodated is not that which I have heard some men aver (that the habits of these Graces may be in Infants, or that the faith of their Parents is accounted to them) but by making a plain acknowledgment that they do not at that time themselves perform them, it answers, that they do perform them by their Sureties, &c. What is the meaning of that?

C. You will remember that I told you, that the Repentance here was an act of the heart, i. e. a firm Resolution of amendment; and what is that, but a kind of vow that they will do it, (and so believe also) when being fitted by age and abilities of understanding and instruction, they shall be thus enabled and strengthned by Christ? Now this Vow or Oath the Child is supposed to make at the Font, though not with its own mouth, yet by Proxies, by Sureties, who do not so much promise that he shall do so, as answer and speak in his stead, by way of Substitution representing the Infants voice, and taking upon them an Obligation for the Infant (an Act of great charity in them, to get an early interest for the child in those so precious mercies, which cannot be had without signing the Indenture back again, undertaking the condition of the Covenant) which consequently the Infant is ingaged in, and when he comes to understand, must resolve himself by vow and solemn oath to be bound to it, or else solemnly must disclaim all part in the benefits of it. In plain terms, every child that was ever baptized (and so you to whom I now speak) have the option given you, whether you will acknowledge that to be your sence which your Sureties undertook for you at the Font, (which if you do, then do you take that Obligation in your own name, and are perjured for ever after, whensoever you fail in performing any part of it, whensoever you embrace any worldly lusts, any vanity of this wicked world, &c.) or whether you will disclaim it (as they that have been married being children, have a choice after, whether it shall stand a ratifi'd marriage or no) which if you do, and will not be bound to the duty, you must know you renounce withal all right or claim in the promises of Christ, disclaim that strength that Christ was ready to have given you, and so continue an impotent wretch, not able to resist any the weakest temptation, ready to be carried headlong into all villany, to the very defaming and wasting the reasonable soul within you, to fall from one wickedness to another, and not come to any degree of righteousness, of Christian vertue, or Moral civility, and withal ready to drop into Hell, in minutely danger to be hurried thither to receive the wages of thy unrighteousness. If the conjunction of these two can be allowed to make up a formidable state, if you can either value vertue and strength, or pardon and acceptance from Heaven, you will surely be so well advised as to acknowledge those Sureties your friends, which ingaged you in so gainful an Indenture, and being now come to a sense of it, count your self under vow, and labour not to be sacrilegious as soon as you are come into the Church, to perjure your self, and rob God of a vessel bought by his blood for his Temple, to serve him there in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of your life.

The Infants vow by the Sureties.

S. You have explained that Question and Answer, as they lie in the Church-Catechism, sufficiently; and so in effect have satisfied all my desires in that matter of the Sacrament of Baptism: yet, as every degree of proficiency in knowledge gives the Christian learner some farther sight of his ignorances, and whets him on to grow yet farther in knowledge; so it is with me at this time. Your last enlargement of the Answer in the Catechism, by teaching me many things, hath put me in mind of my ignorance of two things, wherein I must desire your help. I shall first propose the first to you.

C. What is that?

S. It is this: By what you have last said, it seems to me, that the qualifications required of the person to be baptized are all one with the vow in Baptism: Which how it can be, I do not yet distinctly conceive, but have this Objection against it, that the matter of the vow seems to be somewhat which must be (and is undertaken in some measure by the Sureties that it shall be) after performed; but the things required in the person to be baptized, seem to be such things as must be first in him, before he is fit to be baptized.

The difference between the qualifications for Baptism, & the Vow in it.

C. Your scruple is not very weighty, yet I will answer it briefly, by putting you in mind, that Baptism may be administred either to one of full age, or to an Infant. When the person is of full age (as in case he be of some years before he come to hear of Christ, and then hear and believe on him, and desire Baptism) then are these qualifications pre-required in him before he may fitly be admitted to Baptism; and yet when they are so, their being in him is fitly expresst by him in the words of the vow: Repentance it self (which is one part of the qualification) being nothing else but a change of mind, i. e. a resolution or vow of forsaking all the sins of the former life, and keeping God's holy will for the future; and so Faith, not only a believing or acknowledging for the present. but also a vow of believing for the future, and confessing constantly all the Articles of the Creed for ever after, especially when storms or tempests shall come to shake that faith, or tempt to renounce that profession or any part of it. But when an Infant is baptized, who can neither believe nor repent himself, but all that he doth, doth it by proxy; then it is most clear, that that which is pre-required in one of age, and must be actually in him before he be admitted to Baptism, is not thus pre-required in the Infant, but only required in the future: for the surety doth not undertake that the child is thus qualifi'd already; but he being the substitute of the child, the child by him promises that he will thus perform hereafter. And this promise that he will, is distinctly the vow of Baptism.

S. I acknowledge your Answer, and indeed had little other design in putting you to the trouble of it, but only that I might the less impertinently beg of you a little to insist on the words of the vow of Baptism (as they are used at the Font, and set down in the beginning of the Church-Catechism) which may have some difficulty in them, which is likely to remain unexplained (and so to miss that felicity which all other parts of the Catechism have been afforded by you) unless you comply with me in this voluntary digression, which I acknowledge to be affected by me.

C. I

Sect. III. Of the vow of Baptism,

C. I must confess the vow of Baptism to be a thing of so great importance, and so immediately referring and closely tending to practice, that it were a wonder for a Practical Catechism to be thought compleat without it: And therefore although, as I told you, it differ little from the two qualifications, Repentance and Faith, pre-required in the person to be baptized, (which is the reason that I forgot, having spoken of them, to put you in mind of this) yet I will most willingly comply with you, and explain whatever seems difficult in that Vow.

S. I already see that the Creed and the Commandments being severally explained to me (which are the two latter branches of that vow) I can detain you no farther than while you explain the first part of it. In these words, [They, i. e. my Sureties, promised and vowed in my name, that I should forsake the devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of the wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh,] What is then meant, first, by [The Devil and all his works?]

The Devil and all his works.

C. Certainly the principal thing here renounced is the false Gods, i. e. devils, which the Heathen world did worship so universally before Christ's time, and against which the Catechists (which prepared all for Baptism) did first labour to fortify their Disciples, and are for that cause called in the antient Church (and known by the title of) Exorcists, as those that cast out these Devils. So of the seven precepts of Noah, all which every Proselyte which was received or admitted to live among the Jews (and those I told you were admitted by Baptism or Washing) was bound to embrace, that is known to be the first, which is entitled * Concerning strange worship, i. e. their false Idol-worship, their serving those which were devils and not gods, and which endeavoured nothing more, than the taking them off from the true God. But then secondly, as he that acknowledges the true God with his tongue, doth oft deny him in his life; so they that renounce these false gods or devils, that pray not to them, nor believe them to be gods, may yet acknowledge them in their actions, i. e. may be supposed (as men are oft found) to live like those Idolatrous Heathens in the midst of Christianity. And therefore after this first sence of renouncing the devil, as that signifies forsaking all Idolatrous worship, you must farther add the renouncing all commerce, or consulting with him; the former being that which Witches and Sorcerers use, the latter that which they are guilty of which repair to such Witches, or receive responses from them, or directions for health or thriving, or acquiring any advantages in the world, or if it be but by way of curiosity to know (by any such black art) any future events, or the like, and all other things wherein the devil's help is called in, through not depending totally upon God: Which, as you meet with them, you will understand, by the proportion or analogy which they hold with these which I have now named to you.

* על עבודה זרה

S. The Lord preserve me from such high provocations of his jealousy, in taking any such detestable rivals of God into my heart. But what is meant by all the works of the devil, which are there annexed?

Lusts especially.

C. Answerably to the first prime notion of forsaking the devil, (i. e. the Heathen false worships) the works of the devil will primarily signify those abominable sins, first of Idol-worship, then of filthy lusts, which were commonly used in their Heathen worships, and became rites and ceremonies of them, their filthy revelling and abominable uncleannesses required and accepted by the devil or false gods there; as prayer, and fasting, and alms, and the use of the Sacraments are by the true God among us Christians. These are truly the works of the devil, [a] the secrecies and mysteries of the Heathen Religion; and the renouncing of them at the time of receiving of the true God was that which was especially signified by the circumcising of Abraham, and all the Jews after him, and is most strictly required of us in our Baptism, and accordingly recommended to the younger Christians, Tit. 2. 5, and 6. under the style of sobriety and chastity, and by the Primitive Bishop Polycarp to the Philippians, in these words, That they may be unblameable in all things, but before all, That [b] they take care of chastity or purity. Under that head must be understood all sorts of those foul sins which are not to be named (however used by any, without making them rites of the Idol-worship) whose contrariety to the Christian profession and doctrine, that truth in Jesus, Ephes. 4. 21. (which so strictly requires the contrary purity, and forbids the very looking on any, to lust, much more the uncleannesses there mentioned, Ephes. 4. 19.) and the great danger thereof to our souls, may be judged of by this, That most of the heavy judgments in Scripture that have fallen upon Nations, particularly the utter excision of the seven Nations, the fire and brimstone upon Sodom and Gomorrha, are expresst to have fallen upon them for that one high abomination: And the greatest reproach that ever was to Christianity, was that of the filthy Gnosticks, those Hereticks in the Primitive Church, who retained and improved this piece of Heathenism, continued those works of the devil among them; and most of the seven Churches of Asia in the Revelation were destroyed for entertaining, or not vomiting out of these. And though these solemn ways of committing these sins, making them rites of Religion, be not now to be heard of among Christians; yet if the sins themselves, or any degree of them, be still (though never so secretly) retained among men or women, or if they be not utterly detested and abomined, this is a contradiction to this first branch of our Vow of Baptism, and that which, beside the Hell-fire in another world, may be expected to bring down terrible vengeance here, and may justly be feared to be the secret provoker (oft-times) of God's heavy wrath upon a City or Land, when it comes down without any visible, discernible special provocation.

[b] φροντίζητε ἁγνείας.

S. I hope I shall be careful to remember my vow in this particular, now especially that you have shewed me that it belongs so primarily unto it. But is there nothing else contained under this stile, [The works of the devil?]

Pride.

C. Yes, in a secondary sence all the sins that have a special character or stamp of Satan on them, all the Luciferian prides and ambitions by prying into God's secret will, desiring to be like him in omniscience, by judging mens hearts, undertaking to be equal to him in that title of his of Searcher of hearts, and many the like: next, our diabolical accusing, and lying, and slandering our Brethren: next, our corrupting and tempting them, and delighting to allure or fright them into any unlawful act, and so usurping that title of Tempter that belongs to him: next, our maligning or envying, much more our killing, or destroying our Brethren. All which sins (and others, which it were too long to name) carry much of Satans image, and several of his [c] names about them, and so deserve to be called his works.

False accusing.

[c] Διάβολος, ὁ σατανᾶς, Satanas, or ἀχθὲς, or ἀπολλύων, Abaddon, or Ἀπολλύων.

S. I

S I had thought that those things which the Devil tempts any one to do, had been the prime, if not only, works of his.

C. Whensoever it is sure that the devil tempts any man to any sin, if he yield to do it, it is sure that is very properly a work of the devil. But it is so hard to discern that, or when the Devil doth thus immediately tempt any, and it is so ordinary to accuse the Devil of that which comes from our own evil inclinations and customs, (the habitual corruptions of our own hearts, which are our great and daily tempters) and it is so certain that our own hearts must have the main of the guilt, even when Satan doth tempt any, because if we resist, he shall flie from us, (and indeed our not consenting is the evacuating of his temptations, and consequently the sin is a work of our own will which so consents, and not of the temptation, which had no power to work that consent, nay, if it had been resisted, had been matter of victory and vertue to us) therefore I say, for these and other considerations, I did not think fit to name these in the front of the Works of the devil, being not sure that they at all belong to that rank of sins, as here they are set down by way of difference from the pomps of the world and desires of the flesh. Yet shall I not on this occasion neglect to mind you how nearly you are concerned to watch the Devil, that evil spirit, that he do not secretly inspire or infuse any evil thoughts into you: and the rather, because when he doth so, he takes all care that those suggestions may seem not to come from him (knowing that any Christian must needs be averse from hearkning to them then) but he labours to appear an angel of light, a good spirit, the very Spirit of God; and often brings it so about, that his inward whisperings having some specious disguise of Religion or zeal for God put upon them, are taken for the voice of God's Spirit within men: and among those that pretend to Enthusiasms, and that they are taught by the Spirit those things which the Word of God (the sure inspired voice of God's Spirit) doth not teach them (nay, which in the conceit and opinion of some of them are to be believ'd, though they seem contrary to that) it will be no wonder if Satan do so prevail as to obtrude his tentations under the disguise of dictates of God's Spirit: and that may be a reason that Saint Paul conjures the Galatians, that they anathematize that (though seeming) Angel from Heaven, that teaches any other doctrine for the doctrine of God, save that which was then already received by them; intimating that seeming good Angelical, to be indeed a Diabolical accursed spirit, that so teacheth: and Saint John, 1 John 4. 1. advises us very friendly to try the spirits, whether they be of God or no, signifying (as many false Teachers acted by evil spirits, so sure) many evil spirits also, to put on the outward appearance of God-like spirits, so that they are, or if we beware not, may be by us mistaken for the Spirit of God. And there is no way to secure us from such delusions, but to set up the Word of God as the only plain director of all Christian actions, to account nothing Christian, or dictate of Spirit, but what is taught me immediately from thence, judging my own spirit, or whatever suggestion within me, by that, and not judging, or forcing that to comply with, or bring him in testimony to my spirit. Which I mention because of the danger those men are in who are full of any prepossession, to believe that the Scripture favours or gives testimony to it. As he whose phancy hath been playing with any sound, thinks every thing that he hears to be tunable to that he phansies.

Temptations of the Devil.

S. After the mention of [the Devil and his works] the next thing renounced in that Vow is expresst by these words [The Pomps and Vanities of the wicked world.] What is the meaning of that expression?

C. The World signifies, either, first, the company; or, secondly, the customs; or thirdly, the wealth; or fourthly, power; or fifthly, the glory which is in the world: and [the wicked world] is as much of these as hath any sinfulness or contrariety to the Law of God in them, and so restrains the word [world] to the two former of these, the three latter being in themselves lawful blessings of God: which though they may be either sought or used unlawfully, yet are not here to be styled wicked, or such as a Christian in his Baptism is to renounce; but if he be lawfully possest of them, he may very Christianly continue the use and enjoyment of them. As for the two former, they are such as may be called wicked. For first, the Company, or popular examples and suggestions of the many, i.e. of the Heathen world, (in opposition to which this form of Vow was first framed) or of the greater part of the whole world, as it hath been ever before and since (as it contains the Heathen and Christian, and all others together) these, I say, are generally so contrary to the precepts which Christ prescribes to all his Disciples (that broad way so contrary to his strait gate) that they are very fit to be disclaimed and renounced at a venture, the Christian so far taking himself off from the world, from the practices of the Multitude there, as to forsake the multitude, and betake himself to the Mount, the privacy, the solitude with Christ; chusing rather to go alone in the Paths of Piety and Christian vertue to Heaven, than to have the Company and Jollity of the world to be his tentation to the sins and Hell, which are the way and end of their journey. Mean while this is not again the renouncing of the company of worldly men absolutely, but the resolving not to accompany them in their sins, and to that end fortifying our selves by Vow against yielding to their tentations, and particularly against that very powerful allurement to do evil, the Multitude, and perhaps greatness, and flourishing condition of those which practise sins before us, and which add their Perswasions to their Examples, and perhaps proceed to reproach those that will not go along with them. And the foreseeing and arming our selves against that force of those Examples, that rhetorick of those perswasions, that sharpness of those reproaches, and venturing cheerfully to forfeit our reputation and fame with evil men, (by whom to be well spoken of is the greater curse) rather than to lose the praise of God, is this first part of the Christian valour, or branch of this second part of our vow, in forsaking the wicked world. The second thing which is in this Vow to be forsaken is, as I told you, the wicked Customs of the world; and those primarily, or especially, the Heathen again, (to which the form of this Vow might more particularly relate;) it being common among them for the Laws of Nature to be by the vile customs of their dark hearts so razed out of their Souls, that many practices which right reason and humane nature among Heathens themselves (no farther illuminated than by that natural judicatory, the light of their own understandings, the unwritten law of God within them) would teach them to abandon, as sins and wounds of Conscience, have been by whole Nations at once embraced, and continued in without any check, as innocent sinless qualities; Nature and Reason

The wicked world.

The Company of the world.

The Customes of the world.

Reason it self being so early gagged and silenced by popular custom and vicious education, that many have not known it to be a sin to steal or rob, if they were so dextrous as not to be taken; others to kill and eat their aged Parents, (conceiving that by this means they gave them the most honourable burial;) others to throw themselves murtherously into the flames, to accompany their dead Princes out of the world. Many the like irrational sins through some local custom have gotten the reputation not only of sinless and lawful, but of laudable also. And these, and all that can ever offer to obtrude themselves upon us by the like means, we here renounce under this second notion of the wicked world. Of which sort it will not be hard to find some in every Christian Nation still, as among us that of Duelling (formerly enlarged upon) which I shall not now mention any farther than as an instance of the power of popular custom (founded in a mistake of the notion of honour or reputation) even among Christians themselves, so far as to make that pass for a laudable accomplishment in a Christian, a piece of courage, i.e. vertue and gallantry, which is indeed a most unchristian sin, a guiltiness both of my own and of my Brothers blood, and so not a single provocation. The like may be said of another custom (which this Nation seems to have admitted) in favour to sins of uncleanness, whereby it is become a more creditable thing among us to have been guilty of defiling and invading another mans bed (that sin of Adultery, punished with death among the Jews, by God's appointment) than to be the innocent person which hath thus been robb'd by the Adulterer; the sin it self being not thought worthy of near so much shame (nay, among ill men seldom at all mentioned without applause, and expressions of kindness) as the having been thus wronged. Which again is an evidence, how easie it would be for the most hellish provoking sin to be naturaliz'd and embraced by a Nation, if it can by the boldness and impudence of wicked men, and by the encouragement, or but impunity allow'd it by those which are in Authority, steal into a good Reputation, and so by being customary first, attain to be creditable also. The resisting of such Customs, be they never so Epidemical, the beating them down by the authority of Christ's Precepts, and bringing obedience to those into a reputation among men, at least contending and endeavouring our utmost to take away all reproach from strict, precise, conscientious Christian walking, or, (if by our endeavour that will not be compast) yet however taking care never to be carried away with that stream of sinful custom, but to approve my self and my Family, and (as far as the power of my example and my counsel can extend) to bring in and engage my acquaintance and neighbours, like Joshua and his house, to be the firm, constant Servants of God, in despite of, and defiance to, these most popular Tentations, are the least that can be deemed our Obligation, laid on us by this part of our Vow of Baptism.

Duelling.

Creditableness of some sins.

S. I beseech God to sanctify this part of my Vow to me, that it may be such an hedge and mound about me, to defend me from the invasions and riots of the wicked company, and customs of the world. But what is the importance of the phrase [Pomps and Vanities] which are here disclaimed? Are they the costly attire and attendants, that the great men of the world so constantly use, which seem to be meant by [Pomps?] or are they the superfluities of all kinds, which may deserve to be stiled [Vanities?] If so, then methinks I shall be obliged to understand that saying of Christ, not only of the rich man, that cannot part with his riches, but also of all noble and great men, that live according to their quality in the world, that this Vow of Baptism is so contrary to their whole state and course, that it is impossible for them to enter into the Kingdom of God, as that signifies to become Christians.

Pomps and Vanities.

C. I shall first, as near as I can, tell you the natural importance of these words in this place, and then satisfy your scruple or difficulty. And first, for the importance of the words here, you have oft been told, that the prime aspect of the several parts of the Vow of Baptism is in reference to the practices of the Heathen which were antiently therein renounced, as they were by Circumcision among the Jews. And in this respect the words [Pomps and Vanities] being not much distinct, but exegetical one of the other, and signifying the vain pomps or pompous vanities of the Heathen or wicked world, seem most particularly to point at those things which were used among them in their triumphs and games, and times of gallantry and jollity; for those are peculiarly called [a] Pomps, and being very vain and unprofitable (bringing no good to any but the pleasure of the eye to the beholders) were moreover very bloody and wicked. Such were those of the Gladiators, which did openly upon the stage combate and wound, and kill and butcher one another: which was so prophane an irreligious thing, that in the first times no Christian was permitted to be a spectator of them. So again in their cuffings and wrestlings in the Olympick games, in which they used instruments of lead in their hands to wound, and perhaps slaughter, one another: and these were moreover (generally) accounted [b] sacred among them, as consecrated to their gods, ordered and managed by their chief Priests, (to the appeasing their [c] good deities, as sacrifices and victims to their bad) as we may perceive 2 Mac. 4. 7. where Jason buying the Pontificate, hath with it the power of instituting and moderating their games. And so Acts 19. 31. the [d] Asian prefects there mentioned, were the Priests that had the managing of their games in that Province. By all which you perceive the reasonableness of the Christians being bound to renounce these bloody, vain and idolatrous pomps, at his Baptism, they being a solemn part of their Heathen worship, and therefore to be renounced as properly as their Idol-feasts (though they had had no other wickedness in them besides) for the false deities sake, to whose service they were ordained; but then over and above, having a great deal of bloodiness in them, and mixture of many other sins which made them most improper for a Christian to continue in, or not to profess his detestation of them. But beside these (which are the primary notation of the phrase) many other things there are which must be thought to be renounced in these words. 1. All the sinful courses that are used by men in their times of jollity and festivity, the luxury, and riot, and unlawful gaming, and all kind of excesses, which are but the copying out of the Heathen Bacchanals and Saturnals, those which are turned out of the world by Christ, and by him transformed and changed into spiritual Celebrations, blessing and praising of God, (the Fountain of those mercies) and (proportioned thereunto) Feasts of Charity, eating our meat with gladness (rejoycing in the Lord always, chearfully enjoying the good things which God hath given us, and expressing that joy in Psalms and Hymns and spiritual Songs) and withal in singleness of heart, Acts 2. 46. i.e. with all Bounty and Liberality

Luxury.

Liberality to the poor, in ſtead of thoſe outward, coſtly vain pomps, which the eye of the world is moſt pleaſed with. 2. Here is renounced all the vain oſtentatious Bravery, which idle perſons of this world are ſo apt to admire and dote on. I mean not the external pomp, and ſplendor, and ſolemnities of State, which are by God and nature thought fit to be annext to the Scepter, or Supreme power, (ſuch was the glory of David, and of Solomon, 1 Kings 10. 5.) For theſe are not cenſured, but allowed by Chriſt, Matth. 11. 8. and, being very uſeful to maintain the dignity of Princes, (as that is neceſſary to the happy diſcharge of their office, (cannot but be thought lawful and commendable to be practiſed by them. But the bravery which is here abjured, is all thoſe Attires, and Behaviours, and Deckings that proceed from pride in the heart, and tend to the inflaming of luſt in beholders; or but to ſet out our ſelves glorious and admired in the eyes of men. And of this ſort (though God only be able to judge the heart, and define of any man or woman, that what they do, they do from this ſinful principle, or to that worſe end) it is yet much to be ſuſpected are all thoſe braveries that are uſed by any above what the ſoberer and graver ſort of his quality and condition do uſe; and ſuch again the frequent changing and inventing of Faſhions, the being earlieſt in every new Dreſs, or the ſingularity of Apparel, uſed on purpoſe, and on that affectation, becauſe it is ſingular: for all theſe ſeem ſo far to betray the ſinful principle, that, though it is not reaſonable for one man to judge another for every thing of this nature, yet it will be fit for all that do thus, to examine and charge it upon themſelves, and if they cannot perfectly clear themſelves from that evil principle, or worſe end, then to remember, that this is it which they renounced in their Baptiſm. And becauſe every mans heart is apt to deceive himſelf, and judge too favourably in his own cauſe; the way will therefore be in matter of this kind, rather to deny our ſelves ſome part of that lawful Liberty, than to offend in any exceſs. Where yet all this while you may obſerve, that the ſin that is ſpoken of in this kind is not ordinarily to be fetched from the particularity of the attire or faſhion, whatever it be, (there being few faſhions of Garments, uſed among civilized people, which are in themſelves ſinful) but from the Principle from which it ſprings in the heart, and the End to which it is deſigned, which often betrays it in the uſing of thoſe attires unfitly and affectedly, and when they are not uſed by grave Perſons, which after, when they come to be the general mode, have no ſuch ſignificancy in them: and are therefore by vain perſons then wont to be laid aſide, as now no longer agreeable to their deſigns or inclinations. The ſhort of it is, the Rule of Decency is that (and not the law of Nature only) which muſt give Limits to Attires; this Decency is to be taken from that which is uſual and cuſtomary among thoſe with whom we live, and is varied oft by change of times, and of the condition of age, or dignity of each perſon, (that being comely for one age, and ſex, and quality of perſons, which is not for another.) And he and ſhe that reſt contented with thoſe ways of adorning themſelves which are moſt uſual among the more ſober and grave of their Age and Quality, are not by you to be judged guilty of the breach of this Vow, though perhaps there are thoſe things in their Attire, Gold, Jewels, and the like, which might be thought to own this title of Pomps and Vanities, as thoſe words ſignifie Bravery and Superfluity. The truth is, it were to be wiſhed, that men and women of the higheſt quality would chuſe to diſtinguiſh themſelves from others, rather by that Ornament of a meek and quiet ſpirit, (commended to the weaker ſex by S. Peter, as a far more amiable ornament than that of gold filletings, &c.) and make ſhew of their wealth by thoſe more profitable beneficial expences, for the ſupply of the wants of others. And no doubt this would contribute more to their own ends, (if they be the aims of Chriſtians, or of men) would ſet them out more in the opinion of all wiſe or good perſons. But this being affirmed, will not conclude the uſe of any of thoſe Ornaments which are agreeable to time, and place, and callings, to be ſinful, or of the number of thoſe that are here renounced in our Baptiſm. And ſo I have with the ſame hand anſwered your Queſtion, and I ſuppoſe ſatisfied your Objection and Difficulty alſo.

Bravery.

S. There remains now but the third and laſt branch of the matter of this Vow [The ſinful luſts of the fleſh] which are here diſclaimed. I pray (in a word, becauſe I meant not thus to enlarge your trouble) what is meant by them?

C. The fleſh ſignifies that maſs of body which we carry about with us, that, with all the ſenſes and animal faculties, common to men and other living Creatures: [The luſts of the fleſh] are the deſires and affections, or appetites of that fleſh, which generally deſires and craves thoſe things which are pleaſing to it, that is, to any ſenſe, or part, or faculty of the body; and thoſe, till they are regenerate and ſpiritualized, regulated and brought to hand by the Managery of Reaſon and of the Spirit of God, are generally pleaſed with thoſe things which God forbids, or elſe are more extravagant and exceeding in their appetites than Chriſt permits. And whenſoever the fleſh thus faſtens (being allured by this pleaſant bait) on any thing forbidden by God, or deſires immoderately that which (to the moderate uſe) is not forbidden, this is then a ſinful luſt of the fleſh, and is here renounced by the Chriſtian in his Baptiſm, who promiſes ſo to moderate his deſires, and ſubordinate them to the will of God, that whenſoever they importune or call for any thing which is not thus regular, he will not follow, or be led by them. I ſhall not need to deſcend to particulars of this kind, as the luſts of the fleſh, commonly ſo called by way of appropriation, in order to ſins of incontinence and intemperance; the luſts of the eye, in order to covetouſneſs and inſatiate deſire of riches. Having named the fleſh, and the ſeveral ſenſes and faculties and appetites of that, you will be able to apply thoſe words to all particulars of this nature, and reſolve, when you are tempted and ſollicited by any thing in your ſelf to any act forbidden by Chriſt, that this then is one of theſe ſinful deſires, or luſts of the fleſh, which was in the words of your Baptiſmal-Vow abjured by you.

The ſinful luſts of the fleſh.

S. God grant I may make uſe of your Directions, and Admonitions to this purpoſe, and have accordingly ſuch a watch over my own affections, that ſin gain no entrance by thoſe avenues into my Soul. But having received ſatisfaction fully to one of my propoſed deſires; it remains now that you will allow me the ſame patience and charity, while I propoſe my other difficulty to you, which ſeems to me really to be one, and it was ſuggeſted to me by that explication of the laſt anſwer in the Church-Catechiſm, which gave me occaſion to divert you thus long. And my ſcruple and queſtion is this, not whether it be lawful to baptize Infants, as being unable to understand the Baptismal Vow (for that difficulty you have already cleared to me) but whether it be necessary, or any way useful, so to do, or what authority you have from the Scripture for so doing.

Of Baptism of Infants.

The Apostolical practice therein.

C. The answering the last part of your Quære will, I conceive, take away all scruple in the former, there being no reason to doubt of the either usefulness or necessity of that which we see received into the practice of the Apostolical Church in Scripture. And therefore to give you some light in that matter, I shall not fetch my proofs only from the Analogy between Baptism and Circumcision (though that one Analogy were sufficient to satisfy the importunity of those who think Baptizing of Infants unlawful, upon this ground of their not-understanding their vow: For by that reason, it being as sure that the Jewish child of eight days old could not understand his vow, or what that wickedness was which he then renounced, it must follow, that he could as little be capable of Circumcision) nor again from the foot-steps of the Apostles practice taken notice of in some passages of story in the New Testament (as the Apostles baptizing whole households at once, and the like:) but I shall only give you a short view of one place of Scripture, which seems to me to refer to that matter, and it is that of 1 Cor. 7. 14. For the unbelieving husband [e] hath been sanctified by the (believing) wife, and the unbelieving wife hath been sanctified by the (believing) husband; else were your children unclean, but now are they holy. The thing there insisted on by the Apostle is his judgment, that the Christian husband or wife should not separate from the Heathen wife or husband, as long as the Heathen were content to live with the Christian. And this fourteenth verse is an argument to enforce that advice of his; Because, saith he, by this means it ordinarily comes to pass that the Christian party converts that other (for that sure is the meaning of that phrase [hath been sanctified] not that without being converted he shall be saved by the faith of the other) and this hope (repeated in plainer words, Vers. 16.) or the intuition of the possibility of that, is (as the reason of that former advice here, so) the ground, saith the Apostle, of a known practice of the Church, which he mentions in the latter end of the verse, But now are your children holy; i. e. as I conceive, the Infant children of the Christian parents, (which, were it not upon that forementioned ground of hope and presumption, that living with the Christian parents, they will be taught to know their Vow of Baptism, could not in any reason be differenced from the children of Heathens, or allowed any privilege above them) are now hereby holy, i. e. are now upon this ground thought fit to be baptized without any scruple, whereas the Heathen children, being to live with those Heathen parents, are not thus holy, i. e. are not admitted to Baptism. If this do not sufficiently appear (by this short paraphrase) to be the meaning of the phrase [But now are your children holy] you may then farther (besides the clear force of the context) observe the use of the word here rendred [unclean] in other places: as in that famous place of Acts 10. where Peter refuseth to eat any thing that is common or [f] unclean; where it seems by the sequel, that unclean men are those which are not visible members (and so must not be allowed the privileges) of the Church: For God reforming his error, bids him call nothing (i. e. no man) common or unclean, when God hath cleansed or sanctified (for so [g] holy and clean are all one, as [h] unclean and common) i. e. whom he hath reputed fit to partake of the privilege of preaching there, (in those that were of years, and so capable of that also) or of Baptism here, in those that were capable of no more. By analogy with which place and use of the word, it is most reasonable that [Now are they holy] should signify [Now are your children thought fit to be partakers of the privileges of the Church] i. e. (being capable of no other) of being admitted to Baptism, which the children of Heathens are not. And indeed this is the only difference between them that have thus a Christian parent, and the children of Heathens: For the children of Heathens, if they convert when they come to age, shall then be baptized, and so have that remote capacity now: and there is no imaginable present priviledge for the Christians children above others, upon which one should be said to be holy, and the other unclean, but only this, that these, while they remain children, are admitted to Baptism, the others not. And so this seems to me most naturally to infer (and the rather for the indefiniteness of the speech [But now are your children holy] all the children that live with the Christian parents) that it was then in that Apostles time the general practice of the Church to baptize the Christians children (when they would not the children of those parents which were both Heathen) as counting it reasonable to presume, that the Christians child should be educated in Christian knowledge, (which of the Heathen's child they cannot presume, unless he be taken out of the hand of the parents) and (to the confirming of the assurance that it shall be so) requiring besides the parents, in case they should fail or be negligent, the engagement of some other sureties and undertakers; who, as I said, are only the childrens proxies for the making the vow, (not undertaking for them, that they shall perform it, but taking it in their name) and yet in this other business (of making them know what promise they have made) are absolutely † sureties and undertakers. And by that means, the thing which the Church in baptizing of Infants presumes (and which if it be justly presum'd, there is little farther scruple of the fitness to admit them to Baptism) is secured, as well as any future uncertainty of the greatest value or weight among men is thought fit to be secured, and just in the same manner (by sureties) as those things are which are legally secured among us. By this, I conceive, it may be farther resolved (by the parity of reason) that whenever the child of any Heathen is by any Christian thus undertaken for, he may also very fitly be admitted to Baptism. What I have thus said in this matter, may yet receive some farther weight by comparing with it the custom of the Jews before Christ in their receiving and baptizing of Proselytes, (from which without question, John and Christ took this rite of Baptism.) For, say they, this Baptism belonged not only to those Heathens which being of years and knowledge came over to the Jewish Religion, but also to their Infant children, if their parents and the Congregation under which they were (in whose name it is that the God-fathers or sureties do the same now among us) did desire it in behalf of their children, promising to let them know and understand (when they came of age) what was required of them by their Proselytism, and (as much as in them lay) undertaking that they should not then renounce the Jewish Religion. And this is the very thing that is now practised in all parts of Christendom, and by the Text now mentioned appears, as I conceive, to have been the practice of the Apostles time, i. e. in that age of the first instituting of Baptism, which therefore fore may be deemed herein to have complied diſtinctly with the practice of the Jews, as it did in the Ceremony of water alſo. For it is obſervable that the Hebrew * word which ſignifies to ſanctifie (and ſo is directly anſwerable to the phraſe [Now are they holy] here) is uſed among the Jews [k] for waſhing. To this interpretation of the place I ſhall add no more, but that the notion of holy and unclean there, referring alſo to the legal uncleanneſſes or pollutions (which made the unclean to be ſeparated from the Congregation, excluded them from enjoying the privileges of the Temple till they were waſhed and ſanctified:) this is exactly proportionable alſo to the notion which I have now given you of the words; and accordingly, thoſe that are by Baptiſm admitted into the Church, made partakers of the privileges thereof, will properly be ſaid to be [l] holy, as holy is oppoſite to [m] unclean. Having thus far enlarged on this one place, (which if it were not too long, might farther be cleared by ſhewing the inconvenience of all other interpretations) I ſhall not think it neceſſary to add any more grounds of ſatisfaction to your Quære, laying the whole practice and cuſtom of the preſent Church (for baptizing of Infants) on the practice of the Chriſtian Church in the Apoſtles times, and the continued Canons and practice of the ſucceeding Church in all ages, which required conformity to the Apoſtolical practice, and cenſured all for Hereticks which would not yield conformity therein; which ſure is a competent teſtimony to ſecure us, that this practice or inſtitution of the Apoſtles was not by them meant (as ſome other things) to be but temporary, (the only colour which ſome have made uſe of to aboliſh ſome other eminent Apoſtolick practices or inſtitutions.) To this I might farther add (in anſwer to the former part of your Quære) the benefits and advantages of this practice; as that by this means the child is early admitted to be a partaker of the privileges of the Church and benefits of Chriſtianity, and moſt probably aſcertained by this means to be prepoſſeſſed by the true Chriſtian doctrine, before any Heatheniſh or Heretical principles have time to be inſtilled into him, and the like: which are ſure ſo valuable, and ſo unfit to be neglected by thoſe who have true charity to their children, (and know not whether they ſhall ever live to obtain for them admiſſion to theſe privileges, if they deſpiſe it thus when they may have it) that it cannot but ſignify either great unkindneſs in thoſe parents who, conſidering this, do yet not deſire it for their children; or great perverſeneſs and overweening opinion of their own judgments, (preferring them before the practice and doctrine of the Univerſal Church of Chriſt from the Apoſtles (incluſively) to our preſent age) if after this evidence (and the many more which might be produced in this matter) they yet hold out obſtinately againſt this light, and do not ſeek the Baptiſm of the Church for their tender children, who yet, (in charity we hope) ſhall through the mercy of God be ſecured from ſuffering any eternal evil for or through this default of their parents, of which their own age preſerves them wholly guiltleſs and unblameable.

S. I have enlarged your trouble too far on this firſt Sacrament; I ſhall demonſtrate my willingneſs to leſſen it by haſtening you to the ſecond, in theſe words [Why was the Sacrament of the Lords Supper inſtituted?] What courſe will you think fit to take to expound that to me at the beſt advantage?

Sect. IV. Of the Lord's Supper.

C. If you will take my judgment, this muſt be the method, (which will coſt you ſome attendance.) Firſt, to ſurvey the ſtory of Chriſt's inſtitution of this Sacrament in the Goſpel. Secondly, to obſerve what is ſaid of it by way of ſtory of the Apoſtles practice, Acts 2.46. and 20.7. Thirdly, what S. Paul adds to that in his deſcribing or directing the uſe of it, 1 Cor. 11. 20. and by the way in a ſhort paſſage, Chap. 12. 13. Then fourthly, to ſuperadd the ſame Apoſtles deſcant on thoſe plain ſongs in one notable place, 1 Cor. 16, &c. Fifthly, to ſee what will certainly ariſe from theſe three together: And ſixthly, to apply them (by way of illuſtration and confirmation) to what is ſaid of this matter in the Catechiſm.

S. Be you pleaſed then to obſerve your own geſſes, and begin with your firſt ſtage.

C. I will. And it will not coſt you much patience. For although in three of the Goſpels the ſtory of Chriſts Inſtitution be repeated, yet is there no conſiderable variation in that variety. Some things only are obſervable as circumſtances in the ſetting down the ſtory, ſomething as eſſential and fundamental to the Inſtitution.

Chriſt's Inſtitution of it.

S. Be pleaſed to diſpatch firſt thoſe that are circumſtantial and leſs principal.

C. The firſt of them is, That Jeſus gave that Sacrament to all the Diſciples, even to Judas himſelf, as will appear by all three Goſpels. Matth. 26. 20. He ſate down with the twelve; and verſ. 25. Judas ſpeaks to him; and verſ. 26. Jeſus gave it to the Diſciples, the ſame perſons ſure that had all the while been ſpoken of, there being no mention of his going out as yet: and ver. 27. he bids, Drink ye all of this, not Judas excluded. So Mark 14. 20. the betrayer dipt with him in the diſh; and verſ. 22. as they did eat, Jeſus bleſt and gave to them; and Verſ. 23. they all drank of it. But moſt punctually, Luke 22. After he had given the Bread and Wine, verſ. 19. and 20. it follows verſ. 21. The hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the Table. And that which S. John ſaith to this matter is nothing contrary to this, it being only a relation of his going out (when Chriſt had told John which it was ſhould betray him,) Chap. 13. 30. which was after the delivering the piece of Bread to him, and that ſure was not any part of the Paſchal Supper (which was ſaid to be ended verſ. 2.) but the Poſt-cœnium, in which the Sacrament was inſtituted, agreeable to Luke 22. 21.

Some things in that Circumſtantial. Judas his receiving it.

C. That thoſe that are Chriſtian Profeſſors may be lawfully admitted to the Sacrament, though their hearts be full of villany. This you muſt take warily: I only ſay (from the example of Chriſt, who knew the heart of Judas when he admitted him) that it is lawful to admit ſuch to the Sacrament. It is true, the Chriſtian that ſo comes, eats ruine to himſelf, and ought to reform any ſuch ſin, ſincerely to renounce it, before he thus comes nigh to God in his Sacrament; and if he do not, it is ſo far from doing him good, that it proves his miſchief. Again, it is true that the Governours of the Church, when they ſee any man go on wilfully, ſcandalouſly and impenitently in any ſin, ought to inflict the cenſures of the Church upon him, to withdraw the Sacrament, and uſe other the like means to bring him to a ſenſe and ſhame of himſelf, by way of diſcipline, when they ſee it likely to do good: and in theſe two reſpects it is, that ſuch an one may be juſtly excluded from the Sacrament, by way and out of deſign of Charity to his Soul. But then after all this, if he be not under the cenſures of the Church (which takes off the neceſſity ariſing from the ſecond caſe) and if he will ſtill venture ſo unworthily to that Table, (which lays the guilt arising from the first case peculiarly upon himself) it will not be any new act of sin, (different from either of these) any pollution to the Minister or Communicants, to communicate with him in that Sacrament. So that the only error that I would from hence admonish you to avoid, is the conceit of some, that the communicating with wicked or carnal men, is a sin in the Communicants, a being polluted by their company. It is possible indeed evil company may draw into an imitating of sin, and so pollute. But if it do not so, the very keeping company with them, even in these sacred meetings, is far from being a sin; it is only an acknowledgment that they are of that number whom Christ redeemed, (and so saith S. Peter are they that are damned, 2 Pet. 2. 1.) a joining with them in profession of Christianity (which sure I may do with those who are only professors) a confederating in a vow of living Christian lives (and that I may sincerely and lawfully do with them who are not sincere;) and all these are charitable and Christian acts, and withal tokens of humility, that we are not of that Pharisees humor, so to condemn and triumph over the Publican. And for this practice I conceive we have the Apostles example toward the Corinthians, among whom though there were fornicators, incestuous, 1 Cor. 5. 1. they that went to law among Infidels, Ch. 6. 1. carnal persons, Chap. 3. 3. some that behaved themselves very unchristianly at the Lord's Table, Ch. 11. 21. yet of all these the censure of Excommunication is sent out only against the Incestuous. From whence all that I conclude is, that the communicating with such is not unlawful in a Christian Church. Only he that comes thither, is himself concerned to see that he do it worthily, (which cannot be without leaving all his wilful sins behind him) and the Governour is concerned to exclude him by way of censure, when he thinks that an useful discipline, but is not by that oblig'd never to admit him. First, because the order Christ sets in the eighteenth of Matthew is not to deal so rigorously with him, till after three degrees of admonition (which cannot be done just as a man comes to the Table.) Secondly, because we must not judge others but judicially upon legal process and evidence (which cannot then probably be had neither.) Thirdly, because whosoever sees any man come to that Table, whom he knows to have been guilty of such sins, may very reasonably and by the judgment of Charity think he hath repented of those sins, and comes then with new vows of renovation; (though the truth is, if this last case be wanting, yet will not that make it unlawful to admit him, Christ knowing full well that when Judas received the Sacrament, he was in the full resolution of betraying his Master;) especially when (as in our Church) every man is by the exhortation before the Sacrament advised of the danger of coming unworthily, and so, if he be such, exhorted not to come to this holy Table. Christ communed with Publicans and sinners, and this was charity and humility in him, and a means by converſing with them to reform them; and so may our communicating with them be also.

Communicating with wicked men.

S. What other less material observations have you from hence?

C. This, that it was used by Christ in imitation of the Jews [n] custom after Supper, of distributing bread, and drinking wine about the Table, an argument of Charity and brotherliness among them. And so by instituting it after supper, Luke 22. 20. Christ was pleased to signify to us, that it should be a contesseration of charity among all Christians. Yet doth not this circumstance oblige us to do it at the same time after a meal, any more than the fashion of lying along binds us to the using of the same posture. The antient Christians generally ate it fasting and kneeled when they received it.

The Sacrament given after Supper.

S. Is there any third observation of this kind?

C. There is this, That Christ instituted this after a peculiar Supper, to wit, the Passover, which being a sacrifical feast (of which notion there were many among the Jews and Gentiles, it being common to both those to annex to their sacrifices to God, a feeding with mirth and festivity upon some parts of the sacrifice) and peculiarly commemorative of God's mercy of deliverance to the Israelites out of Egypt, and so very fit to signify the Crucifixion of Christ, that Lamb slain by the Jews, and fed on by us with bitter herbs, a mixture of sowrness in this world (whereupon Christ is called our Passover or Paschal Lamb slain for us.) This Sacrament (which was after the commemorative Passover) is to be conceived a confederation of all Christians one with another, to live piously and charitably, both by commemorating the death of Christ, (who was so good to us, and must expect some return from us, and indeed died for us on purpose that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works) and by making his blood (as it was the fashion in the Eastern Nations) a ceremony of this Covenant, mutual betwixt God and us.

The Sacrament a Federal rite.

S. Is there yet any fourth observation under this head?

C. Yes, That Christ's pleasure was, that all that were present should partake of both Elements in the Sacrament, the Wine as well as Bread; as may appear by the plain words, Drink ye all of this, Matth. 26. 27. and Mark 14. 23. They all drank of it. And if it should be objected that the [All] there, were disciples, and so, that no others have that full priviledge to drink of the Cup, the answer is clear, First, That by this argument the Bread might as well be taken away from all but Disciples too, and so the Laity would have no right to any part of this Sacrament. Secondly, that the practice and writings of the Antient Church, which is the best way to explicate any such difficulty in Scripture, is a clear testimony and proof that both the Bread and the Wine belong to all the people, in the name of his Disciples at that time.

All to partake of both Elements.

S. But why may it not be said, that Lay-men may baptize also, and do those other things for which Christ gave power to his Disciples, as well as this Bread and Wine, divided among the Disciples, should belong to them?

C. The answer is given already, That the Apostolical practice, and the universal consent of the Antient Primitive Church, have defined the one, and defined against the other, and that ought to satisfie any sober man's scruples; it being no way probable that Christ's Institution would be presently frustrated and corrupted by his own Apostles, or their practice so falsified by the Universal Agreement of all that lived next after them, especially there being no Universal Council wherein it were possible for them all uniformly to agree on such an opposition.

S. Is

S. Is there any fifth obſervation of this kind?

C. Yes, the manner of Chriſt's inſtituting this Supper, by way of bleſſing or praiſing God, or giving thanks over it, from whence it is called the Euchariſt. The manner, by way of bleſſing.

S. What doth this import to us?

C. The offering up ſomewhat unto God in imitation of the firſt-fruits under the Law. To which purpoſe you may pleaſe to obſerve the manner of the Sacrament in the firſt Apoſtolical and Antient Church. The Chriſtians, all that were preſent, brought ſome of the good fruits of the earth along with them, and offered them at God's Altar or Table, and the ° Prefect or Biſhop, or, if he were not there, the Presbyter, receiving them as an Abel's offering, bleſſed God for all his mercies, the fruits of the ſeaſon; but above all for the death of Chriſt ſignified by and commemorated in the breaking of the Bread and pouring out of the Wine: and all the people ſaying Amen, the Officer or Attendant, called the Deacon, delivered portions of theſe, to wit, Bread and Wine, to all that were preſent. Then was there a Common Table ſpread for all rich and poor promiſcuouſly, who ate together one common feaſt, and what was left was reſerved by the Prefect for thoſe that ſhould be in want, ſtrangers, orphans, widows, &c. And ſo this was a feaſt of Charity in S. Jude's Epiſtle, verſ. 12. Proportionably to this it is, that every one that comes to the Sacrament ſhould bring ſomething with him, not appear empty before the Lord, or ſerve him of that which coſt him nothing, but always bring ſomewhat to the Treaſury of the Church, for the uſe of the Prefect and Presbyters, in caſe they were not otherwiſe ſufficiently provided for, (and then they were called Oblations, and the place where they were put, the Sacrarium) but in caſe they were, then for the uſe and ſuſtenance of all that are in want. And that this ought not to be neglected by any man of ſubſtance, eſpecially by any Congregation, was the main thing I meant to deduce from this circumſtance. The Offertory.

° προεστὼς Juſt. Mart. Apol. 2.

S. Is there yet any more behind?

C. Yes, to enquire what is the full importance of thoſe words, added in S. Luke, Chap. 22. 19. and repeated by S. Paul, 1 Cor. 11. 24. though not mentioned in the other Goſpels [Do this in remembrance of me.] Do this in remembrance of me.

S. What is the full importance of them?

C. It is, firſt, a Commiſſion given to his Apoſtles to continue this Ceremony (now uſed by him) as an holy Ceremony or Sacrament in the Church for ever. Secondly, a Direction, that (for the manner of obſerving it) they ſhould do to other Chriſtians as he had now done to them, i. e. take, bleſs, break this Bread, take and bleſs this Cup, and then give and diſtribute it to others, (ſetling this on them as part of their office, a branch of that power left them by him, and by them communicable to whom they ſhould think fit after them.) Thirdly, a ſpecifying of the end to which this was deſigned, a commemoration of the death of Chriſt, a repreſenting his Paſſion to God, and a coming before him in his Name, firſt, to offer our Sacrifices of ſupplications and praiſes, in the name of the crucified Jeſus (as of old, both among Jews and Heathens, all their Sacrifices were Rites in and by which they ſupplicated God. See 1 Sam. 13. 12.) and ſecondly, to commemorate that his daily continual Sacrifice, or Interceſſion for us at the right hand of his Father now in Heaven.

S. To whom then doth this office now belong in the Church ever ſince the Apoſtles time? On what ſort of men was it ſettled by them?

C. All that the Scripture reveals to us of this matter is, Chriſts beſtowing or ſettling it on the Apoſtles; whom thereby (and by the coming of the Holy Ghoſt after upon them) we may ſuppoſe inveſted with power, as for the planting a Church, which was to endure after the time of their life to the end of the world, ſo for the appoining and ordaining ſucceſſors to themſelves to preſide and officiate in that Church, and particularly to adminiſter this Sacrament to the people by way of office, to do as Chriſt here did. But who they were, or what ſort of men, on whom the Apoſtles did actually beſtow this power of adminiſtring this Sacrament, this you muſt be content to receive, not from expreſs words of Scripture, but from the Antient Records and Writings of the Church, which begin where the Scripture ends, and are the only way imaginable to inform us of ſuch matters of fact as theſe.

S. For paſſages of ſtory after the Scripture-times, it were unreaſonable for me to expect evidence from Scripture, or any other than ſuch as you now mention, the writings of the Fathers of the Primitive Church: with their relations I ſhall willingly reſt ſatisfied in this matter. I beſeech you therefore, what is the ſum of what you find in them to this purpoſe?

C. That the Apoſtles ſettled in the Church (beſides the Biſhops, who were to ſucceed them in the power of ruling, and Cenſures, in the power of Ordination, &c.) others of an inferiour order, called, within a while, by the diſcriminative title of Presbyters, who in the abſence of the Biſhop, or when licenſed by him, and not otherwiſe, had this power to bleſs the Bread and Wine, and to deliver it, either by their own hands, or the hands of the Deacon (which was an Order founded, Acts 6. but inferior to them) to all Chriſtian Communicants. And ſo this branch of the Apoſtles power and office, with ſome others (not now pertinent to be inſiſted on) may be reſolved (in this forementioned ſubordination to the Biſhop) to be enſtated on Presbyters, and conſequently, that the Presbyters in the Church are thus far the ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles; to whom this commiſſion thus belongs, and with it the duty of adminiſtring this Sacrament to the people committed to their charges, frequently and at fit ſeaſons, and of inſtructing, exciting, and preparing them for a worthy receiving of it. And this is all that I think needful to trouble you with on this ſubject. To whom the adminiſtring this Sacrament belongeth.

S. I thank you for this; and ſhall now ſuppoſe that you have paſt through all the firſt ſort of obſervations, thoſe that are more circumſtantial. What now is that which is the more ſubſtantial difficulty to be explained in thoſe Goſpels?

C. It is to reſolve what is the meaning of Chriſt's words of Inſtitution, This is my body, &c.

S. And what is that?

C. Not

The meaning of This is my Body.

C. Not that the Bread was his Body, and the Wine his Blood, in ſtrict ſpeaking; for he was then in his Body when he ſo ſpake; and when the Diſciples diſtributed it among themſelves, he was not bodily in every of their mouths. And now his Body is in Heaven, and there to be contained till the day of reſtitution of all things, and is not corporally brought down in every Sacrament, either to be joined locally with the Elements, or for the Elements to be changed into it: many contradictions and Barbariſms would be conſequent to ſuch an interpretation. Every loaf of conſecrated bread would be the Body of Chriſt, and ſo the ſame thing be two cubits long, and not two cubits long; and many the like contradictory propoſitions would be all true; which it is generally reſolved to be impoſſible even for God, becauſe it would make him a liar, and be an argument not of power, but imperfection. So again, every Communicant muſt carnally eat mans fleſh and blood, which is ſo ſavage a thing, that S. Auſtine ſaith, That whenſoever words of Scripture ſeem to ſound that way, they muſt otherwiſe be interpreted.

S. What ſence then may, or muſt be put upon them?

C. In anſwering this Queſtion, I ſhall firſt give you an obſervation taken from the Jewiſh Phraſes and cuſtoms uſed in this matter; and it is this, That the Lamb that was dreſt in the Paſchal Supper, and ſet upon the Table, was wont to be called The * Body of the Paſsover, or the † Body of the Paſchal Lamb; and that Chriſt ſeems to allude to this phraſe, when he ſaith, This is my Body; as if he ſhould ſay, The Paſchal Lamb, and the Body of it, (i. e. the preſentation of that on the Table in the Jewiſh feaſt) the memorial of deliverance out of Egypt, and type of my delivering my ſelf to die for you, I will now have abrogated, and by this Bread which I now deliver to you, I give or exhibit to you this other Paſsover, my own ſelf, who am to be ſacrificed (my Body which ſhall preſently be delivered to death) for you, that you may hereafter (in ſtead of that other) retain and continue to poſterity a memorial and ſymbol of me. This for the words [my Body:] but then for the whole phraſe, or form of ſpeech, [This is my body] it ſeems to be anſwerable to (and ſubſtituted in ſtead of) the Paſchal form [* This is the bread of affliction, which our fathers ate in Egypt, or, This is the unleavened bread, &c. or, This is the Paſsover] not that it is that very identical bread which they then ate, but that it is the celebration of that anniverſary feaſt which was then inſtituted, as when in ordinary ſpeech we ſay on Good-friday, and Eaſter-day, This day Chriſt died, and this day Chriſt roſe, when we know that it was ſo many hundred years ſince he died or roſe; which example is adapted to this point in hand by S. Auguſtine in his Epiſtles. Thus much for the phraſe or form of ſpeech; now for the ſence or full importance of the words, [This is my Body] I ſhall by the authority of the Antient Fathers think my ſelf obliged to acknowledge, that the higheſt ſence that will not be ſubject to thoſe intolerable inconveniences mentioned in the anſwer to your laſt queſtion may poſſibly be the ſence of them; and that that which moſt belongs to other places of Scripture, ſpeaking of the ſame matter, muſt in any reaſon be reſolved to be the ſence of them. For the former of theſe, it is certain that many of the Ancient Fathers of the Church conceived very high things of this Sacrament, acknowledged the P Bread and Wine to be changed, and to become other than they were; but not ſo as to be tranſubſtantiate into the Body and Blood of Chriſt, to depart from their own Subſtance, or Figure, or Form, or to ceaſe to be Bread and Wine by that change: And that the faithful do receive the Body and Blood of Chriſt in the Sacrament (which implies not any corporal preſence of Chriſt on the Table, or in the Elements, but God's communicating the crucified Saviour (who is in Heaven bodily, and no where elſe) to us ſinners on the Earth) but this myſtically and after an ineffable manner. And generally they make it a Myſtery, but deſcend not to the revealing of the manner of it, leaving it as a matter of Faith, but not of Senſe, to be believed, but not groſly phanſied or deſcribed. I ſhall leave theſe then, and apply my ſelf to the latter ſort, the other places of Scripture which ſpeak of this matter, reſolving that that muſt be the meaning of the words of Chriſt [This is my Body] which by examination ſhall appear to be moſt agreeable to thoſe other places. And of this ſort of places, you may firſt take the paſſages in the Goſpels themſelves, Luke 22. 20. where Chriſt ſaith of the Cup (not the Wine, but the Cup, which refers to the action, the pouring out and drinking) that it is a new Covenant in his blood which was ſhed for us: which it ſeems is all one in ſence with that other, Mark 14. 24. This is my Blood of the new Covenant which is ſhed for many; and in Matthew, This is my Blood, that of the new Covenant, &c. Which being put together as parallels to interpret one the other, will conclude that Chriſt's Blood was truly ſhed for our benefit, particularly to ſeal a new Covenant betwixt God and us, and that this Sacrament was the exhibiting that Covenant to us: as when God ſaith to Abraham, Gen. 17. 10. This is the Covenant that I will make with you, every male among you ſhall be circumciſed; this Circumciſion is in effect called the Covenant (as here the Cup is the Covenant) i. e. not only the ſign of the Covenant, but a ſeal of it, and an exhibition of it, a real receiving me into Covenant, and making me partaker of the benefits of it. And this you ſhall more fully ſee, if you proceed to the places in S. Paul, eſpecially that 1 Cor. 10. 16. But firſt we muſt deſcend to the next part of our method propoſed, that is, to obſerve what is ſaid of this Sacrament by way of ſtory of the Apoſtles practice, Acts 2. 46. and 20. 7.

S. What is that?

C. In the ſecond of the Acts this is all that is ſaid of it, that continuing daily with one accord (in unanimous Prayer) in the Temple, and breaking Bread in q ſome houſe or room, (as the upper room, Acts 1. 13. aſſigned and ſeparated from all other to that particular uſe, to be the place of Chriſtian Aſſembly, it being by the Jews permitted them to pray in the r Temple, but not to break Bread, or adminiſter the Sacrament there) they did eat their meat with gladneſs, and ſingleneſs, or s liberality, of heart, praiſing God, and t having (or exerciſing) charity toward all the people.

(Having all things common) and conſequents, ver. 34, 35. [No man wanted, &c.] appears to belong to that matter; and therefore the Syriack renders it טוביהא דבת i. e. Bonitas, benignitas, beneficentia multa, though Fabricius rather following the Greek, render it, gratia magna. And ἔχειν is to uſe or exerciſe, as [to him that hath ſhall be given] and [let us have grace] Heb. 12. 28. And therefore the Syriack renders it יתבין גרחמיא dabant in eleemoſyna vel in miſericordia, coram uniuerſo populo; not as *Gu. S. What

S. What do you obſerve from this place?

C. Firſt, the frequency of the Apoſtles receiving the Sacrament, (at that time immediately after Chriſt's Aſcenſion, and the Deſcent of the Spirit) for ought a man can gheſs by the Text, every day, at leaſt every firſt day of the week, at their meeting together. Which although it be acknowledged (as will appear by what you ſhall ſee anon) not to be ſtrictly obligatory to us for the like frequency, yet will much reproach and upbraid our infrequency and negligence in this duty now adays, eſpecially our forſaking ſuch Aſſemblies, going out of the Church oft-times when that Feaſt is prepared, and ready for us, if we did not contemptuouſly depart from it. Frequency of the Apoſtles receiving.

S. What more do you learn from hence?

C. Two ſpecial acceſſories uſed by them, and (as we have reaſon to reſolve) required of us, to make up this ſolemnity.

S. What be they?

C. Firſt, Godly or Chriſtian joy and chearfulneſs in bleſſing and praiſing God for all his benefits, but eſpecially that gracious gift of his Son Chriſt. This is ſet down in two phraſes. Firſt, Receiving food with * gladneſs of heart, Verſ. 46. And the words ſignify firſt a cordial joy and chearfulneſs, then an exceſſive degree and expreſſion of it. Secondly, [x] Praiſing God, ver. 47. or ſinging praiſes to him with lofty and even Poetical expreſſions. Chriſtian joy.

* ἐν ἀγαλλιάσει καρδίας.

[x] αἰνοῦντες θεόν.

S. What is the ſecond thing?

C. The Communicants liberality and charity to thoſe Brethren that are in want. This is expreſſed alſo by two phraſes in the Greek, neither of them fitly rendred in our Engliſh. Firſt, [y] With liberality or frankneſs of heart, a chearful, bounteous, cordial giving. Secondly, [z] Having charity to all the people; by the word which I render [charity] intimating that offertory here and in other places, eſpecially 2 Cor. 8. which was then and ever ſince uſed conſtantly in the Church of Chriſt at the receiving of that Sacrament: and by the phraſe [all the people] ſignifying, firſt, the liberality of thoſe offerings, ſuch as would ſuffice to that end; ſecondly, the impartiality of diſtribution, as in a common table all partaking of what was thus offered, the poor as well as the rich, as you ſhall ſee anon more at large. Liberality.

[z] ἔχοντες χάριν πρὸς ὅλον τὸν λαόν.

S. Will you now proceed to that other place, Acts 20. 7?

C. I will, and that will add but little to what this laſt place hath yielded. The words are theſe, And on the firſt day of the week, when the Diſciples came together to break bread, &c. and there were many lights in the upper Chamber, where they were gathered together, &c.

S. What do you gather from hence?

C. Only this; Firſt, That the Celebration of this Sacrament is called in the Scripture phraſe Breaking of Bread, as before it was, Acts 2. Secondly, that the Lord's day or firſt day of the week was the time ſo early ſet part to this and ſuch holy duties, and that that is the reaſon that S. Paul, 1 Cor. 16. 2. gives the exhortation, That on the firſt day of the week every man ſhould lay aſide his proportional liberality, for the uſe of the poor; Thirdly, That the upper room again was the place of thoſe Chriſtian Aſſemblies: Fourthly, that it is uncertain whether Acts 2. they received daily or no, it being poſſible that the word [daily] there, may belong only to their going to the Temple; or however, that here that frequency doth not appear to be continued, but only every Lord's day once a week, and that ſtill will be a reproach to our ſlackneſs. It is now time to advance from theſe more caſual mentions of this matter to thoſe other more ſolemn Texts, and in the next place according to our method, to obſerve what S. Paul adds to the ſtory of the Inſtitution in the Goſpel, in his deſcribing or directing the uſe of it, 1 Cor. 11. 20, &c. Breaking of Bread.

S. Pleaſe you to do ſo?

C. I ſhall, and to that end briefly give you a paraphraſe of the whole place. Verſ. 20. When you after this inordinate manner (mentioned Verſ. 18, 19.) meet together, this is not to do as becomes Chriſtians, when they eat the Lord's ſupper (or, as the Syriack reads, when they eat and drink on the Lord's day.) Verſ. 21. But as if you were at your own meals, every man of you eateth that which he brought with him; ſo that one eats and drinks more than is fit for him, (viz. the Rich that brought more with him) and another (Poor man that could bring but a little) is well-nigh famiſhed. Verſ. 22. If this be it you will do, you ſhould keep at home, and eat by your ſelves: and to come to the Congregation and do this, is the deſpiſing and ſcorning the Church of God, (where all that is brought is to furniſh a common Table) and withal a ſhaming thoſe poor men that (could bring but little, and) are out of countenance to have done ſo, when you (rich miſers that are by them) have ſuch plenty. What? do you expect to be born with, and not reprehended for this? You are miſtaken, this is a fault in you, (to which purpoſe I will tell you the manner of Chriſt's Inſtitution of the Sacrament, to which thoſe Chriſtian feaſts were annext) Verſ. 23. The Lord delivered down this courſe to me which I deliver to you, viz. That the Lord Jeſus in the night that he was to be delivered up to the Jews, took Bread, and giving thanks over it, brake it, and ſaid, Take, and eat, This (not this Bread, for if that ſhould be the Antecedent, the Greek word is of a Gender that in ſtrictneſs will not bear it, both here and in the Goſpels; but either indefinitely This, or with reſpect to the immediate antecedent, this taking and eating) is my Body which ſhall be delivered (or, as the Syriack, is broken) for you: do this (or, as the Syriack, do thus) in commemoration of me. Where I conceive the literal notation of the words will bear this obſervation, That as the word [a This] in the latter words ſignifies not the Bread, but the whole action or adminiſtration, [Do this] i. e. do you all that I have done in your preſence, take Bread, break, bleſs it, give it to others, and ſo commemorate me: ſo the ſame word [b This] in the former ſpeech [This is my Body] may ſignifie the whole action too, viz. that the breaking and diſtributing, taking and eating this Bread, is the body of Chriſt: (in what ſence you ſhall ſee anon) like as, when Matth. 13. 19. the words literally run thus, [When any one heareth, &c. This it is which is ſowed by the path-ſide] they muſt be thus neceſſarily explained, Any mans hearing, and not conſidering the Word, and the Devil's coming, &c. is the meaning of that which is ſowed by the path-ſide; or yet more plainly, like as verſ. 20. [That which was ſown upon the ſtony parts of the field, this is he that heareth the word, &c.] where it is clear, the ſeed is not anſwerable to the man, but to the word, and

and that ground to the man. But the Seed as it was ſown on the ground, all together, This is he (i. e. this ſignifies him) that hears the word, and receives it with joy, &c. After this it follows, Verſ. 25. So likewiſe he took the cup, having ſupp'd before, (and ſo he did it for ſome peculiar intent, not to ſatisfy thirſt) and gave it them to drink, ſaying, This cup is a new Covenant made with you, and ſealed in my blood, and as oft as you thus drink together in time of holy Aſſembly, give it to others alſo, as I have done to you, and do it in commemoration of me. Verſ. 26. For as oft as you ſhall eat this Bread, and drink this Cup, (ſaith S. Paul by way of concluſion from the premiſſes, for the Syriack ſetting it, ſuffers it not to be part of Chriſt's ſpeech) you do one to another annunciate or proclaim the death of our Lord, till he come again to judge us. Verſ. 27. And therefore whoſoever doth eat of this Bread, or drink of this Cup unworthily, (either not performing the condition required in the Covenant, of which that is the Seal; or breaking the Inſtitution of it in any principal part, particularly in that of the Charity and Liberality here mentioned to thoſe Corinthians) he is ſo far from being benefited by that Sacrament, or that death of Chriſt, that he is rather to be looked on as a man that by this unworthy action had wounded the Lord, contributed farther to the crucifying of him. Verſ. 28. And therefore let a man examine and ſhrive himſelf, and ſee that he come worthily to the Sacrament, both by laying off all his former hainous ſins, and behaving himſelf in that action Chriſtianly, quite otherwiſe than thoſe Corinthians, it ſeems, had done. Verſ. 19. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily (being unworthy by his impenitent ſins to approach to ſo ſacred an Action, or behaving himſelf ſo unchriſtianly there) by thus eating and drinking engageth himſelf to damnation, not conſidering the death of Chriſt, which this was to commemorate, and the end thereof, that he ſhould die unto ſin, and give himſelf up to new life. Verſe 30. The not performing of which is oft puniſhed even in this life, by ſickneſs, diſeaſes, and even exciſion or death it ſelf. Verſe 31. Which are puniſhments of God to bring them to a ſenſe and reformation that nothing elſe will work on. Ver. 32. And ſure, ſuch kinds of puniſhments are in God acts of chaſtiſement, and ſo of mercy, to mend, that he may not condemn; to give us our puniſhment here, that it may not be behind an arrear to be paid hereafter. Verſ. 33. Therefore for the fault which you were firſt told of, that of eating before others, even before they come, engroſſing to your ſelves and deſpiſing others, I beſeech you let that be mended in theſe publick Aſſemblies. Verſ. 34. And for private meals, or eating by your ſelves, let it be at home, for to take them in the Church is a damning ſin. And for other directions, I will give you them when I come among you.

S. What do you chiefly obſerve to me from this place for my farther inſtruction?

C. The punctual confirmation of almoſt every particular before collected from the Goſpel: which although it be no new thing, becauſe it was there delivered, yet in effect teaches us ſomewhat, viz. this, that thoſe other doctrines that according to ſeveral mens phanſies are delivered concerning this Sacrament, having no ground in either of theſe Texts, have not authority from Chriſt, nor yet from S. Paul, (unleſs the other place which is behind will afford them) which what they are, I ſhall no farther tell you than thus negatively; it being my purpoſe only to teach you the poſitive truth to direct your life, not the contrary errors that may ſatisfie your curioſity, or provoke your diſpleaſure againſt any. There is alſo here a great weight laid on a worthy receiving of that Sacrament, and to that end, ſpecial care muſt be taken that we examine our ſelves, come not to that ſpiritual preſence or viſion, as it were, of God, to the renewing of his Covenant with us, with any impurity about us; and as a pawn or pledge of our leaving all other ſins, we muſt ſignifie and expreſs our charity and liberality, and not be guilty of any of thoſe earthly ſins of pride and covetouſneſs, but condeſcend to a common partaking of ſome part of God's mercies with our Brethren.

S. You told me there was another paſſage by the way, Chap. 12. 13. looking this way, what is it?

C. This only, That we have been all made to drink into one Spirit: which by ſome of the Greek Antients hath been thought to refer to the Cup in this Sacrament, (though the truth is, it may ſignify no more than being watered, or irrigation, a conſequent diſtinct from the planting in Baptiſm that went before, in that ſence as it is ſaid that Paul plants and Apollos waters, 1 Cor. 3. 6. where the ſame word is uſed.) And then the plain meaning of it ſeems by the context to be no more than this, That as by Baptiſm we are all entred and incorporate into that one Body, of which Chriſt is head; ſo by the other Sacrament, whatever our particular condition in the Church be, we are received into a participation of that one ſpirit, which furniſhes every order and ſort of men with gifts convenient for their miniſtration; and ſo this Sacrament is an obligation to charity and humility toward one another, neither oppoſing nor contemning one another, as follows in that chapter.

S. Will you now proceed to the fourth part of your propoſed method, and ſee what is to be found to this purpoſe in that ſpecial place, 1 Cor. 10. 16?

C. I ſhall, and for a right underſtanding of it, and collecting that which the context was meant to afford us, you muſt mark that the practice of the Iſraelites firſt in their ſacrifices, and then of the Heathens in theirs, are there brought to convince the truth of what is there ſaid of this Chriſtian Sacrament; and therefore it will be uſeful to obſerve firſt, what it is that is there ſaid of the Iſraelites, then of the Gentiles, and then to apply or bring it home to this buſineſs.

S. What then is it that is ſaid of the Iſraelites?

The Iſraelites ſacrificial Feaſts.

C. It is this obſervation concerning their ſacrifical feaſts, ver. 18. that they that eat any part of them (as when the Prieſt offered up a ſacrifice, ſome parts of the beaſts were eaten together by the people) are conceived to have joined in the ſervice performed by the Prieſt or Sacrificer, and to have right together with him in all the benefits of the ſacrifice; his eating is called Eating before the Lord, and is by God counted as an acceptable ſervice: and whatever flows from God in this caſe by way of benefit or advantage, comes to him as really as to the Prieſt, it being the Prieſts part to ſacrifice, the peoples to eat; and ſo in thoſe two things, there is a mutual reciprocal action betwixt God and them, they ſerve God, and God bleſſes them, and that is called communicating or being partakers of the Altar.

S. What is it that is ſaid of the Heathens?

C. Firſt, That they ſacrifice to their falſe gods, when only the true one ought to have that wor-

ſhip

ſhip from them, Verſ. 20. and 22. and (as by the 22. it appears) that this is a breach of the Second Commandment, for to that refer thoſe two ſpeeches [Do we provoke God to jealouſie?] in reference to his Title there of being a Jealous God;] and [Are we ſtronger than he?] in reference to his Title * God, which ſignifies ſtrong. Secondly, That they which have this mutal conjunction with thoſe falſe gods, are ſuppoſed to receive influxes from them, and to diſclaim expecting any thing from the true one, Verſ. 20. and 21. where alſo the phraſe [The Cup of the Lord] is to be taken notice of, and parallel to that, [The Table of the Lord] to note the action again, and not the elements, as (before I ſhewed you) the [This] ſignifieth. * אל

S. What then is the reſult of both theſe inſtances, together?

C. That they that eat of the ſacrifical feaſt, either of the true or falſe Gods, have a mutual conjunction with them, a kind of confederation, perform ſervices to, and receive influences, benefits and advantages from them, do ſo really from the true God, and are ſuppoſed to do ſo from the falſe; (which is the reaſon why Daniel refuſed to eat of the portion of the Kings meat, Dan. 1. 8. becauſe a part thereof being caſt upon the Altar to the heathen gods, the reſt thereby was conſecrated to them, and ſo was meat offered to an Idol, which a Jew was not to taſte of.)

S. How then will you bring this home to our buſineſs in hand, to the Sacrament?

C. You ſhall ſee, Verſ. 16. for there the Sacrament is ſet down, and the nature and uſe of it. Thus: The Cup of bleſſing which we bleſs, or (as the Syriack) The Cup of praiſe, i. e. the Chalice of Wine, which is in the name of the people offered up by the Biſhop or Presbyter to God with Lauds and Thankſgivings, i. e. that whole Euchariſtical action (and that expreſt to be the action of the people, as well as the Presbyter, by their drinking of it) is the communication of the Blood of Chriſt, a ſervice of theirs to Chriſt, a ſacrifice of thankſgiving, commemorative of that great mercy and bounty of Chriſt in pouring out his Blood for them, and a making them (or a means by Chriſt ordained to make them) partakers of the Blood of Chriſt, not of the guilt of ſhedding it, but (if they come worthily thither) of the benefits that are purchaſed by it, viz. the waſhing away of ſin, in his Blood: ſo in like manner, the [a] breaking and eating of the Bread is a communication of the Body of Chriſt, a ſacrifice commemorative of Chriſt's offering up his Body for us, and a making us partakers, or communicating to us the benefits of that bread of Life, ſtrengthning, and giving us grace. And both theſe parts of each part of this Sacrament put together are (parallel to what was ſaid of the Iſraelites and Gentiles) a mutual confederation betwixt us and the crucified Saviour; on our parts, an acknowledging him for our God, and worſhipping of him; and on his part, the making over to us all the benefits of his Body and Blood, (i. e. his death) grace and pardon, to ſanctify and to juſtify us.

[a] So the phraſe τὸ ἄρτον ὃν κλῶμεν, will be all one with λαβὼν καὶ φαγὼν τὸ ἄρτον, (To take and eat the Bread) proportionably to the notion I gave of ποτήριον and of τοῦτο in the Goſpel, This is my Body, i. e. the taking and eating this Bread, (not this Bread it ſelf) and ſo it will be anſwerable to ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, the Cup, not the Wine, to note the Wine in the Cup ready for drinking.

S. You told me even now that you would ſhew me how the phraſe [This is my Body] in the Goſpel, (interpreted by [this taking and eating is my Body]) was to be underſtood: perhaps it may now be time for you to pay me that debt.

C. It is a fit ſeaſon to do ſo; for this very phraſe of S. Paul's, [The Bread which we break is the Communion of the Body of Chriſt] is the Key to open that difficulty, and indeed perfectly all one, of the very ſame importance with that. This breaking, taking, eating of the Bread, this whole action is the real communication of the Body of Chriſt to me, and is therefore by ſome [b] ancient Writers called by a word which ſignifies the participation, (communication and participation being the ſame, only one referred to the giver, the other to the receiver) the very [c] giving Chriſt's Body to me; that as verily as I eat the bread in my mouth, ſo verily God in Heaven beſtows on me, communicates to me, the Body of the crucified Saviour. And ſo all that I told you of the full ſence of that phraſe [Communication of Chriſt's Body] is again to be repeated here to make up the ſence of thoſe words [This is my Body:] which being ſo largely inlarged on, I need not now to repeat to you.

[b] Damaſcen. Μετάληψις, δι' αὐτῆς τὸ Ἰησοῦ θεότητι μεταλαμβάνομεν.

[c] Ἔχεται σῶμα Χριστοῦ, Chryſoſt.

S. I ſhall ſpare you that pains, and reſt ſatisfied with what you have already afforded me, and now only remember you, that having gone through four parts of your intended method, the fifth is now next to ſucceed, to ſee what will certainly ariſe from theſe four views: Pleaſe you to proceed to that.

The Communication of the Body of Chriſt.

C. I have in effect done it already; yet on condition you will fetch that part, which I told you was more circumſtantial and extrinſecal, from that place where I laid down all on that head together, in the places of the Goſpels, I will now give you a compendium or brief of the main ſubſtantial part of this Sacrament. And that conſiſts only of two branches, one on our parts performed to God, the other on God's part performed to us. That on our part [d] is commemorating the goodneſs of God in all, but eſpecially that his great bounty of giving his Son to die for us: and this commemoration hath two branches, one of praiſe and thankſgiving to him for this mercy, the other of [e] annunciation or ſhewing forth, not only firſt to men, but ſecondly and eſpecially, to God, this ſacrifice of Chriſt's in offering up his body upon the Croſs for us. That which reſpecteth or looks towards men, is a profeſſing of our Faith in the death of Chriſt; that which looks toward God, is our pleading before him that ſacrifice of his own Son, and through that humbly and with affiance requiring the benefits thereof, grace and pardon to be beſtowed upon us. And then God's part is the accepting of this our bounden duty, beſtowing that body and blood of Chriſt upon us, not by ſending it down locally for our bodies to feed on, but really for our Souls to be ſtrengthened and refreſhed by it: as when the Sun is communicated to us, the whole bulk and body of the Sun is not removed out of its ſphere, but the rayes and beams of it, and with them the light and warmth and influences, are really and verily beſtowed or darted out upon us: And all this is the full importance of [This is my Body] or [this is the Communication of his Body.] And ſo I have paſt through the fourth undertaking alſo.

Two branches of the Sacrament.

[d] So the bitter herbs were זכר a memorial of the bitter Egyptian ſervitude, Exod. 1. 14. the uſe of the red wine was לזכר for a memorial that Pharaoh waſhed himſelf in the blood of the children of Iſrael.

[e] So that Precept Exod. 13. 8. is given by Moſes, That on the Paſſover they ſhould annunciate, or tell forth unto their Children, the mercy of their deliverance, (והגדת) and thence they call the Paſchal leſſon הגדה καταγγελίαν Annunciation; and from thence, by a miſtake of a paſſage in Elias Levita, did Scaliger conceive that the night after the fourteenth of the month Niſan was called הגדה, which belongs only to the leſſon then uſed.

S. There is then only a fifth behind, to apply all this by way of illustration and confirmation to what is said of this matter in the Catechism.

C. This will be easily done, you would be able to do it your self; yet I shall go before you in this also.

S. The first Question then is [Why the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was ordained?] and the Answer, [For the continual remembrance of the Sacrifice of the death of Christ, and the benefits which we receive thereby:] What is the meaning of that Answer?

C. Dissolve the words, and you shall see most clearly. First, Christ died: Secondly, this death of his was a sacrifice for us, an Oblation once for all, offered to his Father for us weak sinful men: Thirdly, by this sacrifice we that are true Christians receive unspeakable benefits, as strength to repair our weakness, and enable us to do what God in his Son will accept; and reconciliation, or pardon for us miserable sinners: And fourthly, the end of Christs instituting this Sacrament was on purpose that we might at set times, frequently and constantly returning (for that is the meaning of continual, parallel to the use of [* without ceasing] applyed to the sacrifice among the Jews, and the duty of Prayer among Christians) remember and commemorate before God and Man this sacrifice of the death of Christ.

* ἀδιαλείπτως.

S. The next question, [What is the outward part or sign of the Lord's Supper?] and the Answer [Bread and Wine which the Lord hath commanded to be received] are so plain, that I shall not crave your aid. I conceive it is this, That Bread and Wine is in this, as Water was in the other Sacrament, the Element or outward part, set to signify somewhat else; this appointed by Christ to be eaten and drunk, as the Water to be dipped in, or sprinkled with. And so likewise for the next Question, and first part of the Answer, That the Body and Blood of Christ is the inward part, or thing signified by the other, the Body broken on the Cross signified by the bread broken and eaten, and the Blood poured out on the Cross signified by the Wine poured out into the Cup and drank by us. But then what is the full importance of that which follows in the latter part of that answer, That the Body and Blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received of the faithful in the Lord's Supper?

The Body of Christ verily received.

C. It is this, That in that Sacrament God really bestows, and every faithful prepared Christian as really and truly receives the body and Blood of Christ. As truly as the Bishop or Presbyter gives me the Sacramental Bread and Wine, so truly doth God in Heaven bestow upon me on Earth the Body and Blood of Christ, i.e. the crucified Saviour, not by local motion, but by real communication, not to our teeth, but to our souls; and consequently exhibits, makes over, reaches out unto us all the benefits thereof, all the advantages that flow to us from the death of Christ: The truth of which you had even now confirmed by the words of the Gospel explicated by the plainer expression of Saint Paul, That the Cup was the communication of the Blood of Christ, &c.

The benefits of it.

S. The next Question is plain also [What are the benefits whereof we are partakers thereby?] Be you pleased to explicate the answer to it.

The first.

C. Dissolve it again, and you will do it your self. Thus: The first benefit is the strengthening of our Souls by the Body of Christ, as our bodies are strengthened by Bread. Bread signifies all nourishment for the body, and is called, you know, The staff of life, without which the body is not able to sustain it self, but grows feeble, staggers, and falls into the very grave of death and rottenness, if this staff be not constantly continued to it. Thus is grace to the Soul; we can do nothing that is in order to spiritual life (but fall into sin, custom of sin, the putrefaction of the soul, and so to eternal death) without it: and having forfeited that stock that God had given us in Paradise, we have none of this kind left, but what Christ had by his death purchased for us; and by that great dear bargain of his, there is come into the Church a new stock and staple of grace and strength, for every one that shall in the name of Christ ask it importunately, receive it watchfully, and make use of it diligently; enough, I say, though not to keep us infallibly without sinning any more, (though not to possess us irresistably, and so keep us that we cannot fall) yet to enable us to do that which God in Christ will now graciously accept at our hands, i.e. to serve him sincerely in holiness and renewed righteousness, and to enable us again (if we be not wanting to our selves) to continue and persevere thus to our lives end.

S. You have shewed me the first benefit, but I conceive there is another; What is that?

The second.

C. It is the refreshing of our Souls by the blood of Christ, as our bodies are refreshed with Wine. Wine may be taken in a double propriety, one to refresh the thirsty, another to comfort the sick; as a little was allowed to Timothy for his § frequent sicklinefs. He that pants for thirst, hath his inward flame quenched (and so is refreshed) by Wine; and he that hath any indisposition of body, hath that eased (and so is also refreshed) by Wine. And just thus is the pardon of sin to a thirsty wounded Soul: the conscience of sin is a flame or fire within, and a deep wound to the Soul, and no rest, no quiet under it; and God's free pardon and remission, his speaking peace to the unquiet, his saying [Thy sins are forgiven] to the burthened and sin-sick Soul, is the greatest, only refreshment to that Soul. Let God say this word only, and thy servant shall be healed. And this pardon was wrought by the Blood, i.e. again by the death of Christ, by the sacrifice and satisfaction of that innocent Saviour, by which suffering we are released, by whose stripes healed.

S. But how is this strength and this pardon purchased by Christ's death?

Strength purchased by Christ's death.

C. The strength thus: Christ being in form of God, and equal with God, took upon him the form of a man, all of him but our sins, in this he suffered a shameful death; whereupon, saith the Apostle, God did highly exalt him, rewarded this great humility and patience of his with this dignity and preferment, That all power should be given to him both in Heaven and Earth; that he might dispense to his Disciples all the riches of Heaven, i. e. that sufficient strength and grace which will, being made use of, raise us up from death, spiritual and corporal, enable us to live like Saints here, and raise us to life again hereafter. This power was indeed enstated on him at his Resurrection, but purchased by his Death.

S. How was the pardon of sin purchased?

And Pardon.

C. You have oft heard; by the satisfaction wrought by him in his sufferings, taking upon him to be be our ſurety, and to ſuffer in our ſtead, that as many as are renewed by his grace, may be releaſed by his ſufferings; and from both theſe reſults the conſummation of our hope, everlaſting bliſs in another world: God's mercy (when he is thus reconciled unto us in the Blood of his Son) rewarding every poor mean Chriſtian action of ours with eternal glory.

S. There remains now no more behind, but only the concluding Queſtion, which ſuppoſing theſe benefits thus made over in the Sacrament, but imagining it impoſſible that unworthy, unprepared, prophane receivers ſhould be ever the better for it, asks [What is required of them which come to the Lord's Supper?] What have you to add to that Anſwer that there is given to that Queſtion?

The preparation for worthy receiving.

C. No more but this; That every man is infinitely concerned to have his Soul always poſſeſt with every part of that preparation; that the careleſs oſcitancy and fatal ſtupidity of the world, in never ſo much as conſidering whether they have any of them or no, is a moſt prodigious thing; that the time of preparing our ſelves for the Sacrament (which ought to be frequent, but how frequent is not defined in the Scripture, but left to the judgment of the Church) is a very fit time for that ſelf-examination; that till that be done, and all and each of thoſe graces found ſincere in our hearts, we ought not to come to that holy Sacrament (which yet will not excuſe any for not coming, becauſe he is not prepared, but rather aggravate the ſin upon him, that rather than thus fit himſelf he will part with ſo great a treaſure;) and laſtly, that the particulars of which we muſt thus examine, and which we muſt thus require of our ſelves, are five. 1. True Repentance, (containing ſenſe, ſorrow, humiliation, contrition, confeſſion of all former ſins.) 2. A ſtedfaſt purpoſe to lead a new life, a reſolution to reform all, and that reſolution ſuch as will ſtand faſt in the hour of trial or temptation. 3. A lively faith in God's mercy through Chriſt; a faith, and that a vital one. 4. A thankful remembrance and commemoration of his death. 5. Charity with all men. Every one of which being in their ſeveral due places particularly explained unto you, I ſhall ſuppoſe you ſufficiently inſtructed, and only deſire to oblige you that all this be not laid up to fill your brain, but ſunk down into an honeſt heart, that knowing theſe things, you may be capable of that bliſs that belongs to the doers of them.

O Holy Jeſu, that cameſt down from Heaven, and wert pleaſed to pay that dear Ranſom on the Croſs for us, on purpoſe that thou mighteſt redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto thy ſelf a peculiar people, zealous of good works; We beſeech thee to write thy Law in our hearts, that moſt excellent divine Law of thine, that we may ſee it, and do it, that we may know thee, and the power of thy Reſurrection, and expreſs it in turning every one of us from his iniquities: that we no longer flatter our ſelves with a formal external ſerving of thee, with being hearers of thy Word, partakers of thy Sacraments, profeſſors of thy Truth, knowers or teachers of thy Will; but that we labour to join to theſe an uniform faithful obedience to thy whole Goſpel, a ready chearful ſubjection to thy Kingdom, that thou maiſt rule and reign in our hearts by Faith; and that we being dead unto ſin, and living unto righteouſneſs, may have our fruit unto holineſs, may grow in grace, and in the practical knowledge of thee our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; and at laſt, perſevering unto the laſt, attain to that endleſs glorious end, the reward of our Faith, the fruit of our Labours, the perfection of our Charity, and the crown of our Hope, an everlaſting bleſſed life of love and holineſs with thee, O Father of Mercies, O God of all conſolations, O holy and ſanctifying Spirit, O bleſſed Trinity coeternal. To which one Infinite majeſty we moſt humbly aſcribe the honour, glory, power, praiſe, might, majeſty, and dominion, which through all Ages of the world have been given to him which ſitteth on the Throne, to the Holy Spirit, and to the Lamb for evermore. Amen.

OF THE REASONABLENESS OF Christian Religion.

THE INTRODUCTION.

IT hath always been accounted more Reasonable to doubt of Principles first, and then to throw off the Deductions that naturally arise from them, than to contest the Conclusions when the Principles or Premisses are granted. This occasioned that saying of Picus Mirandula, That the Speculative Atheist was the greatest Prodigy but one, and that was the Practical Atheist. To acknowledge Christian Religion to be true, and, consequently, that without sincere obedience to all Christ's Precepts, not only the infinite rewards of the Gospel are forfeited, but the infinite torments become our portion; and yet to live lives of prophaneness, and luxury, and indulgence to every liberty that suits with our humours, without fear or discomfiture of mind, is a shortness of discourse, that no man that hath consideration enough to examine, or judgment to compare, can chuse but discern and condemn in himself. As therefore the [a] Epicurean that was resolved not to be repress't, or live in the awe of Religion and Priests, counted it but necessary to disbelieve the perpetuity of torments beyond this life; so hath it been Satans method (and the advantage which he hath taken of these times, from the commonness of casting down mounds and hedges, of disputing and questioning the most establisht Truths) to offer it to the Reason and Judgment of his Clients, Whether it be not more easie and hopeful to break up the foundation it self, than, while that remains in its firmness, to demolish that which is erected upon it, and by entangling men in those practices which render them uncapable of receiving benefit by Christianity, to oblige them to endeavour to cast off the doctrines, and to rid themselves from the ill consequences of it. Thus have some men taught themselves the skill and dexterity of unravelling principles, and by giving themselves liberty to disobey Christ in some pleasant or gainful particulars, have at last in their own defence (that they may salve their Phænomena, and appear congruous to themselves) arrived calmly to the Scorners chair, the casting off Christianity it self. Sect. 1.

[a] —nam si nullum finem esse putarent Ærumnarum hominis, nullâ ratione valerent Religionibus atque minis obsistere vatum. Lucret. l. 1.

In stead of gainless Complaints, I shall therefore hasten to give some check to this growing evil, and reduce the whole matter of debate to these two heads. Sect. 2.

First, I shall consider the Grounds of Christianity in the gross, or bulk, all of it together, and in some measure justify the reasonableness of them; and then secondly, I shall descend, in the retail, to the survey and vindication of those particular branches of Christianity which appear to men at this time to be least supported with Reason. Sect. 3.

CHAP.

CHAP. I.

The Grounds of Christianity, or the Reasons upon which men embrace Christian Religion in the gross, all of it together.

Sect. 1. IN lieu of the many grounds (or several branches and improvements of the same one complicated ground) which [a] other men have very rationally enlarged on, this present discourse (which desires not to expatiate, nor to suppose the Reader to have renounced his Christianity wholly) shall confine it self to these two heads: First, the Testimony on which Christianity is built; secondly, the advantages that those which embrace it shall reap by it. The first will render the belief rational, and conclude it impious to doubt of it. The second will render the belief gainful, and conclude it most uncharitable to our selves, yea, and unsafe and treacherous, not to adhere to it. The first will pronounce it, with the Apostle, A faithful saying; the second, worthy of all acceptation. The first will reconcile it to our brains, the second to our hearts. The first will give it possession of our understandings; the second will ravish our wills with the beauty and lustre of it.

Sect. 2. The Testimony on which we believe Christianity, i. e. on which we believe that Christ was sent from God, to reveal his Father's will unto us, and to be believed in all that he delivered to the World (which when it is believed, it necessarily follows, that all and every part of Christian Religion is infallibly true, and capable of no farther doubting) is the most important and convincing of belief, or faith, which can be imagined.

Sect. 3. For if the Apostle had not said it, it is yet in it self most evident to common sense, That Faith cometh by hearing, i. e. that I cannot believe any thing to be true on any better, nay on any other ground but only that I hear it thus affirmed. And as the affirmation is, such is the belief: If the affirmation be from a fallible person, from a meer man, the belief must be a fallible belief; but if the person affirming be infallible, then is the belief infallible also.

Sect. 4. That infallible Affirmer is but one, viz. God, of whose nature it is to be veracious, to be able to do any thing but to lie, which was also affirmed by Christ out of the Principles of common nature, Let God be true, and every man a liar; i. e. though no infallibility of testimony can be attributed to any meer man, yet whatsoever is testified by God, doth certainly deserve to be fully credited.

Sect. 5. And therefore if God shall testify the truth of any thing, there can be no farther scruple or possibility of doubting, or suspecting the truth of what is so testified, than there is actual doubt whether the God of Heaven be God, or whether the God of truth be the father of lies: which as it is a degree above the denying of Christ, and above the infidelity either of the Jew, or Mahometan, or even of Heathenism it self, in that notion wherein it signifies the [b] acknowledgment of more gods than one, (for all that have adored any deity have acknowledged that God, or gods, to [c] speak nothing but truth) so is the pretending to it peculiar to very few since the beginning of the World. There being not many that appear in story to have affirmed that there is no God at all, and those not able to perswade others that they did believe themselves when they so affirmed.

Sect. 6. Now this affirmation or testification of God, that Christ was sent from him to declare his Will to us, &c. (upon which, being once supposed, the truth of all Christian Religion truly so called is immediately and infallibly founded) hath more than one way been authentically interposed. Such are the many repeated testimonies of the Prophets in the Old Testament (which finding a perfect completion in Christ, and none but Christ, do amount to a divine testimony.) Such was the coming of the Angel to Mary the Mother of Christ, and to Elizabeth the Mother of John Baptist, in the New Testament, as also the Star which lighted the wise men of the East unto him, (and of which the [d] Heathens themselves have affirmed, not only that it was a special Star that never before appeared in the Heaven, but also that it had a portentous significancy, pointing at the descent of a venerable God, for the salvation of men, and the good of Mortals.) So again that of the Miracles wrought by Christ and his Apostles, which are another kind of God's speaking to us in men, and upon Earth (particularly that of raising the dead) and are by the Apostles styled, what in reason they are, Demonstrations, Acts 2. 22. and testifications of God himself, Heb. 2. 4. But above all, his own Resurrection out of the Grave, after he had been crucified by them. God by thus raising him is said (most truly according to the dictates of Reason) to have [e] given to all men Faith, i. e. an argument of full conviction, that he was what he pretended to be, and so to * set him out as the person to be believed on, † being powerfully and determinately pointed out by that great act, to be the Son of God. But because all of these would much lengthen this discourse above the designed proportion, and because each of them is largely insisted on by others, and because no testimony is ordinarily deemed more Authentick than that audible voice, I shall therefore chuse principally to insist on that one ordinary way of God's testifying to men, known to the Jews by the title of בת קול the daughter of voice, or of thunder, i. e. a Revelation from Heaven delivered in (or coming out of the midst of) thunder, which, say the Jews, was the special way of God's revealing himself under the second Temple.

[d] Est quoque alia venerabilior & sanctior historia, quæ perhibet ortu stellæ cujusdam insolitæ non morbos moresq; prænuntiatos, sed descensum Dei venerabilis ad humanæ servationis (without question ἀνθρωπίνης σωτηρίας in the Greek, though that be not extant) rerumque mortalium gratiam, quam à Chaldæis observatam fuisse testantur, qui Deum nuper natum muneribus venerati sunt. Chalcidius in Plat. Timæum, p. 219.

[e] Πίστιν παρασχὼν πᾶσιν, Acts 17. 31. * ἐγείρατα αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν, καὶ δόξαν αὐτῷ δόντα, ὥστε τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν εἶναι εἰς θεόν, 1 Pet. 1. 21. † ὁρισθέντος υἱοῦ θεοῦ ἐν δυνάμει, ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν, Rom. 1. 4.

Sect. 7. And by this, God three times gave testimony to Christ. First, immediately after his Baptism, Behold, the heavens were opened to him, i. e. visibly and miraculously parted asunder, and he, i. e. John that baptized him, saw the Spirit of God descending like a Dove, and coming upon him, i. e. descending, as a Dove descends upon any thing, visibly hovering and lighting on him, And behold, a voice out of the Heavens saying; i. e. as the Heavens parted asunder, a clap of thunder came out, and with it a voice voice delivering these words, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, i. e. this is my Son whom I have sent; his coming to the world and his undertaking is perfectly agreeable to, and hath its original wholly from, my Will. From which Testimony of God's it is consequent, That whatsoever he teaches, comes from God, and is to be embraced as that which is perfectly his Will and Law. And it is observable that in one of the old Prophecies of the Messiah, where it is foretold that God's spirit shall descend upon him, it is affirmed almost in the very words which were here said to come out of the thunder, that this was God's beloved, in whom his Soul (i. e. he) was well pleased.

So again a Second time, in the presence of three sober men (which was the number by which the weightiest matters were authentically testified) Peter, and James, and John, being all with him in a Mountain, Behold a lightsome cloud overshadowed them, and a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased: hear him. Giving an unquestioned Authority to all that should ever come from him after. Sect. 8.

Thirdly, at a time not long before his death, when he was a praying to his Father to glorify his Name, A voice came from Heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. And of them that stood by, some said that it thundred; others, that it was an Angel that spake to him. From both which it is easily concluded, That God, whether by, or without the Ministry of an Angel, was heard to speak to him out of the Thunder. Sect. 9.

What was thus done personally to Christ, was with some small variation promised, (and so by John Baptist first foretold) that it should be performed (after his departure) to his Apostles or Disciples, who were to preach his Doctrine, and what they knew of him, after his going out of this world: and accordingly, in the very manner which was foretold it came to pass, and all other things foretold by him did punctually follow. For as they were all together, there was suddenly a noise from Heaven, as of a violent wind, and filled the whole house where they sate. And so this (styled the [h] Baptizing them with the Holy Ghost, i. e. Receiving them with a far higher Ceremony than that of Baptism, viz. with a shining glorious descent of the Spirit of God upon them) did at once give them their Commission from Heaven, and was a testimony of God himself, That what they should teach from Christ, was the very doctrine which God required to be embraced by the World. Sect. 10. [h] Acts 1. 5.

And of this sort there was yet farther one most eminent passage. A known and eminent Jew, one Saul, who by his Sect (a Pharisee) and by his extraordinary warmth and zeal to the Jewish Law, in opposition to Christianity, had interessed himself profestly in the persecuting of it, had a principal hand in the putting Saint Stephen to death, (as appears by the witnesses laying their garments at his feet, Act. 7. 58.) and was engaged in a most vehement bloody design against the Christians in Damascus, and having gotten Letters of Commission from the High Priest to that purpose, Acts 9. 1. was now very rageful upon his way thither: This man, thus breathing out threatnings and slaughters against the Church, and as he was close to Damascus, his journeys end, on a sudden a light from Heaven shone about him, like lightning flashing about his ears; and falling to the ground, by that means he heard a voice saying to him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? in words so convincingly delivered, that he knew assuredly that it was God that by an Angel thus appeared and spake to him: and thereupon he gave answer immediately, Who art thou, Lord? The voice replyed, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest, with the addition of other words, which struck him into such an horror, that immediately trembling, and in an agony of Passion, he said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And was again answered what he should do, Go unto the City, and there he should receive particular directions. Which accordingly happened, and this person became immediately a prime Apostle, or Preacher of Christianity. This thing was not done privately, but every circumstance of the story was publickly known at that time: his Letters from the High Priest were known to the Sanhedrin; and before he came to Damascus, the news of them was come thither, so far, that Ananias a Christian there, that in a Vision from God was bid to go to him in such an house, made this objection against obeying the command, That this was the man that had done so much mischief, and was now come with such a Commission to apprehend all that profest the worship of Christ in that place. And besides, there was company with him on the way when the Prodigy befel him, and all they heard the voice, and saw no body, ver. 7. 'Tis true indeed, that in one relation of that passage, Acts 22. 9. it is said, that they heard not the voice. But that (as all other seeming contradictions of the Scripture) is easily salved by observing, that the word קול in Hebrew, which signifies a voice, signifies thunder also, as Hebr. 12. 26. Whose voice, i. e. Thunder, shaketh the earth; and so very often. And so where it is said, that they heard the voice, the sence is, that they heard the thunder, which was joined with the lightning that flasht about him: and when it is said, they heard not the voice, it is expresst in the place what is meant by it, they heard not the voice of him that spake to him, i. e. the voice of Christ immediately appearing from Heaven, and calling unto him, Saul, Saul, &c. but only saw the lightning, and heard the thunder: but what was said to him, he only heard that was concerned in it; but by the effects, his answers, and consequent charge, they easily discerned that also, though they heard it not. This story did this man always avow as a notorious truth, whensoever he was called in question by Jews or Romans for preaching Christ; and there was never any question made of the truth of it: And this went for his Commission to be an Apostle of Christ; and he never sought for any other; and after doing more service in the Church than all the rest of Christ's own (regularly chosen, and designed) Apostles, he at last laid down his life for the Testimony of that Truth which before this he had so sharply persecuted. Sect. 11.

This is not all yet; for at the beginning of the diffusion of the Gospel to the Gentile World, and for the declaring of God's Will in that particular, there was not only a Vision to Cornelius, and an Ecstasy, and an audible Voice from Heaven to Saint Peter, in these words, Arise, Peter, kill and eat, (the obscurity of which words, and of the Representation to which they belonged, was presently interpreted by the Effect:) but beyond both these, it follows, That at the preaching of Peter to Cornelius and the rest of his Company of Gentile Believers, the Holy Ghost fell on all that heard the Word, i. e. probably, came down upon them in some way of visible Appearance, (the like * as before had befaln the Apostles;) or if not so, yet in such manner as evidenced it self by giving them power of speaking strange languages, and other Gifts and Graces, fitting them for several conditions in the Church. Sect. 12. Church. And this was ſeen by the Jews, that were very far from being inclinable to believe ſuch a thing of Gentiles, and being convinced by the evidence, [k] were aſtoniſhed at it, rapt with admiration at the ſtrangeneſs, but no way doubting the truth of it. And it ſo fell out, that Peter afterwards being called in queſtion by other Jews, for what he had then done in Preaching to Gentiles, (which they thought utterly unlawful) by this relation of the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt upon thoſe Gentiles, [l] he ſatisfied them; which ſure he could not have done, if there had remained any doubt of the truth of it. And the ſame fell out again to the Epheſian-Diſciples, and the truth that it did ſo was evidenced, by their ſpeaking all ſtrange languages (which they had never learned) and propheſying. Two Gifts which were ſo conſtant conſequents of that coming of the Holy Ghoſt on any, that they teſtified it convincingly to thoſe that had no evidence of the fact.

Sect. 13. The Propriety of this Deſcent to this turn, and to that other grand one of giving Commiſſions (and authorizing, and ſo teſtifying the truth of all that ſhould be taught by them on whom the Spirit thus deſcended) may perhaps be better underſtood, by remembring the Cuſtoms appointed by God among the Jews. Thoſe that were among them called to be Prophets out of their Schools, were aſſumed and conſecrated to it by Anointing, (a Ceremony of advancing to ſome eminent Office; and therefore the Chaldee Paraphraſe for Unction, reads ordinarily רבא Advancement.) Now for many years before this coming of Chriſt, Prophecy had failed among the Jews. Under the ſecond Temple, ſay they, there was no Oyl, nor any [m] way of Revelation, ſave only that of the voice from Heaven. Now therefore when God was thus pleaſed to ſend his Son, to reveal his compleat Will unto the World, and from him to continue the ſame by his Apoſtles and others after him; inſtead of that ſolemn Ceremony of Unction, is this viſible Deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt on him and on them in a ſhining fiery Cloud, and with it theſe words of Conſecration to Chriſt, This is my Beloved Son, &c. and in lieu of that voice, the gift of Tongues to the Apoſtles and others. This was foretold by one of the Jewiſh Prophets long before, That the Lord ſhould anoint him to preach, and that the Spirit of the Lord ſhould be upon him, i. e. that he ſhould be anointed, i. e. ordained, to this Office of Preaching God's Will, not by material Oyl, but ſpiritual Unction, by the real Deſcent of the Spirit of God upon him. And accordingly one of his Diſciples, Saint John, being to confute a ſort of Antichriſtian Hereticks of his time, which denied Chriſt to be come really in the fleſh, uſeth no other argument (to fortify them to whom he writes) but onely the mention of this Teſtimony from Heaven, this Deſcent on Chriſt and the Apoſtles, and others who had inſtructed them in Chriſtianity; which he veils under the title of the Unction, viz. that unction vulgarly known among them by that name; the [n] Unction from the holy One, as he calls it, i. e. from God in Heaven, by which (as by their Teachers it had been communicated to them) they knew all things, (i. e. were ſure that the Doctrine they had been taught was true) and needed not to be taught by any, i. e. wanted no more Arguments to confirm this truth unto them: That unction, as he farther adds, teaching them of all, i. e. giving them ſufficient inſtructions in that matter, and in all other ſuch Fundamental Truths of the Chriſtian Doctrine, teſtified to them by thoſe who had been thus anointed immediately from Heaven, authorized to teach them Truth. This ſame again, as far as concerned Chriſt, is by another [o] Evangelical Writer joined with his working of Miracles, and called God's anointing him with the Holy Ghoſt and with Power, (as in [p] another place God's anointing him, alone) which is directly the ſame with that other phraſe uſed by Saint Paul, the [q] demonſtration of the Spirit, and of power, the Deſcent of the Spirit, and working of Miracles: the two things which he urged to the Jews or Heathens whereſoever he preached, (as things which he was ſure they could no more contradict than Demonſtrations themſelves, there being ſo many then alive that could witneſs the truth of them.) In which reſpect, he after tells them of God's having confirmed them into Chriſt, and anointed and ſealed them; all in the ſame ſence, to ſignify God's having afforded them theſe convincing Teſtimonies of the truth of Chriſtianity, preached to them by thoſe on whom the Holy Ghoſt had deſcended, and who wrought Miracles among them.

[q] 1 Cor. 2. 4.

Sect. 14. That this was a very competent Confirmation of the Doctrine of Chriſt, may yet farther appear by conſidering, firſt, the Perſons to whom this was to be done, the then Church of God, the people of the Jews, which were acquainted with his Voices, and his Prophets, and his Oeconomies formerly among them: Secondly, the matter that was thus to be confirmed, no greater change than to which this way of atteſtation may in reaſon be deemed abundantly proportionable. For the things to be believed, only the real completion of ſome things which had been before foretold, and the revealing ſome truths which had been more obſcurely repreſented in the Old Teſtament; and then thoſe, how high and myſterious ſoever, yet being clearly revealed by Chriſt and the Apoſtles in the New, and the explicite belief of them no further required of any than in proportion to the degree of the revelation of them; the revealing of them muſt be looked on as the ſatisfying of an appetite, a deſire of more knowledge (which is naturally in all men, and is ſharpned by the having received ſome imperfect rayes of it) and conſequently ſhould not in reaſon be expected to be atteſted with ſuch a pomp of ſigns and prodigies, as impoſitions of Tasks and Exactings of obediences are wont to be. Then for the things to be done in Chriſtianity, the duties and obſervances; It is again conſiderable, that the change in that reſpect was not ſuch as would denominate it a new Religion, but onely the reforming and perfecting that which was before received among the Jews, and the making it more tolerable and eaſie to be received by other parts of the (Gentile) World. The worſhip of the One True God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, (contrary to the falſe worſhips of the many gods and idols of the Heathens, and to all the unnatural luſts attending them) had been ſufficiently teſtified to the Nation of the Jews by many voices from Heaven, and undeniable atteſtations of God himſelf (and indeed to other Nations by the fearful, miraculous judgments ſhewn in Egypt, and on the Canaanites, under the conduct of Moſes and Joſhua, &c.) and by God's continual reſiding among that people, and his atteſting that by the Urim and Thummim, by the ſeveral Prophets ſent by him, and the other ways of revelations. And to thoſe that granted all this it was foretold (ſo often that no Jew doubted of it) that there ſhould come days of Reformation, that there ſhould come a Meſſias. This was long ago promiſed through all paſſages of their ſtory: to Adam under the title of the Seed of the woman; to

Sem,

Sem, that God should dwell or pitch his tabernacle in the Tents of Sem, take flesh upon him in his family; to Abraham, to Judah, to David, and all along through the writings of their Prophets. Concerning this Messias their carnal hearts had pre-conceived some Mistakes, as that he should be a glorious King here, and make them again (after their being subdued by the Romans) a most victorious, glorious people on Earth, and this howsoever they demeaned themselves, only by the priviledge of having Abraham (to whom great promises were made) to their Father. At last this Messias (otherwise described by their Prophets, as one that should come in a mean and lowly manner, no way desireable to the eye of the world, Isa. 53.) comes just as he had been foretold, a Forerunner being sent before him, on purpose to prepare his way, to dispossess them of their fond perswasions of their absolute election by having Abraham to their father, and pointing him out particularly as the Son of God, the Messias that was now to be received (as he had been so greedily and so long expected) by them. This Forerunner that thus foretold, and after pointed him out, was (as they that crucified Christ confess) by all the [r] Jews taken for a Prophet. And moreover to this testimony of this acknowledged Prophet, comes in the addition of the miraculous descent of the holy Spirit, and the voice from Heaven, and all that hath been mentioned consequent to that. And to those among whom this had always been acknowledged an authentick way of attesting God's Will, nothing could be more required but this. Christ then (or God himself in humane Nature, assumed of a Virgin, and born after a supernatural manner) when he came to thirty years old (the age of a Doctor among that people) sets to this business which it was foretold he should perform, tells them how the former Law was to be reformed, (and especially their former lives, from external observances to internal purities) and how to be filled up and perfected in some particulars; and then lightly changes some ceremonies customary among them, and accommodates them to present use, removes the wall of division which had been between them and all the rest of the world, shews them that that was meant only to keep them from imitating the Heathens sins, and now that there was more need that Heathens and they should love one another, and join to reform both their lives, and practise Christian vertues, than keep that supercilious distance from one another; and in a word, he brings the whole matter to such a model, as all other men but the Jews like extremely better than that which was before among them, and consequently, come in in sholes at the preaching of it: and the Jews that do not so, acknowledge the only reason why they do not, to be their zeal to their law of outward performances, and the perswasion of their absolute election; that is, in effect, that they had no other quarrel to him, but only that he did not teach the doctrines that they liked and were before imbued with, which if he had, he had by that very means done contrary to the prophecies by them allowed of, which foretold he should work a Reformation. Upon these unreasonable terms they crucify him: and by their doing so, more wonderful attestations yet are given to all this. In his very death the Sun is miraculously eclipsed, at a time of the Moon when by nature it was absolutely impossible, and so far against all rules of Astronomy, that learned men in other places took notice of it to be a violence done to Nature, which must signify some great matter. Then a prodigy befalls the Temple, and that a very significant one. Then the bodies of many dead men arise and go to Jerusalem, and are seen by many. But above all, he himself riseth from the dead, and Angels again are sent to give notice of it: and those that at his death had feared themselves deluded (as adversity is a great temptation, and by Christ himself foretold to be so) are every one of them confirmed by seeing, touching, talking with him: and what is seen and testified by them, was seen also by five hundred persons at once, which lived many years to attest the truth to all that doubted it. And at length (which was the most immediate testification of the truth of all the former) he is bodily and visibly taken up into Heaven, before their eyes.

[r] Matth 21. 26.

When that was done, there was but one imaginable method behind, that, according as he had promised while he was upon earth, he should, being himself departed, send the Paraclet, which by descending visibly upon the Apostles, and by endowing them with the gift of doing Miracles, and of speaking of all Languages, which they were known never to have learnt, should enable them to convince the world, by the testimony of Christ's Resurrection and Ascension, and destroying of Satan by his death (the most improbable means of working victories) that he was the Messias foretold, that Seed of the Woman that should break the Serpent's head. On strength of this, they which so lately doubted, now chearfully lay down their lives in testifying of all these truths: And those Jews that did not yet believe on him were, according to his distinct Predictions many times repeated (they, their Temple in which they trusted, their City, their whole Nation, and infinite multitudes of them, whersoever they were found) most stupendiously destroyed by the Roman Eagles or Legions. All this (thus hastily put together, so as necessarily to omit many weighty circumstances under every head) is sure prodigy enough to attest and authorize no greater a change than the clearer Revelation of some obscurer Truths, the confutation of some false Doctrines, and the Reformation of some Ceremonies, and the perfecting and heightning of some Laws less perfect before, and the instituting of a few useful Ceremonies in stead of many burthensome ones, can be thought to amount to. Sect. 15.

This first ground of believing Christianity being thus mentioned, is not capable of any dispute from any reasonable man, unless from him which shall question whether this be not fabulous in the relation; i. e. whether first there were ever indeed heard such voices; or secondly, whether they were not delusions of the hearers, or at least the voice of some other, and not of God. And to him that shall make the former scruple I shall be able to give as satisfactory an answer as is possible to be given of a matter of this nature, of any the lightest or weightiest consequence; to a matter of this nature, I say, i. e. of a matter of fact, (for such it must needs be, that such a voice was heard from Heaven) and that fact past so many hundred years ago. For first, that fact was of necessity to be confined to some determinate time and place, to be done somewhere, and why not in Judea, where it is said to be done? to be seen by some particular men, and by them of necessity (if it were to be known) to be attested to others: nay, if it had been done so as to be heard and seen by the whole World then living (though that this should point out that one person Jesus, would not be well reconcileable with Sect. 16.

that, becauſe his body could not be in every place) yet could not the next Age come to know this; but muſt be forced to make uſe of the atteſtation of men of that Age to reveal it to them, and ſo proceed by the very way that now is allowed us, that of faith or believing. For ſecondly, ſhould there at this hour come the like voice from Heaven, in the hearing of any the moſt credible honeſt men of this Age, what way would be expected to convince the Ages to come (who ſhould not be preſent to hear it) of the truth of this, but by the conſtant affirmation of thoſe who are now ear-witneſſes of it, and by their committing all this to writing now, ſo that all that ſhould now live, and ſuſpect, or believe it a forgery, might be able to examine and diſcover the truth of it; eſpecially, if to that they ſhould join the doing of the greateſt Miracles, which coming only from God, cannot be conceived to be by him allowed to aſſiſt the bringing a lie into the World.

Sect. 17. Beyond ſuch teſtimony of eye or ear-witneſſes thus publickly and authoritatively proteſted, and conveighed to poſterity, there is no rational evidence imaginable for thoſe that lived not in that Age; nor do men at any time exact or require any more authentick proof of matter of fact or ground of believing any thing. For as to the voice of God again from Heaven, (which alone can pretend to be above this) this is not at all commodious to this turn; for this were for God to multiply prodigies improperly and unſeaſonably, 'tis ſure unneceſſarily, and to all that were not preſent this would be again as queſtionable as the former.

Sect. 18. For the teſtifying an high important Truth, which cannot otherwiſe be known, God hath been pleaſed thus perſonally to interpoſe his own Power and Authority, and to ſpeak from Heaven, yea, and to repeat that again and again, that there may no matter of doubt remain concerning it: But when that hath been thus done by God ſufficiently, then are there ſufficient humane means to convey the truth or hiſtory of this fact to other men, viz. the teſtimony of thoſe that ſaw or heard it. And as it were ridiculous to ſuppoſe or expect from God, that he ſhould teſtify from Heaven, that ſuch men did hear that former voice from Heaven; ſo the ſame Law of God and Nature which forbids lying as ſinful, forbids alſo Incredulity as irrational, when a thing is by unſuſpected witneſſes, upon certain knowledge, with ſo many improvements and advantages thus ſufficiently teſtified. And if God upon mans ſeveral incredulities ſhould be ſtill obliged to give witneſs to his Truths by his own voice, then ſhould he cut off that Rule for Belief, which in all other things (agreeably to the dictates of reaſonable Nature) he hath made ſtanding among men. And in this caſe to require any higher teſtimony, were the ſame inconvenient abſurdity as not to believe any thing upon any other ground than that of ſight (which is indeed to miſtake knowledge for belief, or evidence for adherence, and muſt neceſſarily leave nothing of vertue rewardable in that Faith which is ſo violently and unavoidably produced) or to expect a voice from Heaven to give me daily aſſurance of all the paſſages or relations of Hiſtory, and not to believe that there was ſuch a man as Alexander, or Caſar, or William the Conqueror, or Elizabeth the late (but before our birth) Queen of this Kingdom, unleſs ſome voice of God from Heaven atteſt it to me.

Sect. 19. They that cannot believe at any cheaper rate than of a new minutely Prodigy from Heaven, for every act of believing, a Prodigy from Heaven, or (more plainly) they that will not believe any thing but what they know, muſt be fed alſo as well as taught by Miracle, or elſe muſt be obliged to abſtinence (greater than any man inflicts upon himſelf) by continuing conſtant to that Principle. For no man hath Demonſtration, or Infallibility, or Evidence, for his ſafety in any bit of meat that he eats, or the firmneſs of any floor he ſtands on; it being always poſſible, that what doth moſt nouriſh and ſuſtain, might by ſome poiſonous mixture ſmite and deſtroy; that the roof that covers and protects might minutely over-whelm and bury us: yet are we not ſuch Hypochondriacks in theſe matters of daily uſe, (and in them that are, it is interpreted an eminent defect or decay of Reaſon, and not an higher pitch of it) as to deprive our ſelves of the benefit of food and raiment upon conſideration of theſe remote poſſible dangers, nor to fear all things, but what we know infallibly.

Sect. 20. And if it ſhall be ſaid that Eating is neceſſary for the Preſervation of Life, and that that Conſideration makes it reaſonable to truſt on thoſe grounds, becauſe by diſtruſting we ſhould ſubject our ſelves to a certainty of that whereof the other is at moſt but an hazard; I anſwer, Firſt, that this Inſtance was produced only to ſhew that we think it reaſonable, without fear or doubt, to rely on ſome things for which we have no demonſtration or knowledge of the impoſſibility of the contrary; and that is ſtill proved by this inſtance, though it be granted that eating is neceſſary; becauſe if the neceſſity of eating were the cauſe that made men venture that hazard, they ſhould never venture it till they were neceſſarily to ſtarve without it; and when they did ſo, they ſhould do it with continual doubt, and fear of the poſſible danger: neither of which are thought rational, nor practiſed by conſidering men. And ſecondly, the interpretation of [being fed] in the inſtance, was [the whole courſe of men in feeding,] which is not the proportioning of food to the neceſſities of life, or the Leſſian or Cornarian diet, but the free manner of feeding among men, ſuch as was parallel'd to the ſtanding on a floor that might poſſibly fall, that is, being in an upper room; which being not at all neceſſary to life, and withal poſſible in nature that it ſhall minutely be our death, is yet made uſe of among all wiſe men with as much confidence and fearleſneſs as it is expected of us that we ſhould believe the Goſpel.

Sect. 21. This may be enlarged to the ſeveral buſineſſes of the World, wherein all men act moſt confidently; to that of Trafficking and Trading, and all kinds of Merchandiſing, which are really mixt with not improbable hazards: the whole life of the husbandman is a continual example of thoſe that think fit to adhere and believe and act accordingly, without having received any demonſtration. And none of all theſe are ever counted irrational, even by thoſe who have fixed no thoughts beyond this life, and the thriving and proſpering in it, and who conſequently are to loſe their chief and only good if it ſhould miſcarry, and who in all things of that nature are generally as rational and wary, and hard to believe without ſecurities, as the wiſeſt men in the World.

Sect. 22. And if we will in the buſineſs in hand (the believing of the Apoſtles relations concerning thoſe Teſtimonies given Chriſt from Heaven, wherein we have infinitely ſtronger grounds to build our Faith on, ſecurities and convictions incomparably more pregnant and vehement) allow it reaſonable for us to do that once, which in all other things we do confidently every minute of our lives, viz. believe what we have all reaſon to believe, without exacting of evidence or demonſtration, there will be no more required of us in this matter.

Faith

That this is directly the caſe in hand, and, over and above this, that the teſtifying of the Goſpel hath all imaginable advantages, will appear by a bare application of the particulars. Sect. 23.

The voices from Heaven concerning Chriſt are teſtified by the joint concurrence of all that were preſent at them, no one finding any cauſe of ſcruple or interpoſing any doubt concerning them. Thoſe very perſons, with the addition of many more, are allowed the favour of ſeeing him after his Reſurrection, of uſing all the moſt infallible means of ſecuring themſelves and others of the reality of this. Being thus aſſured, they make it the buſineſs of their whole lives after to communicate it to others, ſome in writings, all in preaching through all parts of the World, (whither they travelled on purpoſe to propagate this Truth) agreeing in the whole matter of ſtory, and in every circumſtance of it. The truth of what they ſay they again back with Miracles on one ſide, with completion of Predictions, both of the Prophets of old concerning Chriſt, and of Chriſt concerning them and the ſucceeding Ages, (eſpecially that concerning his ſpeedy coming in vengeance againſt his crucifiers) on the other ſide: both Teſtimonies of God, to authorize their Teſtimonies. In propagating this doctrine as they uſe not ſtrength or force, which hath been the engine by which all other Religions have received their growth, ſo they never endeavour to diſturb States or Governments for (or by) the planting this Doctrine, but always preach ſubjection to the Powers which are any where eſtabliſhed, and without all reſiſtance profeſs (and by their actions demonſtrate) themſelves obliged to ſuffer whatſoever their lawful Magiſtrates inflict on them, and contend only with their Prayers to God, that they may live quietly and peaceably under them, having ſtill their croſs in their hands, and many times on their ſhoulders, to follow Chriſt. And if this were not ſufficient to prevent, or to ſatisfy the jealouſies of Heathen Princes, yet upon that very account it is the greater teſtimony of the truth of their Doctrine, when they that propagate it are ſo far from deſigning any temporal advantages to themſelves, which might bribe them to the depoſing an untruth, that they actually part with their very lives, and conſequently with all capacity of thoſe poſſible advantages, and acquire nothing but reproaches, and torments, and death it ſelf: and all this without any other imaginable reward or payment in commutation or reparation for all this, ſave only the future expectation of that for which they yet had no farther aſſurance than the truth of that which they thus confeſt: nay, yet farther, when they have given this coſtly teſtimony to this truth, God again bears teſtimony to them, and by Miracles wrought at their Monuments, being dead, they yet ſpeak. Sect. 24.

That all this is thus true, is again it ſelf teſtified, not only by Records ſtill extant under their hands who wrote Goſpels and the Acts, and by footſteps and remainders of all others preaching, whereſoever they taught, but alſo by the like conſent of the whole Church, i. e. whole multitudes of that age wherein this is pretended to be written and taught, who being convinced with the truth of what we now enquire after, readily gave up their names to the belief of it, and to the conſequent confeſſion of Chriſt, though the doing it did in like manner coſt them very dear, the parting with their eſpouſed cuſtoms of living, whether among the Jewiſh or Gentile world, their pleaſures, their worldly wealth, and oft-times their lives alſo. Sect. 25.

Beyond all this, the ſucceſs which attended it had ſo much of ſtrangeneſs in it (viz. that from ſuch mean and ſimple beginnings and inſtruments, without any kind of power or earthly authority to back it, without one ſword ever drawn in defence of it, Chriſtianity ſhould ſoon obtain ſuch a victory over the hearts of men in ſo great a part of the World) that nothing but truth, which hath that over-ruling force in it, can be deemed to have been its Champion. Sect. 26.

Laſtly, that theſe are the writings, thoſe the tradition of thoſe eye-witneſſes whoſe they pretend to be, and that they were by ſuch ſholes, ſuch multitudes of men of all Nations believed then, and that belief ſigned by the blood of many, by the hazards and adventures of moſt, by the profeſt non-reſiſtance of all, this is as fully teſtified to us as any matter of fact can be ſuppoſed to be, by the concurrent teſtimonies of all of that age which ſay any thing of it, and by a general ſucceſſive atteſtation of all intervening ages ſince that time, (the authority of [f] thoſe writings being never conteſted by any) i. e. by the ſame means of probation upon which we believe thoſe things which we leaſt doubt of, and againſt which men cannot feign any ſound or ſhew of proof, ſave only that teſtimonies are not demonſtrations; which exception will in like manner be in a like or far greater force againſt all other things which we believe moſt confidently. Sect. 27.

[f] Among the ὁμολογούμενα, the confeſt writings of Scriptures, atteſted by all, and not ἀντιλεγόμενα contradicted by any, ταχτέον ἐν πρώτοις ἴσως ἀρίαν τῶν εὐαγγελίων τετρακτύν, οἷς ἕπεται ἡ τῶν πραξεων τῶν Ἀποστόλων γραφή. Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 3. cap. xx. The four Goſpels are firſt to be placed, and then the ſtory of the Acts of the Apoſtles.

I am not willing to leave any poſſible ſcruple unſatisfied in this matter, and therefore I ſhall proceed to that other bolder objection ſtill behind, That that which is pretended to be the voice of God, may not have been ſuch, but ſome deluſion of the hearers, or at leaſt the voice of ſome other, and not of God; as the Devil in the Oracle delivered himſelf by voice: and therefore though it be confeſt, that if this voice were God's, it is infallibly creditable, yet there will need ſome certain way of diſcrimination to aſſure it was his. To this I anſwer, That the perſon whoſe objection this may be ſuppoſed to be, is either a bare Theiſt, that acknowledges a God, but not the God of Iſrael; or elſe he that acknowledges what the Jew did, the truth of the Old Teſtament. I ſhall reply ſomewhat to each of theſe. Sect. 28.

To the former, That if this way of objecting would be of force, there could be no way for God to reveal himſelf to man, Veracity would be an empty Attribute of God, of no ſignification to us. For it is not imaginable that there ſhould be any greater Aſſurance of Gods ſpeaking to men, than by the Heavens opening, and from thence the Spirit of God deſcending viſibly, and lighting on one, and out of the clouds a voice deliver'd: whatſoever elſe can be imagined or named will not be above this. And if all the ways that God can uſe be not able to give aſſurance that it is God that ſpeaks, what Sect. 29.

are we the nearer for knowing that God cannot lie, as long as there is ſuppoſed for us no way to know what at any time he ſaith? nay, to what uſe (as to this particular) is his Omnipotence, if he cannot reveal himſelf to us in ſuch a way that may be reaſonable for us to believe to be his, and not ſome deceivers voice? Nay, in this God ſhall not be able to do ſo much as any ordinary man; for he can ſo reveal himſelf, or ſpeak, as no man that is preſent, and doth not ſtop his ears, ſhall be able to doubt of his ſpeaking.

Sect. 30. To the ſecond ſort of Objecters I anſwer, That the objection will loſe all its ſeeming force, if it be remembred, that although now among us voices from Heaven are not heard, (and therefore we are not at this diſtance ſo competent judges of the clearneſs or certainty that ſuch, when they were, were not deluſions, and accordingly the aſſent required of us of this age is but proportionable to the ground of belief which we enjoy) yet among that people of the Jews this was very ordinary. God's Law was given to Moſes in that manner, and God led that people by a pillar of cloud and fire, which was anſwerable to this: And in after-times, under the ſecond Temple, they confeſs this the only way of God's revealing himſelf to them. And therefore in this very matter it was allowed and pleaded by ſome prime men of that people, that if the Spirit, or an Angel, had ſpoken to Paul, the reſiſting him would be a fighting againſt God; and hereupon, Acts 23. 9. they confeſſed, that they found no harm in him: that God had thus ſpoken to him, thoſe men then thought probable, but did not avow the knowing it certainly, having no preſent evidence of the fact, ſave only the affirmation of Paul himſelf at that time. But had they had evidence of the fact by being preſent at it (as they that teſtify the voice to Chriſt were eye and ear-witneſſes of it) they would not then have thought it reaſonable to make any farther queſtion, whether that which they call the voice of the Spirit, or an Angel, were ſuch or no, and being ſuch, whether the reſiſting what was ſpoken by it were the fighting againſt God. For the teſtifying therefore of the truth of ſuch pretended facts, and indeed to leave no place for rational doubt in this matter, there is yet a farther anſwer, That the power of miracles, and the gifts of tongues that attended theſe voices and deſcents of the Holy Ghoſt from Heaven, were irrefragable teſtimonies and evidences of the reality of them, and could not be the immediate effects of deluſions, being ſuch as could not be wrought by the power of the devil, nor ever were pretended the effects of his oracular Reſponſes.

Sect. 31. Many other ways of diſcrimination there are by which the voices of the Devil, or deluſions magical, might be diſtinguiſhed from Divine, as that of Concordance with Predictions acknowledged to have come from God; and ſuch was the voice that was delivered at the deſcent of the Spirit upon Chriſt, the ſame that was foretold by the Prophet, and by him joined with the mention of the deſcent of God's Spirit upon him. And to the ſame belongs alſo the Completion of the ſo many other things in him, which had certainly been foretold of the Meſſias; which Concordance with Divine truth is moſt diametrically contrary to deluſion. And beſides, of the miracles which he did, moſt were to diſpoſſeſs and caſt out devils (to reſtore health, as they brought diſeaſes) who conſequently look on him as (and proclaim him) their enemy: and although this may be thought to be done by them for ſome greater advantage (as the Devil may ſuffer one charm to counter-work another) yet could they not here be thought to have uſed thoſe endeavours to raiſe Chriſt into that power of deſtroying them, or to aſſiſt their utmoſt to give him an authority in the world. Indeed the whole doctrine of Chriſt was ſo directly contrary to that which had been maintained by the Oracles, that it cannot be imagined to proceed from that principle to which they pretend. And the ſtory is approved by Plutarch (and the effect hath made it not improbable, that there was ſome truth in it) that about Chriſt's time a voice was heard on the Sea, that the great god Pan was dead, and an huge bellowing and roaring, as of infernal mourners, following it: and that this was probably the cauſe, acknowledgedly the forerunner of the Devil's ſilence, and never ſpeaking in the Oracles any more.

Sect. 32. As for the manner of the Devils giving his Reſponſes in the Oracle, it is confeſt by all that then lived and knew them, that they were delivered conſtantly by a man, who was ſeen when he did it, and was called the ἐγγαστρίμυθος, one that ſpake under the Oracle, out of the caverns of the earth, (by the vapour of which Plutarch conceived him inſpired, and ſo turned Enthuſiaſt) which is a far different thing from a voice (no man being ſeen) which came in a clap of thunder, with a bright ſhining cloud from Heaven. This may reaſonably ſatisfy the importunity of that objection alſo.

Sect. 33. And ſo much for the firſt part of the ground of our Faith in groſs, the teſtimony on which it is built, which being an infallible word, derived and conveyed to us by the moſt creditable means, and which we have no temptation from Reaſon to doubt of, may ſure be concluded a rational ground of belief.

CHAP. II.

A Digreſſion concerning the uſe of Reaſon in deciding Controverſies in Religion.

Sect. 1. HAving proceeded thus far for the convincing of the gainſayer; it may not be amiſs to conſider the Believer a while, and give him the Bounds or Limits within which Reaſon is obliged to contain it ſelf in matters of Faith, and this even by the verdict of Reaſon it ſelf. And I ſhall do it by a brief ſtating of this Queſtion.

Sect. 2. Whether Right Reaſon be appointed the Judge of Controverſies. Whether all doubts of all ſorts be to be determined by the dictates of Nature, in the Heart of every Man which hath the uſe of Reaſon.

To this I ſhall ground my anſwer in theſe two Rules, or Poſtulations. 1. That Sect. 3. The meaſure of mans Natural Power of knowing or judging of things is his participating of thoſe things things (in ſome degree) with God, in whom they are as in the Fountain. So that the man may find, and behold them in himſelf as truly, though not as eminently, or in the ſame degree, as they are in God.

For certainly, if a man, denudate of all experimental, acquired, revealed knowledge, of all foreign helps, left only to himſelf as a man endued with Reaſon, ſhould be queſtioned in any thing, and ſuppoſed able to expreſs his Conceptions, he would be fain to fetch out every word that he ſaid from within him, ſay only what his own heart could diſcern within himſelf: otherwiſe he ſhould be ſuppoſed to anſwer more than he had means to come to the knowledge of; the work done would be above the proportion of the means to it; the Concluſion would have more in it than the Premiſſes.

From hence follows this ſecond Rule, That Men are naturally able to judge only of thoſe things which by ſome ſure connexion depend on thoſe Attributes of God which are communicated to (and particularly by) men, and are the like (as far as the adumbration or tranſcript is to the Exemplar or Pattern) for kind, though not degree, in man as in God. Sect. 4.

Now all Controverſies (i. e. all things ſubject to judgment) are reducible to two heads, Goodneſs or Truth; ſo that the Queſtion now is, Whether Right Reaſon can infallibly judge what is good or bad, true or falſe. Sect. 5.

And then to this I anſwer, Firſt, concerning the firſt Head:

For a thing to be good morally (for Metaphyſical Goodneſs is all one with Truth) depends, by ſure connexion, from that eternal Juſtice which is primarily in God, that being the Rule, as it is the Fountain, of all moral Goodneſs in men, or things; every thing being good, more or leſs, as it more or leſs partakes of that Juſtice which is in God. Sect. 6.

Now this being one of the Attributes of God which are called Communicable, it is truly affirmed, That that Juſtice which is in God is the very ſame in ſubſtance communicated to men, though in a lower degree. And therefore it follows by the ſecond Rule, That man, by the light of Nature and general Impreſſions, i. e. by a power of ſeeing whatſoever is within his Sphere, is enabled by God to judge what is juſt, what not, what morally good, what bad. And no man judges amiſs in theſe things, but he that hath his judgment corrupted by ſome prepoſſeſſion, or habitual vice, or preſent prevailing temptation, and therefore of moral Controverſies, i. e. whether a thing naturally, or in it ſelf, be good or bad, juſt or not, right Reaſon is a Judge. Sect. 7.

Yet this with this Caution or Limitation, that it be not extended to thoſe things wherein the Law of Nature hath been elevated higher by any poſitive Law of Chriſt. For, as right Reaſon cannot judge what is Lawful in any particular Kingdom, becauſe what Nature hath made lawful, the Municipal Laws of that place may have forbidden and made unlawful, (and that right Reaſon cannot take notice of, unleſs it be told ſo:) ſo in Chriſt's Kingdom, the Church, when he hath forbidden what Nature had left free and unforbidden, Reaſon (untaught by Chriſt) cannot ſay that that is unlawful, yet generally will be found to bear that Teſtimony to Chriſt, that what Chriſt hath ſuper-added to the Law of Nature, right Reaſon will of its own accord commend as beſt, or moſt laudable and excellent in them that do it; though, not knowing any Precept for it, it will not affirm that it is neceſſary, ſo as it cannot be omitted without ſin. Sect. 8.

Then concerning the Second Head, I anſwer,

That for a thing to be true, i. e. to have a Being either potential or actual, depends partly on God's Power, partly on his Will. In reſpect of its potential being, it depends on his Power; in reſpect of its actual, on his Will. Sect. 9.

Now God's Power, though it may in ſome ſence be ſaid communicable to the Creature, becauſe all ability in the Creature is a gleam of infinite Ability in God, yet is not this ſo communicated as his Juſtice or Goodneſs was ſaid to be. For Goodneſs in the creature is a kind of image truly reſembling the goodneſs in God, and that a kind of natural image, as is the face in the glaſs not a voluntary one, which hath its Being from the variable Will of the Artificer. But power or ability in the Creature is not thus a natural image of God's Power, but as a reflection of a thing which voluntarily and variouſly caſts its beams. Voluntarily, I ſay, becauſe the diſpenſing of his Power, either in manner or meaſure, is a free act of his Will; and variouſly, becauſe he doth it, firſt, unequally; and ſecondly, not ſo to any, but that he can (and ſometimes doth) withdraw or ſuſpend it when it is beſtowed: ſo that I cannot ſay, that, as that which is juſt in God to be done, is juſt to be done by the Creature, ſo what is poſſible to be done by God, is poſſible to be done by the Creature. Sect. 10.

The reaſon of the not communicating of God's Power to the Creature as well as his Juſtice, may be this, becauſe it conduced not to the end of the Creatures Creation, as the other did: for though God intended to make a Creature truly good and juſt, yet he did not truly powerful. Power indeed being in it ſelf not a vertue, as Juſtice is, nor in it ſelf morally good or evil, and therefore not ſo agreeable to the condition of a Creature, but rather indeed peculiar to the Majeſty of a Creator. Sect. 11.

From all this it follows by the ſaid ſecond rule, that man is not able to fathom Potential Truths, becauſe Power is not the ſame in Subſtance in God and in the Creature, and therefore by what is in the Creature he is no way enabled to conceive what is in God, and ſo conſequently to define of any Potential Truth; becauſe, though it may not be wrought by any thing that is in the Creature, or within his ſphere of knowledge, yet it may be by God. Sect. 12.

All the natural Impreſſion or light that in this behalf a rational Creature hath, is, that two contradictories cannot be true at once; and therefore I think all Principles that are not thought fit to be proved in any natural ſcience, (if they be truly ſo) may eaſily be reſolved into this one, A thing cannot at once be and not be. And this natural impreſſion riſes not from any obſervation of the power communicated to the Creature (for then ſtill it would hold, that though man cannot do Contradictories at once, yet God may) but from a ſight that this would be an effect of extreme impotency, more than is conceiveable in any Creature, and therefore cannot be imputed to God, who is conceived Omnipotent; nor conſequently to man, unleſs God ſhould take away all degrees Sect. 13.

of power quite from him, and then he ſhould be annihilated.

Sect. 14. Now for actual Truths already in Being, which are works either mediately or immediately of God's Will, our Reaſon is no farther judge of them than as God's Will is communicated to us by ſome Images or Pictures of it; either ſubſtantial and real, as, when a thing done is preſented to the Faculty to which it is objicible, there a real image of God's Will is impreſt in me, (and by that I may judge diſtinctly;) or when it is revealed to me either from God, or from any other Witneſs, of which in this matter I am convinced that he partakes of God's Veracity, i. e. would not lie to me, and this may be called an intentional Image of God's Will impreſt in me.

Sect. 15. Thus may right Reaſon judge of things in Being, either becauſe it is ſo really repreſented to the Senſes, and that is evidence; or becauſe it is either reveal'd or elſe atteſted by God, which Reaſon knows can neither erre nor deceive, and this is adherence; or becauſe ſuch a concurrence of Teſtimonies agrees to tell me ſo as I have no Motive or Reaſon to disbelieve, and this is humane Faith, (which may reaſonably take place, until I either ſee ſomewhat or receive ſomewhat by an higher Teſtimony revealed to the contrary:) which alſo is weaker or ſtronger, according to the importance of the matter, authority of the Teſtifiers, my particular danger if I be deceived in it, &c.

Hence the Concluſion is, That

Sect. 16. Right Reaſon is able to judge of all merely Moral Objects, whether any thing be good or bad morally; of Natural Objects in matter of Fact, whether ſuch a thing be done or no, by the help of the means ſpecified, and by Diſcourſe, and Analogy from things that we ſee are done, to judge that ſuch another thing is poſſible. But of ſupernatural Truths, ſuch things as it never diſcern'd in Nature, either in the kind or the like, it cannot judge any farther than thus: Either firſt, that though we cannot do it, yet, for ought we know, it is poſſible (nay it hath a Being) with God; or ſecondly, that God hath affirmed it ſo, therefore I am ſure it is; or thirdly, what comes to me from Authority, that I have no reaſon to ſuſpect, but, on the contrary, concurrence of all Reaſons to be perſwaded by it; nay, there are ſome inward Characters in the thing it ſelf, that make me caſt off all jealouſy or doubt of ſuch affirmations, and therefore I believe it is ſo. But generally, and in theſi, it is no way judge of theſe laſt kind of Controverſies.

Sect. 17. And therefore though God, in moral Actions, even in himſelf, ſubmits and appeals to mans reaſon, Iſa. 5. 3. Ezek. 18. 25. yet in theſe latter he derides all thoſe that go about to judge of them by Reaſon, 1 Cor. 1. 20. And agreeably Saint Paul in his Preaching the Goſpel, for the proving the truth of Chriſtianity, was fain, ſaith [t] Origen, to uſe a peculiar way of Demonſtration, firſt, by comparing of Prophecies in the Old Teſtament concerning Chriſt; ſecondly, by Miracles: but in Practical matters he appeals to that which was written in every ones heart, Rom. 2. 15.

To this purpoſe hath Eulogius an Oration againſt thoſe who think to be able to comprehend the true Theology of Chriſtians (i. e. Chriſtians Diſcourſes concerning the Perſons of the Deity) * by the Wit or Reaſon of Man; and Photius hath approved of that Diſcourſe of his, that he doth [x] Talk of God pioufly and devoutly, and ſet Chriſtian Divinity a pitch beyond humane wiſdom, [y] ſuperior to all other [z] artificial method, or rules of Art.

Sect. 19. In ſumme, it is obſervable in the writing of the Scripture, that generally in defining theſe laſt ſorts of Truths, God's Authority is ſet down as the onely proof of what is ſaid, without uſing any other way of arguing, or ſecular demonſtration: All that is indulged to mens Reaſon being onely this; Firſt, to conſider whether it be not very equal and reaſonable to believe God without any other motive or topick of proof, even in thoſe things which are above or beſide right Reaſon, nay, againſt the propoſals of corrupt; and ſecondly, to ſearch (by what helps ſoever a reaſonable mans prudence and diligence can ſuggeſt, or furniſh him with) which is that word of God which contains theſe Revelations, which Reaſon tells them they muſt believe without farther reaſoning.

Sect. 20. But not to ſuffer my ſelf to believe any thing (though revealed by the Scriptures) but what Reaſon otherwiſe would lead me to, is the ſame that Celſus perſwaded the Heathens (of his ſide) to, againſt Chriſt, to [a] follow Reaſon and the rational guide in all the doctrines we receive, all error and deceit being, ſaith he, brought into the World by Faith; and that they that believed any thing without Reaſon for it, are like them that delight in Juglers, &c. and therefore he laughs at all thoſe who requiring not Reaſon for what they believe, uſe this phraſe, [b] Do not examine but believe, thy Faith ſhall ſave thee, as men that are diſpleaſed with wiſdom, and in love with folly. To all which, Origen, as acute a Reaſoner as any, oppoſes nothing but the Evidence of Prophecies, and the Word of God for this rule of Faith. Which if it be not ſimply believed without any Philoſophical rational enquiry concerning the things affirmed in it, many will of neceſſity ſtill wallow in Infidelity after all that God hath done for the reſcuing them out of it, and only a few find that by rational ſearch which before they believed by ſimple Faith.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of the power of the Affections and Interests in matter of Faith.

THE belief of Christianity being in the first Chapter supposed to be thus sufficiently recommended to the Understanding, which is a well-natured faculty, and very ready to hear Reason when it is offered to it: there is but one Obstruction possible, and that is from mens Affections or Interests; and that by two ways of proceeding; first mediately, secondly immediately. Sect. 1.

First, they work mediately by the Will, and have sometimes that unhappy influence upon that, as by their importunity to perswade it to interpose before the full Representment or Proposal of the object, and so to hinder the free access of the Argument to the Understanding. Sect. 2.

Thus we see it often in prejudicate and passionate men, who are impatient of hearing or considering any thing that may dispossess them. And thus we see it sometimes in those of a better temper, who yet being unwilling to lose any Advantages which they can make use of to maintain their present perswasions, are so intent upon their own part of the dispute that they do not receive the opposite Arguments with that equal Justice of improving them to the height with which they are offered, or to which, if it had happened that they had undertaken the maintenance of the other part, they could have heightned them. This latter, being not an effect of so great a distemper, is not so discernible (to our selves especially) as the other; but yet is a fault, and that of ill consequence, and a deviation from the rules of distributive Justice, which would allow as much of our Attention or Diligence to the improving of the Arguments of the one part as of the other, and expres as impartial a kindness to the Neighbour as to my self. And in all this the Will is culpable for being thus (more or less) instrumental to the Affections. And so it is Negatively also, whensoever we do not use that industry of search as our condition permits, and the importance of the matter requires of us. Sect. 3.

But then, secondly, The affections and interests do themselves immediately, sometimes, perform their own business; they cloud and darken the understanding, and make it less capable and receptive of such Representations as are made to it. Sect. 4.

This made Aristole to affirm, That Pleasures are in some men [a] corruptive of Principles, i. e. that those common dictates of nature, &c. which are by all unbyassed men naturally consented to as true, and unquestioned, do yet to voluptuous men (and the same holds in matter of fear, and interest, and the other passions, and ill habits also) become matter of dispute, whether they be true or not: not because in Reason any thing can there be offered fit to infuse scruples into a rational man, or to combat with the far greater potency of Reason on the other side, which denominated them Principles; but because these rational dictates having somewhat in them which is contrary to, and unreconcileable with, passions and sensitive pleasures, those consequently that have indulged to them, and espoused them, as the most desireable things, do, for the enjoying of them, undervalue and despise the rational Arguments, which would cost them so dear (even the parting with their lusts) if they continued in that reputation which is due to them. Sect. 5.

Hence is it that the more prudent of Heathen Philosophers have proposed it as the best Preparative to the studying and search of Truth, to have mens Affections and Appetites well regulated first (though not by reading or studying the Books and Science of Morals or Ethicks, yet) by [b] Assuetude and vertuous Custom, by inartificial Precepts and sober Education, &c. moderating and tempering their Passions, and bringing them [c] to live Orthodoxly, [d] lest having their Reason disturbed by Passions, they be not able to pass an exact judgment of things. And without this, say they, it is as impossible for a man to behold and judge aright of Truths (such Truths as have any thing any way contrary to passions) [e] as for a man with sore eyes to behold illustrious splendid Objects, without being anointed or cured of their distemper. Sect. 6.

[e] ὥσπερ ὀφθαλμῷ λημῶντι, καὶ κεκαθαιρμένῳ, τὰ σφόδρα φωτινὰ ἰδεῖν οὐκ οἷόν τε. οὕτω καὶ τῇ ψυχῇ μὴ τῷ ἀρετῷ κεκτημένῃ, τὸ τ' ἀληθὲς ἐποπτεῖσαι καλλος. Hierocl. in Præf. ad. χρυσᾶ ἔπη.

Accordingly it hath been observed in the first Ages of the Church, that luxurious and intemperate men were of all others most hardly brought to believe the Christian Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body and Immortality of the Soul, because their carnal joys being so material and gross, and contrary to what Christ hath taught of an Eternal Life, and of Spiritual Bodies, and Bliss, their being so deeply engaged and immerst in the former, fortified them pertinaciously against all impression from the latter, and enabled them to hold out finally against the belief of those Christian Truths, which others of more ruly tempers, upon equal Reasons, and the same Representation, did most readily embrace and assent to. Sect. 7.

And it is worth our present consideration and enquiry, whether they which are now most willing to entertain doubts of the truth of Christianity, are either more sharp discerners of truth then all others that are not (or then themselves, before they) arrived to this pitch of Stanchness and Scepticism; or again, whether they have seriously spent any considerable time in reviewing their Principles, and, doing so, have sprang any special new Arguments which they had not considered before, and those of such weight with them, that they will contentedly expose themselves to all the torments of Hell (the sure reward of an Atheistical Antichristian life) upon the bare probability of those their Arguments, (which cannot be rationally done by them, unless their pretensions against Christian Religion exceed ours for it, in strength of Credibility, as far as an eternal Hell exceeds those short sufferings of this life to which Christianity betrays us; or as an eternal state of spiritual bliss in Heaven doth surpass the transitory, unsatisfactory, short pleasures of sin in this life;) or whether it Sect. 8.

be not really their freer indulgence to some Liberties which Christianity admits not of, (and that more against light, and against the importunity of God's judgments, than before) or perhaps some change of affairs abroad, which hath made the practice of Christianity a more inconvenient, costly thing, than it was wont to be; most men being willing to have the Advantages of Religion, as long as there be but few, and supportable, encumbrances that attend it, and after changing their opinion of it, when they have run any hazards by it.

Sect. 9. Which truly is so far from being new or strange, that it was a part of the Character that our Christ set upon himself and his Doctrine, both in that Parable of the Seed that fell upon stony ground, which is supposed to be scorched at the rising of the Sun upon it, and by that close of his answer to John's Disciples, Blessed is he that is not scandalized at me, foretelling them that the most eminent and considerable danger to Christian Religion is, That they which in prosperous times are forward Professors of it, will, when their Religion begins to offer them smart, fairly forsake and fall off from it.

Sect. 10. Thus much hath been premised to this second Head of Arguments, on purpose to shew the influence that matter of advantage may have on Belief; and that on either side, not only where mens interests do chance to thwart their perswasions, but also, and as discernibly, when they appear on their sides, to assist and confirm them.

Sect. 11. For so certainly did the sweetness and well tastedness of the Manna work as effectually on the Faith of some Jews, make them as willing to adhere to God and Moses, in opposition to returning to Egypt, as the new miraculous manner of the coming of that down upon them; and the Milk and Honey of Canaan were very good Motives, and Allectives, and Engagements to the Faith and Obedience of others: And so in like manner the carnality of the paradise that Mahomet promised to his disciples hath much advanced the credit, and facilitated the belief, and disguised the grosness and absurdities of the Alcoran.

Sect. 12. And because Advantages are not to be disliked because they are such, but because they pretend and are mistaken to be such, when they are not, and by so doing do rob us of those that are truly so, or that are infinitely weightier and more considerable; and because that which is really the most advantageous is always most rational, most prudent for man to chuse and pursue and aspire to; therefore it is that to the former argument of the reasonableness of the ground or testimony on which we believe Christian Religion to be true, I now proceed to the advantages that those that embrace it shall reap by it, both because most mens Objections against Christianity are founded in an opinion, that it is not an advantageous Profession, and would have no other quarrel to it if they were satisfied that it were; and also because though advantageousness no way contributes to the making or proving a thing to be true or false, yet it doth to the making it more or less worth believing or embracing, (for every slight truth is not such) and so more or less fit to be set up in our hearts as our Religion.

Sect. 13. For, that by Religion every man entertains hopes of acquiring somewhat of benefit to himself, and would not chuse to enter into those bands, if he did not promise himself some advantage by it, is a Maxime which I shall not think fit to prove or confirm in this place.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Advantages of Christian Religion in the gross.

Sect. 1. THere is nothing therefore after the testifying of the Truth so proper for this present Disquisition, as the consideration of the Advantages of Christian Religion, and those advanced above all other imaginable advantages of any other Religion, as much as the credibility of Christian Religion is above the credibility of any other that pretends against it.

Sect. 2. This I am by my premised Method obliged to consider here only as true in the gross. And that will be done by this one consideration, which hath been enlarged on * in other papers, That the Precepts of Christ, especially his superadditions to the former Laws of Moses and of Nature, are, beyond all the contrary Vices, or the lower degrees of the same Vertues, perfectly agreeable to Humane Reason, cultivated, and improved, and heightned by Philosophy; so that that shall confess those things to be still most commendable and most excellent which Christ hath thought fit to command his Followers. This might be demonstrated through all particulars: but I shall more strictly restrain my self to the Advantages of a Christian life, by considering it first in order to outward, and secondly to inward advantages.

* Second Sermon on Matt. 11.30.

Sect. 3. The outward advantages are again more publick, or more private. Of the publick there is none sure more valuable and more fundamental to all other than that of Peace; and that is so immediately and inseparably annext to the Christian Doctrine, that, would men think fit to be guided by that Rule, were but Christ's Precepts constantly practised, there would be no occasion of distemper or disturbance through the world, either between Christian Potentates among themselves, or betwixt any Christian Prince and the Subjects of his own Kingdom.

Sect. 4. First, In what state or condition soever a man is placed in any Nation, be he King or Subject, this commands him most strictly therein to abide with God; every man to content himself with his present portion, whether it be of Soveraignty or of inferiour estate under Subjection. Then secondly, wheresoever the Supremacy of power is placed by the Laws of any Kingdom, there Christ requires Subjection and non-resistance in all Subjects; and both by himself, and in the Writings of his Disciples, † repeateth and impresseth that far more earnestly on the Subject, than he doth the duty of Protection on the Supreme; and where they [a] conjoin them both, there they begin constantly with that of subjection in the Inferiour, as being of more universal concernment to the Peace and Preservation of the whole, and as that which earns the Superiors performing of his duty, as a due reward to their Obedience.

† Matt. 22.21. Acts 23. 5. Rom. 13. 1 Pet. 2.13,18.

[a] Eph. 5.22,25. & 6. 1, 4, 5, 9. 1 Pet. 3. 1, 7.

Obedience. Thirdly, Chriſt prohibits ſelf-love, thinking highly of ones ſelf, all covetouſneſs, ambition, animoſities, revenge, doing or returning of injuries, whiſperings, backbitings, diſtruſts and jealouſies, all ſcrupulous preventions of remote poſſible dangers: and Fourthly, he commands doing as we would be done to, bleſſing of enemies, contempt of the world, not valuing any thing which is moſt tempting in it, and, above all things, purſuing of Peace with all men, (in the greateſt extent imaginable) as much as in them lies, and where-ever it is poſſible, even over the whole world. And fifthly, the Precepts delivered by Chriſt (plain and intelligible to all) as they are a Standard by which every man is to meaſure his own actions, ſo are they alſo to examine others, and conſequently they will fortify againſt Seducers and ſly diſturbers of a peoples Peace, if, according to Chriſt's direction, we try them by their fruits, and reject and ſtop our ears againſt all thoſe whoſe doctrines bring not exact Concordance to Chriſtian practice along with them. And where theſe Precepts are put in practice, what poſſible in-let is there left for Diſturbance or Sedition to enter?

Sect. 5. After Peace, Plenty is the moſt deſireable publick good, and that is hardly ſeparable from the former; but, beſide the Contributions which all the fomenters of peace have made toward Plenty alſo, Chriſtian Religion hath peculiar ways of aſcertaining any people of that, if its Laws be embraced and practiſed. For, firſt, Chriſt commands labour, and induſtry, and diligence, baniſhes the idle, as a [b] diſorderly walker, disbands him as ſoon as he appears to be ſuch. Secondly, he makes the rich man his Almoner or Steward to diſtribute to every mans wants as he is able: and as he bleſſes his liberality and renders it the moſt probable courſe to make him rich; ſo he convinces him, that gathering and hoarding up wealth is the meaneſt, and, withal, the moſt diſadvantageous folly, and that the only real Commodity in riches is the Joy and Happineſs of relieving others, and the inhancing of their future Reward by ſo doing. Thirdly, he forbids rapines, defraudings, gaining to our ſelves by any other mans loſſes: And fourthly, by putting the wealth of the world in a Chanel, to deſcend from Superiours to Inferiours, from him that hath to him that hath not, from the part that is filled to that other that is emptied, he makes a certain Proviſion for every part of the body. And beyond all this, fifthly, he hath taught men, that all the good of Plenty is to be enjoyed in a Competence or a Sufficience, (and that there is only more trouble, and more charge, and more fears, and more temptations annexed to any greater abundance.) And ſixthly, he hath given all his faithful Servants aſſurance, that he that hath the diſpoſing of all, and knows what they have need of, will never ſo deſtitute them that they ſhall want theſe neceſſary things. And when Plenty is thus interpreted, and theſe Proviſions made for it, there will be little poſſibility that any people that live according to theſe Rules ſhall fail of that certain benefit of them.

[b] ἀτάκτως περιπατοῦντες. 2. Theſſ. 3. 6.

Sect. 6. Then for the private outward Advantages to every Chriſtian-liver, they will be as diſcernible alſo. And theſe are of two ſorts, Firſt, thoſe that have an univerſal influence on the comfortableneſs and chearfulneſs of the whole life, without which neither health nor wealth, nor any particular advantage will have any taſte or reliſh in them: Secondly, thoſe particulars of health, &c. Of the firſt ſort, I ſhall be confident to prefer the obſervance of one Chriſtian Precept, Attending to a mans particular Calling, which as it is the ſtrict duty of every Chriſtian of what rank or quality ſoever, ſo is it that which ſweetens the whole life to him that lives orderly according to that Rule. It is certain that Aſſuetude and cuſtom hath a moral efficacy in it to make every thing pleaſant that is accuſtomed, (were it not upon that ſcore, it is not imaginable that ſome ſins to ſome men, which have natural averſions to them, ſhould ever be taught to go down ſo ſmoothly.) By this means, buſineſs and bodily labour it ſelf, which at the diſtance ſeems moſt uneaſy, to thoſe that have been brought up in it proves moſt pleaſant and delightful. To ſuch an one, idleneſs and want of imployment is really the moſt uneaſy affliction of his life.

Sect. 7. And for him that is not brought up to either of theſe, yet we ſee by Experience, and are able to give the Reaſon of it, from the active temper both of the body and mind of man, that there is no ſuch conſtant torment as the not knowing what to do with his time, the having his hours lie upon his hands; for the removing of which moſt of the vain or ſinful mixtures of our lives are ſought out, as cures or divertiſements, and having no real pleaſantneſs in them, do yet imitate ſome, by ridding us of the contrary uneaſineſs, the burthen of that idle time, which is made more ſupportable by ſuch varieties. Thus hath that uncharitable and very mean quality of cenſuring and backbiting and deriding of others become ſo frequent and faſhionable in the world, (ſo inſeparable from all our Converſations, the only modern good Company, as it is called) only becauſe many perſons have no other imployment for their time but that of talking; and of that ſort this is the moſt obvious to thoſe who have neither zeal enough to their own good, nor ſo much of friendſhip to thoſe with whom they converſe, as to make the faults of one another (in order to the reforming or fortifying one another) the ſubject of their diſcourſe. To this and all other ſins and vanities of this nature, this duty of attending the Calling is a certain Antidote or Cure: The advantages of which cannot be more eminently exemplified than among thoſe men who by miſtake are conceived to have no Obligation of Calling upon them, I mean thoſe of the Nobility and Gentry in a Kingdom. I ſhall inlarge on this inſtance a little.

Sect. 8. The Calling of thoſe that are not born to Eſtates or Poſſeſſions is generally acknowledged to be ſomewhat of Labour or Induſtry for the acquiring of wealth; and to them may reaſonably be confined that part of Adam's Curſe (which is yet ſweetned to Chriſtians by Chriſt) that in the ſweat of their brows they ſhall eat their bread. But then thoſe that have ample poſſeſſions left them, ſufficient for themſelves and family, (and much more) and beſides, a perpetuity of that to their Families for ever, are certainly under no ſuch obligation to labour, to increaſe ſo fair an heap, or to ſpend that pretious time and ſweat and induſtry on the bringing more water into the Ocean, or indeed more weight unto that burthen of wealth which lies already an encumbrance (more commonly than a real advantage) on their ſhoulders. Their Calling therefore, without queſtion, conſiſts in the ſcattering not encreaſing, in the diſcreet, charitable diſtribution of that early revenue which is committed to their ſtewarding, i. e. in the uſing that wealth (to the richeſt advantages they are able) to the ſervice of God. Such is the ſpending their time as Citizens not of one City, but of the World, enquiring what is the duty of mankind, and how they may ſerve God chearfully in thoſe Precepts of Chriſt which are of the greateſt perfection, obſerving the wonderful things of God's Law, and the Harmony which thoſe notes of Diſcord make, which to the unskilful or untuneable ear are ſo harſh. This and much more in reference to God: and then in order to Men, the well ordering of that part of the Commonwealth wherein they are imployed, the relieving of thoſe that want, the attracting inferiours by Exhortation, Admonition, Correption, (but eſpecially by exemplary acts of all piety) to the practice of Chriſtianity, and, as much as in them lies, bringing vertue into countenance and reputation, into faſhion and credit in the world.

Sect. 9. That wealth and eminency of place are very proper inſtruments toward this end, will not be needful to be demonſtrated here; all that is ſeaſonable will be, to conſider what a Treaſure of Joy and Sweetneſs would come in to every ſuch perſon in a Kingdom by a conſtant chearful attendance on the ſeverals of this calling, every one of them infinitely more proportionable to the appetites of a generous ingenuous mind than any thing elſe which his ambition could ſuggeſt to him, nothing vulgar or mean in it: and (beſide all the particular delights in every act of each) the great tranſcendent comfort of having ſatisfied Conſcience, the not having lived an unprofitable burthen of the Earth, the having in ſome meaſure performed the task for which he came into the world, would be to him that comes to reap them unſpeakable raviſhments, though at the diſtance perhaps, the ſenſual deſigner diſcerns not ſuch excellencies in them.

Sect. 10. Next are the ſeveral particular external advantages, as they are the deſired portion of every individual man, which (beyond all other prudential methods imaginable) Obedience to Chriſt's Precepts provides for us. Of this ſort, firſt, the health of the Body (the foundation of all other outward comforts) cannot better be preſerved from diſeaſes, than by ſtrict rules of conſtant temperance and ſobriety, and of faſting and abſtinence ſometimes, of continence or conjugal chaſtity, of active and induſtrious purſuit of the buſineſs of the Calling; nor can it better be ſecured from wounds and maims and violent deaths, than by mildneſs, and quietneſs, and ſobriety, and bearing of injuries; all which are the ſpecial charges of Chriſtian Religion.

Sect. 11. The very ſame practices, beſide theſe proprieties of advantage to the health, and eaſe, and ſtrength of the body, have in them a far greater delight and pleaſure and gratefulneſs to the ſenſes than any of the unchriſtian contraries. No pleaſure in eating and drinking like that in the temperate feeding on the plaineſt, wholeſomeſt diet; and ſo in the reſt.

Sect. 12. For Reputation, another ſpecial outward advantage, it is clear, that beſides that Chriſtian Religion teaches every man to think better of others than himſelf, forbids judging and reproaching and backbiting, and ſo moſt certainly preſerves that Jewel entire to every man; the practice of Chriſtian Vertues commands eſteem and value even from thoſe which leaſt exerciſe them themſelves. The proud man cannot chuſe but reverence the meek, the debauch'd man the temperate, the greateſt ſelf-ſeeker him that moſt deveſts himſelf of all his ſelf-intereſts. There are not three things in the World which ſo certainly bring a good reputation along with them, as Charity, and Humility, and Conſtancy; and theſe three are the prime commands of Chriſtian Religion.

Sect. 13. After the outward, I proceed to the inward advantages, the advantages of the Soul; and thoſe either of this life at the preſent, or in order to another life.

Sect. 14. The Chriſtian Precepts tend evidently to the bettering of the Soul in this life: Firſt, by purging. The Heathen Philoſophers, Porphyrie; and divers others, eſpecially the Pythagoreans, were much concerned in the pollutions of the Soul which they diſcerned, and beyond all things in the World deſired and endeavoured the purging them out, ſought to Magick and Sorcery to that end, but terribly miſtook in that way to it. Our Chriſt hath done this, by the Grace and Doctrine of Repentance, as far as is neceſſary for an inferiour State. And ſo, is foretold by the old Prophets under the ſtyle of [the deſire of all Nations] and [the expectation of the Gentiles] as he that brought with him, in his precepts and in his graces, a full ſatisfaction to all the gaſpings and thirſts of the moſt rational and earneſt appetites about us.

Sect. 15. Secondly, by cultivating it with all uſeful knowledge and true wiſdom. For ſuch, by the Oracles own confeſſion, is Practical Knowledge; and of that kind all the Philoſophers that ever were never aſcended to ſo high pitches as Chriſt's one Sermon in the Mount hath done.

Sect. 16 Thirdly, by ſatisfying it, allowing it here thoſe injoyments which of all others a rational Soul is pleaſed with. 1. The pleaſures of friendſhip, or profitable converſation, admoniſhing and inſtructing one another. 2. The pleaſure and ſpecial raviſhment of relieving and refreſhing thoſe that want, of making a poor man happy. 3. The pleaſure of contentment, and deſiring nothing but what we enjoy. 4. The pleaſure of Victories, in reſiſting and overcoming temptations of all ſorts, but eſpecially of, overcoming evil with good. And whenever there is any unpleaſant mixture, then 5. The pleaſure of a difficult obedience, thereby to approve our love and zeal to him who hath given himſelf for us.

Sect. 17. And fourthly, by daily rewarding of it: 1. By the comforts and joyous reflexions of a good Conſcience (as that is ſet off by the contrary Hell and torments of a bad.) 2. By the ſeveral eaſes that the ſeveral Chriſtian vertues give men here: the eaſe of Patience, contrary to the uneaſineſs of rage; the eaſe of contempt of the World, contrary to the perpetual drudgery and toils of the worldling; the eaſe of the continent man, contrary to the flames and diſquiets of the libidinous. 3. By the preſent experience of God's loving kindneſs here, in anſwering of thoſe Prayers which are uſeful for us, in denying thoſe which would be hurtful, in reſtraining us ſometimes, in exciting us at other times, in ſpeaking peace to our Souls, &c. 4. By converſing with God by meditation, by thankſgiving, ſinging Hoſannahs and Hallelujahs to him, the moſt joyous employment in the World. Nay, by a perpetual chearfulneſs, rejoycing always; which, as it would be another mans reward, ſo is it the duty of a Chriſtian. 5. By the expectations of a reward in another life; which, though future, is yet by the benefit of two Chriſtian vertues, Faith and Hope, foreſtalled, and anticipated, and made preſent to us. And all theſe, if there were not infinitely more, were ſure advantages enough to entertain a ſhort life of fifty or threeſcore years, and ſecure it from being weariſom to a Chriſtian, or from needing those sinful, shameful, unworthy divertisements that all other sorts of men, on purpose that their time may not lie upon their hands, are fain to seek out unto themselves.

Lastly, the Advantages which a Christian reaps by Christ are in order to another life. And those I shall best represent to you by shewing these two things. 1. The Valuableness of the Reward promised by Christ, and aspired to by Christians, infinitely above all other rewards that any other Religion pretends to bestow upon men. 2. The Attainableness of that Reward, and the blame that will light on none but our selves (so that we shall be bound to acknowledge our selves most stupidly wretchless and irrational) if we do not attain to it. Sect. 18.

For the former, the Valuableness of the Christians future reward, infinitely above the wages of any other Religion, that will appear, 1. by the Immateriality, and 2. by the Eternity of it: Both these it is defined to be, by Christ; and by being so, is concluded to be an eternal, infinitely blissful state. And that Christ said true in that, need not again be proved, God himself having been proved to bear him witness, that all that he said is true. The Immateriality of this reward demonstrates it agreeable and proportioned to the nobler part of us, the upper or rational Soul; all other grosser pleasures, the Mahumetans enjoying of women, and the Jews long life in a Canaan, being gratifications to the viler parts of us, our senses or bodies, and to those too in their vilest state, as they are natural, not as they shall be spiritual (and equal to Angelical) bodies. Sect. 19.

Having said this, I need not add the shamefulness and emptiness and unsatisfactoriness of all bodily pleasures, proceeding partly from the covetous ingrateful condition of that basest part of us, as the Heathens have styled the body, partly from the great meanness and poorness and baseness of all bodily contents (so unworthy to be the ambitions, or any thing but the servants and attendants of the reasonable Soul) and the instant satieties and irksomnesses that they always are attended with, such as nothing could make any mere man place any considerable value upon them, were not he either cheated into it, at the distance, by the false glosses that other men put upon them, and by seeing what hazards are willingly run in pursuit of them; or were he not early ingaged in an habitual indulgence to them, which makes that difficult to part with which he hath injoyed so long, and so consequently which imitates some pleasure (and is mistaken for it) by the contrary painfulness of giving it over. Sect. 20.

Whereas on the other side the immaterial, spiritual, more sublime satisfactions to the pure undefatigable Spirit, the rational immortal Soul within us, as they cannot be liable to those baseneses and emptinesses, so neither are they in danger of those satieties; and by satisfying and blessing that part of us which is infinitely most excellent in our natures, must of themselves necessarily be concluded most superlatively excellent, and deserve, as such, to be infinitely preferred and most valued by us. Sect. 21.

Having said this one thing of the Immateriality of the Christians future reward, and agreeableness to that part about us which alone is worth providing for, (the happinesses of the other inferiour parts being consequent to and included in this, and a provision withal being (by the wisdom of our God) made for them that they shall no longer desire or want those enjoyments, which is perfectly the same, if not with some advantage better than if they had them) it is not possible any farther improvement or accession should be made to this reward, but only by the perpetuating of it. Sect. 22.

And this is that other part of Christ's Promise, That the bliss which he thus bestows shall in respect of its own plenitude never be exhausted or diminished; nor again, through the repentance of the Donor or the envy of any other, ever be withdrawn or forced from us. Sect. 23.

And this is a great Enhancement and Evidence of the Rationalness of our Religion, how severe soever Christ's Commands or how rigid his Exactings are supposed to be, or what sharpness soever we here are forced or permitted to endure in approving our Obedience to him. If there be any Difficulty in the Obedience, or Ungratefulness in the sufferings of a Christian's life, yet the abundant recompence of the present advantages, and, after those, of the Soul-ravishing unspeakable bliss (infinitely above the weight of the hardest or roughest part of Christ's task of Performances, and above the proportion of the sowrest portion that any pious man tastes in the afflictions of this life) were they supposed to be of the same equal duration, would make our Hopes and Patience and Perseverance perfectly rational, according to the balances with which indifferent men weigh, or Husband-men labour, or Merchants traffick here on Earth. Sect. 24.

But when to every minute of a pleasant not painful Obedience, to every mite of Pressure (which God that sends gives strength also to bear chearfully, makes matter not of Patience, but Victory and Rejoycing to us) there is most immutably ascertained to us by Christ an eternal (ETERNAL) weight of glory, how impossible is it that those few sowr drops of so short-transitory Obedience and Patience, should not be drowned and lost in that vast Ocean, whereinto within a while they shall be really, and at the instant, by Faith and Hope, they are (in Effect and by Equivalence) poured out. Sect. 25.

If there be any thing now left disputable in this matter, it must be, Whether it will not be justly deemed irrational that God should so over-heap his measure, so over-proportion his wages to us, reward that so gloriously, which, if there were never a Heaven hereafter, were at the present reward sufficient to it self, and infinitely preferable before the condition of any other man's life. But the advantage of that being on our side, we shall have little reason to dispute or complain of it. Sect. 26.

The only thing imaginable to be replied will be, that Christ's inflictions are as immaterial and as eternal as his rewards; and the reason not presently discernible, why our short, empty, nauseated pleasures, the sins of a short life, and the joys of those sins far shorter than the shortest life, should be punished so sadly and so eternally. This scruple of the Atheist hath been searched to the bottom, and answered * in other Papers; and the brief of it is this, That the choice being referred to us to take of the two which we best like, Eternal Death set before us on the one hand, to make Eternal Life the more infinitely reasonable for us to chuse on the other hand; and the eternal Hell (whensoever we fall into it) being perfectly our own Act, neither forc'd on us by any absolute decree of God's, nor irresistible temptation of the Devil, nor our own flesh, but as truly our wish and choice, and made purchase, nay, much more truly and properly than eternal Heaven is (when our Obedience is first so wrought by God's Grace, and yet after that so abundantly rewarded by the Donor:) Sect. 27.

it is certain that if there be any thing irrational, it is in us unkind and perverſe Creatures (ſo obſtinately to chuſe what God ſo paſſionately warns us to take heed of, ſo wilfully to die, when God ſwears he wills not our death) and not in him, that hath done all that is imaginable to be done to reaſonable Creatures (here in their way or courſe) to the reſcuing and ſaving of us.

Sect. 28. And ſo this hath by the way demonſtrated alſo the Attainableneſs of that reward, and the no kind of fault of God's (he hath ſent his Prophets, his Son, his Spirit, his Miniſters, his Mercies, his Judgments, all ſorts, and new Methods of working Deliverances and Salvations for us, and all ſlaughtered, and crucified, and grieved, and abus'd by us) but all merely of our ſelves, if through our irrational prides or ſloths we do not attain to it. I ſhall not need therefore farther to inlarge on that, eſpecially having † elſewhere abundantly demonſtrated the truth of it.

CHAP. V.

The Exceptions againſt ſome particulars in Chriſtian Religion; and 1. God's Diſpoſitions of Providence.

Sect. 1. IT now remains that I proceed from the groſs to the retail, from the general to the particular view and conſideration of thoſe particular Branches of Chriſtian Religion which ſeem to men at this time to be leaſt ſupported with Reaſon. And they will be of two ſorts, either concerning God's Providence, or concerning God's Commands now under the Goſpel. The firſt concerns his wiſdom in diſpenſing the things of the World among men, the ſecond his choice of duties wherein to exerciſe us.

Sect. 2. For the firſt of theſe, it will briefly be reduced to this queſtion, Whether it can be deemed rational that Injuſtice ſhould proſper, and Patience never be relieved or rewarded in this life; as it is every where taught to be the Method of God, and is moſt eminently exemplified on Chriſt himſelf in his own perſon in the Goſpel.

Sect. 3. Where firſt, if the Queſtion were, Whether Injuſtice could be really favoured by God, or by him ſo approved and encouraged, as to be thought worthy of any the leaſt reward, though but of a Cup of cold water, by him, or (as conſentaneous to that) Whether Injuſtice by going unpuniſhed here, and by being triumphant in this World, might be thence concluded to be an act either of Sanctity or of Innocence, owned and commended and juſtified by God by its thus proſpering; I ſhould then, I confeſs, acknowledge this to be irrational, and not plead or undertake to be the advocate of that Religion which ſhould teach one ſuch Doctrine as this.

Sect. 4. For this were to make a God (who by being ſuch is ſuppoſed to be of an immutable Will and Juſtice) to become inconſtant and contradictory to himſelf, to forbid oppreſſion as contrary to his Will, and yet, without making any change in the matter (without withdrawing what he hath given to one, and diſpoſing it to another, as in the caſe of the Egyptians Jewels and the Canaanites Land) to reward it as agreeable to his Will; to pronounce that no Covetous Perſon, without repentance, ſhall inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and yet to give the covetous, beſide an infallible title to the Kingdom of God, continued to him as a ſpecial Saint of his, the addition of all the bleſſings of this life. In a word, this were the ſame irrational thing as to affirm that Thief which proſpered in his aſſault and actually robbed the Traveller, and perhaps killed him too, to be by that means turned honeſt man, and that nothing but miſcarrying in his attempt could denominate or demonſtrate him a thief; that no ſin were any longer a ſin if it were once acted, no oppreſſion any longer oppreſſion if it were permitted to come to its fulneſs; that every the fouleſt violence, as ſoon as it were come to the height, bearing down all the reſiſtances of Divine and Humane Laws and force, did then preſently ceaſe to be violence, and by being the loweſt fiend in Hell commence ipſo facto the moſt rewardable Saint. And therefore the only Religion that hath been known in the World to maintain and countenance this, that of the Turk or Mahometan, I profeſs to believe abſolutely irrational.

Sect. 5. But for Chriſtianity, that is ſo diſtinctly contrary to this, that the great fundamental Hiſtory upon which all our Religion at once is built, is the moſt lively example and doctrine of the contrary. For when Chriſt himſelf was delivered up into the power of wicked men, and by them arraigned and reviled and crucified, not only the Diſciples which were his conſtant attendants, but his Army of Myriads of Angels that were always at his command, doing nothing toward his releaſe, when this conſultation of the Sanhedrin became ſucceſsful, and obtained the deſired event againſt him (the higheſt and moſt proſperous oppreſſion of the greateſt innocence and vertue) then, though there were more circumſtances which might affix this on God his Father, and ſeem to draw him into partaking in it, than we find recorded of any or all other ſinful actions (as that God's Hand and Counſel did foredetermine this to be done; that God foretold it by all his Prophets, and from the certainty that they could not lie, doth, when it is done, conclude that Chriſt ought thus to ſuffer; that they that did it, even the chief Rulers of them, had the excuſe of ſome ignorance, until God's raiſing him from the dead diſpelled this miſt from before their eyes; that what God had thus foretold and predetermined, viz. that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, he had thus fulfilled, Acts 3. 18. that he that ſuffered voluntarily laid down his life, and by a ſpeedy taking it up again was freed from the ſaddeſt part of death, the remaining under the power of it, nay, was in the iſſue ſo far from being the worſe for ſuffering, that beſides the glorious advantages that came to his Diſciples and children by it, he himſelf was in that humane nature of his highly rewarded and exalted for this his ſuffering; though, I ſay, all theſe circumſtances concurred to make the injury leſs, the crime more excuſable, and altogether more fit and more honourable to be charged upon God, and ſo to turn it from the crime of murther to the vertue of obedience to God's will and charity and benefaction to mankind, and even to him that ſuffered) yet this one act of the Jews, their doing againſt the expreſs Command and will of God, that thing which yet was by God * determined to be done, their crucifying an innocent person, that desired nothing but their amendment, their committing that act which by God was forbidden under the Commandment of Murther, is thought fit by that God whom the Christians worship to be punished most prodigiously and exemplarily, that ever any sin of the deepest dye and the most mischievous effects was ever punished, even with the utter desolation of the whole Nation, and all the prodigies that have been read of, the greatest pomp of aggravating circumstances, the calling Heaven and Earth together, to make the execution of these crucifiers the more solemn and remarkable. So far is Christianity from owning any such irrational doctrine as this. * προώρισται ἁγιασθαι.

But this being thus disclaimed, and the Doctrine which is acknowledged to be Christian being cleared to be only this, That in God's Dispensations and Providence, and governing of the World under the Gospel, it is not unusual for injustice to prosper, and patience and innocence never to be relieved or rewarded in this life; this I shall now assume on me to clear to be perfectly reasonable; and it shall be by thus taking it asunder. Sect. 6.

First, That wicked men should be permitted to be wicked, when all fair rationable means have successively been used to bring them to repentance, to restrain them from waxing worse and worse; that they that will not mend by all the probablest and most effectual means, should at last be left to themselves and become incorrigible; that God should not proceed from perswasion to violence, and force them to be good (contrary to the nature of man in this his state of proficiency, who was created with a will or freedom of doing evil if he pleased, and contrary to the nature of free and rewardable goodness, which if compelled ceaseth to be such) who will not be restrained from evil without force: This will never be deemed irrational in God, who hath another Tribunal to arraign and punish those who will not submit to Exhortation and Discipline here: But on the contrary, it will very ill become the servant of God, for his own ease and security, to wish the disturbance of that method of God with mankind, to expect that man, which when he was in innocence was created with a liberty to chuse the evil, should now, amidst the briars and thorns, after the provocations of a long vitious life, have such shackles laid on him, as that he should not be able to break God's Bands and Laws; and all this only that the good man may be protected, who, if he be not, knows that it is far more for his advantage than if he were. Sect. 7.

Secondly, that they which are wicked and have cast off all restraints of Divine and Humane Laws, which break through all the ties and securities that promises and oaths can lay upon them (the greatest protection for innocents that any Religion or Law hath ever provided for them) should by these advantages above other men, be able to over-reach and defraud others; and by this means having acquired a power of hurting, should, when they have it, make use of this power to do what is most agreeable to their lusts and interests to do: This again hath nothing in it strange or irrational: It is far more strange that it is not always thus, that (wicked men allowing themselves all the liberty, and being by their very sins furnished with all armour and instruments to work their wills; and all innocent men, that resolve to continue such, being by this means disarmed and naked before them) the wicked should not get the whole world into their possessions. Sect. 8.

This certainly were to be expected, and by this means all that have wicked inclinations would in any humane likelihood be incouraged to act the height of their power of hurting, were there not a peculiar hedge of Providence to defend the meek, without any of their own (considerable) contributions toward it, to guard them wonderfully in the open field without any visible means of doing it. And if this shall otherwise happen at some one time, perhaps but once in many ages, and that for some very great end, in God's wisdom more considerable to the God-like Government of the whole world, than the miraculous rescuing of a few meek innocents from a short oppression (in earthly things which are not worth the possessing) could be deemed to be; there is sure no great wonder in this, nothing irrational in the sometimes permitting of it. Sect. 9.

He that were secured in his inheritance in a quiet Kingdom as long as any man injoyed his own, as Majesty were permitted on the throne, or Law and Justice on the Bench, would never desire a fairer conveyance, or a longer lease of the most valued possessions of this life: and this security remains to the meek man, though once in many Ages it may have happened not to prove good unto him. Sect. 10.

And as there hath been nothing strange or irrational on the part of the wicked oppressor that prospers: so next, on the part of the patient or sufferer that smarts under him, there will appear to be as little. Sect. 11.

For first, Absolute innocence is a thing which (save in the person of Christ) hath never been met with in Man or Woman on the Earth; and therefore he that is guilty of no fault in one particular, may yet be culpable and punishable in many others: he that is legally possessed of an estate, and hath done nothing to forfeit it in Law, may yet have sinned against God, and so have punishments due to him from that eternal Justice; which if they fall upon his body or estate in this World, there is nothing irrational in that; but especially if so light a discipline may pass for all the revenge, and (through the sufferings of Christ, and interposition of Mercy) avert all future punishment, and be accepted in commutation for the torments of another Judicature, this sure is all the charity and bounty in the World, that may be admired, but not complained of as unreasonable. Sect. 12.

Secondly, That those that for their other faults might justly be punished, should have this punishment inflicted on them by those which themselves are wicked, and are actually such in thus afflicting them, if this seem to have any thing unreasonable in it, it will soon be answered by the necessity of the matter, which makes it impossible for any but wicked men to be imployed in it. The Israelites were once used to root out the Nations, but that by an infallible Commission from God the Supreme Law-giver (and whose Will being once made known over-rules all former laws) and the universal Owner and Disposer of all the World and the possessions thereof: And by this Commission, this became to them not only lawful, but necessary, an act not only of Justice, but of Obedience. And so upon the like Commission, the Levites killing their Brethren was an act of Sanctity, a consecrating themselves unto the Lord; those bloudy Sacrifices were in a manner the Ceremonies of their Consecration to their Priests Office. But then, first, all this depended upon the infallible validity of Sect. 13.

their Commiſſion, which had it been falſly pretended by them, or had they not been aſcertained that it came from God, their Actions had been as ungodly and murtherous as Abraham's ſacrificing his ſon muſt have been deemed without the like Commiſſion. And ſecondly, this Commiſſion was by no means to be enlarged to any other, but thoſe particular ſubjects or matters to which it was given. The Jews might not at that time have deſtroyed or invaded any other Nation upon the face of the Earth, nor might the Levites at any other time have killed their Brethren on ſtrength of that Command; much leſs may any other People of any other Nation, on ſtrength of that example. And ſo now that ſuch Commiſſions are out-dated, when all is left by God in the hands of ſtanding Laws, in oppoſition to new Revelations, and conſequently, when that which is moſt juſt for me to ſuffer, or God to permit, (or by proſpering in him to inflict on me) is moſt injurious in him that doth it, were it not perfect fury, much above the pitch of irrational, to demand that God's deareſt Children ſhould act as the vileſt men? to require ſuch explicite contradictions, that none but godly men ſhould be permitted to oppreſs, to kill, to commit Sacriledge, to lay waſte, and to deſtroy, to break all thoſe Commandments of God, which he that doth, ipſo facto ceaſeth to be godly? If there be any wickedneſs to be done in a City, ſhall the righteous be the only men to do it? this were worth wondring at indeed. But for the wicked, whoſe trade it is, whoſe joy of heart to be thus for ever occupied, he is in his element, he needs no call or incitation to do it. The turning him out of that office, and employing any body elſe, were the greateſt unkindneſs to him; as the caſting the Devils out from tormenting the man, was by them looked on as the deſtroying them before their time; whereas the Angel of light would have looked upon it as a degree of Hell, had he been ſent in on that errand to torment him.

Sect. 14. Thirdly, Beſide the perfect reaſonableneſs of having offenders puniſhed temporally here, (which were reaſonable, if it were for ever in another World) there is a ſecond, not only Juſtice, but Mercy, in ſuch Sufferings on whomſoever they fall. They are Admonitions, and Doctrines, and Spiritual Medicines, diſciplines of the Soul, to awake us out of ſecure, and ſtop us in wilful, ſinning; and are by God on purpoſe made uſe of to that end, when Proſperity hath been long uſed and experimented to have no ſuch auſpicious influences in it, to be proper to feed and foment, very improper to ſtarve and ſubdue enormities. And if the Phyſician adminiſter a bitter Potion, if the Surgeon apply a Corroſive or Cauſtick, when Julips or Balſoms are judged and proved to be uneffectual, ſure it is not the manner of men to count ſuch Methods irrational.

Sect. 15. Nay, it will be no Hyperbole to affirm, that the addition of ſuch Documents as theſe may ſometimes deſerve to be preferred and more pretiouſly valued than all the Doctrines in the Book of God it ſelf without theſe, one ſuch ſeaſonable Application than all other Receipts in his Diſpenſatory. The word of God gives Rules of living to all men, but thoſe ſo general and unapplied, that it is ordinary for paſſionate men not to ſee themſelves concerned in them. Theſe puniſhments and viſitations will be able to bring home, and make us, while we are under the diſcipline, confeſs that we are the very men to whom by peculiar Propriety they appertain.

Sect. 16. But there is yet a third ſublimer benefit of ſuch diſpenſations of God under the Goſpel, which will render them abundantly rational. And that is the exerciſe of many Chriſtian Graces of the greateſt price in the ſight of God, and ſuch as ſhall be ſure to be the moſt richly rewarded by him, which were it not for ſuch changes as theſe would lie by us unprofitably; ſuch are Patience, Meekneſs, Humility, Contentedneſs with whatſoever lot, faithful Dependance on God in all outward things, Thankſgiving for Plenty and for Scarcity too, a ſubmitting to God's Will in ſuffering as well as doing it chearfully; yea, and to his Wiſdom too, in reſolving God's choices for us to be abſolutely fitter for our turns than any our own wiſhes; and laſtly, that Wiſdom which Saint James ſpeaks of, the skill of Spiritual judging, which can really prefer this ſtate of ſuffering for Chriſt (an excellence that Angels do not partake of) beyond any other ſtate or condition of life.

James 1. 5.

Sect. 17. Were it but only for the Variety, that all the burthen of the day might not lie on thoſe Graces which are exerciſed in fair weather, but that thoſe other provided for the Storm or Winter might take their turns, and give them ſome relaxation, this would be very rational and uſeful for us; as Ariſtotle ſaith, that the change of motions from uphill to down-hill, and ſo back again, doth provide againſt laſſitude, more than the conſtancy of any one, be it in the eaſieſt, ſmootheſt Plain, becauſe that lays all the burthen inceſſantly upon one pair of muſcles without any relief or aſſiſtance from any other. But when withall every exerciſe of each of theſe Graces hath attending it an addition of more Gems in our Crown, more degrees of Glory in another World, (that I may not add alſo of preſent Joy, and Satisfaction, and Raviſhment in the preſent Exerciſes here,) then ſure the ſuperfluities and pleaſures of this life, the any thing that is ever taken from us by the Harpyes and Vultures of this World, are richly ſold and parted with by the Chriſtian (which knows how much, or, indeed, how little they are worth enjoying) if they may thus bring him in that rich fraight of never-fading bliſs in another World. And this will ſerve for juſtifying the rationalneſs of God's dealing with us now under the Goſpel in reſpect of his Providence.

CHAP. VI.

The Exceptions againſt Chriſt's Commands.

Sect. 1. IT remains that I proceed to Chriſt's Commands under the Goſpel, and ſhew the Rationalneſs of them.

Sect. 2. And having done it ſo largely already on the head of Advantages, I ſhall now only deſcend to that one againſt which our Modern Exceptions are moſt frequently made, viz.

The

The great Fundamental duty of taking up the Croſs to follow Chriſt, i. e. of approving my obedience to Chriſt in all and every particular, even when the extremeſt danger, the loſs of my Life, is like to be the Price to be paid for it. Sect. 3.

The unreaſonableneſs of this is argued and concluded from the contrariety of it to that Liberty of ſelf-defence, and to that Law of ſelf-preſervation, which nature is ſuppoſed to dictate to every man. And the ſhewing the weakneſs of this Objection will be a full vindication of the rationalneſs of the Precept. Sect. 4.

And this is done by putting us in mind what is meant by Self-preſervation, and what by Nature, and what by Law. A man is made up of a Body and a Soul, a mortal and an immortal part, and thoſe may be conſidered either ſeverally or united: And conſequently Self-preſervation may be ſet to ſignify any one or more of theſe four things. Either, firſt, the preſerving that material mortal part of him from preſent hurt; or ſecondly, preſerving the immortal part of him in well and happy being; or thirdly, preſerving the preſent union of one of theſe with the other; or fourthly, the providing for the perpetual happy union of them eternally. The firſt is the preſerving the Body, and with it the eſtate, and liberty, and reputation, &c. from preſent loſs or diminution. The ſecond is preſerving the Soul in Innocence, or Vertue. The third is preſerving of this Life of ours, which we live in the natural Body. And the fourth is, providing for a joyful Reſurrection, and an everlaſting Life attending it. Sect. 5.

Then for Nature, that may ſignify either blind uninlightned Nature, which ſees no more than the reflexion upon it ſelf, and the Book of the Creatures, and Natural Inſtincts repreſent to it; or elſe Nature as it is inlightned by Revelation, i. e. by God's making known ſome things in his Word, which Nature had never known had they not been thus revealed: Such are the Doctrines of our Faith, and particularly the eternal rewards and puniſhments which are revealed to us in the Scripture. Sect. 6.

Then for Laws, thoſe may be either abſolute and peremptory, which yield not to any ſuperiour Laws; or elſe conditional and ſubordinate, when a ſuperiour Law doth not interpoſe to the contrary. Sect. 7.

To bring all this home to our preſent diſcourſe. If by Self-preſervation be meant either the firſt or the third notion of the ſelf, the preſerving my Body or my life, then though it may truly be ſaid that it is a Law of Nature, that men may, and that (when no ſuperiour Law requires the contrary) they ought, and are bound to preſerve theſe imperfect mutilate ſelves, theſe Bodies; yet then as there is a higher notion of a man than as that barely ſignifies his Body, his Soul being the far more excellent part of him, and the eternal union of Body and Soul together being moſt eminently the Notion that he is concerned in, ſo there muſt be a ſuperiour Law of Self-preſervation than that which commands only the preſerving the Body: and though bare uninlightned Nature, that is able to look no farther than this life, do not give any Law in this matter; yet Nature being ſuppoſed inſtructed in the Chriſtian Doctrine, that there is another life of Body and Soul after this to laſt for ever, muſt needs be reſolved to do it; it being impoſſible that reaſonable Nature, when two things are repreſented ſo diſtant, as the life of a few years here in the midſt of ſuch ſad mixtures, and an everlaſting life hereafter in the fullneſs of all joys, ſhould not enjoin the preſerving of the latter, even with the contempt of the former, when the care of the former may bring any danger to the latter. Sect. 8.

The ſhort of it is, That when Eternal Life is in the hand of Chriſt to give to them that continue obedient and conſtant to him, and to none elſe, and when the fearing of them which can hurt and kill the body, the caring for or preſerving of this preſent life, doth at any time or in any caſe reſiſt or obſtruct the performance of that duty which Chriſt then requires or expects from me; there Nature commands me to deſpiſe the leſs and preſerve the greater: and if it be not abſolutely willing to Sacrifice the preſent to the eternal life, and conſequently to prefer the obeying of Chriſt to the preſerving of this fading ſhort life, it muſt acknowledge it ſelf a blind Heathen Nature, that knows nothing of an eternal future life, and of him that can caſt both body and ſoul into Hell; or elſe an irrational wild Nature, that knows theſe diſtances of finite and infinite, and doth not think them worth conſidering. Sect. 9.

It is therefore my moſt charitable opinion of thoſe that object the Principle of Self-preſervation to the Doctrine of taking up the Croſs, and determine us free from the Obligation of paying obedience to Chriſt, when it cannot be done without endangering of Eſtate or Life, that they ſpeak out of their memory only, what they have read in Books of that ſupreme Law of the preſerving ones ſelf, but do not withal remember, that if that Self ſignified only the Body, it was the Philoſophy of them that knew nothing of the Immortality of the Soul or the endleſsneſs of another Life; or if they were aware of the Chriſtian Doctrines of Eternity, they never called the Body that Self that was to be ſo ſolicitouſly tended. Sect. 10.

And therefore it is obſervable in the firſt Ages of the Church, that thoſe Hereticks that were enemies of the croſs of Chriſt, that taught it to be [a] indifferent and lawful in time of Perſecution to forſwear and renounce Chriſt, and offer Sacrifice to Idols, were a ſort of men (the Gnoſticks) that immerſt themſelves in all unnatural filthineſs, and depended not at all on the Promiſes of another life; and having firſt taught that Chriſt did not [b] really ſuffer in the fleſh, but only in appearance, would not be perſwaded that either he had any [c] need of their lives, or indeed expected it from them, [d] being come, as they ſaid, to ſave their lives, to die that they might not be killed. Where the miſtake was clear and viſible, that they thought they were theſe tranſitory Lives that Chriſt came to preſerve, and not thoſe other lives which were to be conveyed over to Eternity. Sect. 11.

The fate of thoſe Gnoſticks at that time was very remarkable, and that which will render our irrational Sect. 12.

tional fondneſs of theſe bodily lives yet more irrational. Their great care was to preſerve their lives, and their prime dexterity in order to that, to comply conſtantly with the powerful perſecutor; that was, eſpecially, with the Jews, (for though the Sword was in the Heathens hand, yet the great malice againſt the Chriſtians was in the Synagogue, from [e] thence ſprang all the Perſecutions.) To this end thoſe Gnoſticks took upon them to be great zealots for the Moſaical Law of Circumciſion, and generally pieced with the Jews, and approved themſelves to them. At laſt the Roman Army comes againſt Jeruſalem, takes Jews and Gnoſticks together, and deſtroys them all: and ſo Chriſt was as remarkably a true Prophet in that as in any one particular, That he that would ſave his life ſhould loſe it, (that very temporal life, that all his compliance with the Jews was deſigned to ſave) and he that would loſe, i. e. venture and lay down his life for Chriſt's ſake, ſhould find it, i. e. have it more probably preſerved and continued to him here, than they that were moſt ſolicitous for it, and, whether he loſt or kept it here, have it reſtored to him to continue eternally.

[e] Synagogæ Judæorum fontes perſecutionum. Tert. ib. c. 19.

Sect. 13. And if that promiſe of the Goſpel have truth in any ſence of it, then is the command no irrational command, of taking up the Croſs to follow Chriſt, when he can, if it be for thy turn, accept of thy taking up the Croſs, without its bearing thee; or if he do not, can pay thee abundantly for what thou loſeſt, reward thee with Eternity.

Sect. 14. If I could fore-ſee any other command of Chriſt could fall under our jealouſie and cenſure, I ſhould proceed to it, and be confident of approving it exactly rational. As it is, I am at an end of my deſigned Method, and am glad it hath been contrived into ſo ſmall a compaſs, being now at leiſure to retire to my Meditations, which will, I hope, be more calm, being thus disburthened; and make it my firſt Theme to diſcourſe with my ſelf, how extremely rational it is that thoſe very turns of Providence which have been our great temptation, and, they ſay, made many Atheiſts among us, ſhould be reviewed again, and upon ſecond demurer thoughts engage and inſtruct us all to become more Chriſtian.

Who is wiſe, and he ſhall underſtand theſe things: prudent, and he ſhall know them? For the ways of the Lord are right, and the juſt ſhall walk in them, but the tranſgreſſor ſhall fall therein, Hoſ. 14. 9.

Χρὴ πρὸς τὰς διαβολὰς μὴ ἀποσιωπᾶν, ἵνα μὴ συγχωρήσωμεν συνδοκεῖν τῷ ψεύδει, καὶ τὸς ἀπατημένους μὴ ἐναφῶμεν τῇ βλάβῃ. S. Baſil. Epiſt. 63.

A BRIEF

VINDICATION

Of three Paſſages in the Practical Catechiſm,

From the Cenſures affixt on them by the MINISTERS of LONDON, in a Book Entituled, [A Teſtimony to the truth of Jeſus Chriſt, &c.]

For Mr Cheynell.

SIR,

AT my return from London late laſt night, I met with ſome ſcattered reports of your dealing with the Author of the Practical Catechiſm, in a late Sermon or Sermons of yours in this City, within a few days after I met you at Col. Hammonds lodgings, and ſignified my intentions to go out of Town the next day. Now though the care I have of the reputation of that Author be not ſo great or paſſionate, as to put me upon the leaſt thought or deſign of working any proportionable revenge on him, that endeavoured publickly to defame him; or to make you any return, ſave only of my prayers to God for you, that he will forgive you all the treſpaſſes that either this, or any other dealing of yours hath been guilty of, and that he will give you a right Judgment in all things; yet becauſe I would not be in danger to believe any thing of you cauſeleſly, I thought my ſelf obliged in Juſtice to you, to deſire from you (who know beſt what you ſaid) an exact account in writing (as far as your memory will ſerve) of all that you ſaid in publick, either at Saint Maries, or Carfax, wherein the Author of that Catechiſm was concerned. I do much abuſe my ſelf in the notion I have of Chriſtian Juſtice, if that do not oblige you to anſwer this requeſt of Octob. 10. 1646.

Your Servant

H. Hammond.

I ſhall re-inforce my requeſt, that you will ſend me the ſumme of what you ſaid, with as little alteration as is poſſible.

SIR,

I Return you thanks, and am before-hand with you for Prayers, the Lord pardon, and lead you into all truth and holineſs. Truly Sir, I had ſaid as much of the Practical Catechiſm as I did ſay, though you had been in Town, nay, had been (where you might learn ſomething of my brethren) at Church. What I ſaid of the Author of that Catechiſm, was (your Friends being Judges) as much as he deſerved: ſome think I ſpoke too highly in his commendations. But to the point; firſt, you ſay you are obliged in Juſtice to me to deſire an exact account of my Sermons: Sure this is ſomewhat more than equal Juſtice to me, it is to exerciſe Juriſdiction over me. Secondly, you do much abuſe your ſelf in the notion of Chriſtian juſtice, if you conceive me obliged in Chriſtian juſtice to give you an account this night (being to preach to morrow) of what I preached about ten dayes ago.

I will deal plainly with you, I have not ſaid all that I intend to ſay of that Catechiſm, becauſe it ſeems to evacuate the moral Law, under pretence of filling up its vacuities, and it doth in effect overthrow the ſumme and ſubſtance of the Goſpel. Sir, this is more than I ſaid in either Sermon; But you ſhall (in due time, place, and manner, as ſoon as my weighty occaſions will permit) receive the reaſons of this aſſertion

From your humble Servant

Fr. Cheynell.

Saturday, Octob. 10. 1646. about 4 of the clock in the afternoon.

SIR,

What I ſaid of the Practical Catechiſm ——

SIR,

I Am ſorry I was ſo miſtaken in you, as to make a requeſt to which you do not by your anſwer return me one word, nor are ſo favourable as to promiſe me any at your greater leiſure. Having had this experience of you, I ſhall make no more new queſtions (to which the former part of your Letter might tempt one that were curious) as who of my Friends they were, which were ſo well ſatisfied with what you ſaid of the Author of that Catechiſm; or, who again, that envyed him the Elogy which you affirm your ſelf to have beſtowed upon him. I ſhall rather take occaſion from theſe two affirmations of yours, to inforce my one former Petition, that you will commit to paper what you ſaid, and give me leave to paſs a judgment whether the Author be obliged to thank you for civilities, or (as my preſent intelligence goes) to clear himſelf from your accuſations. I am willing to flatter my ſelf by the ſecond leaf of your Letter (begun with a [Sir, what I ſaid of the Practical Catechiſm] and ſo abruptly broke off) that you were once in ſo good humour, as to deſign me the favour I petition'd for; and if I am deceived, yet have I now more reaſon to importune it, becauſe, firſt, by your preſent miſtaking of my few Lines; and ſecondly, returning an anſwer very diſtant from the particular propoſed by me; I am enclined to believe it poſſible that your exceptions to the Author of the Catechiſm might be miſtakes alſo, (and then I would hope I might rectify, and you retract thoſe miſtakes;) Or elſe, ſecondly, that your anſwers might be ſomewhat from the matter, and the ſhewing you that might to you be uſeful alſo. And if neither of theſe ſhould prove true, I ſhall farther invite you to that charity by a ſerious promiſe, that whatever you to my apprehenſion juſtly object againſt, or confute in that Author, ſhall by Gods grace tend to my edification. And having that preparation of mind, I hope your prayer will be heard, that God will pardon, and lead me into all truth and holineſs.

That you may not think I have been unjuſt in mentioning ſuch blemiſhes in your Letter (and that I may perform to you, what I deſire of you) I ſhall firſt mention the miſtakes in it. The firſt is, your interpreting my deſire to you, for an exerciſe of Juriſdiction over you, which that it may appear probable, you ſay, I deſire an exact account of your Sermons. Where firſt, Sir, to deſire an account, is not to exerciſe juriſdiction: Secondly, the account I deſired, was not of your Sermons, or of any part of them, ſaving only of that wherein the Author of the Catechiſm was concerned; and that I then told you I was obliged (in Juſtice to you) to deſire, and I ſtill conceive I am ſo, it being but juſt, to uſe this obvious conducible means to keep me from believing you to have ſaid any thing but what you did ſay, when perhaps the relations of others may be unjuſt to you, (and tempt me to be ſo alſo) and no body can well aſſure me of either, but your ſelf. What you mean by [more than an equal juſtice to you] I ſhall not demand, becauſe I would make haſte to conclude this paper: yet becauſe I ſuppoſe you would intimate by that phraſe, that it was not Juſtice to you (for if it were more than equal on your ſide, you would not complain; and beſides you ſay, it is exerciſing juriſdiction over you, which for me to do over you, were I confeſs injuſtice) I muſt further evidence it were not, by naming you the particulars which are reported to me from your Sermon, which are ſuch falſe ſuggeſtions, that nothing but your ſaying, and ſaying truly that you ſaid them not, can clear you from a great fault, of which that I may not charge you untruly, I had no ſure way, but to make that requeſt to you. The particulars are four:

Firſt, That you told your Auditory that there was a Catechiſm, and never a word of the Trinity in it. Of this I deſire you to inform me whether you ſaid it or no. For if you did, there was great injuſtice in it. For 1. if you had mentioned the full title of the Book, not a Catechiſm (to which it may ſeem proper to treat of the Trinity) but a Catechiſm with a reſtriction to one kind of matter, a Practical Catechiſm, there had then been no great matter of wonder or complaint, that that ſpeculative myſtery had not been handled.

But then 2. the very firſt lines of that Book would farther have prevented that objection. For the Scholar there profeſſing himſelf to have attained in ſome meaſure to the underſtanding of the principles of Religion propoſed by our Church Catechiſm (and that by this very Catechiſts care, who had often done it in his Pariſh, and at this time choſe to do ſomewhat elſe) and the belief of the Trinity being part of that Catechiſm, and of thoſe inſtructions, there is a clear reaſon why in the ſubſequent diſcourſe the Doctrine of the Trinity is not handled, becauſe it is ſuppoſed as a præcognitum before it.

3. This ſpeech if it were yours, would ſeem to have ſome deſign in it, and (whether meant by you, or not) be thought by others to affix on the Author either denying of the Trinity, or being guilty of ſome errour in that point, which he was willing to conceal: and that this Author is guilty of neither, I believe any man will be convinced by that Catechiſm, viz. in the laſt lines of it, where there is expreſs mention of, and prayer directed to the bleſſed Trinity coeternal, to which one infinite Majeſty, &c. In which few words are diſclaimed (though not confuted) as many of the errors of the Antitrinitarian and Socinian as could be well expected in that matter, I mean the words Trinity, and Unity, eternity of each Perſon, and coeternity.

The ſecond thing that I heard of, was in the matter of Oaths, that the Catechiſm had trained up youth very ill, in giving licence to vain Oaths, which you are ſaid to have concluded from theſe words in the Catechiſm, where in anſwer to this queſtion, Is the third Commandment in Exod. [Thou ſhalt not take the name of God in vain] no more than [Thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf?] It is anſwered, No more undoubtedly — for there, I am told, you ſtopt, and from thence fell into ſome expreſſions againſt the Doctrine and Book. If this were ſo, then were you very unjuſt to your Auditory, in with-holding from them the conſequents, which would certainly have kept them in charity with the Author. I beſeech you, Sir, read on, and you ſhall find that there is there as ſevere an interdiction of all kind of ſwearing in a Chriſtian (and ſure ſuch are all to whom this Catechiſm was meant) as can be imagined: in plain words, a total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf, making that as unlawful now, as perjury was before, and a great deal more, ſo extremely ſtrict, that I have by learned men been asked whether that Author were not too ſevere againſt all kind of ſwearing, but (I thank God) never heard it fanſyed, that there was any ground or appearance of liberty to be drawn thence. All that that Author can differ from you in, is his opinion, that the words of the third Commandment belong expreſly to perjury only; and for that opinion he brings the plain words of Chriſt, which reads it μὴ ἐπιορκήσεις, thou ſhalt not forſwear, &c. Secondly, the importance of the word in the original, where to lift up (or take) the name of God, ſignifies to ſwear, and [vainly] ſignifies [falſly,] and ſo the very word uſed in Exod. and there rendred [vain] is Deut. 5. in the ninth commandment rendered [falſe.] To theſe Arguments if you can give a ſatisfactory anſwer, he may chance to change his opinion in that. But however, the inſiſting on Chriſts direct punctual prohibition will ſure prove it a ſufficient calumny in him that ſhall hence conclude the Author to have given youth any liberty in this kind. I would no man were more guilty of vain Oaths, in himſelf or others, than that Catechiſt is, and reſolves to be. Having ſaid thus much, I ſhall adde ex abundanti, that in kindneſs and ſubmiſſion to the meaneſt, the Author thought fit to adde in a laſt edition (intended above a year ſince, but ſold in this Town above a month ago) after theſe words [no more more undoubtedly] theſe words, by way of explication of what before he meant, [In the primary intention of the phraſe] for to that only he profeſſes to have deſigned that ſpeech, never thinking to deny or doubt, but that vain Oaths (though not ſwearing ſimply taken, i. e. all kind of ſwearing) would there be forbidden alſo, though not primarily, yet by way of reduction; which you may gueſs to have been his meaning, becauſe he adds, that perhaps fooliſh, wanton uſing of Gods name (though not in oaths, for one may uſe Gods name and not ſwear) ſurely profane uſing of it, is forbidden by that reduction. And (I pray) do you gueſs whether it be likely that he which ſaid, perhaps fooliſh uſing of Gods name was in the law forbidden, and all kind of voluntary ſwearing under the Goſpel, could juſtly be charged as a friend to young men, in giving them any of that liberty. If you can think it poſſible, yet read on to the end of that matter, and I will be bound you ſhall think otherwiſe.

Your next exception (I am told) was, that in the matter of repentance, the Author makes inclination to ſin an infelicity, not a ſin. This, if you ſaid, you are much to blame. For in the place whereto that refers, 'tis clear that under the general words of [All kinds and ſorts of ſins] the firſt kind named is weakneſſes, frailties, pollutions of our natures, our proneneſs and inclination to ſin. Which being poſitively ſaid, would, in the judgment of any ingenuous man, have helped to interpret that which follows [as infelicities, if not as ſins] thus, not to deny them to be ſins, within two lines after it had been affirmed they were; but that, even in their opinion that took them to be only infelicities, not ſins, (as ſure ſome do, when they are not conſented to) they were yet to be to them matter of humiliation, true ſorrow and grief, as the words are clear, no where ſo much as intimating that they are not ſins, unleſs when he ſaith they are no actual ſins, which I hope you will not ſay they are, when not conſented to.

Your next exception, (I am told) was about Juſtification, but my relations differ in the particular. Some ſay your quarrel was, that he makes faith a condition, no inſtrument. If that were it; I pray tell me whether you think faith a phyſical inſtrument of juſtification, (as for a moral inſtrument, that he in terms acknowledges) or when juſtification is only an act of Gods through Chriſt pardoning of ſin, and accounting juſt, you can imagine that faith hath any kind of real though inſtrumental efficiency in that work, i. e. whether faith in any ſuch ſence can pardon ſin, or pronounce juſt; or whether it be not ſufficient to acknowledge it an inſtrument in receiving of Chriſt, and all other acts of the man as Chriſtian, and only a condition or capacity in the ſubject to make capable of Gods act upon him in juſtification? This is the ſumme of what the Author ſaith in that point, and ſhall be farther cleared to you, if that were your exception. Others tell me it was concerning the priority of ſanctification before juſtification. Which point, as it is there ſtated, can be no matter of quarrel to any that affirms the receiving of Chriſt to be pre-required to juſtification. For as that is no more than that faith is pre-required (in the true notion of faith, and that wherein Dr. Preſton acknowledges it) ſo is it by that Author ſaid, that only that ſanctification is precedent to juſtification, which is the cordial aſſent to Chriſts commands and promiſes, giving up the heart to him, reſolution of obedience; not the actual performance and practice of thoſe vows, for that is acknowledged there to be after juſtification.

Theſe are the particulars I have heard of, and have now reaſon to believe, that of all them you are not guilty, eſpecially of the firſt, though 'twas (even at London) poſitively told me from you. And therefore I do by theſe preſents acquit you of that, but yet think it not amiſs to have mentioned that report, that by it you may ſee (what alone I have now in hand to prove) how truly I told you, that to avoid the danger of believing any thing of you cauſeleſly, I thought my ſelf obliged in juſtice to you to beg an exact account of what you ſaid. I have been too long on the evidencing your firſt miſtake, I would you had anſwered my requeſt, and then you had taken away all excuſe of that prolixity.

Your ſecond miſtake was, that you conceived me to have ſaid that 'twas a piece of Chriſtian juſtice in you to have given me an account this night, &c. wherein you were fain to add to my words [this night] whereas I only mentioned an anſwer, but aſſigned you no time for it, but punctually required the Meſſenger to deſire to know, when it would be ſeaſonable, and he ſhould call for it; and accordingly, though I have this evening written this rejoinder, yet that I may not trouble you, I mean to reſpite the ſending it till Munday. And yet by the way, I conceive it had been as eaſy for you to have given me what I deſired, as that Letter in ſtead of it, unleſs it be eaſier for you to write out of your invention than your memory. I am ſure it had been the ſavingſt way, for then you had eſcaped this importunity. The diſtance of your anſwer from my propoſition I ſhall not need to put you in mind of. That which you mean to add more of the Catechiſm, is not all, nor (if my intelligence fail me not) any part of what you have ſaid already: and 'tis but diverſion to tell me you will ſay more, and give me reaſon of that more, when as yet much leſs is deſired of you, and cannot be obtained. I ſhall, when you are at leiſure, deſire all your heap of exceptions againſt that poor creature, that (I will be depoſed for it) meant no man any greater malice, than to land him ſafe at heaven the neareſt and ſureſt way that the Author could imagin. But I will not yet importune you for any more than you have yet delivered publickly in this City. By granting me this uprightly and candidly, you will make me really rejoice to hear that you ſhall have taken any further notice of me; but if you ſhall perſiſt to deny me this firſt requeſt, you will utterly diſcourage

POSTSCRIPT.

YOU are pleaſed to mention your deſign of further ſeverity againſt that Author in the matter of the moral law, which (ſay you) it ſeems to evacuate under pretence of filling up its vacuities; and adde, that it doth in effect overthrow the ſumme and ſubſtance of the Goſpel. The latter of theſe (I confeſs) would be a little ſtrange to me, that he that labours to elevate the Goſpel-precepts (as you think, too much) above the Law, ſhould overthrow the ſumme or ſubſtance of the Goſpel. I muſt profeſs to believe that whatever charge can be affixt to that Doctrine, that would not be it, but rather that it labours to raiſe the Goſpel to a greater height than it would bear, or indeed to leſſen the Law, not to alter any thing in the Goſpel. In this particular I muſt profeſs my ſelf poſed, and utterly unable to conjecture what you mean, till you are ſo kind as to adde your reaſons. One thing only I meant to ſerve you in by this Poſtſcript (becauſe I ſee, that, unleſs others have deceived me, you may poſſibly be deceived in paſſing judgment on that Book) and that is, to tell you, that you have a hard task to prove that that Author doth at all evacuate the Law moral (unleſs you guard your ſelf by that cautious word, that it ſeems to evacuate it, and that it may, and not do it really.) For you may pleaſe to mark from me, (who know the ſence and ſpirit of that Author better than you) that he ſaith not poſitively that Chriſt added to the Law new precepts, but one of theſe two, either new precepts, or new light; and concludes that either of theſe two will ſerve his turn, and enhaunce the Chriſtians obligation; and adds, that he that will acknowledge that Chriſt requires more of his Diſciples or Chriſtians now, than the Jews by any clear revelation had been convinced to be neceſſary before, did grant as much in effect as he deſired to be granted. And yet farther, in the cloſe, that if any will contend, and ſhew as univerſal plain obliging precepts under the Law, as there are in the fifth of St. Matthew, he ſhall be glad to ſee them, and not contend with him, ſo that he will bring the Jews up to us, and not us down to the Jews; profeſſing that the only danger which he had uſed all his diligence to prevent. Now I have told you this, uſe your diſcretion, and let me hear the worſt you can ſay in this particular alſo.

For Dr Hammond.

SIR,

I Was not the firſt, no nor the laſt, that endeavoured to confute the dangerous errors of your much admired Catechiſm; yet I do not hear that you have fallen foul upon any but on my ſelf. I acknowledge my ſelf the weakeſt, and yet am confident that Gods power will be manifeſted in my weakneſs, that God may have all the glory. I received your Rejoynder upon Munday: that day I was forced to go out of Town to ſpeak with a Gentleman; I was to preach yeſterday morning, and to perform ſome exerciſe in the afternoon for the ſatisfaction of ſome that are much ſeduced; this Friday morning I return you what I can, and hope it will give you ſome ſatisfaction.

Sir, your meſſenger forgot your charge, and never told me that you expected an anſwer when I was at leiſure, and therefore I ſcribled ſomewhat in haſt, as now I do, for I have not one hour in a day free from diſturbance.

Your errors were more ſolidly refuted by two of my Reverend Brethren, that are both of them Seniors to you: they would have been able to have given you better ſatisfaction.

You deſire to know what I ſaid at Carfax. I took notice of that paſſage, page 103. of your laſt edition, where you ſpeak to this effect [That the holy Ghoſt was our advocate in ſetling a Miniſtery to pray and intercede for their ſeveral Congregations (and enabling them in the very Apoſtles time to form a Liturgy to continue in the Church to that end) and thereby helping our infirmities, and teaching us to pray as we ought.] I ſaid, I ſhould be glad to ſee that Liturgy which you ſay 1. was then formed; And 2. was to be continued in the Church. 3. To know whether the Holy Ghoſt doth help our infirmities by any other Liturgy or not. 4. Whether they do not pray as they ought, who know not where to procure that very Liturgy, which you ſay was formed in the Apoſtles times, and to be continued in the Church. 5. Whether the Common-prayer-book be that very Liturgy.

Sir, Mr. Reynolds told me you wanted direction about your firſt-fruits; if your brother will procure L. Gen. Cromwel to ſpeak to Sir H. Vane junior, it is in his power to relieve you. Forgive the abruptneſs of

Your faithful Servant

Francis Cheynell.

In this outward Paper was incloſed as follows.

SIR,

SIR,

I Was not much taken with your notion of Juſtice, but I ſhall gratify your deſire, being now invited to charity by your ſerious promiſe and preparation of mind to entertain the truth, if God be pleaſed to diſcover it to you by ſo weak an inſtrument as I confeſs my ſelf to be. You have changed and mollified your phraſe, you did not ſtoop ſo low in your Letter, as you do in your Rejoynder (as you are pleaſed to term it) to beg an account: Truly Sir, I did ſtumble at thoſe hard words, exact account, conſidering that you have exerciſed juriſdiction heretofore in a Countrey, where I am now ſeated by the Parliament. You complain of falſe ſuggeſtions. I pray God forgive them that ſuggeſted ſo many falſe accuſations againſt me to you, who have (as I perceive) more worth in you, than to believe them.

1. It is reported that I complained of you to my Auditory, becauſe you did not handle the Trinity in your Catechiſm, nay, that there was not a word of the Trinity in that Catechiſm: I believe Mr. Digle will be ſo candid, as to aſſure you that this is a falſe ſuggeſtion. But give me leave, Doctor, to deal plainly with you; there is an accuſation framed againſt you by your own Apology, for you ſpeak in the language of you know whom, when you tell me, that I need not wonder if the ſpeculative myſtery of the Trinity be not handled in a Practical Catechiſm. Believe it, the Doctrine of the Trinity is a Practical myſtery, the very foundation and ground-work of the myſtery of godlineſs. The bleſſed Trinity is not only the object of our faith, but of our Worſhip too; nay, the Doctrine of the Trinity hath by Gods bleſſing a comfortable and quickning influence into the main paſſages of the life and converſation of all Orthodox and judicious Chriſtians. I hope, I need not remember you of your Baptiſm, or tell you that a Sacramental Covenant is Practical. Sir, rectify that miſtake, and I will forgive the ſuggeſter.

Your next reaſon concerns the Church-Catechiſm, I ſuppoſe you mean that Catechiſm in the Common-prayer-book: now truly Sir, I muſt confeſs that I like that Catechiſm far better than your Practical Catechiſm: and your Friends will tell you, that you might have contented your ſelf with that Catechiſm, unleſs you could have made a better.

To your third reaſon I anſwer, that I did once in London ſhew that paſſage, which you cite out of your prayer, to aſſure a friend of yours, that you did acknowledge the Trinity, though you maintain many errours, broached by them that deny the coeternal Trinity in unity. I haſten to your ſecond report.

2. Concerning your expoſition of the third Commandment, I ſaid, the youths, &c. had learnt the Art of ſwearing as perfect as their Catechiſm; and added, that I did not wonder at it, when I read ſuch a paſſage in a Practical Catechiſm printed at Oxford; as you may alſo read, if you begin at the eighth Section of the ſecond Book (I adde theſe words now, becauſe I have ſent home the Oxford edition, and cite it according to the laſt edition,) where the eloquent Author (to whom for parts, gifts, learning, I acknowledge my ſelf far inferiour) being deſired by his Scholar to weed out the vice of ſwearing, leſt it ſhould take too deep root in young men, and get into faſhion, doth aſſure his Scholar that after this Preface, Ye have heard, &c. the firſt part of the Precept, Matth. 5. 33. [Thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf] is clearly the third Commandment: but the latter part [But ſhalt perform, &c.] is taken out of other places of the Law to explain the meaning of the former, and to expreſs it to be (as literally it ſounds) againſt perjury or non-performance of promiſſory oaths: where note, there's liberty enough for aſſertory oaths, for the third Commandment is not meant of aſſertory oaths, as is plainly ſaid afterwards. But leſt the Scholar ſhould think that this was not the full meaning of the Law ſent by Moſes, he is prompted to put the queſtion home, whether there be no more meant in the third Commandment than [Thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf?] The Catechiſt anſwers ſadly and peremptorily [No more undoubtedly.] This is a flat denial indeed, which requires full aſſurance of belief in the Scholar, as it doth note confidence in the Teacher, no more, and undoubtedly no more. I fear that the doubtful [perhaps] and imaginary ſuperaddition following (of which I may have fair opportunity to ſpeak more hereafter) will not be ſo effectual to reſtrain the Youths or Doctors from ſwearing, as the unqueſtionable command of God. I hope, this expoſition of the third Commandment is not generally received in this Univerſity, and doubt not but ſome will be ſo ingenuous as to proteſt againſt it.

Sir, I have no more than this in my notes concerning that paſſage in your Catechiſm, though I was ſufficiently prepared by meditation to have diſcourſed at large upon that Argument: whether the clock ſtruck, or what other diverſion there was, I know not; I believe I ſaid not much more, but whether I delivered more or leſs at that time, I am not able to give you an exact account, it was not a buſineſs worth a deſign to paſs over ſuch excuſes as you alledge for your ſelf.

1. A total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf, and making it as unlawful now as perjury was before, is a doctrine which you cannot prove, unleſs you mince your total and univerſal with ſo many qualifications, that at laſt you loſe the total in a cypher. You ſay, as [a] Smalcius and the reſt do, that I muſt not take an oth but for Gods glory and the publick good: now this is not to forbid ſwearing it ſelf, but unneceſſary ſwearing: what's become of your total now? Did the perfect Law of God give men leave to take [b] vain oaths, ſo vain as that God ſhould have no glory, nor men any good by them? Why, ſure, it was by this Argument lawful to lift up the ſoul to vanity in a ſence intolerably bad. 2. Concerning our difference, it is this: you undertook to prove that by the third Commandment, there was no more meant, than that a man ſhould not forſwear himſelf. Can you conclude this out of all your premiſes in the Catechiſm? your ingenuity would not permit you to frame ſuch a concluſion, and therefore you conclude that anſwer of yours which begins [c] C. No more undoubtedly, &c. thus, [By all which it is clear, that to take Gods name in [d] vain is to forſwear ones ſelf.] You do not adde, [and no more] which was the point in queſtion, between the Scholar and and the Catechiſt, and therefore that ſhould have been proved, and in the concluſion inferred. 3. You appeal to Chriſt the beſt Judge. Chriſt ſaith; that whatſoever oath is unneceſſarily taken (ſo you muſt ſay, as I have proved before) cometh of evil, Matth. 5. 37. ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἐστιν, if you will, of the evil one, or of the Devil. Now Sir, did not the third Commandment forbid all evil; or all deviliſh oaths? 4. That the word is rendered [falſe] ſometimes, I grant; that it is as properly, if not more properly, rendred [e] [vain] you cannot deny; and if you conſult [f] Aben Ezra, R. Selomo, &c. they will aſſure you that we are not to lift up or take the name of God vainly: I need not go about to prove that the Jews ſaw this truth as clearly as we do, but I can prove that they ſaw and acknowledged it, and that is ſufficient for me to prove againſt your aſſertion. 5. Conſult the Septuagint, and ſee how they [g] render the word, Exod. 20. 7. Deut. 5. 11. 6. You know, that the primary and principal ſignification of the word is not [falſe] but [vain,] and [h] every man that hath looked into the Hebrew, gives you inſtances enough. 7. You know, that [i] others tell you, that if the primary intention had been to forbid forſwearing, divers other words or phraſes would have been uſed, in all probability, ſuch as the holy Ghoſt uſes in other places; learned men are bold to name divers, but I am not ſo bold. I might ſay a great deal more, if I had a mind to wrangle with you about the primary intention: but that is not the queſtion between you and me; only, you have acknowledged in a manner that the edition of your book printed at Oxford, had in the judgment of Learned men ſomewhat queſtionable. You tell me of the laſt edition of your Book at London. I anſwer, 1. That I ſaw one edition printed at London, and compared it with the Oxford edition; what difference there is between them, it is your part to ſhew. 2. As for that edition you talk of, ſold in Oxford about a month ago, that was a fortnight before I preached; truly I bought that edition alſo. You ſee I was at ſome coſt and pains to know your mind. 3. I read this laſt edition, and ſaw no difference between that and the other in this point about the meaning of the third Commandment. 4. I asked others and they told me that there were ſome additions at the end of this laſt edition. I peruſed thoſe additions, and then concluded that I might take it for granted that was your opinion which was to be found in all three editions. 5. You now refer me to that laſt edition, and tell me that you have added ſomewhat to thoſe words [No more undoubtedly] by way of explication; good Sir, ſay, Retractation. 6. I have looked over thoſe additions once again, with the beſt eyes I have, and find nothing about the primary intention of the phraſe; You ſay, you added it; and where ſhould I look for an addition, but amongſt your additions? you ſee how hard it is to find your explication. Your Printer and you may well make a confeſſing apology; for the additions to the 120 page, concern nothing but perjury or ſacriledge. 7. I looked on, to ſee whether it was not inſerted afterwards, till I came to the end of your additions, and there I found ſome alterations, your laſt reſerve, which (I confeſs) I did not peruſe, before I preached: my reaſon was, becauſe you call them [Leſs remarkable alterations] and therefore I thought very innocently, that you had only corrected ſome literal miſtakes; but contrary to my conjecture, I there find not only ſome alteration, but (what I bleſs God for) a direct recantation of ſundry particulars, and I hope you will ſee cauſe to recant much more. I will continue my prayers for you, and do what I can to help you to ſome new light to diſcern old ſpiritual rules which were given by God in the time of Moſes. Sir, ſeriouſly conſider the carriage of this buſineſs, and tell me whether your patience or mine hath been more exerciſed? Take another Commandment, the ſixth if you pleaſe, will you ſay there is no more, undoubtedly no more meant by that, but the actual taking away the life of a man? no, you anſwer more fairly, pag. 99. and why then could you not have interpreted the third Commandment as clearly? 3. Conſider that there are three editions of your Book abroad, every man will not be at the ſame coſt and pains that I have been; do you make the ſad and woful inference. 4. Look into the Treatiſes of Learned men; do any ſay there is no more, undoubtedly no more meant in a Commandment but what is directly primâ facie preſented? is that which is to be reduced to a command, not meant in that Commandment, to which it is properly reduced? 5. In theſe X words or Commandments, words ſhould not be too much reſtrained, but taken in their latitude. 6. Is it proper for a man that hath ſaid, No more, undoubtedly no more is meant, to come in with a doubtful perhaps afterwards, and ſay perhaps there is more meant? 7. Your leſs remarkable addition is a plain recantation. 8. It is more for Gods honour and yours, to make a free, noble, ſolemn recantation, and (now you have deceived the Kingdom with three editions) to do all things like your ſelf, ingenuouſly: a worthy action loſes its grace, and our Brethren loſe their ſhare of benefit by it, when done with ſo much reſervedneſs, that others cannot well take notice of it for their edification. Pray Sir, let your recantation be as remarkable as your ſeduction; do not put it at the fag-end of ſome leſs remarkable alterations, acknowledge that you were ſeduced by — into this opinion, and recant with obſervation, leſt others be ſeduced by ſo many hundred Catechiſms as are diſperſed throughout the Kingdom.

But it may be that you will deny that you have made a recantation. Truly Sir, firſt, the addition of thoſe words [in the primary intention of the phraſe.] 2. The putting in of [Idle] and blotting out of [perhaps] which did much affront your [No more undoubtedly.] 3. The change of theſe words [the particular matter of Moſes his Law was of Promiſſory (not Aſſertory) oaths] for theſe [The matter was peculiarly of promiſſory, not only of aſſertory oaths,] all theſe three together will amount to a round recantation, conſidering that in three editions you had ſaid, there was No more, and undoubtedly no more forbidden in the third Commandment, than the breach of promiſſory Oaths.

Ninthly, conſider, that if this amendment had been before Oxford had been taken, or if you would ſay that it (as well as another edition of your Book) was intended, before you were in danger to be called to an account for this and many things of worſe conſequence, your recantation would be more ſatisfactory. I ſpake to you as a friend, and ſpeak not out of my own breaſt, for I do but repeat the cenſures of other men. For my own part, you have made a ſolemn profeſſion under your hand to give me ſatisfaction, but how will you ſatisfie other men? 10. Yet I muſt profeſs, that I do not like that expreſſion of yours [Never thinking to deny or doubt, but that vain oaths would be forbidden there alſo.] Do you mean that they were forbidden by God when Moſes publiſhed the Law,

Law, or would be forbidden afterwards by a ſuperaddition? Would be is not ſo clear an expreſſion as is deſired. 11. I do not underſtand that expreſſion of yours, when you ſay, [That in kindneſs and ſubmiſſion to the meaneſt, the Author thought fit to add] If you mean it of me, I take it kindly, for I did ſpeak to your Friends at London about you, and they promiſed to tell you poſitively of it, and I ſpoke for that end; for I do reſpect you more than you think I do: and ſome worthy friends both of yours and mine know, that near upon ten years ago we did exchange ſome Letters about your opinion concerning certain vacuities in the moral Law of God. 12. But Sir, you ſhould conſider, that Learned men have told you of this errour, and therefore ſay, in ſubmiſſion to better Judgments. 13. Say, in ſubmiſſion to the greateſt, even to Jehovah, the God of glory, I will abaſe my ſelf, recant my errours, and acknowledge the perfection of his moral ſpiritual Law. Surely it is meet to be ſaid to God, &c. Job 34. 31, 32. I beſeech, that you will weep over thoſe two Verſes, and then read that paſſage, John 6. 38. Chriſt came down from Heaven to do the will of God, &c. Oh, do you come down from your Criticiſms, come down from your notions, your imaginary ſuperadditions; which you look upon as a kind of heaven; and endeavour to do the will of your Father, revealed in his perfect and ſpiritual Law, and I'll warrant you you'll find it ſo perfect, without any ſuperadditions, that your Evangelical obedience ſhall not excel or tranſcend that excellent rule; nay, you will confeſs that you cannot ſee an end of its perfection, and you will hate every falſe way. Pardon me, if I ſeem to preach to you; the Lord ſet it home upon your heart.

3. The next report is, that you made inclination to ſin an infelicity, not a ſin: I ſaid, that the Author of that Catechiſm did acknowledge that godly ſorrow was to be conceived for all kinds and ſorts of ſin: but when he deſcends to particulars, he ſpeaks with ſo much irreſolution, as if he doubted whether our aptneſs to fall into all ſin, were an infelicity only or a ſin.

Sir, your expreſſion is inexcuſable, and your apology doth no way ſatisfie. Truly Sir, you muſt fall down at a Throne of grace, and beg pardon of God, and you muſt ſpeak more poſitively, or elſe you will not be able to give ſatisfaction to impartial men.

1. You ſpeak of pollutions of nature: ſure that expreſſion is more proper to denote actual ſins, than original ſin, which is one entire, univerſal, and natural pollution. 2. Every one that is of age to conceive godly ſorrow, hath actually conſented to the corruption of his nature, he hath cheriſhed it, and been pleaſed with it. 3. You ſeem to imply, that there muſt needs be ſome conſent given to every actual ſin; Sir, that is yet to be proved on your part; for you are too magiſterial, and ſo much given to dictates, that you may well ſtand to be perpetual Dictator in Divinity; every point of a Catechiſm ſhould be exactly proved. 4. You ſeem either to recant what you ſaid before, or at leaſt to doubt whether theſe pollutions be infelicities only, or ſin. 5. The danger is the greater, becauſe you expreſs ſuch a grand point Sceptically; there are indeed too many that ſay, The corruption of our nature is rather an infelicity than a ſin; do you expreſs your ſelf thus doubtfully, that you may comply with them? indeed if you were compoſing ſuch a Liturgy as ſome have wiſhed for, that Proteſtants, &c. might join together, I confeſs you have ſufficiently ſerved that deſign: but ſure it was your duty, eſpecially in a Practical Catechiſm, to have declared your ſelf freely and fully againſt that dangerous errour. 6. If you are of their mind who maintain the corruption of our nature to be only an infelicity, not a ſin; it was not fairly done to blind your Reader with an Orthodox expreſſion in the beginning of your anſwer, that you might afterwards tempt him into a dangerous errour. 7. It is abſurd to ſay, that godly ſorrow is to be conceived for an infelicity quà ſic, meerly as an infelicity. 8. There is no doubt but that every ſin ſhould be bewailed quà ſic, as a ſin: an inconformity to a ſpiritual Law, and a proneneſs to actual rebellion againſt God, and all the commands of God, ought to be bewailed even with tears of bloud; you need not ſpeak timorouſly or doubtfully in ſo weighty and clear a point. 9. I found the more fault with this doubtful expreſſion, becauſe you write a Practical Catechiſm, and you know that the corruption of our nature hath great influence into our practice, and therefore you ſhould have been moſt clear and expreſs in this point, that by Gods grace this proneneſs to ſin might be both bewailed and mortified. I need not tell you, how many dangerous conſequences have been inferred from ſome doubtful expreſſions in Catechiſms or Confeſſions about original ſin, but I haſten to your laſt report, which is about juſtification.

4. It ſeems you are moſt to ſeek here, you deſire me to help you out. Sir, I never ſaid that faith was a Phyſical Inſtrument of juſtification; ſure juſtification is no Phyſical thing. You do grant, at leaſt in terms, that faith is a Moral inſtrument of juſtification; but if you deny it to be a Real inſtrument in receiving Chriſt, then ſure what you grant in terms, you deny in deed. No man ever dreamt that faith doth pardon ſin, but a ſinner doth by faith receive a pardon: 1. Faith doth receive Chriſt really, but ſpiritually, not corporally, or phyſically. 2. That which you call a ſufficient acknowledgment, is not ſufficiently clear; be pleaſed to explain what you mean, when you ſay [that faith is an inſtrument in receiving of Chriſt, and all other acts of the man as Chriſtian, and only a condition or capacity in the ſubject to make capable of Gods act upon him in juſtification.] 3. You ſhould diſtinguiſh, as the Apoſtle doth, between receiving of Chriſt, and walking in him. 4. If you mean, that all other acts of a Chriſtian, namely acts of repentance, charity, and in a word, all acts of Evangelical or new obedience, are Moral inſtruments of juſtification, I deſire a proof of that. 5. Doth my receiving of Chriſt make me capable of Chriſt, or rather make me poſſeſt of Chriſt? 6. I think you will not deny that Gods act in giving Chriſt, giving a pardon, &c. is in order of nature before my receiving of Chriſt, and a pardon. 7. You have not yet clearly expreſſed, what is the true notion of faith in your opinion, and what Dr. Preſton ſaith to confirm you in it, and where he ſaith it. 8. If you conceive that a cordial aſſent to Chriſts commands hath any influence into our juſtification, be pleaſed to unfold that riddle: you know, it is confeſſed by all, that the true believer doth give a cordial aſſent to Chriſts commands; but is he juſtified by that aſſent? 9. How do you prove, that any ſoul whilſt it remains unjuſtified doth cordially and wholly give up it ſelf to be ruled by Chriſt? I confeſs it to be a good evidence of juſtification, but not an antecedent to (much leſs a Condition to make us capable of) juſtification. 10. If a cordial aſſent to Chriſts commands, and a reſolution of obedience, are moral inſtruments of juſtification, be pleaſed to ſhew what efficiency theſe inſtruments have in juſtification; whether the Terminus of that efficiency be a capacity in the ſoul, which doth formally make the ſoul capable of Gods act in pardoning ſin, and pronouncing the perſon juſt and righteous? 11. If a reſolution or vow of obedience be ſufficient unto juſtification, without the actual performance of the vow, why do you wind in all other acts of a man as Chriſtian, into a diſcourſe of the very firſt act of faith, in receiving Chriſt, and forgiveneſs of ſins? 12. If, on the other ſide, God juſtifies the ungodly, how doth a conſtellation of Goſpel-graces, and all the acts of grace put a capacity into the ſubject to make a man capable of juſtification?

Sir, that which I took exception at, was your confounding of faith and works in a diſcourſe of juſtification. 2. That you do frequently imply, that we are juſtified by faithful actions, acts of ſincerity and obedience, that they are the Condition of juſtification, and that God doth abſolutely require them as the only things by which a man is juſtified, p. 12. you ſay, the condition which makes us capable of pardon of ſins, is poſitively the new creature, or renewed, &c. obedience to the whole Goſpel, the performing, &c. —— and Conſtellation of Goſpel-graces, &c. I need not tranſcribe your words, in your * laſt edition they are to be found, in the 8 page. 3. You ſay, that faith without the addition of ſuch works, ſuch obedience Evangelical would be unſufficient to juſtification, &c. The words following are as bad or worſe, page 14, 15. and the like you have page 19. Sir, I proved that faith was ſufficient to be an inſtrument of juſtification, without the addition of Evangelical works unto that purpoſe, and in that act; and that we were not juſtified by a righteouſneſs inherent in us, or any acts of repentance, charity, or new obedience performed by us. I am not aſhamed, yet am not now at leiſure to repeat my arguments to prove that we are juſtified by the obedience of Chriſt alone, freely imputed by God, applied and reſted on by faith only.

For Mr. Cheynell.

I Received your returns, and the Letter that encloſed them; and ſhall (as briefly as I can) give you my ſence of both. And firſt to your letter, I ſhall tell you truly that you are the only man in the world that ever I knew to have endeavoured the confuting one ſyllable of that Catechiſm; and therefore the addreſs I made to you, I acknowledge to have made to you only. If by your reverend brethren you mean thoſe which are here with you employed at this time, I ſuppoſe your periphraſis hath told me who they are, and then I am confident they are perſons which would have communicated to me any ſuch advertiſements, wherein I am ſo nearly concerned (to diſcern whether their diſlikes were cauſeleſs or no) before they had publickly accuſed me for them: which becauſe they have not done, I muſt not yet believe that refutation was publick, or ſuch as could be capable of my notice; though I muſt acknowledge to expect from either of them that which is, as you ſay, much more ſolid than yours, and heartily wiſh it were either of thoſe to whom I am now writing: for then I ſhould make no queſtion, but the ſatisfaction (mutually) would be much greater. But as it is, I muſt undergo my fate, and cannot be deceived in the ſucceſs of this paper, more than I now find my ſelf to have been in the reception of my former, which when I had kept my ſelf within thoſe limits, which I ſuppoſe far from all motion toward diſtemper, and only asked (and as you ſay beg'd) an exact account of what you had ſaid of that Author, and given you the plain reaſons of my requeſt, is yet charged by you to have fallen foully on you: To this reproach of yours I reply not one word (being not ſo much in love with that part of your ſpirit as to imitate it; which yet both here and hereafter I beſeech you not to miſtake for a no-ſence of it) but conceive it as true that I have done ſo, as that the errours, ſo ſtiled by you, are either errours, or dangerous. I will not doubt of your employments or diſturbances, nor think your returns are too ſlow, I wiſh you had more leiſure, and more perfect tranquillity of thoughts at all times, eſpecially when I have the luck to diſcourſe with you. In the mean, I beſeech you to believe, that what queſtion ſoever may depend concerning the Meſſengers delivering his errand (whom yet, upon his aſſeveration that he did it aright, I muſt believe) there can be none of the words in my letter, or conſequently of the addition in yours, viz. of the [this night] wherein I conceived you obliged to give me that account, when you have my paper by you to aſſure you, that I did not.

The words which you affirm to have taken notice of in your Carfax-Sermon, I acknowledge to be in the Catechiſm, and muſt ſet them down again in this paper, that you may judge, while I adviſe with you, whether you miſtook them, or no [The holy Ghoſt was our advocate in ſetling a Miniſtery to pray and intercede for their ſeveral congregations (and enabling them in the very Apoſtles times to form a Liturgy to continue in the Church to that end) and thereby helping our infirmities, and teaching us to pray as we ought.] You ſee Sir, and muſt acknowledge, the parentheſis in the midſt of the ſentence; and (I ſuppoſe) know the meaning of that, that it is ſo ſet, that it may unite the words after to the words before it, not pretend to joyn them to it ſelf; So that the ſentence without the parentheſis is this (and not altered by it) That the holy Ghoſt was our advocate in ſetling a Miniſtery to pray and intercede for their ſeveral congregations, and thereby helping our infirmities, and teaching us to pray as we ought. Only 'tis added by the by, that the holy Ghoſt that thus ſetled that Miniſtery, enabled them in the Apoſtles times to form a Liturgy to continue in the Church to that end, viz. of praying and interceding for their ſeveral congregations. To either of theſe thus ſet (as only theſe words can be ſet in conſtruction) your queſtions are wholly impertinent, i. e. do no way ingage him that had ſaid theſe words, to ſatisfie your ſeverals, (and I am not over willing now to engage my ſelf to anſwer any more than the matter requires of me.) For firſt, the ſaying that the holy Ghoſt enabled the Miniſtery in the very Apoſtles times to form a Liturgy to continue in the Church, doth not conclude that that very Liturgy was to be continued, as in the second and fourth question you change the words, which you needed not have done, unless you meant to get advantage by it, and from thence to conclude it my opinion, that there was some necessity, that that Liturgy formed in the Apostles times should be continued in the Church, as I am told you collected thence: but, you see, I said not, and profess not to have meant in those words [to continue] but only that it might continue (i. e. if the Church thought good) either so as it was, or with such additions or alterations as the Church should think fit; as he that leaves lands to continue to his heirs, obliges not them from ever alienating them, or exchanging. You see, the utmost that these words [to continue] on which all the weight of your exceptions lie, can be extended. And that comes not home to your [was to be continued,] nor to your questions, which are built upon it. I need say no more to your second quære; And yet if I thought you sought for any thing but exceptions in my Papers, I would adde freely, as to a Scholar, or friend, my whole sence of this matter, as a little conversation with ancient Writers hath made it up to me. For once, 'tis this; That the Apostles, and those that were by the holy Ghost consecrated to the planting of the Church, had the gifts of miracles; not every one all, but one one, another another, poured on them; That, among these, in those first times, there was χάρισμα ἐυχῆς, the gift of prayer, (that gift a miracle, as the gift of healing, prophesying, &c.) That this was bestowed εἰς ἕτα τίνα, that did pray for the rest, and ask those things that were useful for them, and teach others how to pray; That some of the prayers thus conceived by them, which were fit for the common perpetual uses of all Christians, were received and kept by those whom they thus taught; That those are they which the Ancients mean by Liturgies of Saint James, Saint Mark, &c. Though I believe not, that either all these are in those Liturgies which now we have under their names, nor that all that are under their names are those; That in the celebration of the Sacrament, which they daily used, some forms were constantly observed by them, no new occasion making it fit to alter them: Of which sort I little doubt of the Lords prayer, the ἀναλογία anon mentioned, from [lift up your hearts,] to [therefore with Angels, &c.] inclusivè; after that a prayer, called * ἐπίκλησις; then the words of consecration, taken from the Gospel: These, I suppose, I have good authority to think constantly used among them, and the blessing of God hath brought them down to us. Beside these, I make no question but variety of other prayers according to the exercise of that χάρισμα were poured out by him that was so endowed, and those I call not (as I would do the other, and whatever else there was of that nature) set forms in the Apostles times, but plainly exercises of that gift. But then as those forms were preserved and continued, so when those extraordinary χαρίσματα ceased, there was need of somewhat else to supply that place; and that would not be in any reason to permit every man to pray as he would (for that was the thing for the preventing of which, and the unhappinesses consequent to it, the χάρισμα ἐυχῆς had before been given, which but in that respect had not before been useful) but set prepared forms for the daily constant wants, and those provided by the Governours of the Church, Apostolical men, which had so benefited under the prayers of those that had the χάρισμα, or perhaps remembred some forms of theirs, at least the method and manner used by them, that their forms might well deserve to be heeded by, and so continue in the Church, at least were likely to be fitter for the turn than the unpremeditated effusions of them that now had not the extraordinary χάρισμα, and of all whom it cannot be presumed that they have the ordinary wisdom to pray always as they ought. I conceive, I can satisfie any reasonable man for the main of what I have now said, upon those grounds that are fit for a matter of this kind. I mean it not for a new ball of contention between us; I shall satisfie your exceptions to the Author without it. And that is all my answer to your second quære. And for your first, I say, that speech concludes me no undertaker, nor obliges me to shew you that Liturgy, any more than my telling you, that as Christ taught his Disciples to pray, so John Baptist's before him taught his, will oblige me to tell you what the Baptist's form was: The Disciples tell me, the Baptist did teach his Disciples to pray, and 'tis possible they could not, I am sure they did not help you to the sight of that prayer: and the Authors meanness, or his being so far less authentical than those Disciples, though it may make it more fit for you to dis-believe his report that they formed a Liturgy; yet will it not, to think him more obliged to give you a copy of it, or to acknowledge it temerarious to have said that they did form one, because he hath it not ready to shew. Other reasons, beside that of clear ocular demonstration, may be thought worthy our heeding in matters of fact; the testimony of men nearer those times than we are: And under that head I conceive there are many things to be produced; for whether the Liturgies that go now under the name of St. Mark and St. James are the very Copies compiled by them or no, it is to me no improbable argument that that age which first acknowledged them to be theirs, had been taught by Story that there were some written by them, upon which they thought fit to father those upon them. Besides this, you have been shewed in another place from 1 Cor. 14. 26. that in the Apostles times some of the Psalms of David or Asaph were used ordinarily in their devotions, and that St. Paul found fault that they did not all join in the same Psalm at the same time, which would, saith he, be best for edification: and if it were mended upon St. Paul's admonition, the use of those very Psalms were (at least a part of) a publick divine service, which is the English of Liturgy. Secondly, that, if we believe Stories, St. James, made choice of some special prayers most frequently used by the Apostles, shortned again by St. Basil and St. Chrysostome; all which the Greek Church, which is fitter to judge (in this matter done among them) than we, do still retain, and make no doubt of the Authors of them. Thirdly, that there is famous mention of a short form of St. Peter's, used alone, they say, for a great while in the Roman Church. Fourthly, that 'tis clear, that St. Augustine speaking of Sursum corda, &c. saith, that they are verba ab ipsis Apostolorum temporibus petita, and so the compiler of the Apostles Constitutions, which imitates that antiquity, and makes use of that form, must be thought to have believed, or else he had been much mistaken in his imitation, and had put off his disguise, even by putting it on. 5. That the same words with those in our Liturgy, are not only in the Liturgy which is said to be St. James's, and those other of St. Basil, and St. Chrysostome, but are recited by St. Cyrill of Jerusalem (in his Catechism) one of the Ancientest Authors we have. If it may be with your leisure

(though, as I ſaid, I undertake not to demonſtrate, yet) to offer to your judgment, not to breed you more controverſies or diſturbances, I ſhall not only refer you to Caſſander to prove that to Chriſts words in the Lords Supper, the Apoſtles added the uſe of the Lords prayer, (which though it were not much, is more than nothing of ſet form, or Liturgy, and might doubtleſs have been accompanied with much more, though I am not able to ſhew it you) but alſo go a little farther with you, upon occaſion of that laſt mentioned form, and that Father.

The form of doxology, following thoſe verſicles of ſurſum corda, &c. in our Book, is, you may remember, this, [therefore with Angels, &c.] of which there is little queſtion, but that it is the form which was called by the Greeks χερυβικὸς, by the Latines Præparatio (viz. of the Sacrament, as 'tis ſtill in our Church) that αἶνος or δόξα, which, ſaith Juſt. Mar. precedeth the Euchariſt, or bleſſing of the elements, i. e. prayer of conſecration; ὑμνωδία, ἀινολογία. δοξολογία, ὁ ἐπὶ Σεραφὶμ, by Cyril of Jeruſalem, which as it is there placed after the εὐχαειτία, i. e. (not the Sacrament, but) the giving of thanks, (as with us it is after the [Let us give thanks to our Lord God]) ſo it is before the prayer of conſecration; (which other-where, as even now in Juſtin, is called by that title, and the Sacrament ἀρτος εὐχαειτηθεὶς) as with us alſo, and is the very καθολικὴ ὑμνωδία, which, ſaith that ancient Author, under the Apoſtolical diſguiſe of Dionyſius, the whole Church profeſt before the Sacrament. And this I have ſaid, to ſhew you (if you delight in it) ſome part of that Liturgy (and being in our book you may yet ſee it) which was by thoſe Ancients uſed: And to bring it yet nearer home to the point in hand, 'tis that ancient Cyrill's affirmation of this very form, that it was παραδοθεῖσα ἡμῖν; which words, in the uſe of thoſe Ancients, moſt commonly note the thing they ſpeak of to be delivered them from the Apoſtles, or Apoſtolical men; and being ſpoken by Cyrill who was not long after thoſe times, and S. Auguſt. ſaying expreſly of ſurſum corda (which may very probably extend to this whole ἀινολογία after it) that they were delivered down from the very Apoſtles times: I conceive this, with the other precedent teſtimonies of it, may amount to a proof tolerably ſufficient to perſwade a prudent man that they were ſo. I will prevent a miſtake in this matter of Cyrill's words, which I do not think probable you would fall into, but yet am willing to ſerve you by preventing it, that the Greek [παραδοθεῖσαν ἡμῖν ὑπὸ τῶν Σεραφὶμ ἀινολογίαν ταύτην λέγομεν] imports not, as I conceive, that it was delivered by the Seraphim, (for then it would be ἀπὸ; and though that were more than an Apoſtolical, even an Angelical tradition; yet it would rather look to the [Glory to God on high,] &c.) but that it is an hymn taking in the Angels to join in lauds with us, (to which I conceive S. Chryſoſtome referred in his μετ' ἀγγέλων ᾄδεις, μετ' ἀγγέλων ὑμνεῖς, and the Greeks that call it χερυβικὸς, and Amalarius, when he ſtiles it hymnus refertus laudibus Angelorum,) and this hymn delivered down ἡμῖν by (our i. e.) that Cyrill's anceſtors at leaſt, which who they were likely to be, I before gave you reaſon to conjecture. That this thus mentioned by St. Cyrill, is that very part of our Liturgy, which I noted it to be, is clear enough by the words that follow in him [ὅπως κοινωνοὶ ἡμῖν ὑμνωδίας ταύτης ἐπουρανοπίους γενώμεθα σωτηρίους,] compared with our [With all the company of heaven we laud and praiſe, &c.] and that they are placed as we place them, by the ἵνα ἁγιάσαντες ἑαυτοὺς διὰ τῆς πνευματικῶν τούτων ὕμνων παρακαλῶμεν τὸν φιλάνθρωπον θεὸν τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα ἐξαποστεῖλαι ἐπὶ τὰ προκείμενα, &c. noting this Hymn to be immediately before the * conſecration, and to prepare men for it; which the Liturgick Writers mean by calling it præfatio actionis, & hymnatio præcedens confirmationem ſacramenti, and ſo with us it is continued. If I ſhould proceed to give you any more arguments, to perſwade you that the Apoſtles did uſe ſet forms of publick divine Service, and mention thoſe forms to you, I ſhould hope but for little thanks from you, and therefore ſhall abſtain from that profuſion, remembring that all that I am this minute about to prove, is, that I am not bound to ſhew you that Liturgy which was ſaid to be formed in the Apoſtles times. And having ſaid this, I ſuppoſe you will diſcern what my anſwer would be, (if I were obliged by my former words, to give you any, as you ſee I am not) to your other queſtions; or for fear you ſhould miſtake again, I will, ex abundanti, return you my opinion; To the third, that he doth; To the fourth, that they may, (I wiſh I could adde, they always do; but I am not obliged to that;) To the fifth, that it is not, if you mean by [that very] the ſame without any change: but yet in the ſence that Theſeus his ſhip came home the ſame that it went out, and is an inſtance in Logick of one notion of idem numero, I conceive it, if poſſible, more than the very ſame, having ſome of the ſame ribs remaining in it (as even now I inſtanced, and profeſs to be perſwaded by thoſe Authorities,) when that is ſuppoſed to have never a one.

* Or that Prayer that I told you was called ἐπίκλησις, wherein they prayed for the ὑποφήτησις, or ἐπίλεψις πνεύμα]ος ἐις τὰ προκείμενα. An ancient form of which we have in St. Baſils Liturgy, Σὺ λάμπθα, &c. ἐλθὲν τὸ πνεῦμά σου τὸ ἅγιον ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ προκείμενα δῶρα ταῦτα, καὶ ἐυλογῆσαι αὐτὰ καὶ ἁγιάσαι καὶ ἀναδεῖξαι.

I have no occaſion to add any more in anſwer to the Letter, but to thank Mr. Reynolds and you for your willingneſs to give me directions about my firſt-fruits; though the truth is, I am returned from London, and did ſpeak to my Brother to ask L. Gen. Cromwels aſſiſtance; but Sir Henry Vane junior is not of that Committee. Sir Henry Vane ſenior was in the Chair, and I delivered my caſe to him, and he fully conſented to the juſtice of my requeſt: and then your ſaying, Sir Henry Vane hath power to relieve me, ſhall be ground of hope to me that he will.

NOW for the longer, and ſo ſadder part of my task, wherein you are not ſo courteous to me, as you were in that concluding line of your Letter, I muſt proceed to that.

In the entrance I muſt have leave to be ſorry, that I have to deal with a man that will profeſs himſelf not much taken with that notion of Juſtice (which I ſaid obliged me to deſire an exact account in writing from you, of that wherein that Author was nearly concerned, and could no otherwiſe be ſure not to think any thing of you cauſeleſly.) If this were not juſtice to you, or may not yet be believed ſo by you, I deſpair of ever doing any thing acceptable in your preſence. Our humours, or our principles, will be ſo contrary, that whatever I ſhall ſay, I ſhall have reaſon to ſuſpect you will not be much taken with it; yet I ſhall farther adventure to give you one relation, which will not only clear my former notion of juſtice to you, but offer to your conſideration whether there be not ſomewhat due from you by that notion of juſtice (or ſome other) to that Author, to others, yea and to your ſelf.

There

There fell out in ſome Lay-company in this Town, ſince your Sermon fore-mentioned, a diſcourſe, Whether it were not lawful to ſwear, ſo that that which was ſworn were exactly true; one of the company inſiſted rightly, that it was not, the other was confident it was, and produced for it the Authority of that Author; and to prove that again, ſaid, that the Preacher at St. Maries read it out of that Book. Of the truth of this he was ſo confident, that he preſently reſolved to make uſe of that liberty, which he believed from your citation to be the opinion of that Author, more than his carnal heart did permit him to believe the truth of what you added (if you did any thing beſides the reproaching of that Author) in confutation of that Doctrine, and thereupon he ſwore a great Oath, that that which was before him was a candleſtick, and perſwaded himſelf that he had done no hurt in doing ſo.

Now Sir, when I have again told you, and all the world; that that Author hath written moſt ſtrictly againſt ſwearing, (and only differs from you in that queſtion concerning the primary intention of the words of the old Commandment) and ſaid in plain words, 1. That idle, fooliſh, wanton uſing of Gods name, (which if it be not in oaths, is leſs than ſwearing) ſure profane uſing of it, (which in all the editions was in, and abſolutely belonged to all kind of unlawful oaths) might be reſolved to be forbidden there by reduction: And 2. That under Chriſt (which again I tell you, belonged to all to whom that Catechiſm could ſpeak,) there is a total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf, making that as unlawful now, as perjury was before. 3. That to ſwear in ordinary converſation is utterly unlawful. 4. That all voluntary, eſpecially promiſſory oaths, are now utterly unlawful for a Chriſtian. And 5. thoſe voluntaries defined to be thoſe that have their impellent or principle from my ſelf; when I have, I ſay, told you all this, then for Gods ſake ponder ſadly with your own heart, in caſe that poor ſoul be ever tormented in hell for that vain oath, (as, without Gods mercy upon repentance, undoubtedly he will) how much you have to charge upon your ſelf for giving him confidence that that Author had ſaid what he learnt from you: eſpecially ſeeing your Sarcaſm in that phraſe of the much admired Catechiſm, might tell you that it was poſſible ſome poor, paſſionate, ſinful creature, might thus unhappily admire it. I conjure you, not to think there is any jeſt in this, but believe from me, that I am able to produce the perſon that heard it, (and that had that care and love of piety and of truth, and that particular knowledge of my deteſting all oaths, as to come in ſome paſſion to me for ſatisfaction,) and that I have already ſeriouſly ſent to diſabuſe the offender, leſt that ſin ſhould be laid to his charge, which you have made that Book be the occaſion of; and when you have laid this to your heart, the God of all grace direct you to do your duty in this particular.

I will not confute your opinion, that I have ſtooped lower in my Rejoinder than I was in my Letter, by begging what I did before but deſire, (I will be very willing to do ſo always, and ſhall yet be more vile than ſo, if that may perſwade you to do me juſtice;) and yet it may be obſerved, that in your judgment to deſire and requeſt (which I did before) is ſo much lower than to beg, (which is but a nicety,) that until I did beg, as well as deſire and requeſt, and again re-inforce my requeſt, you did not think fit to grant me the leaſt crumb of that juſtice which I deſired from you.

At the phraſe [exact account] you affirm your ſelf to have ſtumbled, and call it [thoſe hard words.] If this be ſo, I cannot tell how to behave my ſelf ſo cautiouſly, as either to ſpeak plainly enough to you, or to keep you from ſtumbling. For [exact account] is ſo plain to be underſtood, and ſo unlike juriſdiction, unleſs you miſtook it for exacting an account, (which you are too ſubtle to do, when the word deſire went before it,) that if ever I had exerciſed juriſdiction over you, or any other, (which I never was in place to do, the Office for which my firſt-fruits are required, being without a juriſdiction annext to it;) yet you could not have been tempted by that to this miſtake. I ſuppoſe you were pleaſed to be merry, when you imply you were; and therefore muſt friendly admoniſh you, that there is a ſhrewd diſeaſe, in which Irenæus had ſo much skill as to pronounce ἢ πλέον γελῶσι τάυτῃ μᾶλλον κακῶς ἔχουσιν, and therefore I ſhall briefly deſire you, that hereafter you ſpeak, 1. So properly as not to ſay, deſiring is exerciſing juriſdiction; And 2. Seriouſly, (for truly I am not in jeſt, when I write to you, and that would have kept you ſafe from ſtumbling. Yet becauſe you are at ſuch leiſure as to remember I had an Office in your now Countrey, I ſhall tell you that there is a ſeal belonging to that Office, from which, if you had induction to that Living, you may read in your Wax, μακάριοι ὅταν ὀνειδίσωσιν, and then you will ſoon diſcern how many men, as well as me, you have helpt to make happy. I bleſs God, (and will never curſe you,) that I am one of that number.

In your next Section, you pray for them that ſuggeſted ſo many falſe accuſations againſt you to me. But firſt, you affirm not above one to have been falſe; and that I confeſs to be ſo, and need not to be told ſo back again. As for your new accuſation, which you are reſolved to pay me in ſtead of that former, I deſire you to know that I defie it, and know no danger or ill found in the language of Speculative myſtery, nor acknowledge any Author of it whom you can ſuſpect; particularly, not him whoſe name you blotted out, ſo that I might read; I mean, neither Smalcius nor Socinus, whoſe doctrines in the buſineſs of the Trinity I do heartily diſclaim; and am ſo far from being tainted or tempted by them, that I cannot ſay I ever permitted my ſelf to read any Tract in them, or any other of that ſet, (unleſs in the Racovian Catechiſm) on that ſubject. And you will never repair the injury, if you uſe arts to faſten it on me, or to perſwade any man that I was ever inclined towards it. For your nicety by which you except againſt my calling the doctrine of the Trinity a ſpeculative myſtery, ſaying that it is practical, and giving your reaſon, [becauſe the bleſſed Trinity is the object of our worſhip, as well as of our faith;] I ſhall make no ſcruple to acknowledge the Trinity to be the object of our worſhip, (and to that end I directed that concluding act of my worſhip to that bleſſed object) and every point of that which in the Catechiſm is made due to God, I ſuppoſed there, and now profeſs to be perfectly due to the Trinity. But then you might remember, that you acknowledge it the object of our faith; and of that there be many parts which will not be diſparaged by being ſtiled myſteries and depths of ſpeculation, and in that ſence, or as they are ſo, I then ſpake, and only ſo, and need not acknowledge any impropriety in that ſpeech; becauſe though a ſpeculative doctrine may be alſo practical in another reſpect, as the knowledge of the cauſes of diſeaſes is a practical knowledge in reſpect of the cures it will help to work; yet as that is ordinarily called the Theory of Phyſick, and is preſumed before Students aſcend to the practical; ſo I told you the Author ſuppoſed the ſpeculative underſtanding of that myſtery in the Church-Catechiſm, before he came to the Doctrines in this Book, which are the practical. You remember me, that a Sacramental Covenant is practical; and I may as well remember you that there are credenda propoſed to the vower in that Sacrament, as well as facienda.

On occaſion of mention of the Church-Catechiſm, you ſay, you like that better than my Practical, and I confeſs my ſelf to do ſo too; ſo vehemently, that I believe 'twill be long ere we ſee a better in its ſtead. But yet I conceive, that he that hath learnt that, may be capable of more, at leaſt of directions to make uſe of that knowledge imbibed to the amendment of his life: elſe, moſt of our preaching were in vain; nay elſe, both that Catechiſm ought never to have been expounded, and every one that hath written any thing elſe for the benefiting of youth or men, muſt lie under the prejudice of that inſolence of thinking himſelf able to make a better, as well as this Author.

For your juſtice in that anſwer to the third reaſon, I am not to thank you, nor can I think that any man that was in any meaſure my friend, needed to be told by you or any, that I acknowledged the Trinity. If he did, examine your own heart, whether you know not ſome body, who had helped to defame me in that particular, by ſaying I was a Socinian or the like, or by ſaying I maintain many errours broached by ſuch; If you do not, I will thank you for the good office you mention; and ſo haſten alſo, (and wiſh heartily I could make more haſte to get into ſome more delightful imployment) to the ſecond report.

In that, I ſee, I met with no falſe accuſation of you, but in you enough of injury to that Author, by picking out what might make him odious, and preſent him an eloquent learned diſciple of yours, to be taught, that ſwearing is a ſin; or rather a prophane deſigner, and corrupter of the Nation, that hath given Boys a liberty of ſwearing in their Catechiſm. I have ſufficiently told you, and all men, that that Author is moſt guiltleſs of that charge, and if you will not yet acknowledge it, I muſt leave it to God to judge betwixt us; as alſo, whether he produce not the unqueſtionable command of God againſt all ſwearing, aſſertory or promiſſory; and whether you do not imply, that he doth ſo, in ſaying againſt him that [the perhaps imaginary ſuperaddition] (which you know are no other than the words of Chriſt) will not be ſo effectual to reſtrain, as the unqueſtionable command of God. Sir, doth he queſtion the Command of God to be againſt ſwearing? doth he not ſay that all prophane uſe of Gods name is ſure forbidden under the third Commandment of the Law by reduction? (or is not all unlawful ſwearing, aſſertory as well as promiſſory, a prophane uſing of his name?) that I may not add that he produces, and earneſtly inſiſts on the direct clear command of Chriſt againſt all voluntary oaths, which is unqueſtionably a Command of God to any that is not worſe than a Socinian, and denies Chriſt to be God at all. And whereas you obſerve by the way, that there is liberty given by this Author for aſſertory oaths, do you think there was not that liberty for ſome ſort of them? or doth the Author ſay there was for all ſorts of them? or for any that were voluntary? He ſuppoſes the primary intention of the third Commandment (and of theſe words, thou ſhalt perform, &c. againſt non-performance of promiſſory oaths) to be againſt perjury; Under that, by reduction, to be forbidden (not ſwearing ſimply taken, and ſo not all aſſertory oaths, but) all prophane uſing of Gods name, which ſure contains aſſertory oaths, though not them only, or all of that ſort, becauſe ſome others do prophane Gods name; and of theſe, all do not, but only thoſe that uſe it unneceſſarily. This is ſufficient indeed to conclude all kind of aſſertory oaths, not to be the particular matter of Moſes Law, and indeed no ſort of them to be ſo much as reducible thither, but only thoſe where his name is unneceſſarily uſed; but ſure thoſe that are ſuch, it doth not give any liberty to, nor can you think it did, without pronouncing at the ſame time, that 'twas contradicted in the next page, which I muſt ſuppoſe you were able to ſee, becauſe you lookt ſo narrowly here to find this hole, which I am perſwaded never any the moſt carnal man ever took notice of, to encourage himſelf in his ſin, till you directed him to it. By which you may ſee, that ſome men are more induſtrious in finding faults to accuſe their brethren, than others in ſeeking pretences to excuſe themſelves.

To your Arguments I ſhall endeavour to ſay little, partly as not apprehending the force of them, partly ſuppoſing that we now talk of a matter of fact, which may be tried by evidence; the Book being ready to prove the truth of what I affirm from it; and then 'tis not in the power of a thouſand probable arguments (much leſs of a few diſ-jointed) to wreſt any man out of ſuch a certainty. I ſhould willingly venture them to any Reader to do their worſt on him, eſpecially your firſt, whereby you would ſhew that he cannot prove the Doctrine of a total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf, and making it as unlawful now, as perjury was before, unleſs he loſe the total in a cypher. Where ſure, Sir, 1. If a man would bind you to your words, you are now much leſs an enemy to ſwearing in univerſum, than the Author was: for otherwiſe that would not be objected, that he prohibits more of that kind than he can prove. And 2. for mincing the total into a cypher, you will have no reaſon to fear, for though he ſhould mince the total ſomewhat, and ſay with (I aſſure you, not from) Smalcius (for who doth not ſay ſo too?) that I muſt not ſwear, but for Gods glory, and the publick good; yet is not that all cypher, I hope, for it prohibits all ſwearing in communication, as utterly unlawful; all voluntary, eſpecially promiſſory oaths. But then, Sir, you muſt know that a total prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf, contains all ſwearing by any creature, as well as by God, and that is no cypher neither.

As for your queſtion, Whether the perfect Law of God did give men leave to take vain oaths? he is willing moſt clearly to ſatisfie that, and aſſure you of his opinion, that it did not; and becauſe by the whole period I cannot poſſibly conclude any thing but only this, that you know not why I uſed the word Total, (a total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing) I will tell you that too; becauſe Chriſt had ſaid, μὴ ὀμόσαι ὅλως, ſwear not at all; which what it ſignifies, is here ſufficiently explained, thus, not only not by God, but not by any creature of God neither.

2. In the difference, as you ſtate it, betwixt us, you are very unjuſt, in ſaying I undertook to prove, that by the third Commandment there was no more meant, than that a man ſhould not for-ſwear himſelf. This is falſe; I never undertook it, but profeſs that what is forbidden by reduction, is meant as truly, though not ſo evidently propoſed, as what is expreſt, and therefore you muſt be content to open your eyes, and ſee what is the queſtion between the Scholar and the Catechiſt, (and the ſame alſo is the concluſion) viz. not what is meant, i. e. what is the full adequate importance of that Commandment, or what it contains under it; but what that is, i. e. what the words ſtrictly ſignifie, or, as 'tis now expreſt, what is the primary intention of the phraſe; and to that queſtion the anſwer is made [no more undoubtedly but forſwearing;] as if the queſtion were askt of [ὁ μοιχεύσεις] is that no more than that thou ſhalt not commit adultery? I ſhould anſwer, no more undoubtedly; yet never fear that any man would think that I affirmed, that fornication, and all other villany was not there forbidden, eſpecially when I had alſo added, that it were by reduction; and ſo in like manner, to take the queſtion that you after ſet, whether I will ſay there is no more meant by the ſixth Commandment than taking away the life of a man; I anſwer, that the word killing is no more, and that was all the Author ſaid of the third Commandment, viz. that the Commandment in Exod. (that is, the words of the Commandment (which are there ſet down) Thou ſhalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain) is no more than forſwearing; that the words were the ſubject ſpoken of, 'tis plain by the proofs produced of it, from the uſe of thoſe words in other places. This is ſo probable a truth, that I could not have thought it needful to have given it illuſtration to any man elſe.

3. When I appeal'd to Chriſt as Judge, and thought I had made good my appeal by producing his words whereby he renders that Commandment, οὐκ ἐπιορκήσεις [thou ſhalt not forſwear;] you attempt to argue and prove againſt me, but never take notice of my proof, which is abſolutely againſt law of pleading or diſputing. And for the argument you confront to it, I aſſure you it perſwades me nothing, but that you thought πονηρῷ was to be written with ε. For though I ſhall tell you that all Oaths, that come from evil or from the Devil, are not from thence concluded to be evil or deviliſh, becauſe the Oath that I take lawfully in Judicature may come originally from evil or from the devil in another, and muſt not needs be from evil in the taker, ſo I have no need to anſwer you with that, but plainly confeſs, that all evil and deviliſh Oaths are forbidden in the third Commandment.

I need not deny but that שוא may ſometimes be rendred vain, and ſo ſometimes 'tis, even when it ſignifies a Lye, (as μάταιον in the Bible hath a peculiarity ſometimes to denote Idols, thoſe greateſt lies in the World.) All that I was to conclude was, that Chriſt having expreſt it by a word which Saint Matthew here reads ἐπιορκήσεις, there was nothing in that Hebrew phraſe, but what was agreeable to this, and that is true, though it ſhould be granted to ſignifie vanum, becauſe it doth falſum alſo. But you ſay, you need not go about to prove that the Jews ſaw this truth as clearly as we do, but you can prove that they ſaw and acknowledged it, and that that is ſufficient for you; and then let me tell you, you have fought blind all this while, and now you may ſee, if you will, that foraſmuch as concerns this Author (unleſs you will fight on, when you ſay you need not) your great quarrel is at an end; for he that ſaid in general of all this Sermon in the mount, that Chriſt added either new precepts, or new light, promiſed to be ſatisfied with either of them: and though he conceives the * Greek Fathers to have generally affirmed the former, and the Latin alſo, for the firſt 400 years, (particularly in this matter of ſwearing, Theophylact, οὐκ ἦν πονηρὸν τότε. μετὰ δὲ χρόνον ἐστὶ πονηρόν· expreſſing his opinion to be, that ſome ſwearing was πονηρὸν under Chriſt, which had not been ſo before) yet he hath obliged himſelf to be content with the latter, which now, you ſay, you need not deny, (I would you had never needed to oppoſe one ſo violently, that aſſerted no more, than what you need not deny;) and therefore I will now adde only thus much, that, 1. This is the meaning and effect of affirming it [forbidden there, not by the primary intention of the word] for from thence it is that the clearneſs ariſes; that which is forbidden by reduction only, being not ſo clear, nor conſequently ſo deeply obliging thoſe to whom it is not (ſuppoſing ſtill that it is not their fault, that it is not) ſo clear. 2. That if it were granted, that Chriſt gave a new precept here, it would not yet follow, that all unlawful ſwearing by Gods name was not forbidden before: becauſe there is another thing which he may have added to the third Commandment, the not ſwearing by any thing elſe, as well as not by God. But, you ſee, I need not now affirm this; I will give you leave to think that I am ſo awed by you, that I am not willing to ſpring you any new game of controverſies. I confeſs I like not the ſport ſo well, as to ſollicite your company any further.

* See the teſtimonies of the Fathers both Greek and Latin in the Catechiſm p. 37, 38. not thought fit then to ſwell up this Letter.

For the Septuagints διὰ μαλαίᾳ, I gave you an hint by the way, that that will gain you but little.

For my knowledge of the primary ſignification of שוא you muſt not judge, for he that ſhall but look into Schindler (as venerable an Author ſure as Pagnin) will find that he ſaith 'tis uſed de re falsâ, vanâ; Firſt falsâ; but if you had pleaſed, my argument of the uſe of the word in the ninth Commandment (as fit to expound the Second as any) might have been thought as fit to be conſidered, as what you have inſiſted on in ſtead of it.

You do well to abſtain from the negative argument of [he might but did not.] But then it is not true that the queſtion betwixt you and me is not about the primary intention of the phraſe: for whoſoever reads that Catechiſm, theſe letters, or even many of your arguments, will know it is; or if not, I make no ſcruple to pronounce, what I have done ſo oft, that I have no other quarrel to you in this matter, ſave only the injuries you did me at Saint Maries, and every one that believed ought of it from you. But ſure, Sir, I have not acknowledged in any manner, that the firſt edition of that Book had any thing in it queſtionable in the judgment of learned men; I told you it was [in kindneſs and ſubmiſſion to the meaneſt,] and that kindneſs and ſubmiſſion intimates no more acknowledgment of queſtionableneſs, than the word meaneſt intimates the learnedſt. I would now add, that I might have done it to prevent cauſeleſs quarrelling, but that I now ſee that it will not do that neither.

As for your long deduction and magnifying of your coſt and travail through the Additions, &c. of that Catechiſm, you might have been leſs Playſome in re ſeriâ. If you do not already know that you have prevaricated herein, you may read and remember the Printers Poſtſcript (which I think you cite alſo, and ſo have read, I ſhall now but adviſe you to remember it) and you cannot chuſe but ſee, find, I hope, acknowledge) that all your Fable vaniſhes, and your Hiſtory ends in this plain brief, that will bring no ſcorn on the Author, viz. that he prepared a new edition of the Catechiſm; added a third third part more; and, to ſerve the meaneſt, explained every thing that by any advice or hint he obſerved to need explaining; call it altering, if you will, for to alter from worſe to better he profeſſes himſelf to think an amiable, imitable quality, and will never be aſhamed of it: yet muſt not now aſſume it to himſelf, having, I aſſure you, no right to it, any further than it ſignifies explaining. This edition had long ſince been Printed in Oxford, could the Printer have gotten down ſo much Paper. When the City was rendred 'twas carried to London to that end, where againſt the Authors will or knowledge three editions had been made by the firſt Copy, one of which was juſt then ended; and by that means the Printer had been at greater loſs than I was willing to be cauſe of to an enemy, if another new impreſſion had been then made of it. This, God knows, was the cauſe it is now ſet out ſo troubledly (the Printer being willing to put out the additions thus, rather than not at all; and to put this inconvenience on the Reader, than loſs upon himſelf) for which, though I was very ſorry, yet I never foreſaw that I ſhould be thus chid and reproacht, and triumpht over for it. I hope ſome of the μακαριοι in Chriſts Sermon may be the portion of them that ſuffer without a cauſe, though it be not upon that excellent ſtile [for righteouſneſs ſake:] I am ſure, this of mine is not for unrighteouſneſs. And now as ſeriouſly you ſhall judge of the thing called exerciſing of patience, and never expect to be thankt for your charges, unleſs it had brought in to me more juſtice (I need not ſay charity) from you. And if after this, nothing will ſatisfie you but recantation, ſo oft repeated recantation. (O that this φιλοτιμια might be changed into that of the Apoſtles, of the ἁρπαζειν) get me but ſome Expedient that lying ſhall be no ſin, and that no other ſin in you or others ſhall be conſequent to it in this, and for the other part of it, if it can delight you more than the calling for it hath done already, you ſhall have my moſt willing conſent towards it.

For the latter end of the ſheet, of deceiving the Kingdom, of ſeduction, &c. and what follows in the next, to the end of the report, I am ſenſible of it, and I thank God I have received grace from him to pray that I may make the ſame uſe of it, that David doth in the ſtory of Shimei's reviling, 2 Sam. 16. 10. I pray alſo, and deſire the prayers of all good men, that God would ſhew me the ſin which hath now brought this portion of calumny upon me, and that is all I would ſay to it. And yet, after this reſolved ſilence to that part, I ſhall again anſwer to you ſome few things. 1. That when in your fourth conſideration you ſay [meant in a Commandment] you ſhould ſay, ſignified by the words of a Commandment. 2. That which you call, taking in a latitude, I call reduction. 3. That my explications were deſigned by me to be as remarkable, nay much more than the firſt edition was: for I deſigned a full impreſſion, and many other things to make them ſo. 4. I never had any thing to do (not ſo much as the knowledge, at that time) with the ſetting out any edition of that Book, ſave only of thoſe additions, and of printing the firſt few Copies at Oxford, for the uſe of thoſe that were more willing to be at that charge, than at a greater in tranſcribing it. 5. I ſay moſt diſtinctly, that every emendation in that Book, that to my utmoſt remembrance I can ſpeak of, was intended long before ever the Town was near taking: and for danger of being called to an account of any thing ſaid in it, God knows my ſimplicity, I was never near dreaming or thinking of it, and am now in courage enough to fear neither men nor Angels in that particular. 6. That I know not, that ever I have made you a ſolemn profeſſion under my hand to give you ſatisfaction; and my moſt careful recollecting what I have wrote, cannot bring it to my remembrance: certainly you dreamt of that together with the round recantation. If it were any thing above endeavouring it, certainly it was a very raſh promiſe; and if ſo, I beſeech you remit it to me, for I would not willingly take any more pains about it. For other men, I am more ſecure: and if you once be ſatisfied, I ſhall ſuppoſe all men, that know it, will think it time for them to give over quarrelling. 7. That by [would] I did in effect mean, were forbidden alſo by God, when Moſes publiſhed the Law; and have oft told you how I meant ſo. 8. I have already told you, that you came not into my heart, when I thought or ſpake of ſubmiſſion to the meaneſt: and wonder as much, that you ſhould think the alterations were made in ſubmiſſion to you, as that you ſhould now rank your ſelf with the meaneſt, who have not ſupererogated in humility ſince I met with you. Truly, Sir, I do not think, meanneſs is the cauſe of your miſ-underſtandings, nor did I ever from any friend at London hear of any particular you diſliked in it: or if I had, by any ſuch meſſage, I would have found out ſome way to have offered you or any man living a friendly debate about it. For your reſpects, I find little ſigns of them now, and by the ſubjects do believe that there were little expreſt in thoſe letters of yours ten years ago about me. I can, and do freely forgive you all: but know not that I am bound to thank you, till ſome body elſe tell me ſo. 9. If any learned men ever told me of that opinion about Chriſt improving the Law, and expreſt themſelves to think it were an errour, I am confident I have given them ſuch a ſtate of my opinion in that matter, that no good Chriſtian can find fault with, or lay any charge on it of hurt or danger to any mans manners, if it were ſuppoſed falſe. And beſides, you may know, that as Learned as any this age now hath, both of Ancients and others, are fully of my opinion: And let me tell you, that ten years ago I had no objection againſt my opinion, but that it was by ſome men fathered on Socinus: but knowing, that I believed it long before I ever ſaw one word (I think, had heard the name) of Socinus; and that the Scripture and Fathers, and other the like means, which taught me all my other Divinity, taught me that too; and ſaw, that if it were a miſtake, it could make no man live worſe, (as the contrary opinion might do, if it were ſo) I reſolved to deny my ſelf in that phantaſie rather than objection; and ſpeak what I thought might edify, what diminution of credit ſoever it brought after it. I ſhall add my thanks for your counſel, which I would fain think to be in great earneſt, but that I ſuppoſe you cannot believe that I look upon Criticiſms as a kind of heaven, nor that you would think fit to ſend out in the ſame breath true Chriſtian earneſt, (for, above all things, I account admonitions ſo) and Sarcaſms. I ſhall only deſire, that I may ſtudy the Moral Law, as I find it delivered from that ſecond Mount: and I will obey you in all other motions, and (as you deſire) not cenſure you for this part of your Sermon, how bitter ſoever it is, but thank you for all the good you meant by it. But whatſoever you ſay of the Moral Laws perfection, I hope it muſt not ſo be underſtood as to deny that Chriſt (as he gave more grace than was ever allowed in the ſtate of Nature, or by the Law, ſo) might, if he pleaſed, improve the obligations which either either the natural Law, or that given by God through Moſes, had laid on men; and whether by new precepts, or new light, call us to a higher degree of perfection (and oblige us to it) than others had by any particular precept thought themſelves obliged to. As for the imaginary ſuperadditions you talk of, you will I hope conſider, that 'tis as dangerous to detract from the Word of God, as to add to it; and to deny Chriſt to have added, if he have, as to affirm him, if he have not. I am ſure, the conſequences may be more dangerous. As for your ſtile of perfect and ſpiritual Law, I ſhall in the plain word acknowledge it, that it was both perfect (in reſpect of the ſtate of men to whom it was given, whether by Moſes to the Jews, or by the God of Nature to all men) and ſpiritual alſo, extending to the ſpirit or ſoul of man, and not only to the outward actions. But this, I am perſwaded, hinders not but that Chriſt that gives more grace than was brought into the World by the Law of Moſes or Nature, and that disburdened all men of that ſad yoke that lay on the Jews, and that is content to accept of ſincere without not-ſinning obedience, may have leave to advance his diſciples to an higher pitch of ſpiritual perfection (whether by new laws or new light) than the Law in the former delivery of it had advanced them: And to ſet up this pitch, whatever it is, as a precept, (not only a counſel of perfection) to us Chriſtians, was the utmoſt of my deſign and endeavours in that Sermon you ſpeak of ten years ago, and is of this Author now; and I never imagined it poſſible that this doctrine could give any man liberty to think worſe of the Law of God, or practiſe leſs of it; but have reaſon to think (and could give an experimental account of what I ſay) that the not teaching it, might flatter men ignorantly to believe that there was leſs required of them than I conceive (and deſire, they ſhould conceive) there is. And do you conſider alſo, that he which is πονηρὸν, and moſt cunningly reſiſts all the reſtraints that obſtruct or undermine his temptations, is ὁ διάβολος & ἀντίδικος alſo; can plead againſt, accuſe, and calumniate any man or doctrines that are contrary to him. And ſo I humbly take leave of the ſecond report, the Lord forgive you for it.

In the third report it ſeems I was not miſtaken neither, nor in my expectation, that plain poſitive affirming the things you would have affirmed, would not ſatisfie you. I told you, that the Author under the general phraſe of all kinds and ſorts of ſin, ſets in the front the weakneſs, frailties, and pollutions of our nature, our proneneſs and inclination to ſin. This your Sermon ſaid was ſpeaking with irreſolution, as if he doubted, &c. I told you once again this is no irreſolution; and he doth not doubt but that this aptneſs to fall into all ſin is a ſin, to wit, an averſion of our faculties from God, which ought wholly to be converted to him; will this ſatisfy you? I have reaſon from your former carriage not to be over confident that yet it will; for if it doth, you ought in all reaſon to have been ſatisfied before, where it was ſet down as a firſt ſpecies of ſin. You ſay, my expreſſion is inexcuſable of [as infelicities, if not as ſins,] you, it ſeems, are reſolv'd it ſhall not be excuſed to you, and therefore will not interpret it by the words that went next before it, or ſo as it may be reconciled with them, but will force it to a ſence directly contradictory to what went juſt before it, and ſo muſt ſuppoſe me mad (for ſo is he that can affirm contradictions at one) only becauſe you will not be juſt; any thing that is moſt irrational muſt be believed of another man, rather than an expreſſion be excuſed by you. But, Sir, I do not yet think it inexcuſable, if I deſired to bring all thoſe men on their knees (in humiliation and godly ſorrow for their inclinations to evil) which do not believe them, when they are not conſented to, to be other than infelicities. Men that will not be of my opinion in all things, I can be content to ſerve and miniſter unto, and labour to do them good upon their own (if they will not permit me upon my) principles. But then 1. it ſeems I muſt not ſay, pollutions of nature (I ſaid, of our nature, and you ſeldom leave out the leaſt word by chance, or but when you have ſome deſign in it,) or if I do, that expreſſion is more proper to denote actual ſins, than original ſin, which is one entire, &c. I ſhall put it to the queſtion, whether pollutions of our nature be at all proper to denote actual ſins, which are pollutions of our perſons; whether not moſt proper to our natural averſions from God, or inclinations to evil: If the wiſeſt or meaneſt would have that better expreſt, I deſire to hear from them, and it ſhall be conſidered againſt another edition, which will again (after all your triumph on that occaſion) ſtoop to ſerve the meaneſt in explaining.

2. For him that (as you ſay) hath conſented to the corruption of his nature, that hath cheriſhed and been pleaſed with it, I ſhall ſuppoſe him to have committed an actual ſin, and then ſure his evil inclination was not the thing which could be capable of the title of infelicity in any mans ſence, for that title ſuppoſes poſitively that they are not conſented to. And though every man that is of age hath ſometimes ſo conſented, yet ſometimes, and in ſome one act, I ſhall by Gods grace ſuppoſe it poſſible that he hath not; and then, that his act of non-conſenting will be a piece of Chriſtian victory over that ſinful inclination; and the ſinful inclination, though it ſhall ſtill continue a ſin, and be matter of humiliation, yet ſure will not paſs with you for a ſin cheriſhed at that time, and conſented to.

Your third quarrel grounded on the conceit that I ſeem to imply, that there muſt needs be ſome conſent given to every actual ſin, did make a very hard ſhift to be a quarrel; and in ſtead of being managed with blows, ſtands ſtill, and falls out into contumelies; and concludes that I ſhould prove, but it ſelf ventures not to diſprove any thing: otherwiſe (if I ſaw your grounds of ſcruple) it may poſſibly be believed, that this Divinity might be cleared to you, without pretending, as you ſay, to Dictatorſhips.

4. I do neither recant what was ſaid before, nor doubt whether inclinations to ſin be ſins, i. e. averſions from God; and then it matters not what you ſay I ſeem to do: I ſaid this before, and ſo I ſay ſtill, and (how humble ſoever the diſlike of your behaviours towards me may by Gods grace help me to be) this is not recanting.

5. For the danger, I ſhall acknowledge it, when I acknowledge the thing, but to ſet down inclinations to ſin in the front of the ſpecies of the general phraſe [all ſorts of ſin] is not to ſpeak ſceptically. How many ſoever there be that teach otherwiſe, you ſee I am not one of them; And why that Author uſed the word [if not,] you have been told ſo oft already, that you could have no excuſe to ask the reaſon of it again, but your deſire to lay a new accuſation on me of complying with the Socinians. Which, Sir, is, as your accuſation, ſo your calumny again, if you meant any other thing by compliance than the deſiring more to bring all to humble themſelves before God for their inclinations to ſin (on what principles ſoever they went) than at that time, in the midſt of a Practical Catechiſm, in the matter of Repentance, to fall a diſputing with all comers about original ſin. For the Liturgy you ſpeak of, if you know not my mind, let me tell you, 1. That I would have the Litany continued in the Church, the firſt part of which is ſufficiently contrary to your [&c.] and this you may gheſs by a Book which I profeſs to ſubſcribe to in that particular, viz. The view of the Direct. pag. 25, and 26. Then ſecondly, that I would have the Doxologies continued, and how that would become ſuch a Liturgy you may ſee, View of the Direct. pag. 32, and 33. Yet farther, that I would have the Creed continued, yea, and kneeling at the Sacrament, among other reaſons for this, (on which the Proteſtants in Poland forbad ſitting,) becauſe I would not comply with the ancient or modern Arians, or any other that make our Saviour a mere creature. For which I ſhall direct you alſo to that View of the Direct. pag. 28. I ſhall not now ask you, which is more compliant to your [&c.] the New Directory, or Old Liturgy; nor whether a Socinian may not more conveniently officiate now (and ſo, in that caſe, thoſe of his opinions join with him) than they could ſix years ago, when the whole Church ſervice was appointed to be read conſtantly in every Church. I am not willing to trouble you with any new queſtions, but only to be ſatisfied by you in matter of fact what wrong you have done that Author in your Sermons, and to ſhew you that it is wrong. As for reparations from you, I now know you better than vehemently to expect any, and by your carriage in this particular, and your If I were compoſing ſuch a Liturgy,] I am for the future arm'd to be content with what now I find, and to expect that when you want even words in the Author to cavil at, (as it will be long before thoſe will be wanting,) and I remember to have ſeen an art of cavilling that turn'd every word of the Creed into hereſy, or blaſphemy, or Atheiſm, and then what ſhall become of this poor mortal frail Catechiſm, when ſuch an artificer is reſolved to triumph over it?) poſſibilities, and jealouſies, ſuch as the [If you were compoſing, &c.] ſhall be ſufficient to rob that Author of his little reputation. That that [if] could have no ground but in your deſign quocunq; modo to defame him for a Socinian, you will gheſs, when again I tell you that the placing inclinations in the front of ſins, was a declaration free and full againſt that errour.

6. I am, you ſee, neither of their mind that think inclination to ill no ſin, nor therefore did I blind, but inſtruct my Reader with that Orthodox expreſſion, as you call it; and 'tis hard that a man cannot uſe Orthodox expreſſions, but he muſt be accuſed for doing it, upon ſuppoſition that he did it to this end that he might afterwards tempt others to an errour. God knows our hearts, and muſt only judge that of me; and till he have done ſo, and revealed it to you, 'tis want of charity in you to ſay I have not done fairly.

7. If it were never ſo abſurd, to ſay that godly ſorrow were to be conceived for an infelicity quà ſic, merely as an infelicity, yet it might be conceived for it [as an infelicity if not a ſin;] i. e. by them who doubt whether it be a ſin or no, or who, though they are not certainly perſwaded that it is a ſin, when unconſented to, yet acknowledge it ſo, when it is conſented to, and then grieve for it as for a ſin; and when it is not, acknowledge it to be an infelicity, and grieve for that alſo. Beſides, an infelicity may be ſuch an infelicity, that it may be matter of godly ſorrow, though not quà ſic, merely as an infelicity: as, in this point, I may have ſorrow that I have a vitious impure nature about me, which is juſtly thought by me an infelicity, eſpecially in compariſon with that pure ſtate of them that are with Chriſt; and this ſorrow is κατὰ Θεὸν, a ſorrow according to God; and the interpretation of deſiring or loving the appearance of Chriſt, and ſo a godly ſorrow: and he that doth not poſitively reſolve that this having a vitious nature is more than a pollution and an infelicity, taking neither of them for a ſin, may yet mourn for it quà a pollution, not quà an infelicity; and make good that he doth ſo, by profeſſing ſincerely, that he would undergo any infelicity, on condition to get rid of this pollution. And yet laſtly, (which is the only anſwer neceſſary for you to conſider to this point) if that which you ſay is abſurd, were ſo indeed, it would rather prove, that which is called [an infelicity, if not a ſin] were indeed a ſin, when 'tis ſaid of it in that very place, that it muſt be matter of contrition or godly ſorrow; than that it is taken to be no ſin, when 'tis both affirmed to be one, and to be matter of contrition. If I ſhould ſay, that I may have ſorrow for ſomewhat that is an infelicity, and call that a godly ſorrow, an errour this might be, but I hope not a dangerous one; or if it were, not ſuch an infectious one, as to turn every other affirmation of mine into a non-affirmation, or make me guilty of other errours, of which I profeſs (and 'tis clear at that time by other evidences) that I am not guilty. Thus hard is it for fleſh and blood to lay down a quarrel or a jealouſie, when 'tis once engaged. Otherwiſe, plain words might deſerve to be heeded to prove a man Orthodox, as well as ſuppoſed conſequences to arraign publickly, and condemn him for errours. In how much more quietneſs have poor creatures poſſeſt their ſouls, that have learnt from thoſe words (and ever ſince daily practiſed) the humbling of themſelves for their very inclinations to ſin, than you that have thus uſed your skill, unhappily to limbeck, extract, and force poyſon out of them?

8. I acknowledge, that every ſin ought to be bewailed as a ſin, and that inclinations to ſin ought to be ſo bewailed; and I meant by contrition, or breaking of the heart to pieces, as much as your tears of blood amount to: And of this I neither doubt, nor fear to profeſs my ſence. Yet ſure they that do not agree with me in that particular, may be adviſed to have true grief and ſorrow for them on their own principles.

9. That the corruption of our nature hath ſpecial influence on our practice, I am as confident, and have conſidered as ponderingly as you: and this whole Catechiſm was deſigned to obſtruct thoſe fountains, as much as was poſſible, and to help to purify unto Chriſt a peculiar people zealous of good works; and according to my beſt underſtanding, I deſigned a ſcheme that might be inſtrumental to that end: and whatever your method would have been, and what your commands for the particulars that might be more expreſly cleared, I could not divine, and had liberty to uſe my own method. This only I know, that inclinations to ſin are there expreſt to be ſins, and that clearly enough, that he may discern it who hath so much leisure from quarrelling as to bewail them. And indeed you need not tell me what dangerous consequences have been inferred from doubtful expressions in Catechisms, &c. For I have an example before mine eyes of one that will infer those consequences from one word in such a Book, that the whole sence of the place contradicts directly, as much as sin and no sin are contradictories, and then 'tis but reason a man were allow'd pardon (and not triumph'd over presently) for being willing (when 'tis by anothers fault become so necessary) to explain. And so much for the third report.

The fourth (that about faiths being, whether a condition, or instrument of Justification) I cannot observe by your words that you have at all insisted on in either assembly; for though you deny it not, yet also you affirm nothing, as in the two former, which you own; and as in the last you are pleased to do. Either then you spake to this particular, and then although it be a fault in you not to acknowledge it, yet till I am sure of it, and that my reputation is concerned in it, I have no reason farther to importune you; or else you did not speak to it, and consequently did me no injury in that particular, and then I truly cannot accuse you, having no authority that you did, worth my depending on, and that which I had, contradicted by others, as the others of the Trinity which proved untrue, and so the rather inclines me to believe that this is so also: On these grounds I have no temptation to add more to this matter, because the whole business which brought us now together, was to vindicate my self from (and that made it necessary for me to know what had been) your accusations, and not to render you at this time (which I can spend much more profitably to my self and others) an account of my faith, save only where you have calumniated it. Yet because it is possible that the questions here proposed by you, may through some mistake or ignorance of the grounds that I go on, be matter of some scruple to you, and it may be my duty to prevent those mistakings, I have now thought fit to tell you, what is the general ground that I build on in this matter, by analogy to which you may form an answer to those questions, and reconcile those seeming differences which you may have taken notice of. My grounds are these, 1. That justification is divine acceptation, and pardon of sin. 2. That the mercy of God, through the satisfaction and merits of Christ, is the sole cause of this justification. 3. This work of justification is of such a nature, consisting merely in Gods pronouncing us just, accepting and pardoning, a work of God without us, upon us, concerning us, but not within us, that consequently nothing within us can have any real proper efficiency in the work: for then that, whatever it is, must be said to justify, i. e. to accept, and pardon, which nothing in us can be said to do, though but minus principaliter, secundariò, or realiter instrumentaliter; for if it had any such efficiency, there might in strict speaking be some real vertue or force in that thing, and that proportionable to the effect in some measure, at least it must act virtute primæ causæ, and by the impulsion of that might immediately produce the effect; which any even grace, as it is in us, hath not force enough to do. For either it must do it as an inferiour meritorious cause, subordinate to Christs merits, or as an inferiour efficient cause, subordinate to Gods pardoning and accepting; and then, as I said, that must pardon and accept also immediately, though not principally; as the knife cuts immediately, though the hand or the man principally. 4. This work of Grace in God through Christ thus justifying, is not every mans portion, some qualification or condition there is required in the subject, in the person whose sins God will thus pardon in Christ, or without which God that justifies the sinner, will not yet justify the impenitent infidel: the promises of God, though general, being yet conditional promises, and the promise of pardon being one of them, as shall be proved at large if you think fit. 5. This condition is set down in several phrases in the Scripture, Conversion, Repentance, Regeneration, but especially receiving of Christ, faith in the heart, an embracing of Christ, the whole Christ, taking him as our Priest, whose sacrifice, and whose intercession to depend on; as our King, whose throne to be set up in our hearts; as our Prophet, to submit our understandings to his doctrines, and captivate them to the obedience of faith. 6. This grace of faith hath many excellent offices and efficiencies; one principal one, laying hold on the Promises, laying hold on the Λύτρον; others also of subduing the passions, mortifying lusts, overcoming the world. In all these, being works wrought in us, by God principally, instrumentally by this grace, Faith is an efficient. But all this doth not at all conclude it to be in any propriety of speech an efficient, or any kind of logical proper cause in the act of justification: because there is no need of any such, God being ready to do his work, to perform his promise, i. e. to justify the penitent believer; and whensoever by his grace that qualification is wrought in the heart, or there but truly rooted, God pronounces that man just.

I have out of my heart set down my sence, which I suppose, you will find every where scattered in the Book. I desire not that it may prove a μῆλον ἔριδος between us, (in case there be any word hastily let fall, which though to me, that understood my own meaning, it be plain, to you, especially if you delight to be captious, may want explication;) but yet I would be glad to hear, if there be any poyson in any of these propositions; and whether, and wherein I am mistaken: If not, I suppose you will be able to answer all your twelve Queries out of these premisses, or discern that it was impertinent to ask them, these grounds being thus supposed. I shall, I think, onely need to adde, that as soon as ever this new creature hath life in him, at the first cordial receiving the whole Christ in vow, or resolution sincere, i. e, at the first minute of conversion thus to God, the person is justified; not one of those in time after the other, but in order of nature, as naturally the condition must be undertaken, before the Covenant belongs to me: but at what minute soever this is done, God puts away his wickedness, &c. I have sinned, saith David; and the Lord hath put away thy sin, saith Nathan; I said I have sinned unto the Lord, and thou puttest away the iniquity of my sin. This thus pre-required I call sanctification in semine, or ἁγιασμὸς, (the direct Greek for that word) without which no man shall see God; and consequently, without which no man is justified; for whosoever is so, is in that condition at that minute, that, if he die in it, he cannot miss of glory. Beside this notion of sanctification; there is another for the acts, and fruits, and state of sanctification: and that I acknowledge a consequent of [illegible]ification, and an effect of that grace that justifieth the ungodly. And having added this, I conceive I have clear'd the way to your last particular.

In which, it ſeems, you took ſome exceptions, which, by what hath been ſaid, will appear to be your fault, not the Authors of the Catechiſm. For 1. Faith and works are not confounded in the diſcourſe of juſtification, any otherwiſe than Saint James and Saint Paul confound them; Saint Paul ſaying, Abraham was juſtified by Faith, and Saint James, by works, and the way of the reconciling them punctually ſet down there. 2. What he doth ſay of being juſtified by faithful actions, as it is after the very ſtile of Saint James [Abraham was juſtified by works;] ſo doth the word [by] ſignify onely a condition, not an efficient. And whereas you mention obedience to the whole Goſpel, conſtellation of Goſpel-graces, &c. and think ſtrange that they ſhould be affirmed the condition of juſtification, you muſt remember that thoſe phraſes denote them onely in the ſeed, or firſt life of all theſe, proportionably to the firſt notion of ſanctification, and then I ſuppoſe you can make no ſcruple of that affirmation. 3. You ſcruple that Faith without the addition of ſuch works, ſuch obedience Evangelical, would be affirmed unſufficient to juſtification. Wherein perhaps you think [works] ſignifies actual performances: but that is not the meaning of it in that place, but the word is taken in another Scripture-acception of it, for ſuch obedience as the Goſpel now requires, and for that which the Story of Abraham once makes the thing on which he was juſtified, i. e. reſolution to obey God in the ſacrificing his Son, not the actual ſacrificing of him: this is there called in the Catechiſm, pag. 20. Evangelical obedience, and is ſet as the explication of works; and without this, I acknowledge to believe that faith would be unſufficient to juſtifie; meaning Faith in any other notion but that which doth contain this receiving him as a King, and giving up the obedience of the heart to him. And you muſt give me leave a little to wonder why you ſhould add, that the words following (in that place) are as bad or worſe than the former, (and yet 'twas but civility and prudence not to name them) when they are but a direct citation of a place of Scripture. Thus [the ſame is called in a parallel place, Faith conſummate by love, Gal. 5. 6.] (for ſo the Greek ἐνεργουμένη is rendred by the Syriack.) The truth is, the laſt thing by you excepted againſt, was in effect a place of Scripture alſo, James 2. 22. [Faith made perfect by works,] ſet down in ſome words of paraphraſe; and then this in the Galatians might be as bad or worſe than that, (I ſhall mollify the harſh phraſe for you, and add) more contrary to the Antinomians, and Fiduciaries. As for your diſproving that doctrine, I ſhall not need conſider that, becauſe the doctrine is new ſet when it comes to be diſproved, and in thoſe terms which you ſee I acknowledge not: for I do not ſuppoſe the neceſſity of adding Evangelical works unto that purpoſe, and in that act, to make Faith the inſtrument of juſtification. For 1. I acknowledge not Faith an inſtrument of that, any other than a moral inſtrument, by which I expreſs my ſelf to mean a condition accepted by God to juſtification; and a logical or proper inſtrument of receiving Chriſt, (which Chriſt, not which faith, juſtifies.) 2. Evangelical works, in the notion wherein I ſuppoſe you now take them, for fruits of faith, performances of obedience, I affirm not to be either inſtrument or condition in the act of juſtification, or to that purpoſe; but I require them afterwards when occaſions and opportunities of exerciſing that faith, of performing thoſe reſolutions, do call for them. And therefore 3. I make no ſcruple to acknowledge that we are not juſtified by any righteouſneſs inherent in us, as I oft have ſaid, but only by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed: Only that infuſion of new righteouſneſs (which when 'tis infus'd and rooted, is inherent in us) is the condition without which we ſhall not be juſtified; not taking it again for the actual performances, or acts of righteouſneſs. Yet in the three laſt lines you have now again changed your queſtion, and made it ſuch an one, that I cannot blame you not to be aſhamed to repeat your arguments, or to maintain; For I ſhall moſt joyfully conclude with you in the very words, the truth of that you ſay you uſed thoſe arguments to prove, viz. That we are juſtified by the obedience of Chriſt alone, freely imputed by God, applyed and reſted on by Faith only. For whatever other qualifications be required as conditions in the ſubject, 'tis the work only of Faith to apply in that ſence, i. e. to reſt on Chriſt. And having ſo well agreed in the concluſion, one would wonder how we ſhould ſo differ in the premiſſes. Certainly there was ſome fault ſome where. Was it not a willingneſs to find faults in that Book that made it appear ſo full of errours, and a heat (that might have been ſpared) which turned the Pulpit into a Paſquin, or Morforius, on which that Author was to be defamed?

That which I have now affirmed, I am confident is the ſumme of what is ſaid on that Point in more words, and with more proofs and clearings in that Catechiſm; and not now minced or dreſt anew by your directions, or for your palate. Yet if it may now pleaſe you, and you will ask God forgiveneſs for your ſlandering of me, and conſider me ſo much, as to think that that reputation was valuable to the Author which you unjuſtly laboured to rob him of, I ſhall moſt heartily (as I do already forgive you the injury, ſo) conclude this Paper, and take leave of you, and continue

Munday night,
Oct. 19. 1646.

Your Servant

H. Hammond.

I deſire to hear what opinion you have of this large trouble, thus unexpectedly multiplied upon my hands.

SIR,

SIR,

I Am ſent for away from hence in great haſt to my dear Mother, who is very ſick, and ſo am forced to dictate to an ill Amanuenſis; if greater Letters than an a be miſtaken, I muſt crave your pardon. If you think fit to reply, be pleaſed to ſeal up your notes, and Mr. Wilkinſon (who lodges at Merton Colledge) will convey them to

Your Servant

Fr. Cheynell.

SIR,

I Conceive your Letters are meant, (as they are by the ſuperſcription directed) to me only: yet I thought it my duty to direct you to ſome that are equally engaged, and able to give you better ſatisfaction. You will not believe me, and I have done. As for your diſcourſe about deſiring an exact account; truly Sir, I do ſeriouſly believe, that when you were at higheſt, you would ſhew as much civility towards any Miniſter of Chriſt, as you did towards me. It may ſtand with the ſtate of an Arch-deacon to deſire an account, if he add, exact account. The greateſt General will give Orders to his Officers in as humble a ſtile; Theſe are to deſire. But enough, if not too much of that. If your challenge made me ſmile gravely, yet ſure you are too angry when you ſay, I have reproached and ſlandered you; you endeavour to make me as happy, as you conceive your ſelf to be. Sir, I never thought that there had been ſo much advantage to be made of a Parentheſis; I do not deſire to miſtake your meaning, and am ſorry to read your uncharitableneſs. Your judgment is, that I ſeek for nothing in your Papers but exceptions; you intimate that I am no Scholar, and to your ſelf no friend; yet you are ſo courteous as to communicate ſome part of your mind to your unlearned enemy: but you profeſs, that you do not caſt up a ball of new contention between us, only you are pleaſed to refer me to another Book called the View of the new Directory.

I acknowledge that I have heard, what I now begin to believe, that that Book is yours, becauſe you ſmile upon it, as Fathers uſe to do upon their pretty Babes.

The Author of that view of the new Directory lays down this rule, pag. 2. [Nothing is neceſſary in the worſhip of God, but what God hath preſcribed;] Pray, Sir, let us know how many ſeverals of the Common-Prayer-book that are purpoſely left out in the Directory, are preſcribed by God.

2. The ſaid Author abuſes both Presbyterians and Independents; but whether he doth anſwer the ſeveral Arguments propounded by either, I leave to you to conſider. Sir, if you have any thing to ſay againſt our Learned and Reverend brethren of Scotland, they are of age to anſwer you, try their ſtrength.

3. If you pleaſe to undertake the anſwer of Mr. Cottons arguments againſt ſet Forms, you may have liberty to ſpeak your mind; but truly Sir, till you have performed this task (I mean, till you have ſhewn how many things are preſcribed by God, and rejected by us in this Directory: 2. Till you have anſwered our brethren of Scotland, and Mr. Caton, to ſay nothing of others) you have no temptation to triumph, unleſs you mean to triumph before the victory, as that Author doth. You ſhould not refer us to Mr. Hooker, now the ſtate of the queſtion is ſo much varied.

4. If it be granted to you, that ſome ſet-Form may, by ſome perſons, at leaſt for ſome time, be lawfully uſed; how will you prove it neceſſary that any whole entire ſet Platform of Liturgy ſhould be rigorouſly impoſed upon all the Miniſters of theſe three Kingdoms of England, &c? is not that the thing which you do ſo paſſionately long after, and earneſtly contend for? if it be not, I confeſs I am much miſtaken; and if it be, let it be clearly and undeniably proved.

5. In this laſt return, I do not find you willing to own what your words ſeemed to import, [That there is ſome neceſſity, that the Liturgy formed in the Apoſtles times ſhould be continued in the Church.] For you give the preſent Church leave to judge of the Liturgy compoſed in the time of the Apoſtles (as you pretend) and to make what alterations or additions, alienation or exchange ſhall ſeem fit to the preſent Church. But Sir, if thoſe Apoſtolical men were extraordinarily aſſiſted by the Spirit in compoſing that Liturgy, ſhall men of ordinary gifts take upon them to paſs a peremptory ſentence for altering, alienating, exchanging what was (as you conceive) compoſed by the extraordinary aſſiſtance of the Spirit, and is by a more than ordinary bleſſing and providence preſerved and tranſmitted to poſterity? Sir, take your words according to your own interpretation, that the holy Ghoſt who ſetled a Miniſtery, enabled them in the Apoſtles time to form a Liturgy to continue in the Church, to the end that the Miniſters might pray and intercede for their ſeveral Congregations; and you do certainly decline, if not ſtudiouſly, the maintaining of what you are engaged to maintain by your View of the Directory; if a Miniſter may pray as he ought in a Congregation, without the uſe of the Liturgy, which you ſay was formed in the Apoſtles time to continue in the Church, then ſure a Miniſter may pray as he ought in the Congregation, without the help of the late Common-prayer-book.

6. You name ſeveral Liturgies; which will you ſtand to, and avouch that it is without any interpolation or corruption?

7. Not to ſpend time about the miraculous gift of Prayer, you ſay there were ſome exercifes of that gift, and confeſs thoſe exercifes to be different from the ſet-Forms you contend for. Sir, is there no ordinary gift of Prayer vouchſafed to the Miniſters of Chriſt? ſhould not this ordinary gift be ſtirred ſtirred up by meditation, and exerciſed in Prayer? ſhould not Miniſters of Chriſt give themſelves to pray, and ſtudy how to pray ſeaſonably, according to the ſeveral occaſions adminiſtred by the various turns of God's providence? How do you prove, that a man that hath not ordinary wiſdom to pray as he ought, is called by Chriſt to be a Miniſter of the Goſpel? Surely, Sir, I think a Miniſter ſhould ſtudy to pray ſeaſonably, as well as preach ſeaſonably; and if the Primitive method and manner of prayer be to be obſerved, it doth not follow that the Liturgies, which go under the name of Saint James and Saint Mark, and have conſtantly been ſuſpected by Learned men, ſhould be rigorouſly impoſed upon the Miniſters of the New Teſtament, who have an ordinary gift of prayer, nay, are indued with the ſpirit of Prayer.

8. You mention the uſe of Pſalms, and the Lords prayer. Why ſure Sir, you did view the Directory very ſlightly, if you took no notice of the Order about the publick reading of the holy Scriptures, and the frequent reading of the Book of Pſalms. We acknowledge the prayer which Chriſt taught his Diſciples to be of it ſelf a moſt comprehenſive prayer, and not only a pattern of prayer; And it is ſpecially recommended to be uſed in the prayers of the Church; if you pleaſe to call this a Liturgy (and, it ſeems, you can demonſtrate no more) do not complain that you are deprived of all manner of Liturgy; for now you have told me that publick divine Service is the Engliſh of Liturgy. Sure I am, the Parliament deſires that our publick ſervice of God ſhould be moſt divine and orderly; for their care hath been to hold forth ſuch things as are of divine inſtitution in every Ordinance, and to ſet forth other things according to the rules of Chriſtian prudence, agreeable to the general rules of the Word of God: and for the conſent and harmony of the Churches, there are general heads propounded, and if you obſerve the general heads, the ſence and ſcope of the prayers, and other parts of publick worſhip, you will have no cauſe to complain of diſorder and confuſion in our publick worſhip. But you tell me that we may pray as we ought, without the help of that Liturgy, which you conceive was formed in the Apoſtles time; and therefore I think I may proceed to the ſadder part of your task.

1. Concerning your ſad Story, I need ſay no more, but that I am glad you have diſabuſed one offender; I could wiſh that you would diſabuſe all thoſe whom you have abuſed with three or four editions of your Book, by a remarkable Recantation of your errour. Sir, venture my arguments to any Reader, I fear none; let your Book be witneſs whether I charge you juſtly or no: I mean your Book printed at Oxford, and all printed after that Copy; I except nothing, but your leſs remarkable alteration, which was not remarkable enough for me to take notice of in ſo ſhort a time; and therefore you muſt blame your ſelf, that your Recantation was no more remarkable; for when you told me that you added theſe words In the primary intention of the phraſe,] I looked over your additions more heedfully, and could not find it: and I did at laſt read even your leſs remarkable alterations, and the Printers Poſtſcript, or yours, for the excuſe of your ſelf and him.

Sir, your firſt anſwer in the eighth Section of your Catechiſm, explains the meaning of the third Commandment to be according to the literal ſound, againſt perjury or non-performance of promiſſory oaths; mark that [Promiſſory oaths.] Whereupon your Scholar is immediately prompted to ask whether the third Commandment, [Thou ſhalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain,] be no more (mark that, no more) than [thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf?] your anſwer is, No more undoubtedly. The God of heaven judge between us; nay, your ſeveral editions do judge; there being not a ſyllable of the primary intention to be found in three or four editions.

2. I ſay, the queſtion is, What is meant in the third Commandment? Your firſt anſwer being an explication of the meaning of the Commandment: The ſecond queſtion is, whether the third Commandment be no more? that is, whether the meaning of it be no more, than that thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf? this is moſt clear to me.

3. The queſtion is not of the intention of a phraſe; that's but a harſh expreſſion, which muſt be explained to be meant of the intention of the Law-giver; and it was Gods intention to forbid fooliſh and wanton ſwearing, as well as forſwearing.

4. We had not beſt diſpute what is primary and ſecundary in Gods intention; one intention is ſufficient, and that is to forbid both.

5. You are not able to make it good that that's the primary intention of the phraſe: and therefore I glanced at that by the way.

6. Your doubtful perhaps was that which troubled me: and ſurely Sir, you do ſee what reaſon you have to blot out perhaps.

7. Why do you ſay, perhaps fooliſh and wanton, ſure prophane uſing of Gods Name is forbidden? is it not as ſure that fooliſh and wanton uſing of Gods Name is forbidden as prophane uſing of it? or is not all fooliſh and wanton uſing of Gods name prophane?

8. Your remarkable alterations aſſure me, that you are convinced that you had not ſaid enough againſt vain aſſertory oaths, in any of your editions: for the words run thus in them all, the particular matter of Moſes his Law [was of promiſſory (not aſſertory) oaths,] which you alter thus, [peculiarly of promiſſory, not only of aſſertory oaths:] and if that be not a recantation, I do not know what a recantation means.

9. I ſaid truly that a doubtful perhaps would not reſtrain youths from fooliſh and wanton uſing of the Name of God; if Preachers be ſo timorous to cry, Perhaps it is forbidden, and that but by reduction neither, ſwearers will grow bold. I do not like your inſtance in this laſt Paper, when you ſay, that fornication is forbidden in the ſeventh Commandment by reduction; ſurely Sir, there needs no reduction to evince that fornication is forbidden.

10. You talk of the words of the Commandment; the queſtion is, of the meaning of God in the Commandment. Gods mind is to forbid fooliſh ſwearing in the third Commandment, and fornication in the ſeventh.

11. I did not take notice of your argument to prove that forſwearing is forbidden in the third Commandment, becauſe you prove what I never denied.

12. You ſay, the Oath which you take lawfully in Judicature, may come from the Devil in another.

ther. You are miſtaken; it is not the oath, but the vanity of the oath which comes from the Devil.

13. You come not off with honour, when you ſay, Firſt, that the ſuperaddition (which I call imaginary) is a command of Chriſt, and afterwards ſay, if it was not a ſuperaddition by a new precept, yet there is a ſuperaddition of new light. Your Catechiſm is, it ſeems, like the Tridentine Canons, capable not only of ſeveral but contrary interpretations. I appeal to your Book again, Lib. 2. Sect. 3. page 50. Firſt, your interpretation that Chriſt came to fill up the Law, as a veſſel that had ſome water in it before, but now is filled up to the brim; and that which is worſe, of a picture, &c. Sir, was there but a rude draught of moral perfection in the perfect Law of God? was it drawn in colours to the life, or as it were with a coal? Take heed, be not too buſy in imitating any Father in a dangerous expreſſion, or in excuſing the great evacuators of the Law. Secondly, though you pretend often to be very careleſs whether you prove a ſuperaddition or improvement of the Law to have been made by Chriſt, yet you confeſs that it is the foundation of a weighty ſuperſtructure, ibid. Pray Sir, declare what that ſuperſtructure is. Is it that you may be juſtified by obedience to theſe new ſuperadded precepts, and yet ſay that you are juſtified by a righteouſneſs without the Law? ſay honeſtly, is that the ſuperſtructure, or is it not? 3. Do you not tell us, that light is the ſtate and doctrine of Chriſtianity, darkneſs of ſin and imperfection? obſerve how untowardly that compariſon runs; though you do not bring it round, yet you go too far; you ſay, that before Chriſt, there was ſome mixture of imperfection, and ſome vacuities in the Commandments of God; you are ſpeaking of the moral Law; you ſay, Theſe vacuities are filled by Chriſt, ibid. Theſe expreſſions ſure have reference to new precepts, and not only to new light; if not, read page 51. to ſhew that Chriſt came to fill up the Law, ſay you; firſt he rehearſes the old Law, and thereby confirms it, and then annexes his new Law to it. What ſay you, who is blindfold now? is not this undeniable? 4. You ſpeak too doubtfully, ibid. when you ſay, that Chriſt under the Goſpel gives higher or plainer promiſes: you ſhould ſpeak with more reſolution in a Practical Catechiſm. 1. There was Goſpel under the Law, and the Spirit was miniſtred to all the elect then, during the time of legal adminiſtrations; divers Jews were penitent believers, and therefore under the ſecond Covenant before Chriſt came in the fleſh. 2. The promiſes were plain enough to them that were endued with the Spirit, as is evident by the Apoſtles diſcourſe in the 11 Chap. to the Hebrews, they were ſo plain that they ſaw them, were perſwaded of them, and embraced them; though the thing promiſed, the Incarnation of Chriſt, was far off, yet their light was ſo clear, and eye of faith ſo ſtrong, that they beheld Chriſt afar off. 3. We have no higher promiſe than that of being heirs and co-heirs with Chriſt in glory, and they had the promiſe of eternal life, the promiſe of being bleſſed for ever in Jeſus Chriſt. 4. The ceremonies which you ſay had nothing good in them, did direct to Chriſt, and therefore there was this good in them, that they did by Gods ordinance and bleſſing direct the elect of God under that diſpenſation unto Chriſt, in whom they were to enjoy all-ſufficient and everlaſting good things in glory. 5. No ſin was able actually to damn penitent believers during the time of legal adminiſtrations. And therefore I wonder at your diſcourſe in the 51 page. Pray Sir, is there any venial ſin? 6. You ſpeak too faintly, when you call the Evangelical diſcoveries before Chriſt, glimmerings of light, and inſert the ſceptical perhaps, page 52. of your Pract. Catech. Sir, there is no perhaps, no hap-hazard in this buſineſs; Jeſus Chriſt was ſufficiently diſcovered during the time of Levitical adminiſtrations to all the elect for their everlaſting ſalvation. 7. When you ſpeak of the glimmerings of the Goſpel, you ſay theſe things were not univerſally commanded to all under threat of eternal puniſhment, but only recommended to them that will do that which is beſt, and ſo ſee good days, &c. Obſerve 1. That you do here by conſequence aſſert, that there were counſels of perfection under the Law: I will not ſay works of ſupererogation, but the Jews were (it ſeems) encouraged to do ſomewhat more than was commanded. 2. Will you ſay, that to believe in the promiſed ſeed, to circumciſe their hearts, mortify their luſts, reform their lives, walk in new obedience, was more than was commanded in the time of the Levitical diſpenſation? 3. Will you ſay, that the Jews were not obliged to believe in the promiſed ſeed, circumciſe their hearts, and the like, under threat of eternal puniſhment? I might enlarge, but by your anſwer to theſe few propoſals, I ſhall be able to underſtand your obſcure Catechiſm; do not ſay, that there is a Sarcaſm in the Epithet. I hope, you will now confeſs that you did contend for new precepts; and therefore you recant once more, if you will be ſatisfied with new light. Sir, counſels give new light, but you ſay the ſuperadditions in the fifth of Matthew are all commands, and not counſels only; and you endeavour to prove it ex profeſſo, page 52. Surely the ſame things were commanded of old; then theſe are but imaginary ſuperadditions, as I called them: but if they be ſuperadditions, and not only counſels but commands, they are new precepts, and therefore you did not contend for new light only, but for new precepts. By this little that hath been ſaid, it is clear that you had ſome weighty ſuperſtructure to lay upon this ample foundation of new precepts, or elſe you did but ſweat and toyl in laying the foundation that you might have your labour for your pains, which you are too wiſe to do. Sic notus Ulyſſes?

All that I deſire is, that you would alter from worſe to better; for I join with you in profeſſing that ſuch an alteration doth declare amiable and imitable qualities: Finally, if you contend not for new precepts, then acknowledge that the ſuperadditions you dreamt of were, as I ſaid, imaginary; and I muſt remember you that the third Commandment, which is out of queſtion the command of God, and Chriſt, and the holy Ghoſt, will by Gods bleſſing be moſt prevalent to reſtrain men from fooliſh or wanton uſing of the name of God in aſſertory oaths, or any other idle uſing of Gods name when they do not ſwear. What I ſaid of Criticiſms was no Sarcaſm: I did but remember you that Criticks are apt to think themſelves ſo far above other men, that they do uſually contemn the ſerious admonitions of poor Country Preachers. But as high as the Criticks think themſelves, I hoped that you would not think them mounted to the higheſt heaven, and therefore called it a lower heaven.

You tell me, [That you do only deſire to ſtudy the moral Law, as you find it delivered from the ſecond Mount]

Mount] in your laſt return, page 14. So ſay the men whom you cry out upon, the Antinomians; and they give this for a reaſon, becauſe the Law of God publiſhed on mount Sinai doth not in their opinion oblige believers.

But you go beyond them in the next page, page 15. and imply, that no unbeliever is obliged under pain of damnation, to obſerve the moral Law. Your words are to this effect, [That Chriſt, who gives more grace than was brought into the world by the Law of Moſes or nature, hath disburdened all men of that ſad yoke that lay on the Jews, and is content to accept of ſincere, without not-ſinning obedience.]

1. I deſire to know what grace was brought into the world by the Law of Moſes? Doth not the Apoſtle ſay that grace came not by Moſes, but by Chriſt only? 2. How do you prove that all men, I mean, every one of mankind, is put under the ſecond Covenant? I ſuppoſe that is your meaning, becauſe in your Practical Catech. page 3. you affirm [That Chriſt did ſatisfie for all the ſins of all mankind, and that all other parts of the ſecond Covenant are conſequent and dependent on that.] And therefore I conceive that in your opinion there is a revelation of the Law of faith made, a pardon granted, and ſufficient grace given to every one of mankind to perform what is neceſſary now under the ſecond Covenant; becauſe you acknowledge that theſe are mercies made over in Chriſt by the ſecond Covenant, in the ſelf ſame page; and to whom are the mercies made over, but to them for whoſe ſins Chriſt hath ſatisfied? 3. I deſire to know how Chriſt could disburthen any man, or ſatisfie for the ſins of any one, according to your opinion, if he did only exerciſe the office of an Aaronical Prieſt by his ſacrifice? For it is certain that no Aaronical Prieſt did ever make any more than a Typical ſatisfaction by the exerciſe of his office; and you adde, that when the Scripture ſpeaketh indefinitely of Chriſts Prieſthood, or his eternal Prieſthood, or of his bleſſing us and turning of us from our iniquities, theſe expreſſions have no reference to his [ſingle, finite, unrepeated ſacrifice upon the croſs, which belongs to his Aaronical Prieſthood,] but they muſt be underſtood of his Melchiſedechian Prieſthood, to which he was conſecrated by his death, which you term an Aaronical ſacrifice, and look upon it as a rite and ceremony of the conſecrating of Chriſt to be our eternal High-prieſt, page 10, 11. You think you have gone far beyond the Socinians in this point; but hear what Smalcius ſaith, Non eſt autem diſſimulandum nos non negare Chriſti mortem ad ejus ſacrificium pertinere, Refutat. Smiglec. de erroribus nov. Arianorum, lib. 2. pag. 282. a word is enough to a wiſe man. Our caſe ſtands thus then, 1. Your doubtful perhaps will not reſtrain men from fooliſh wanton ſwearing; you did well to blot out that. 2. Your new precepts will not do it, and you do well to reſt ſatisfied without them. 3. Your total prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf will not do the deed; becauſe Chriſt doth only prohibit falſe ſwearing and vain ſwearing, he doth not prohibit ſwearing it ſelf; for if ſwearing it ſelf were prohibited, it would never be lawful to ſwear in any caſe; even as adultery it ſelf is prohibited, and therefore it is not lawful to commit adultery in any caſe.

I hope you will diſtinguiſh between vain ſwearing, and ſwearing it ſelf; if ſwearing it ſelf be prohibited, I muſt not ſwear for the publick good, becauſe I muſt not do any thing that is prohibited, though it tend to the publick good. You wonder to hear me ſpeak of Smalcius, and demand who is not of that opinion? Sir, remember that you ſay, [Chriſt hath ſuperadded to the old Commandment a total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf, making that as unlawful now, as perjury was before,] page 66. Now for a man that maintains this, to ſay likewiſe that it is lawful to ſwear for the publick good, is to ſpeak like Smalcius, &c. Examine well whether you be not guilty of the ſin of dogmatizing: for I know if you did not condeſcend too paſſively to take up both opinions, you have reaſon enough to diſcern that theſe opinions do fight with one another. Sir, I have proved it already; take one argument more. If ſwearing it ſelf be as unlawful now, as perjury was before Chriſt came in the fleſh, then it is as unlawful to ſwear for the publick good, as for a man to forſwear himſelf for the publick good, which I hope you will not affirm. A man may be lawfully called to ſwear, but no man can be lawfully called to forſwear himſelf; Ergo ſwearing it ſelf is not as unlawful as perjury. If you wonder that rational men ſhould contradict themſelves, I anſwer they ſeldom do it but upon a deſign; and I could eaſily gheſs at the deſign, but you have taught me to be more reſerved.

In the 12 page of your laſt Anſwer, you ſay, That what is forbidden by reduction is not ſo deeply obliging; and therefore I ſtumble at your notion of reduction, conſidering that you ſay, Fornication is forbidden by reduction in the ſeventh Commandment. Sir, I think my ſelf as deeply obliged to abſtain from fornication as from adultery, I mean, by the ſame Authority. Moreover you plead there, that Chriſt may be ſaid to have added to the third Commandment, becauſe he forbids ſwearing by any thing elſe as well as by God. 1. Were men at liberty before Chriſt came to ſwear by any creature? 2. We may now in ſome caſes ſwear by God, but in no caſe by the creature; and therefore ſwearing by God is not totally and univerſally forbidden, as ſwearing by the creature is. You tell me that Schindler is as venerable an Authour as Pagnine; truly Sir, I am not aſhamed to profeſs that I have profited by that edition of Pagnine which Mercer put forth. If you conceive Grotius more venerable than Mercer, he will aſſure you that שוא propriè ſignificat vanum. R. Iſaac Abarbinel on the 20 of Exod. ſaith, the word is taken ſo largely in the third Commandment as to comprehend both vain and falſe oaths. If I had ſaid, falſe oaths had not been prohibited in the third Commandment, I would have conſidered your argument drawn from the ſignification of the word in the ninth Commandment. If you pleaſe to conſult R. David Kimchi in libro Radicum, he will prove by the Talmud Jeruſal. and Onkelos, that the word ſignifies fruſtra, & ſine cauſâ; and that he who ſweareth that figs are figs, is to be puniſhed for ſwearing in vain; he cites the 1 Sam. 25. 21. to prove that the word ſignifies vain, [ſurely in vain have I kept.] David doth not ſay he kept Nabals cattle falſely, but in vain; nay, you will find, that they tell you that a falſe oath is forbidden, becauſe what is falſe is vanity, and Tohu, and nothing. I cited R. Abraham Aben-Ezra on the third Commandment; and he will tell you, that one that hath accuſtomed himſelf to ſwear vainly, will ſwear in one day oaths without number; and if you reprove him for ſwearing, he will ſwear that he did not ſwear, and much more to this purpoſe. See R. Solomon Jarchi, if you pleaſe; you will find, they all come to this non aſſumas nomen Domini gratis, fruſtrà, in vanum; and therefore you need not reject, what was humbly tendered to you, with so much scorn and indignation. You say, by [would be forbidden] you did in effect mean were forbidden. I do not understand what you mean, when you say you did in effect mean it: but let that pass. I understand you better when you talk of ὁ παλαιὸς, & ἀντιθεσις: I forgive you: and if that be part of your Rhetorick, I do not envy you, and will not imitate you.

I pass on to your scanning of the third Report. 1. Sir, if you did not doubt, you did ill to speak doubtfully; for your doubtful expressions may help to make or keep others doubtful. 2. You acknowledge something worse than that I charged you with, namely, that you used that expression to serve them, [Who think our natural aversion from God, and inclination to all sin, to be no sin, but an infelicity, unless actually consented to,] by labouring to do them good upon their own principles. Sir, men cannot be brought to true repentance upon false principles; if mens principles are corrupt, refute their principles, and instruct them better, that they may be better principled; Otherwise if you build upon a false foundation, your building cannot stand, and they will be hardened in their impenitence by your connivence. Be pleased to take notice, that this corrupt opinion is not a soul-abasing principle, but rather a self-exalting errour; and therefore the pressing of such a principle upon them, will never humble them. If you had told them, that we are all by nature spiritually dead, in a polluted and cursed condition, this might humble them; but if you serve men upon their own proud principles, they will take it for granted that their principles are good, and grow the prouder. No man can conceive true godly sorrow for his actual sins, who doth deny the very root and fountain of all his sins to be a sin. 3. You suppose, that corruption is not cherished in some act, and conclude, ergo, in that act it is not cherished; just idem per idem. 4. You are desired to prove what you take for granted: is not that equal? I say, that original sin is truly and properly a sin in them that are not of age to consent to it; and that every actual sin in men of ripe years, is not actually and formally consented to; corruption is so strong in us, that it doth many times break forth without our consent; and I am ready to prove both propositions, if you doubt of them. 5. You were ill advised to pass a complement in a Practical Catechism, with men of corrupt opinions, contrary to your own principles. 6. You mention the Socinians very often; but let me intreat you to be wiser: do not provoke me to make a parallel between your expressions and theirs. I take not upon me to know any mans opinion, or his heart, any further than his words declare both. 7. When I spake of a Liturgy that was in design, you know I did not mean the Common-prayer-book. 8. For your View of the Directory, do not magnifie it till you have finished your task; never talk of the suffrages of the Jews, Heathens, or Mahometans, but speak to the point; I have shewen you the point in question. 9. You would have Doxologies and Creeds: is this worth answering? doth not the Directory take in the whole Scripture for a Liturgy? and are there not Doxologies enough, and Creed enough (even all things necessary to salvation) in the holy Scripture? When the confession of faith is published to the world, you will find this Reverend Assembly (so much scorn'd in that Book you subscribe to) be no enemies to any Orthodox Creed: and you may, amongst the rules and directions about the Sacrament, in the Ordinance of Octob. 20. 1645. see that we have not forgot our Creed. 10. I am not at leisure to dispute with you about sitting at Sacrament; the Parliament is not guilty of your illogical conclusions, though you would fain expose them to contempt in your View of the Directory, View Dir. cap. 1. p. 1. If it please you, we will put it to the question, Whether the Directory (in which there is the wisdom of two Parliaments, two Assemblies, which I oppose to your wisdom) or your Pract. Catechism give more countenance to Socinian errours and practices? I will dispute this question with you where you please, and when you please. 1. Shew me where the Directory doth enjoin all communicants to sit in the act of receiving. 2. Tell me whether all familiarity with Jesus Christ doth infer an equality. 3. Doth any Socinian think himself equal with Christ, or conceive that there is no more honour due to Christ, than to a mere man? Pray, do the Socinians no wrong, they will say as you say, That Christ did not bless us till after his resurrection, till he became an everlasting Priest; and ever since he was such a Priest, he hath all power in heaven and earth, a power equal to Gods power, and therefore Divine honour is due to him. Sed tum cultum qui nunc Christo debetur postquam in cœlis esse cœpit, qui est, ut ipsi tanquam Deo confidamus, & omnia ab illo speremus, & petamus quæ ad salutem æternam pertinent, adeoque ipsam æternam salutem dicimus ei deberi, non propter qualemcunque, sed talem & tantam potestatem quæ par sit Dei potestati, Smalcius refutat. prim. lib. Smig. de erroribus Arianorum, cap. 11. p. 109. Sir, I will give you a better Argument against the Directory, and for the Common-prayer-book; you may read it, View of the Directory, page 27. [It is not necessary to exchange the pleasant easie course of our Liturgy, for the tedious, toylsome, less-profitable course in the Directory.] Tell Prelates and Courtiers of ease and pleasure, and you win their hearts. This was a good Argument for an University Orator to urge, but this same word Ergo spoils all such Rhetorical arguments. I hasten to your discourse about godly sorrow: This is your first assertion. 1. Godly sorrow may be conceived for the pollutions of our nature, as infelicities, if not as sins. Be pleased to prove this proposition; and I will abide by it, and maintain the negative. 2. He which doubts whether original sin be a sin, may conceive godly sorrow for it, this is the second dictate. But your third Dictate is admirable. 3. He that thinks inclination to sin no sin, but when he actually consents to it, may when he doth not consent to it, grieve for it as an infelicity. Sir, the question is of Godly sorrow: is it godly sorrow, or is it not, for a man, to grieve for an infelicity, which, as he conceives, is no way sinful? 4. You say, If a man look upon original sin as a pollution, though not as a sin, he may grieve for it with a godly sorrow. I had thought that all pollution of the soul of man had been by sin only, Mar. 7. 23.

You are much mistaken, when you say, that they who think original sin no sin, may be advised to true grief and sorrow for it on their own principles. If by true grief you mean a godly sorrow, no man mourns for sin after a godly manner, but he that grieves for it as a sin against God. Sir, in a Practical Catechism you should have laid undeniable grounds of repentance; and therefore either plainly proved, or at least resolutely asserted original sin to be a sin, without any ifs or ands: For where ſhall a man begin in his repentance; if he be not convinced that original ſin is a ſin? ſhould he not lay the axe to the root of corruption, and bewail the fountain of pollution? will not he be apt to doubt whether actual ſins be ſins, who doubts whether an inclination to all ſin be a ſin? ſurely ſuch an acute wretch will ſay, My inclination to ſuch and ſuch an act is natural, and not evil: Ergo this and the like acts, to which I am naturally inclined, are not evil. You know what I could adde; let me beſeech you to conſider what hath been ſaid, and I will paſs on to your fourth Report.

Your fourth Report concerns Juſtification. Sir, I did not deſire you to give an account of your faith, but I ſhould have been glad that you would have vouchſafed an anſwer to my Quæres. I thank you for your ſecond acknowledgment that you were miſinformed, and I thank you for your endeavour to prevent miſtakes. Truly Sir, I do not wilfully miſtake your ſence, nor do I deſire to take any advantage of an haſty expreſſion.

Your firſt Propoſition is, that juſtification is divine acceptation and pardon of ſin. I will not ſtand to ask you why you put acceptation before pardon; it is likely that was not done de induſtria; but I would know why you ſpeak of remiſſion and acceptation, and leave out imputation; I obſerve, that in your ſecond propoſition you do affirm that [The mercy of God, through the ſatisfaction and merits of Chriſt, is the ſole cauſe of this juſtification.] Do not think me too curious, ſince you deſire me to give my opinion of theſe propoſitions; you know, there are ſome that diſtinguiſh between a firſt and ſecond juſtification; and they do expreſs themſelves warily, and they will grant what you ſay, ſo you will give them leave to chuſe which they mean, this, or that juſtification. But I will judge charitably of you, hoping that by this juſtification you intend not to imply that there is another juſtification; and ſo, as they ſay, a firſt and ſecond juſtification. Give me leave to ask you a queſtion or two about the ſecond propoſition, compared with the fourth, and with ſome paſſages in your Practical Catechiſm, that by a clear anſwer to a few Quæres, many miſtakes may be prevented.

In your ſecond propoſition you ſay, The mercy of God, through the ſatisfaction and merits of Chriſt, is the ſole cauſe of juſtification. In your Catechiſm you ſay, That Chriſt did ſacrifice himſelf for all the ſin of all mankind; and yet in your fourth propoſition in this laſt return you ſay [That this work of grace in God through Chriſt, is not every mans portion] Sir, if Chriſts ſatisfaction be the ſole cauſe, and he hath made ſatisfaction for every man, the grace of God (which extends as far as Chriſts ſatisfaction) muſt be the portion of every man for his juſtification by the obedience of Chriſt alone. My firſt Quære then is, 1. Why the grace of God in juſtifying thoſe for whom Chriſt hath ſatisfied, doth not extend to every man for whom he hath ſatisfied? 2. Whether the qualification and condition, which you require in the ſubject, be beſtowed upon the elect abſolutely or conditionally? Regeneration you ſay is a condition which doth diſpoſe the ſubject for juſtification, that is, for acceptance and pardon, as I conceive, and you expreſs. Pray Sir, ſhew me what condition God requires unregenerate perſons to perform, that they may attain unto regeneration, which you take to be the condition of juſtification. I acknowledge, that God doth never juſtify an impenitent infidel in ſenſu compoſito, that is, the infidel doth not remain an impenitent infidel; but then you muſt grant on the other ſide, that God doth juſtifie the ungodly. 3. Whether there be any condition which doth ſo qualify the ſubject, as that you can ſay, by theſe habits, acts, vows, and theſe only I am juſtified? Pract. Catech. page 16. Sir, Learned men ſay that there is no condition required to diſpoſe the ſubject for juſtification; but there is a condition, namely Faith, beſtowed upon none but the elect, to receive the object of juſtification, Chriſt, and his compleat obedience, perfect righteouſneſs; and hence (as I conceive) ſome men (that meant well) ſay, there is a condition required, that is, to receive the object; and others ſay, there is no condition required, that is, to diſpoſe or qualifie the ſubject, ſo as that the ſubject ſhall be conſtituted righteous by that diſpoſition or qualification. I ſpeak as plainly as I can deviſe, that there may be no miſtake. God doth by his free and effectual grace work the hearts of his elect to receive Chriſt, that they may be juſtified; not by their own obedience, or vow of obedience, but by the obedience of Chriſt alone, freely imputed by God, and reſted on by faith only.

Pract. Cat. p. 3.

Moreover, Learned men do diſtinguiſh between diſpoſing of the ſubject to ſalvation (which is the laſt part of the execution of Gods decree of election) and diſpoſing the ſubject unto juſtification: though they grant that there is a condition to enable the ſubject to receive the object Jeſus Chriſt, who is Jehovah our righteouſneſs. And therefore Proteſtants do maintain, that all the habits and acts of grace which are in the beſt of men concurring together, are not ſufficient to juſtifie a man before God, and therefore faith concurring with a vow of obedience, or any faithful actions, cannot juſtifie us: Though faith alone be ſaid to juſtifie us Relatively, that is, in regard of the object received by faith. I acknowledge with you, that juſtification is Gods act, we cannot pardon our ſelves, and God ſitting as a fatherly Judge upon a throne of grace, doth juſtifie us τῷ ὑψει, as Chryſoſtome upon the 8 of Rom. 33. verſ. Sir, let me intreat you not to wonder, that I find fault with ſome paſſages in your Book, which you ſay are in effect places of Scripture. Sir, to abuſe the Scripture for the maintenance of any errour, is to my apprehenſion, a great deal worſe than to deliver any erroneous conceits in your own language. The Papiſts ſay as you do, that they ſay no more than Saint James himſelf ſaith. I did not dream that you thought Abraham was juſtified by the actual ſacrificing of his Son! Socinus ſaith, Abraham was juſtified by offering up of Iſaac. I do not think he means it in any other ſence than that which you repeat; namely, that Abraham was juſtified by a reſolution to obey God in the ſacrificing of his Son, not by the actual ſacrificing of him.

Sir, I am heartily glad to hear you acknowledge that you agree with me in the concluſion: be pleaſed to retract all that is contrary to that concluſion in your Pract. Catechiſm, and then I am ſure you muſt retract what I complained of. Pray Sir, do you not think that we are juſtified by a ſincere vow of obedience, as truly as we are by faith? that is, that our vow of obedience is a condition of Juſtification; I do not ſay an inſtrument, for you deny faith to be an inſtrument of juſtification. And therefore if a ſincere vow of obedience be the condition of juſtification, we are juſtified as truly by that, as by faith. 2. Conſider that you ſay in this laſt return, pag. 20. [The condition muſt be undertaken before the Covenant belongs to me.] This vow or reſolution of obedience is, as I conceive, that which you call the undertaking of the condition; why then ſurely obedience is the condition of the Covenant of juſtification, for obedience is that which is undertaken in a vow of obedience. 3. If by Covenant you mean the whole Covenant of grace, you muſt make ſome condition go before our regeneration alſo. 4. You know the Papiſts ſpeak as fully as you do any where for the meritorious ſatisfaction of Chriſt: but you know what they ſay of the prævious diſpoſitions, to diſpoſe and qualify the ſubject for juſtification; and you know what others ſay of the vow of obedience. 5. Though to give a pardon be Gods act, yet to receive forgiveneſs is an act of faith, Acts 26. 18. We do not receive a pardon by any act of charity, or by a vow of obedience, or receiving of Chriſt as King, and giving up the obedience of the heart to him; I believe you have not forgotten theſe expreſſions which are ſcattered up and down in your Catechiſm and Papers. If faithful actions be the only thing whereby a man is juſtified, as you affirm pag. 16. then are we not juſtified only by a vow of obedience. If faith be unſufficient to our juſtification, unleſs it be conſummate by love, that is, by acts of Chriſtian charity, or keeping the Commandments of God, as you expound that phraſe, pag. 20. then ſure you cannot ſay you plead only for juſtification by a vow of obedience. Unleſs you will make a firſt and ſecond juſtification, I do not ſee how you can come off. On the other ſide, if we are juſtified by a vow of perſonal obedience, then we are not juſtified by the obedience of Chriſt alone, or by faith only; I mean, by the obedience of Chriſt, as that obedience whereby we are conſtituted righteous; not by faith only, as that whereby we receive a pardon; receive Chriſt as Jehovah our righteouſneſs: and therefore truly Sir, I do not yet ſee how you can agree with me in my concluſion; namely, that we are juſtified by the obedience of Chriſt alone, freely imputed by God, applied and reſted on by faith only, unleſs you will retract thoſe paſſages in your Book, which were juſtly complained of, for the good of you, and this whole Univerſity. I ſpeak plainly and freely, as it becometh

Octob. 30. 1646.

Your Friend to ſerve you,

Francis Cheynell.

SIR,

ON Saturday, October 31. I received your Papers (dated the day before) by way of return to mine of October 20. That night I got a liberty from other avocations to read them over, and am now on Munday at the beginning of the week following on preparation to give you ſome account of them. Your letter which conducted them was but brief, yet was willing to take notice of one particular, that of your having written πονηῦ with ι, which though it be only a grammatical σφάλμα, and very extrinſecal to the matter in hand, yet ſeeing you are pleaſed to make it the only ſubject of thoſe few lines, I muſt in civility tell you ſomewhat of your manner of excuſing it. 1. That literal miſtake you know you were guilty of, and I only told you that you were ſo, and added not one word more. Inſtead of excuſing or confeſſing it, you now deſire me only to pardon the miſtakes of an ill Amanuenſis, and adde your reaſons that forced you to make uſe of him. Sir, I will do more than you deſire. Firſt, I will pardon that former miſtake in your ſelf alſo; and tell you, that in one that undertakes to be a Scholar, (and to be very ſevere to thoſe writings of other men, which many pious perſons have been willing to receive with ſome kindneſs, and now profeſs to ſee no kind of ground for your quarrels in them,) the not ſpelling ſo plain a word of Greek, would by very many men be hardly excuſed: I mean, it would take off from their opinion of your learning, as much as if you had written impius with a [y,] that is, more than many faults of a higher nature could be fit to do. Secondly, I will believe (or excuſe) your ſaying, that your haſte forced you to dictate to an ill Amanuenſis, when I have ſome reaſons to think it did not. 1. Becauſe you had had my laſt Return in your hands ten days, and I ſuppoſe the occaſion that cauſed your haſte, was not known to you all that time, or more days than one or two of them: for I profeſs to think your avocation ſo very urgent, and ſhould be ſorry to hear that I was the occaſion of detaining you one minute; but then before you knew of it, I ſuppoſe that did not force you to chooſe this ſhorter way. This was my firſt reaſon. 2. Becauſe the Amanuenſis was ſo far from being an ill one, that in the whole Paper I know but of one failing in the kind forementioned: and that is in the word Sacrifice, where inſtead of the letter c. there is s, which is in effect to write facio with s. But then upon the firſt ſight, this plainly appears to be your own hand, interpoſing this word in ſtead of another blotted out, as you know I can diſcern both by your former Letters, and by the like alterations in other places of theſe Papers. This again inclines me to believe, that the dictating you mention, might be deſigned a little to conceal ſuch ſlips which might poſſibly fall from you, and that it was not forced by your haſte only. My third Reaſon is; becauſe I conceive it a far more ſpeedy way to write from my own phanſie or underſtanding, (which may be done without any ſtay but that of inventing and writing,) than to dictate to another, wherein much longer time is required for me to dictate articulately, and for him after that to write, then again to recite to me what he hath written, before I can proceed to dictate. In this I can ſpeak but mine own, and ſome others ſence, and the common notion that I have of it; but conſidering how far my notions are wont to be from pleaſing you, and that 'tis poſſible you might mean dictating out of your Note-Book, where you may have thrown together all your exceptions againſt that Authour (for that your Amanuenſis tranſcribed what you had formerly writ, I ſuppoſe you do not mean that by dictating,) on theſe grounds, I ſay, it is poſſible here may be ſome difference in judgment between us alſo. And therefore if again you tell me, that you have ſpoken your full ſence in this particular, I ſhall make all haſte to believe you, and ask you pardon for this importunity: Yet in the mean time I will tell you my reaſons alſo for my being ſo free with you in materiâ non gravi. 1. Becauſe I diſcerned ſo little in your future diſcourſe which would be more pertinent to the matter of my laſt return; having found, that after my having anſwered or laid grounds of anſwering near twenty queſtions in your laſt Paper, more than the matter in hand, or my leiſure engaged me to, you have thought fit to ſpring new matters of controverſie, and to that purpoſe (that you may never fail of the like matter) to catechiſe me in a ſtrange number of queſtions more; when the whole intention of my Paper was, that it might be conſidered, whether you had not wronged that Author in your firſt quarrels at that Book; and not to engage my ſelf in diſcourſe for ever with him that had ſo little pleaſure in any thing of mine. 2. Becauſe by ſome ſuch infirmities as theſe being repreſented to you, you might think it poſſible for you to miſtake in greater matters. For truly, I think it far more poſſible for a Scholar (that reads haſtily, and is intent to note and number faults) to impoſe cauſeleſly upon his Author, than to commit ſuch ſlips, (and not mend them at the review) when he writes as haſtily. And truly if I did not believe that this which I have written were fit to perſwade you that this were poſſible; and did I not hope, that being calmly mentioned to you, it would perſwade you, I would not venture it to your eyes, and if I am miſtaken in my belief or hope, do but tell me ſo, and I promiſe you to retract my errour, to ask you pardon in my next, and (to repair all the injury that can be poſſibly conſequent to the errour) to throw thus much of the Paper into the fire, and not to permit it to the eyes of any other Judge or witneſs, when you have thus ſignified your pleaſure to me.

I ſhall now proceed to your encloſed; and for your firſt period, [where you repeat only, and ſay you have done;] I anſwer, that I have done alſo.

In the repetition of the diſcourſe of exact account, &c. there is a great miſtake, viz. That, becauſe when I was at higheſt I would have ſhewed as much civility towards any Miniſter of Chriſt, as I did toward you, therefore my preſent deſiring an exact account of your ſpeeches concerning the Author of the Catechiſm was the exerciſing juriſdiction over you. I muſt needs tell you, that in my opinion height and dignity in the Church, is not a proper ground of leſſening civility, but an obligation to encreaſe it to all Miniſters of Chriſt, from that example of our Saviour, who when he acknowledges the title of Lord from the Diſciples to be well beſtowed on him, Joh. 13. 13. doth yet waſh their feet, and give them an example of doing the like, (v. 14.) when they are at the higheſt alſo, and ſo Matth. 20. 27. and in the parallel places, he requires them to expreſs their greatneſs in the ἔστω διάκονος, and ſets them his own copy of the οὐκ ἦλθε διακονηθῆναι, ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι: and you ſhall have my opinion (and I ſhould be glad to be told of it, if my practice hath not been agreeable to it) that (as he that is not the more liberal and extenſively charitable for having received the benefit of Eccleſiaſtical preferments, ſo) he that is not the more civil and truly humble for having received any dignity in the Church, hath ſomewhat of the Gentiles κατακυριεύων & κατεξουσιάζων in him, and hath no countenance from Chriſt, or Apoſtolical inſtitution or practice, for that misbehaviour in his dignity. For hence Sir, I will leave (and not help) you to conclude, that how civil ſoever I would have been to any Miniſter in any degree of greatneſs, or how civil ſoever any General may be, if he pleaſe, to his ſouldiers; my being thus civil now, (and no more) is not exerciſing juriſdiction over you, ὅπερ ἔδει δεῖξαι, the only thing which I had then to demonſtrate: and ſo I have ſaid enough (and ſhall conſent to the truth of your [too much]) of that alſo.

Next for your grave ſmile, I ſhall not queſtion it, or deny you thoſe delights, ſo the ridentem dicere verum may go along with it, but ſure the graver the ſmile was, the more it became you not to impoſe on me the exerciſing juriſdiction over you then, or challenging you now, while I only deſired and begged, requeſted and re-inforced my requeſt, (that you would give me an exact account of what you had publickly ſaid of that Author) on purpoſe that I might think no ill of you cauſeleſly; Certainly Sir, ſuch a carriage as this, thus grounded and deſigned, will neither provoke a grave ſmile, nor paſs either for act of juriſdiction or for challenge; or if it muſt, no man ſhall ever be admoniſhed for having treſpaſſed againſt a brother, and ſo be brought to repentance for it, Matth. 18. 15. nor ſhall he that hears (or hath matter of ſuſpicion) that any injury hath been done him by another, have means of knowing ſurely whether he hears or ſuſpects with cauſe, or no. As for your affirmation, That ſure I am too angry when I ſay you have reproached and ſlandered me, from whence you conceive, I endeavour to make you happy. Sir, it is a heap of miſtakes. For, 1. by the grace which I meekly acknowledge to have received from God, I have been enabled (and I conceive, in ſome meaſure made uſe of the ability, by the help of the ſame grace) to hear that I have been reproacht by you, and to tell you ſo, without being too angry, and therefore you are not ſure. 2. I did not ſay you had reproacht and ſlandered me (your additions are always to ſome advantage of your own;) I only ſaid [to this reproach of yours] which I conceive was not ſaid without cauſe; For [to ſay that my deſiring an exact account of you, and not of others, (when I knew not of any other) was to fall foul on you,] cannot be leſs than a reproach; nay, your addition was true, (though then I did not ſay it, and now I tranſcribe it from your Paper, without any paſſion,) it was a ſlander alſo. 3. He that is too angry, doth not at all (by that act) endeavour to make him happy with whom he is too angry; at leaſt, not by the importance of that Text, Matth. 5. 11. unleſs the διωγμὸς or ὀνείδισμος be added to it; and that you do not in this pretend I was guilty of: of which yet I confeſs to have been as guilty in thoſe words, as of the too much anger. 4. It ought to be proved, that my calling your words a reproach was without a cauſe alſo (which you do not attempt to do,) or elſe from thence your concluſion had no right to be induced.

In the next buſineſs, concerning my return to the paſſage read out of the Catechiſm in your Carfax-

Sermon,

Sermon, you are in great haſt, paſſing through all the many pages which I had ſent you to ſatisfie you about that matter, till you meet with a citation of the View of the Directory: and then you think you have an occaſion to leap into a new field, and preſently tell me of my fatherly ſmile upon that pretty babe; (I beſeech you, be more ſolemn, and impoſe not on me either ſmiles or fondneſs to any creature of mine; or however, do not firſt feign ſmiles, and then build concluſions upon them:) and without more ado you ſpend four Sections in asking me queſtions, and ſetting me tasks about that View of the Directory, and ſeveral paſſages in that Author. I cannot think this is the way of replying; it is certainly at the beſt, diverting to another matter.

But Sir, in your ſpeedy paſſage to this other field, you ſcattered ſomething which I ſhall not deſpiſe ſo far as not to take up after you; and tell you, 1. That (whatever you did) you ought to have believed, from the very nature and importance of the word παρίθησις, that the advantage which I made of it was very proper to be made: and why you tell me you never thought it, and neither anſwer my reaſon, nor give me any to the contrary, I cannot imagine; in your haſte, that unimportant ſpeech of yours might have been omitted as well as any other. 2. For thoſe ſpeeches of mine (whereon you judge my uncharitableneſs, and are pleaſed to expreſs your ſorrow for it,) I muſt profeſs you have wholly miſtaken them; and I think that is done by you very unſeaſonably, at the very minute when you had ſaid you deſire not to miſtake my meaning, and are ſo kind as to be ſorry for me. For let me tell you, that ſuch miſtakings are leaſt incident to them that are ſuch lovers of truth, and ſo ſorry to ſee others uncharitable. Now for your miſtakes, I conceive they will be clear to any man that reads the words; I am ſure they are to me, that know my ſence: I ſaid, That if I thought you ſought for any thing but exceptions, I would adde as to a Scholar and a friend, &c. This no way intimates my looking on you as no Scholar, or no Friend to me, much leſs as on my unlearned enemy (which again you adde ſupra computum;) I beſeech you, do ſo no more, for there is difference betwixt no friend and an enemy, as betwixt poſitive hating and negative not-loving) but rather that I did look on you (and meant to deal with you) as both a Scholar and a Friend, if that only third thing, [my thought that you did not ſeek for any thing but exceptions] did not interpoſe and hinder me. From this 'tis clear, that the utmoſt that could be charged upon that ſpeech, was my thought that you ſought not for any thing but exceptions; which if I had been guilty of, I do not yet diſcern it had been uncharitable, becauſe in all the paſſages between you and me at this time, exceptions at that Author, and at my words, have been the whole affair diſcernible by me, and ſo there was no ground to oblige my charity to think (whatſoever poſſibility might be, on which to hope) any other of you. But I ſhall not need grant you that my former ſpeech intimated this neither; for my words, taken and joined with what follows, do not ſo much as intimate that I did poſitively think, &c. (for beſide that ſuppoſitio non ponit, and [if] is but a mark of a ſuppoſition) my doing the contrary to that which would have regularly been ſuperſtructed on that thought, (as it is apparent I do, by my freely adding my whole ſence in the words immediately following) makes that [if] to be far from an intimation by which you might conclude that I did think what is there mentioned. He that propoſes hypothetically [if a man were any better than a ſtone, then he would learn ſomething] and then aſſume not that he learns nothing, but contrariwiſe within few lines affirms that he doth learn very aptly, doth certainly not ſo much as intimate by that [if] that he is no better than a ſtone, but rather clearly affirms the contrary. Be pleaſed to apply it to the caſe in hand, and you will find you were too haſty to conclude me uncharitable, as before you were too willing to conclude me angry.

In the next place; whereas you adde, That I profeſs, not to caſt up a ball of new contention, but only am pleaſed to refer you to another Book, the view of the Direct. This, I ſuppoſe, was a product of your haſte alſo, for the former part of that ſpeech was by me delivered of one thing, viz. of that account given you ex abundanti of my ſence of that whole matter about Liturgy, among the Apoſtles, which therefore was not in any reaſon to become matter of new contention, for then there would be no end. But the ſecond thing (my reference to the View of the Direct.) came in afterwards, in my anſwer to your firſt queſtion, and that too with a [beſides] a note of an ex abundanti alſo, when I had before ſufficiently anſwered your queſtion, at leaſt ſo anſwered as that you reply not to it. What you meant by making this change, and mixing of things ſo diſtant; you will (I hope) upon examination of your ſelf remember. And I beſeech you, for my ſake to do it, that there may hereafter be ſome few leſs material paſſages in your diſcourſe, which may be paſt over by me without occaſion of confuting: For as yet you ſee there hath been nothing of any deep conſideration, and yet nothing that deſerved not ſome animadverſion.

Sir, I come now to the new field you deſire to lead me to, the ſeveral paſſages which you now newly mention in the View of the Directory, and the tasks and queſtions that you offer me on that new occaſion, without any the leaſt temptation offered by me to bring you to it (for they are not thoſe places which I had referr'd you to, to which you make theſe exceptions,) and which is moſt unreaſonable, before you had either ſaid one word in anſwer to what I had now produced on that matter, or confeſs your ſelf ſatisfied with it: I muſt leave you again to paſs ſentence on your ſelf for this behaviour; and to conſider, that you have no way encouraged me to undertake all your commands, or defend at this time every part of every Book which you ſhall have leiſure to except againſt. Yet Sir, I am reſolved to fail you in nothing that you can vouchſafe to think reaſonable for you to expect, on condition that for the future you will weigh your ſcruples better before you throw them into your Papers.

Firſt you ſay, the Author of that View lays down this rule, page 2. Nothing is neceſſary in the worſhip of God, but what God hath preſcribed] and from thence demand, how many ſeverals of the Common-prayer-Book, that are purpoſely left out in the Directory, are preſcribed by God?

This will be very admirable to him that looks on that 2 page of that View. For firſt, that which you ſay, that lays down for a rule, is there produced only as a ground of the adverſary with whom the Author of the View there diſputes, in theſe plain words [I ſhall ſuppoſe it granted by them with whom I now diſpute, that nothing is neceſſary, &c.] If I ſhall labour at any time to confute or anſwer you by by an argument or anſwer ad hominem, by urging ſomewhat againſt you, that you take for a principle, and mention it as a thing which I ſuppoſe granted by you, would you ever think fit to impoſe this principle of yours as a rule laid down by me? If you will offer to do this, or now conceal that you do it, and make advantage of it, there is no diſputing with you. But then ſecondly, you muſt take notice what 'twas that the Author of the View was there a proving, not any neceſſity of retaining all or any of the ſeverals of our Liturgy, but that there was no neceſſity of aboliſhing the Book, &c. That was the eaſie task he had to prove againſt them that affirmed to think it neceſſary to aboliſh it: and you muſt not ſet that inanimate Book new tasks (as you do me;) or if you do, you muſt not thus expect to be obeyed. Now I have gone thus far; I do remember to have heard that you objected ſome ſuch thing to the Author of that View (under the title of the ſame perſon who was the Author of the Catechiſm) in your Carfax-Sermon, and challenged him to prove that our Liturgy was neceſſary. If the having ſaid it there, and having conceal'd it when you were pleaſed to give me an account of that Sermon, cauſed or occaſioned your inſerting it in this place, then though it be now a kind of reſtitution to give it me here, which then you were willing to keep from me, (of which nature I have heard of more, which I ſhall anon mention to you,) yet ſhall I not thank you for it, becauſe you do it under another ſpecies; but ſhall only complain, that both there and here you were either very unkind in not obſerving the main argument of that whole firſt part of that Book, or elſe very unjuſt, if you did diſcern it, and were willing to impoſe ſo diſtant a theme upon that Author.

To your ſecond accuſation, I muſt as briefly ſay, that that Author abuſes neither Presbyterian nor Independent; onely mentions the ſeveral influences which he profeſſes himſelf forced to believe that they had, the one ſort into the premiſſes, the other into the concluſion; and renders his reaſons for it, becauſe the concluſion is very diſtant from what the premiſſes would neceſſarily infer (viz. a neceſſity of aboliſhing our Book, when none of the three premiſſes aſcended near ſo high) and that which the Presbyterians, as he conceives, would not affirm, (for ſure all of that perſwaſion do not, or have not always thought it neceſſary to aboliſh ſet Forms:) and I now demand of you, whether in this thought he did abuſe them; or if not, what elſe he did ſay of them that can deſerve that phraſe from you. For the arguments propoſed by either] as far as the Book with which he undertook to deal did propoſe or intimate them, you know he hath anſwered them; and till thoſe anſwers are diſproved, they may paſs for good ones. For your challenge in the name of your Reverend Brethren of Scotland, I know not what occaſioned it, unleſs ſome citations out of Mr. Knox's Liturgy: and if thoſe were not rightly cited, the pages are noted in the margent, and will preſently inable you to diſprove them.

To your third of Mr. Cottons arguments againſt ſet Forms, the buſineſs of that View tempted not that Author, nor doth our preſent matter of debate incline me to think them neceſſary to be taken in. It is not every mans work to do every thing at every time: yet perhaps it might be anſwer ſufficient to you, to tell you that it appears not to me by any thing that here you ſay, that you believe ſet Forms unlawful; and till you profeſs you do, you are perhaps as much obliged to anſwer Mr. Cottons arguments, as that Author; I am ſure, as much as he is obliged to ſhew how many things are preſcribed by God, and rejected by you in the Directory, when he looks not on the Liturgy which he defends, as any of Gods preſcribing, but only preſſes the no-neceſſity (from thence or from other grounds) of aboliſhing it, and after proceeds to ſome other particulars about it; but no where to the divine preſcription of it. If by the anſwering your Brethren of Scotland, you mean any arguments of theirs againſt ſet Forms (as you ſeem to do by joining them with Mr. Cotton) I am perſwaded by ſome part of that View (viz. by the Authors producing the practice of the Scots for ſet Forms) that he never dreamt they had appeared againſt them, at leaſt ſo far as to think aboliſhing neceſſary (which was his only point in hand,) and then you muſt excuſe him that he did not know firſt, and then not anſwer them. Yet after all this, what occaſion you had to accuſe him of triumphing, or of doing it before victory, (when you bring no objection againſt that victory, but only his not-anſwering Mr. Cotton, &c. (which were things to which his preſent task obliged him not, nor ſo much as intimated that it did;) and when you object not one word againſt his anſwers to that which he did undertake) I can no more gheſs, than at the reaſon why that Author might not (for ſome things which he had ſo particularly defended, and was never confuted by any) refer you to Mr. Hooker, or why the ſtate of the queſtion is ſo varied, as you ſay it is.

For the fourth charge and queſtion [How it will be proved neceſſary, that any whole ſet Form of Liturgy ſhould be rigorouſly impoſed, &c.] all that I ſhall need to ſay in vindication of that Author is, that he is never forced by the task before him to prove any ſuch thing; if it be not neceſſary to be aboliſhed, it is enough for his turn againſt his adverſary. And then for your opinion of the matter or object of my paſſionate longing, or earneſt contention (who, I thank God, am at this time neither paſſionate, nor longing, nor earneſt, nor contentious for any thing but that you would permit me to be quiet) I ſhall not need be much concern'd, becauſe all that you bring to prove all this againſt me, is, that if it be not true, you are much miſtaken: in which you cannot blame me, if I grant the concluſion, becauſe 'tis eaſier far than the other member, which you have left me, [viz. to prove clearly and undeniably,] which ſure is not every mans task, eſpecially when you are the perſon I muſt approve theſe proofs to. Only I muſt deſire you to remember, that to make it unlawful to uſe this ſet Form, is much more than to relaxate or forbid a rigorous impoſing; and the former of theſe had been poſſible to have been done, without the latter.

5. For my not owning a neceſſity, that the Liturgy formed in the Apoſtles times ſhould be continued in the Church, i. e. (as I there expreſs) that that very Liturgy ſhould be continued without any alteration or additions, I am content to join with you; but wiſh you had not mangled my words; 1. by putting in alienation and exchange (which is there applyed to Lands, not to Liturgy; and only uſed as a reſemblance to ſhew that he that ſaith, [The holy Ghoſt enabled a Miniſtery to form a Liturgy to continue] doth not affirm that it was neceſſary to continue, any more than he that leaves land to continue to his Heirs, obliges them from ever alienating, &c. which ſimilitude will enforce à majore, what what I conclude from it, the no-neceſſity of not adding or altering that Liturgy; but (whatſoever it might do) is not there brought home to that of alienating, &c. becauſe it is not by him that brought it, applyed ſo far, (as you will ſee in the place.) 2. By ſaying, That I give the preſent Church leave to judge of the Liturgy compoſed in the time of the Apoſtles, and to make (as what alterations and additions, which only I did ſay, ſo) what alienation or exchange ſhall ſeem fit to the preſent Church. Wherein you have inſerted and impoſed on me almoſt every word recited particularly [the preſent Church, &c.] in ſtead of [the Church] (which ſignified quite another matter, viz. the Church either of thoſe Apoſtolical men, or thoſe next following them,) and the Church again not only in order to adding or altering as they ſhould think fit, but (which differs much from it) of aboliſhing, as the affair now ſtands; or, as you there ſay, alienating and exchanging: (not to mention, that I no where have yet given that Church leave indefinitely to judge of the Liturgy, much leſs the preſent Church to judge ſo far as to alienate.) Certainly a man may affirm, that the Church next after the Apoſtles times may have leave to alter ſomewhat, (as occaſions might alter,) and to add ſomewhat (as they thought fit) to the conſtant Forms uſed by the Apoſtles, and ſo to ſettle ſomewhat in the Church (by that adding) which might ſupply the place of the χάεισμα πνῶς which the Apoſtles had above the ſucceeding Church, and yet not give the preſent Church of England, or any perſons in it, which are not the preſent Church in any notion of it, leave to caſt out all ſet Forms, particularly thoſe which without any alteration, thoſe firſt Ages of the Church had delivered down to us from the Apoſtles. So again afterwards, you much vary the ſtate, when you talk of men of ordinary gifts taking upon them to paſs a peremptory ſentence for alienation or exchange. Who would think that [the Primitive Churches thinking fit to add or alter,] ſhould be ſo improved under your hands? (I beſeech you once more never to alter one word in the period with which you are diſpleaſed; for other men that are in any degree credulous, or not very wary, may be deceived by your doing ſo; though you ſee I am not altogether ſo ignorant of my own ſence, or of your wont, as to depend on you without examining.) You ſee now how little right your concluſion of that fifth Sect. had to be induced upon any words of mine: and yet let me tell you, that if it were granted you poſſible, That a Miniſter may pray as in a Congregation without the uſe of the Liturgy formed in the Apoſtles times, &c. nay, without the help of the late Common-prayer-book, yet will it not follow from thence, that it is well done to aboliſh (with this Liturgy) all ſet Forms, much leſs that it was neceſſary to aboliſh this.

To your ſixth you already diſcern my anſwer, that neither I nor the Author of the View are obliged to ſhew you any Liturgy, and avouch that it is (I ſuppoſe you mean) that formed in the Apoſtles times without any interpolation, &c.

In your ſeventh you will not ſpend time about the miraculous gift of Prayer, (which if you had done, and obſerved the uſe that I there made of that doctrine to the preſent purpoſe, it would have ſtood you in ſome ſtead, (at leaſt kept you from being ignorant of my ſence, and (the conſequent of it) your asking of more queſtions,) and I will not ſpend any more time about your ſeveral queſtions than to tell you, that all that I now, or the Author of the View contend for, doth not prove us concern'd in thoſe new Quæres: for were it granted, that there were an ordinary gift of Prayer, and that to be ſtirred up and exerciſed, that Miniſters ſhould ſtudy to pray ſeaſonably, (which I ſuppoſe is not to pray ex tempore becauſe you ſay ſtudy) that he that hath not ordinary wiſdom to pray as he ought, is not called by Chriſt to be a Miniſter of the Goſpel, (and yet ſure he that hath that ordinary wiſdom to pray as he ought upon premeditation, may pray as he ought not, upon ſudden effuſion; and the Liturgy would a little prevent that, and perhaps enable him to pray more to the edification of the people, than he is able to do, who yet is able in ſome degree to pray as he ought) and that it doth not follow that the Liturgy under the name of Saint James and Saint Mark ſhould be rigorouſly impoſed, nay, that it were true that there are ſome endowed with the ſpirit of Prayer, (as that is by you ſet, for ſomewhat more than the ordinary gift, and which it will be hard for any man to demonſtrate to others that he is truly poſſeſt of) were, I ſay, all this granted to you, yet ſure from all this heap of data (if they were conceſſa too) it would not follow that it was neceſſary, or ſo much as tolerably well done, to aboliſh all ſet Forms in the publick ſervice of God, which was the prime thing by that View inſiſted on.

To your eighth [about Pſalms and uſe of the Lords Prayer,] I was not to be accuſed for too ſlight a view of the Direct. but you for not obſerving to what purpoſe I now mentioned theſe. It was to ſhew the uſe of ſet Forms in the Apoſtles times, and then 1. You muſt mark, that the uſing of ſome ſet Pſalms by all the people as a part of prayer or thankſgiving, differs ſomewhat from reading them as any other piece of Scripture; and let me tell you by the way, that either the ſinging of them, or the manner of reading them alternatim, is a mark (though not inſeparable) of that difference. 2. That the recommending the Lords Prayer is not ſo much as the Apoſtles conſtant uſing it in their ſervice, (eſpecially of the Euchariſt) nor proportionable to our Saviours [When you pray, ſay, Our Father,] and yet I ſuppoſe you will not doubt to obſerve with me, that there are many that acknowledge it recommended in the Directory, that conſtantly abſtain from uſing it in their Pulpits. 3. That I conceive my ſelf to have demonſtrated more than the uſe of Pſalms and the Lords Prayer (if by demonſtrating you mean proving by the authority of Witneſſes fide digni, (which is the higheſt way of demonſtration, that matters of fact are capable of.) 4. That [for your rule of holding forth ſuch things as are of divine inſtitution in every ordinance, and ſetting forth other things according to the rules of Chriſtian Prudence agreeable to the general rules of the Word of God;] this is not the firſt time you have been told, that it is an excellent rule, and that it is far from concluding any neceſſity of aboliſhing all ſet Forms; or even all or any part of our preſent Liturgy. As for the cauſe I have of complaining of diſcord and confuſion in your publick Worſhip, I am not engaged by any thing I have ſaid to give you any anſwer; having not ventured on ſuch a degree of boldneſs, to ſpeak ſo groſly either againſt the general of the Directory, or againſt any of your particular exerciſes of your gifts. Laſtly, I acknowledge I did tell you, that we may pray as we ought without the very Liturgy formed in the Apoſtles times, and ſo nothing hinders but that I may go on alſo to the next particular; which you will

will give me leave to have called the then ſadder part of my task, becauſe it was then the longeſt, not becauſe it had any thing elſe beſide the length, and other things of that nature, (ſuppoſing ſtill that you mean not any ſolid exception, or any ſtrength of argument to be repell'd) which might make it either task, or ſad to me. In that I ſhall not find any fault that the buſineſs of the Trinity is at length diſmiſs'd, but ſuppoſe that you have received ſatisfaction in that point. Only it had not been any great matter if you had vouchſafed to tell me you were ſo ſatisfied. But I muſt not expect thoſe acts of grace from you. I ſhall therefore follow as you lead me. And 1. Sir, concerning the ſad ſtory, (as you pleaſe to call it) I am much tempted to wonder (but that I have for ſome time a little reſolved to give over that innocent quality, and learn with Numicius that prope rem unam, Nil admirari) that it ſhould produce but one thing in you, and that ſhould be gladneſs. For though the gladneſs, as you have faſtned it, I ſhall not think a fault in you, but be alſo glad with you, that I have diſabuſed one offender, (whoſe ſin no man but you, and his own ſoul was guilty of;) yet that it ſhould not be matter of ſome ſorrow or regret to you, to have been the occaſion of that offence in him, (which is certainly to ſcandalize your weak brother, and leave it ſtill poſſible for many other, through that ſcandal, to ſtumble and fall in like manner;) this muſt be matter of wonder and admiration to me, but withal of advertiſement what I am to expect from you by way of return to any act of Chriſtian admonition, and for that you ſhall give me leave to be heartily ſorry, though you will not.

For your command, [That I ſhould venture your arguments to any Reader, &c.] I profeſs my ſelf ready to obey you: and therefore ſhall now take boldneſs to tell you, that I do expect from you, according to the purport of this ſpeech of yours, that you will give your conſent that this whole matter be referred to others judgment; and to that end, that all that hath thus paſt between us be ſtraightway Printed; and I will then deſire no further ſatisfaction for the injury which I conceive my ſelf to have received from you. As for the witneſs you deſire the matter ſhall depend on, viz. that Book as it was printed at Oxford, I ſhall be as ready as you to ſtand to it, and by that to have it tried, whether the Author of that Catechiſm in that firſt edition gave any Chriſtian man any degree of liberty (more than you your ſelf confeſs is due) of ſwearing. This way of trial I ſhall never refuſe, but profeſs to you (what before I told you) that the advertiſing you of the addition in the laſt edition was perfectly ex abundanti, and that the Author was juſtified ſufficiently from the main part of that charge (viz. giving youth liberty to ſwear) without it. And therefore by the way let me tell you, that when that Author had in the ſimplicity of his heart put in thoſe words of the primary intention to prevent all miſtake in the moſt ignorant, (not queſtioning but that all ordinary learned or intelligent would underſtand without it,) for you to faſten peculiarly upon that one ſupernumerary anſwer of mine, and to make ſuch ſhews of triumph, and impute clancular dealing to that Author, and a great deal more, (on ſo no manner of grounds or probabilities, when all is laid together) is that, which you ought to lay to your heart, though you will not the ſad Story. What you add again to the ſame purpoſe, after ſo full an anſwer, is like all the reſt; and as I muſt not think that ſtrange neither, ſo I deſpair that my repeating my former anſwers will provoke or invite any better dealing from you.

In your next Section beginning with, [Sir, your firſt anſwer, &c.] you have, I conceive, one new miſtake. For by your [mark that] twice repeated, I ſuppoſe you would have it marked that that Catechiſm affirms no more to be forbidden by the third Commandment, than the non-performance of promiſſory Oaths. If you mean thus, you are much miſtaken. All that is toward that ſence is only this, that the ſecond part of the words cited by Chriſt, [Thou ſhalt pay unto the Lord thy vows,] explains the meaning of the third Commandment to be againſt perjury or non-performance of promiſſory Oaths. Do you now pleaſe to mark [againſt perjury] not denying but that the falſeneſs of aſſertory Oaths, which is alſo perjury, is there meant by the words of the third Commandment; but giving the non-performance of promiſſory Oaths, a ſpecial right to the negative part of that Commandment, as it is there lookt on by Chriſt. And I beſeech you conſider, and paſs your conjecture, what did or could move that Author to add that diſtinct mention of promiſſory Oaths in that place, but thoſe words which there Chriſt recites, [Thou ſhalt pay, &c.] and do you tell me, if they do not peculiarly (nay, only) belong to promiſſory, (for ſure aſſertory Oaths are not capable of being thus paid) and if the Author thus ſtrictly deſired to follow Chriſts method, ought this to be imputed to him? Certainly not, when he never made queſtion but that aſſertory Oaths were meant alſo by the third Commandment, and diſtinctly affirmed that perjury (which ſure contains that) was there forbidden. The conſidering of this might rather have ſuggeſted to you this truth, that that Author was careful to make it his firſt task, or part of his method, to weigh the literal importance of each part of the Text, and gain as much from each part, againſt the ſin, as he was ſure it would neceſſarily import, and then to build upon it, what by reduction, (i. e. by any thing but the primary literal importance) what by Chriſts ſuperadditions, (i. e. by the words induced with a [But I ſay unto you] whether they note new precepts, or only new light) would be as firmly ſuperſtructed. And your want of obſerving this method, this deſign of that Author, is the likelieſt thing, that in charity I can pitch on for the occaſion of your miſtake in any part of this matter; though for your affirming that this Catechiſm gave any Chriſtian, liberty of ſwearing, I cannot be juſt if I ſpeak ſo favourably. To this, which I conceived a new miſtake in you, I muſt add another old one in that Section, viz. that you will ſtill talk of my ſeveral Editions, (and not mean that laſt where the additions are ſet;) when you have been ſo oft aſſured of this truth (of which I can produce the confirmation of ſeveral Oaths) that I never had the leaſt knowledge of, or gave conſent to any other but the firſt Oxford printing of thoſe few Copies, and thoſe laſt additions.

For the ſecond thing, which is ſo clear to you, 'twill be acknowledged far from being ſo, if I again tell you that the meaning of thoſe words of the ſecond queſtion, [Whether the third Commandment is no more, &c.] is moſt preciſely this, whether the literal importance, (or if you will, the literal meaning) of the third Commandment be no more, &c. and that will well agree with the firſt queſtion, what is the meaning of the old Commandment, (viz. as 'tis delivered by Chriſt in theſe words ὑπἀποφάσεως, and the conſequents out of other places, Thou ſhalt perform, &c.) that is again the literal meaning, or the neceſſary importance of the words produced by Chriſt, agreeable to which is the anſwer, that 'tis ſet to expreſs it to be, as literally it ſounds, againſt perjury, &c.

3. 'Tis not very reaſonable for you to over-rule all others, by ſaying the queſtion is not, when I have as much reaſon to know as you, (being ſo well known to him that ſet the queſtion) and affirm it is, or (becauſe with you the intention of a phraſe is a hard expreſſion) to conclude from thence, that it muſt be explained by the intention of the Law-giver, whereas I again tell you that the literal notation of the phraſe is the thing that was meant by it, and not the intention (I mean, the total full intention) of the Law-giver.

4. For the queſtion of what is primary and ſecondary in Gods intention, [which you would not have diſputed,] that you ought to have ſpared alſo: for again I ſay, 'tis about the primary or ſecondary notation of the phraſe. But you by drawing in (before) the intention of the Law-giver, found it an eaſie change into the intention of God; but neither of thoſe is the thing here ſpoken of.

5. I conceive, Chriſts rendring the third Commandment by ὐ πεποιήσεις, is, as I was then confident, (beſide others) a ſufficient proof that that is the primary intention of the phraſe: and I have reaſon to continue in that opinion, becauſe you have not dropped any word of anſwer to it, in all your tale of rejoinders.

6. For the doubtful [perhaps,] if I had reaſon to blot it out, you need not challenge me for doing what was rational: the truth is, I was not confident that every body was perſwaded or could be convinced, that all fooliſh, wanton uſing of Gods name (if without any kind of ſwearing) was forbidden in that Commandment, which only ſpeaks of taking, or lifting up Gods name, which with the Hebrews ſignifies ſwearing, and (if wiſe men may be believed) nothing elſe: and therefore I was (according to my judgment) more willing to put in [perhaps,] than to venture a quarrel with any body in that matter; but afterwards, conceiving the (reduction) would bear it, and willing to be as ſtrict in this matter as I could poſſibly any way juſtifie (God knows, far from any thought of being accuſed for giving liberty of ſwearing) I put in (idle) in ſtead of the word (perhaps:) and ſo you have, you ſee, the fate of ſhrifting me. I am not permitted to keep any thing from you; and yet deſire not to burthen you with a ſecret, or to deliver this my confeſſion under the reſtraint of any ſeal to you.

7. I have given you grounds to diſcern that 'tis not ſo ſure that fooliſh and wanton uſing of Gods name is forbidden by that Commandment (in caſe that fooliſh uſing it be without Oaths) as prophane or blaſphemous uſing it; the former of which you were told, I conceived to belong to Oaths, and thoſe unlawful Oaths, (and when not to ſuch Oaths, then to ſomething elſe which was equivalent to them) as [to profane,] ſignifies to uſe that commonly or unworthily, which is only to be uſed in holy matters, and ſuch are Oaths reſolved to be, and therefore called ſacramenta; and the uſing them in common talk, or to any but the ſacred uſe, is to prophane them; and ſo you ſee, that was a cauſeleſs exception alſo. For though ſome fooliſh wanton uſing of Gods name may be prophaning it, i. e. prophaning Gods name, or uſing it leſs ſolemnly, yet is it not the prophaning of a ſacramentum or Oath, which ſure is greater than the former.

8. Your concluſion, truly, is not true; all that can be juſtly concluded of me from thoſe alterations, is this, that I began to conceive that what I had ſaid againſt aſſertory Oaths, might be made more clear to all; though 'twere to me, that knew my own ſence, ſaid clearly enough before; and I ought to be thanked for this care, (eſpecially by you, if to you it was not clear) and not ſo oft to be reproacht for it. And I will once more profeſs, that to my beſt remembrance I made no one alteration in that Book, but only on deſign to explain, not to alter or retract any thing; or to alter the words that they might more fully ſpeak my ſence. I wiſh there were any thing would content you, but ſpeaking againſt my conſcience; I would not much care then, if you ſtill call'd it recantation.

9. You ſtill miſtake [fooliſh and wanton uſing of Gods name] for ſwearing: (and I will be ſo charitable to you, as to think this is it makes you ſo hard to be ſatisfied in this matter.) But I have oft told you, Gods name may be uſed without ſwearing, and that (not uſing, but) taking or lifting up his name ſignifies that. And then why ſhould the [perhaps] which is not affixt to ſwearing, but to ſomething elſe, contribute any thing toward the ſwearers boldneſs? I beſeech you diſcern what is ſo manifeſt and ſo oft repeated to you. The words there are, [Prophane, &c. is ſurely there forbidden] and that, I have oft ſhewed you, contains every unholy, unlawful Oath under it. For your diſlike of my inſtance of fornication in the ſeventh Commandment, there is no remedy; you will not like any thing that comes from me; and yet 'tis ſure enough, adultery cannot ſignifie fornication in the primary ſence, or ſave by reduction; and beſides, if to the particular of fornication you had a propriety of diſlike, the other inſtance of killing would ſerve the turn, and that you might poſſibly have either lik'd or confuted alſo.

Your 10th is but a recitation of what was oft ſaid before, particularly in the firſt, and ſecond, and ninth, and there you will find it anſwered.

Your 11th is no fair paſſage, for though the proving perjury to be forbidden in the third Commandment, be the proving a thing that you never denied, yet the inference of the argument there uſed being this, that to take Gods name in vain is no more in the prime ſence, or propriety of ſpeech, than to forſwear, that you know was the only thing denied by you, and therefore the argument in any reaſon ought to have been taken notice of.

In the 12th I pray be not too confident that other men are miſtaken; 'tis in this more poſſible that you may be. For when the incredulity of another man is the only thing that calls for my Oath from me in a matter which is not materia legitima juramenti, there the Devil having to do in the incredulouſneſs, the Oath may be ſaid to come from the Devil alſo.

13. My honour will ſufficiently be provided for in this particular alſo, after all your ſcoffs, for which ſoever the ſuperaddition is, of new precept, or of new light, the ſuperaddition, i. e. the thing thus inferred by Chriſt [But I ſay unto you] or Chriſts ſuperadding theſe words, Swear not at all (either of which is a frequent ordinary meaning of the word ſuperaddition) is a command of Chriſt without queſtion. And therefore your ſimile of the Tridentine Canons muſt lie upon your hands; for this is not a place for you to put it off upon your Reader, or your ſervant (that takes all this pains and drudgery for you, for no other pay but of reproachful ſimile's) the Author of the Catechiſm.

But, O, that this ſo ſlight an occaſion ſhould, in the midſt of another engagement, give you hint or excuſe to break out from hence into that other large field concerning that whole matter of Chriſts adding to the Law! I wiſh you could have ſatisfied your ſelf with 13 degrees of confutation (which ſure you would have done, if any one of them had been ſolid, and if number had not been neceſſary to ſupply for weight) and not have thought it neceſſary thus to expatiate. But, Sir, I muſt not neglect you, or let you paſs unattended in any your moſt caſual notions; But clearly tell you to that whole matter, that I do produce the authorities of, and reaſons out of the Fathers (and confeſs my ſelf ſo weak as to be inclined, if not convinced by them) to confirm Chriſt to have improved the Law; and ſhall not count this to be imitating a Father in a dangerous expreſſion, but a full current of Fathers for many years, in a clear pronouncing. And whenſoever I ſhall underſtand that thoſe teſtimonies, or thoſe reaſons may be likely to perſwade with you, I ſhall (out of a very ill topical memory, being far diſtant from my Books) be ready to produce you ſome of them. But then though in the Catechiſm this be done, yet 'tis as clearly there ſaid that no man ſhall be contended with, in this matter, (a little practice of piety with peace, being valuable above a great deal of this kind of diſputing) ſo he acknowledge that Chriſt brought more light, and clearly convinced men of the unlawfulneſs of ſome things, which by nature, or Moſes, men had not been convinced to be unlawful. Thus much for the Doctrine once again. As for the ſuperſtructure that the Author meant to lay upon it, I ſhall ſatisfie your importunity, if it be but to get you into ordinary charity with him. 'Tis plainly and briefly this; A ſerious and hearty deſire that the utmoſt that Chriſts words in that Sermon can ſafely and properly extend to, may be now thought by men the duty of every Chriſtian; and that it may not either be put off (as a counſel of perfection, or a precept of Clergy-men only, under the ſtile of Diſciples) or be brought down again to the old Law of Moſes, or the fundamental of nature, (and being then either not conceived, or not found to be ſo ſeverely preſcribed there, be thought fit to be removed from the Chriſtian ſhoulders) or elſe be taken with ſome σῶον φάρμακον, which by reconciling it with the latitude thought to be allowed under Moſes, may take it off from all ſtrictneſs, and ſo from that height which I conceive now to be required, and which I deſired very earneſtly that all men would look on as their neceſſary duty, and ſo try by Gods help (and the force of the old Pythagorean hemiſtichium Δύναμις γὰρ ἀνάγκης ἐγγύθι ναίει) whether they might not poſſibly be able to perform it. This was the utmoſt of the ſuperſtructure by that Author deſigned or thought on, and that made me ſo wonder (from knowledge of my own ſence, and conſcience of my innocent intentions) that any man ſhould ſay, That this Doctrine could deſtroy the ſumme and ſubſtance of the Goſpel; and yet I confeſs, I have heard of one other man that hath ſaid that, and perhaps from him you may remember it, and not have ponder'd the truth of it. And ſo by my honeſt ſaying, which you call for, you ſee what ſpirit of jealouſy poſſeſt you, when you fancied ſuch an aereal ſuperſtructure for me, which I profeſs never to have dreamt of, and to wonder at the ſharpneſs of your invention, that could be ſo prompt for me. I plainly confeſs, That Chriſt and his merits is the only cauſe on which I depend, and expect to be juſtified, without the righteouſneſs of the Law; and the moſt obedient ſubmiſſion to his moſt elevated precepts can no more contribute toward juſtifying me, than the like obedience to the law of nature or Moſes would have done, if Chriſt were not conceived to have heightned that Law. When we have done the higheſt that Chriſt requires of us, we are but unprofitable ſervants; and by our new obedience have been far from doing more than was required of us, or making expiation thereby for that which we have not done.

In your third Section of that matter, I grant that which you would infer from pag. 50, 51. that the Author there produces arguments to confirm that part of the opinion for new precepts, and therefore I ſhall ſpare reviewing your proofs that he doth ſo: but inſtead of it, tell you, that after he hath confirmed it both by a remarkable Scripture, and the reaſons given for it by the Fathers, (which concludes their opinion alſo) yet he confeſſes to be content with the acknowledgment of more light; and that he will not contend with any that is contrary minded, ſo he will bring the Jews up to us, and not us down to the Jews. Which that it is the expreſs doctrine of that Book, you have oft enough been admoniſhed, and can never perſwade any man to the contrary, that ſhall after the places cited by you, have patience to proceed to the reſt of that matter.

But now Sir, you begin again, and would ſeem to ſay ſomewhat againſt that Doctrine;

As 1. That there was Goſpel under the Law, and the Spirit, &c. and divers Jews penitent believers, and therefore under the ſecond Covenant. Sir, all this is granted moſt willingly, and yet Chriſts coming in the fleſh did bring more light, more plentiful effuſions of the Spirit, and ſo might poſſibly be allowed to give new precepts alſo.

2. For the promiſes, how plain they were to the Jews, needed not to be diſputed by him who ſpeaks only of precepts (ſave only as the height or plainneſs of the promiſes, amongſt other arguments, apt to make higher precepts more ſeaſonable:) and yet that the promiſe might be cleared by Chriſt, and made more univerſally known, you will hardly deny or diſprove alſo. For though they were ſo plain that they ſaw them, yet 'twas afar off, in your own citation of Hebr. 11. and they that were preſent to Chriſt, (who was one of the promiſes) might ſure have a clearer ſight of them.

The ſame will be anſwer to your third argument, for that concerns the promiſes again: and in that reſpect 'tis ſufficient to add, that the promiſes, were they never ſo high before, were now ſure clearer under Chriſt; and that is all that is affirmed by that Author, and will ſuffice to infer his concluded obligation to higher obedience.

And ſo likewiſe the fourth will be anſwered, concerning the Ceremonies, which I acknowledge to have had ſome good in them, in order to Chriſt whom they prefigured; but yet many of them had none in themſelves, I am ſure none when Chriſt is come, and hath removed the obligation of them, and ſo may be allowed to have added ſome new precepts in lieu of them: and I am as ſure they have not ſo much of goodneſs or eaſineſs, the χρηστὸς ζυγὸς or ἐλαφρὸν φορτίον, as now is in the very higheſt and ſtricteſt precepts that are given us under Chriſt; and therefore is there nothing like unreaſonable in the change.

In your fifth, ſure 'tis not ſo ſtrange that I ſhould mention the pardoning of ſin now under Chriſt; for though that was to be had for the penitent believer under the time of the Law of Moſes, yet was it 1. Not by the power or purport of the Law, but only by Chriſt; And 2. 'twas not at all to be had in the ſtate of nature, or firſt Covenant, which required unſinning obedience; and to the Law of nature that law of Chriſt was ſaid to ſuperadd, as well as to the Law of Moſes; and therefore that particular in the 51 page, was not impertinent neither, or capable of your ſad wonder. But how I am obliged to think your queſtion [Whether there is any venial ſin?] tolerably pertinent, or fit to expect any return from me at this time, I cannot gheſs, yet ſhall ὑποπτεύειν, and anſwer that alſo; that though no ſin have any title to pardon under the firſt Covenant, yet under or by the purport of the ſecond, many ſins not gotten out of infirmities, &c. ſhall be waſhed in Chriſts blood, and ſo be actually pardoned, (which is more than venial or pardonable in that ſence) whereas many other ſhall never be capable of that waſhing, or that pardon, without particular forſaking, but bring them that lie under them (impenitent unbelievers) into condemnation. This were abundantly enough, conſidering the call I have to the anſwering of that queſtion at this time. Yet to demonſtrate to you that I am not over ſhy of anſwering you a queſtion (though it be of ſome nicety) when you think fit to ask it me, I will go a little farther to ſerve you, and give you the ſtate of this queſtion (if you pleaſe, by way of ſuppoſition at large) in ſuch a manner poſſibly that no party will find much to object to it. Thus;

What is the meaning of this ordinary queſtion, [an aliquod peccatum ſit ſuâ naturâ veniale?] will appear by the anſwer that muſt be given (if it be ſatisfactory) to this argument, which I ſhall imagine produced againſt it; [No ſin is in its own nature mortal;] for that ſin ſhould be the cauſe of damning any, or that puniſhment eternal ſhould be due to ſin, is but an accident that the Law or Covenant of God brought in, either to Adam, Quo die comederis morte morieris, or after, Behold I ſet before you life and death, &c. for ſure had it not been for that Law of prohibition (that Covenant, with that penalty, on breach of conditions) ſin had never damned any one; and therefore thoſe irrational creatures to whom no ſuch Law is made, and Covenant given, though they ſhould be ſuppoſed to ſin againſt the Law of their creation, they ſhall not be puniſhed eternally for that. Now it is an old rule in Logick, that Accidens advenit enti in actu exiſtenti, and is not de naturâ ſubjecti, though ſometimes ſo ingraffed into it, that it becomes inſeparable from it, therefore this [being mortal or damning] being an accident that came in by Gods Covenant or Law, cannot be of the nature of ſin, what ever that ſin be: For if it were ſo, then God who cannot make contradictions true, nor conſequently take away the nature of the thing and preſerve the thing, could not take away the damningneſs of ſin from ſin (any more than quantity from a body) manente peccato realiter, which yet we know God can do, and ordinarily doth, by pardoning of ſin: for however it may be ſaid by way of anſwer to that part of the Argument, that Chriſt ſuffered and ſatisfied for ſin, or elſe God could not pardon any, (not to diſpute the truth of that, whether he could or no) it ſtill remains that the damningneſs of ſin is then taken from ſin, by what means it now matters not.

This is the Argument I meant to ſuppoſe made againſt that plain granted truth; and to this argument, he that had propoſed the main queſtion, and held it negative, if he will ever anſwer, muſt ſay that the Law and Covenant of God (whether that ſignifie the eternal Law, or even the eternal will of God, who wills holineſs as he is God, or in any other notion of Law) is a main ingredient in the conſtituting of ſin, the very formalis ratio, that makes that which is of its ſelf materially an act, to become formaliter a ſinful act; that makes the killing of a man, which is materially murther, to be alſo formally the ſin of murther; and therefore if by the Law or Covenant of God all ſin be made mortal, then may it truly be ſaid in this other notion or reſpect, or for this reaſon, that all ſin is ſo of its own nature.

This anſwer muſt be acknowledged to be pertinent and ſatisfactory, and ſo any Proteſtant will receive it: and inſtead of excepting againſt it, I deſire to ſtrike in and cloſe with both Diſputer and Anſwerer, and infer that then it ſeems this is reſolved on by that party that holds all ſins in their own nature mortal, that that is all one with this other propoſition [All ſins which are by the Law prohibited under pain of damnation, are by that Law damning ſins, and none venial;] this being ſo, I ask the oppoſite party, that diſputed even now, what he thinks of this propoſition [All ſins which by the Law, or firſt Covenant were prohibited under pain of damnation, are by the tenor of that Law all damning ſins, none venial] I am verily perſwaded he will conſent to it too. And having done ſo, what hinders now but that this Controverſie may be accommodated between Diſputers, being once rightly explained and underſtood? For that under the Law, or firſt Covenant every leaſt ſin was ſufficient to forbid a mans juſtification, and conſequently to damn, is apparently the words of Scripture, Gal. 3. 9. Curſed is every man that continues not in all. As for the Goſpel, or ſtate of Chriſtianity, or ſecond Covenant, ſtricken with us in Chriſt, we know there is pardon for ſin by the very tenor of the Covenant, and every ſin is not now ſuch, as that it ſhall either damn hereafter, or exclude every one that commits it from the preſent favour of God, but may be competible with a juſtified eſtate, and a hope of heaven. Goſpel-obedience is not perfect, exact, without ſinning at all, but only faithful, ſincere, impartial, without hypocriſie, or indulgence in any known ſin; not the righteouſneſs of him that never ſinned, but of him that believeth on Chriſt, that repenteth and amendeth his life, that of the new creature, [He that confeſſeth and forſaketh ſhall have mercy] and the like. This was ſo far ſeen and acknowledged by ſome Papiſts of the Learneder ſort, [a] Gerſon, [b] Almain, and [c] Jo. Ep. Roffenſis, that they have left their opinion in thoſe words to which no moderate Proteſtant will refuſe to ſubſcribe. The two former thus, Peccatum mortale & veniale in eſſe tali non diſtinguuntur intrinſecè, intrinſecè, & eſſentialiter, ſed ſolum per reſpectum ad divinam gratiam quæ peccatum iſtud imputat, &c. The third, Peccatum veniale ſolum ex Dei miſericordia veniale eſt. I have now need to add no more but this, that if this do not prove acceptable to you, I have loſt my labour, eſpecially if it ſhould be matter of any new contention, thus to have been willing to pacify contenders.

[b] Opuſc. tr. 3. c. 10.
[c] Reſut. 32. articulo Luther.

As for your ſixth, of the [glimmerings] and the [perhaps] it was a little unlucky, not only becauſe 'tis ſaid of Chriſt in Scripture, in terminis, that he was the day-ſpring to give light to them which ſit in darkneſs, which is certainly as much as the [glimmerings] or the [perhaps] can be imagined to import, but alſo, becauſe thoſe glimmerings are mentioned by that Author clearly in order to the commands in that place (as appears by the queſtion that induced that anſwer) and you talk of the diſcovering of Chriſt to all the elect for their everlaſting ſalvation, which ſeems to me ſtill to reſpect the promiſes; or if it do alſo refer to the commands ſufficiently diſcovered under the Law, &c. yet that is nothing againſt our doctrine, which ſuppoſes the former light (for precepts) ſufficient pro ſtatu, and that men were then ſaved non obſtante this want of greater light; and only require higher obediences now from thoſe that are allowed higher light.

To your ſeventh, which again breaks aſunder into three under-charges or examinations, there will be little ſcruple to tell you, that though the things you mention were required of the Jews ſub periculo animæ, (Viz. belief, mortifying luſts, &c.) yet ſome other things, viz. ſome of the things propoſed by Job in his ſpeeches to his friends, by David in his Pſalms, eſpecially by the Wiſeman in his Proverbs, &c.) might be but glimmerings of the Goſpel-precepts, σκιαγραφίαι to this ζωγράφησις; and being 1. Not ſo ſtrictly and manifeſtly required of all as the commands of the Decalogue, &c. 2. Not delivered by theſe as Law-givers, but as wiſe men. And 3. being not by way of particular precept propoſed to all; they might then not oblige them (to whom they were not manifeſt, or not delivered ſub præcepto) under thoſe hazards, under which now the knowledge of our Fathers will by Chriſt involves us. Beſides, I ſuppoſe 'tis no news to you, that there were voluntary oblations among the Jews in Moſes his time, and many acts of ſtrictneſs after, wherein they that obliged all men to perform them, were ſaid to dogmatize: and though for ſo doing the Phariſees (that did impoſe them as neceſſary) were condemned, yet the חסידים or Aſidæi, that practiſed them, and yet not conceived them neceſſary, and ſo never ſo impoſed them on others, were never condemned, but thought fit to be commended and rewarded: and though the Jews were encouraged to the performance of theſe נדבות or ἐκουσιασμοὶ, yet is nothing of the doctrine of ſupererogation inferr'd by this neither. But 'tis now impertinent to enlarge on this ſubject; when all other difficulties that now depend are ſatisfied, I may chance be able to give you a juſtifiable account of that alſo.

And ſo how far ſoever the Author of the Catech. contended for new precepts, yet having expreſt what he would be content with in that matter by way of compoſition, rather than contend; and ſaying the very words that I have in that matter tranſcribed thence, I muſt be no more ſaid to recant this ſecond time than that Author did even at the firſt edition. Who by that one willingneſs to live peaceably with you and all men, muſt it ſeems, be condemned to that reproach of having recanted; and be triumpht over, only becauſe he would not quarrel with every man that is contentious.

And to go on with you, what if counſels give new light? may not commands do ſo too? or muſt I be reprehended becauſe I am no Papiſt? I mean, becauſe I conceive theſe in Saint Matthew to be no counſels, but precepts? I hope, that which I have ſaid will ſufficiently reſcue me from any more of your jealouſies concerning my weighty ſuperſtructures. I have told you my whole heart; you need not uſe any optick glaſs of your own providing to ſee that which is ſo naked, and τετελεσχηλισμένον before you.

For the ſecond page of your ſixth leaf, where you are pleaſed to mention the [All that you deſire] it is too wanton for me to return any thing to it; I have no leiſure to be playſome, or to conſider how poor you are, or how the Critiques have offended you, or what lower heaven they converſe in. Only I hope, I ſhall not now at laſt be condemned for an Antinomian, (becauſe I only think the whole Law of the Jews doth not now oblige us) much leſs to go beyond them, to be a hyper-Antinomian, for no more than theſe two plain aſſertions, that Chriſt hath rid us from the ſad yoke of ceremonies Judaical, and will now accept of ſincere, though it be not unſinning obedience. If this Divinity will not pleaſe you in any meaſure, I ſhall never approve my ſelf to you; but yet hope that you do not think in earneſt that the Antinomians errour is that Chriſt added higher precepts, or by more light encreaſed the obligation to obedience above that which the Law required. I ſuppoſe you meant that name only as a mormo to fright me; not that now, becauſe I am no Socinian, I muſt be an Antinomian preſently.

After the ſetting down the [All that you deſire] and that cloſed as I conceived with a [finally] it ſeems you have two deſires more (and one of them hath many more in it alſo:) and when your deſires do ſo increaſe upon you, I can ſcarce hope to give you ſatisfaction; and therefore ſhall deſire to be excuſed, if I proceed not to them; becauſe ſome parts of thoſe deſires I cannot imagine how I am obliged to anſwer at all, (as to tell you what grace was brought into the world by the Law of Moſes, when I make no doubt to acknowledge that grace came by Chriſt, and as I remember 'twas you (not I) that ſeem'd to ſay the contrary, in the top of the ſecond page of your fifth leaf of this laſt return, [The Spirit was adminiſtred, &c. during the time of legal adminiſtrations] which yet I would not there quarrel with neither, but think them reconcilable by a commodious interpretation) and other parts are utterly impertinent to any part of our point in hand; as that, Of all mankind's being under the ſecond Covenant, Of Chriſts ſatisfying for all, and ſo of pardon and revelation of the Law of faith to all, (which if it were the thing which brought in all the former, will be eaſily ſatisfied, by ſaying, that what was before ſo revealed ſufficiently pro ſtatu, was not yet ſo fully and clearly as now by the coming of Chriſt) and ſo that alſo of the Aaronical Prieſthood, wherein yet I perceive you conclude ſtrangely againſt that Author. For ſure he can very well think (what he doth) that Chriſt can ſatisfy for ſins, notwithſtanding that the exerciſe of his Aaronical Prieſthood conſiſts in his ſacrifice. For though that ſacrifice be a ceremony of his conſecration to his Melchiſedechian

Prieſthood

Prieſthood in one reſpect, yet as a ſacrifice (not in the ſhadow, but) of the ſubſtance, as a ſacrifice not of the bullock or goat, which indeed can make but a typical ſatisfaction, but of the Lamb and eternal Son of God, this ſacrifice may well expiate and ſatisfy, and ſo did indeed. And if you can get the Socinians to affirm this alſo, I ſhall never quarrel with you, I ſhould be glad you could thus make them your converts. But ſure Smalcius's [Non eſt diſſimulandum nos non negare Chriſti mortem ad ejus ſacrificium pertinere] will not come home to it: For they can ſay this frequently, and yet not think that any ſatisfaction for ſin was made by any ſacrifice of Chriſt; nor that that ſacrifice conſiſted in Chriſts death, or was offered by his dying; but expreſs the meaning of thoſe words ſufficiently, that the death of Chriſt did only pertinere to that ſacrifice which was not offered up in his death. Which you ſee is not my ſence, but that the death it ſelf was a ſacrifice, and in it ſatisfaction made for ſin by the ſacrificer. I was afraid a word would not be enough to every wiſe man, and therefore I have been forced to add this alſo.

As for your ἀναπεφαλαίωσις of your conqueſts, you have liberty to uſe it ὡς ἀπόλαυσιν, and triumph as much as you pleaſe. For though the [perhaps fooliſh wanton uſing of Gods name] (which is not always in Oaths) would not reſtrain from fooliſh wanton ſwearing, (and yet methinks à majori it might) yet ſure the [ſure all prophane, &c.] and the expoſition of Chriſts μὴ ὅλως ὀμνύειν, may be allowed to do it; and ſo all had been ſafe, and to that matter altogether as clear, if the [perhaps] had never been blotted out. 2. Chriſts new precepts will do it, (whether they ſignify ſuperaddition of more precept, or more light, which infers encreaſe of obligation) and if they would not, I ſhould not by that be obliged to reſt ſatisfied without them. However, you ſee I do not reſt ſo ſatisfied, but only tell you what you are to underſtand by them, and that juſt agreeably (or in terminis the ſame) to what had been ſaid before in that Catechiſm. 3. For [Chriſts not forbidding ſwearing it ſelf] you will give me leave to have been long ſince of that opinion with you, meaning by it, that ſwearing for Gods glory or the publick good is not forbidden by Chriſt: and therefore ſure the meaning of the anſwer [A total univerſal prohibition of ſwearing it ſelf] was ſomething elſe, viz. of ſwearing at all by the name of any other beſide God, which formerly you might have believed, if you had pleaſed. But I am afraid Sir, you are fallen upon ſome new notion of [the ſin of dogmatizing.] For to the notion that I always have had of it (viz. teaching for doctrines or neceſſary duties the Traditions of men, or impoſing things as Doctrines of God, which are not ſuch) 'tis impoſſible your words can belong. Do not you mean by the ſin of dogmatizing [tranſire in dogmata vel ſententias aliorum?] I ſuppoſe you do, by what follows, of my condeſcending too paſſively to take up both opinions. This may poſſibly be a ſlip in you; I ſhall not upbraid you with it. By what hath now twice or thrice been ſaid, your new argument is ſuperſeded; and I am for all my aſſent to the anſwer in the Catechiſm, verily perſwaded that forſwearing my ſelf for the publick good were a far greater ſin than ſwearing truly in order to that end. But that that Author muſt ſtill be forced to have contradicted himſelf, is very hard, when the clear account of his not having done ſo hath ſo oft been given, and cannot yet get a little audience from you. I would, you would be but ſo well natured as to tell me the meaning of your ſic notus Ulyſſes? and what the deſign is that you could ſo eaſily gheſs at; This plain dealing would deſerve far more thanks (but indeed not ſet me out for ſo dangerous an undermining deſigner) than your ſuſpicious ſpeakings, and then affected reſervation. Speak out the deepeſt of your heart; 'twill be as ſeaſonable, and as juſt, I ſuppoſe, and in all reaſon as well taken as your queſtion about the weighty ſuperſtructure, or your collections in either Sermon.

For your ſtumbling at my twelfth page about reduction, I am ſorry, and ſhall labour to keep you from falling down right: By telling you, 1. That ſins forbidden by the ſame authority, may yet more or leſs clearly be forbidden by that authority, and under the ſecond of thoſe (viz. thoſe that are leſs clearly forbidden) that of reduction may come. 2. That the leſs the clearneſs of forbidding is, the leſs deep is the obligation to them to whom they are (and 'tis not their fault that they are) leſs clear: yet of things forbidden by reduction, ſome are much more clearly forbidden than others; and ſo fornication, than ſome other ſins forbidden by that Commandment: and I ſuppoſe you, to whom it is as clear that fornication is there forbidden as adultery, are as deeply obliged to abſtain from one as other; But then ſtill in other particulars, which are not by the light of the words, nor by any other means made thus equally clear to ſome men, to them they are not equally or ſo deeply obliging.

Then for your [moreover] about Chriſts forbidding ſwearing by any creature, (which if you had vouchſafed to have taken notice of, you might have left out much that went before) you will ſufficiently be anſwered: 1. That ſwearing by any creature will hardly be thought to be forbidden by the Command againſt taking the name of the Lord in vain, (becauſe he that ſwears by the creature doth not directly any ſuch thing) but might perhaps be better reduced to the former Commandment of not worſhipping the creature. 2. I do not believe that any command under the Law of nature, or of the Jews, will be produced ſo clear, or be acknowledged ſo convincing to thoſe that lived before the Law, or to the Jews, againſt ſwearing by ſome creature, that Joſeph which is brought in frequently in the ſtory ſwearing by the life of Pharaoh, without any mark of ſin on that form of ſpeech, ſhall be reſolved to have ſinned againſt conſcience in it. And therefore it may at leaſt be granted, that this was of that nature that it might be matter of Chriſts (ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, μὴ ὅλως] and of the Fathers ἐκ τῶν πονηρῶν τότε, μετὰ δὲ χειρὸν ἔτι πονηρῶν. And therefore, 4. I muſt willingly acknowledge, what the Author doth, that a Chriſtian may in no caſe ſwear by the creature, and have told you that that was the meaning of that Authors phraſe of total univerſal prohibition, anſwerable verbatim to Chriſt μὴ ὅλως ὀμνύειν.

You are next pleaſed to proceed to the ſtrife about the word שָׁוְא, and 1. to change Pagnin or Mercer for Grotius, and tell me that he will aſſure me that שָׁוְא proprie ſignificat vanum. Where he ſo ſaith, you tell me not, nor will I deny it, becauſe I know not what in that place he may mean by proprie: but yet I muſt tell you, that it was a little unlucky, that I ſhould examine but one Author of your citing; and that ſhould prove ſo contrary. For I have lookt on that Commandment in Grotius his Notes on Ex. 20. 7. and there thus you may read, In vanum] i. e. falſo. Non pejerabis. Idem dem n. e. שוא & שקר ut in præcepto nono apparet, collato hoc Exodi capite cum altero Deuteronomii, ubi Græci ponunt utroque loco ματαιαν ϯιυϛὴ. This is as plain a teſtimony as you could have ſuggeſted for my turn; and I hope you will now pardon me, if I abſtain from examining the reſt of your citations, being ſo ſure that the granting them all will not prove that Chriſt ſaid any thing which I may be aſhamed to ſay after him, when he rendred the third Commandment μὴ ταιοπιήσης, and when I acknowledge vain ſwearing by Gods name forbidden by that Commandment, and that שוא as 'tis ſometimes rendred falſum (as by the Targum, Ex. 21. 1. 'tis paraphras'd by דשקר mendacii, and by our Engliſh rendred falſe, and ſo in other places) ſo it is oft rendred vain alſo: which is the utmoſt can be proved by them. Whereas indeed the word, even when it ſignifies vain, hath a peculiar notation of vanity proper to this matter, viz. of a fair empty ſhew, when in words I ſeem to oblige my ſelf, but really do not; which fault is obſervable in ſome kinds of ſwearing, which are therefore clearly forbidden in that Commandment.

As for any ſcorn and indignation expreſt by me about this matter in my laſt, though I wondred to ſee it objected, yet becauſe my memory was frail, I lookt over thoſe papers (which truly I keep for the like purpoſes, to decide ſuch differences, that may be incident) and there can I not find one word that looks that way, or that I can imagine could bear that accuſation.

For the ſence of [did in effect mean it] I ſhall ſatisfie you; It was that I did mean that which is in effect all one with that other phraſe [were forbidden.] This you are ſo kind to let paſs, and with it ſome few ſides more, which I may therefore ſuppoſe had no greater difficulties in them, but am far from taking it ill that you let them paſs, but ſhall aſſure you that you might as well have paſt by that alſo of ὁ διάβολος & ἀντίδικος, which, by ſaying you underſtand, and by forgiving me, I ſuppoſe you think meant by me againſt your ſelf, to faſten ſome ſtrange ill character upon you. This I ſuppoſe you did by occaſion of the meaning of thoſe two words, which are not only titles of the Devil, but have a ſignificancy proper to them; the one to expreſs a calumniator, the other a plaintiff or adverſary ὁ δίκη. The former (I confeſs) of theſe, you might with ſome reaſon think I might apply to you, and perſwade your ſelf that I cannot but believe you to have been guilty of calumniating me, i. e. accuſing me falſely. But truly Sir, whatſoever I might think in that matter, I never meant to ſay any ſuch thing to you, nor to manage a diſcourſe (deſigned to a better end) with any paſſion or aſperity, though it were in ſaying of truth only. And therefore let me aſſure you, I was far from meaning or ſaying any ſuch thing of you; and was ſo little guilty in my own conſcience, that when I found it in your paper, I was a little troubled, till I had ſomewhat ſatisfied my ſelf with conſidering that you might poſſibly be miſtaken, and then by looking on the place in my Papers where I find the paſſage moſt clear from looking towards you. The truth is, I was a ſpeaking of the hurt that might come by teaching that Chriſt improv'd not the Law, and told you that I could give you an experimental account of it (Truly that refer'd to a particular perſon that was then in my mind, and is now in my memory, ready to be named to you, if you pleaſe) in one that by urging that doctrine, and ſo bringing down Chriſt to the perfect law of Moſes, became an advocate for a vile unchriſtian ſin. This I made no queſtion was a ſtratagem of the Devils, accuſing to him that Doctrine of Chriſts ſuperadditions for a falſe and dangerous Doctrine, and to that end calumniating all Authors for Socinians, &c. that were for that Doctrine, and by that means fitting him to the juſtifying of that his vile ſin, which otherwiſe he had not probably been guilty of. This is in more words the plain of what I then ſaid in thoſe few words, not of Rhetorick, but of plain ſence, and might (if you would) have been excuſed from the addition and length of this paraphraſe.

You lead me on now to the reviewing of what was ſaid on occaſion of the third report.

In that, I ſee, I have not yet the luck to pleaſe you neither, but have offended you more by my excuſe than I had done by the firſt crime; thus unskilful am I in converſation with men of your temper. This is, it ſeems, an errour in me; I am ſure, an infelicity. Well, I ſhall again endeavour to ſatisfie you in the reaſonableneſs of what I deſigned, in not diſputing with them that thought not all inclinations to evil unconſented to, to be ſins; but only affirming that they were, and rather bringing them to godly ſorrow upon their own principles, than falling to diſputation about it. The reaſon was, and ſtill is, becauſe I fore-ſaw every godly man (I mean, thoſe of whoſe piety I have no reaſon to doubt, and that in other things are very Orthodox, I am confident, truly humbled for their evil inclinations conſented to) was not of your opinion in this matter. 2. Becauſe it is a very nice point, which perhaps for want of clear ſtating may be miſapprehended between men of diſtant perſwaſions. I will ſet you a brief ſtate of it, and leave it to your judgment, whether I ſpeak reaſon or no. There is in a man a double faculty, to which this inclination may poſſibly be applyed, either the ſenſitive appetite common to men with beaſts, or the humane will. The ſenſitive faculty naturally inclines to the pleaſurable object, viz. to that which is agreeable to the fleſh; that this inclination unconſented to by the man, uncheriſhed, unliked, ſhould be a ſin, would be hard to affirm, though you mean by it but original ſin; becauſe original ſin is a conſequent of Adams fall, and this was certainly in our firſt Parents in the time and ſtate of innocence before the fall; as when the apple was ſo fair to the eye, ſweet to the taſte, &c. 'tis clear, the eye and taſte were then inclined to it; and nothing but the command of God to the contrary could quell that inclination. Suppoſe then, they had not eaten after this inclination of the carnal appetite to that forbidden fruit, had that inclination in that appetite only been a ſin in them? 'Tis very probable it had not; the conſent, or ſomewhat elſe, of the will, being neceſſarily required to make them thus guilty, and I now ſpeak abſtracting from any thing of that. Beſides this, there is another inclination, viz. of the will, (not a full conſent of the will (or a mixt) to the carnal propoſal, but) a bending of the will rather that way than the other; not a weighing down of the ballance to that ſide, but an ἑτεροζυγία (as that word is contrary to an ἰσοζυγία, from the word ζυγὸς, ϛαθμὸς (a pendulouſneſs betwixt the good and the evil, but rather bending toward the evil. This is it that I conceived to be an averſion from God; not fully, but ſo far as that it did rather bend to the carnal object; and this was it that I called a ſin: though being but the inclination of our corrupt nature, and not conſented to, I could not call it an actual ſin. Now the word proneneſs, or inclination to evil, being thus an equivocal phraſe, I thought not fit to be ſevere or importunate upon them who perhaps did not know how to diſtinguiſh it, nor again to trouble a Catechiſm with too much nice diſcourſe; but more groſly to bind the Scholar to humble himſelf for all ſins, diſtinctly for his evil inclinations, (to that purpoſe affirming plainly that they were ſins) or if he would be apt to diſpute, which might hinder his being humbled, (I mean, diſpute upon ſuch a nicety as was mentioned) yet ſtill to call for the concluſion, humiliation, upon his own principles, if he would not allow it upon mine. This I conceive, will clear that Author from any crime in his doubtful expreſſions, or connivence. For 1. the words are clear, that inclinations to evil are ſins; and (if he will be taught) that will inſtruct him in true principles; if he will not, yet will not the [if] following be a means to harden him in impenitence. Nor indeed can I conſent to you, that no man can conceive true godly ſorrow for his actual ſins, who doth deny the fountain of all his ſins to be a ſin, if you mean by that fountain, the natural inclination: For I make no queſtion but he that ſees, and fully diſcerns all his actual ſins, and looks upon them all as progenies of his will, and ſo his [ἐμὸν ἔγκλημα, ἐμὸν ἔγκλημα, ἐμὸν μέγιστον ἔγκλημα] that ſees nothing of nature, or neceſſity, or fault of others in it, but all his own villany, may have as true godly ſorrow for his actual ſins, as he would have if he were ſenſible of that other alſo. I ſay not, that he would have as much true godly ſorrow abſolutely, or for all ſins; (for ſuppoſing, as now I do, that he hath not ſorrow for thoſe inclinations as for ſins, you muſt not conceive that I ſay he hath it, ſave only as for infelicities) but I or he may have as true godly ſorrow for actual ſins, as the other would be likely to have for actual ſins. To which purpoſe I ſhall farther venture this one example and proof to you; Our firſt parents certainly might conceive true godly ſorrow for their firſt ſin, which was in them actual, yet muſt needs deny the fountain of that, and (conſequent to that) of all their ſins (their own free-will) to have been a ſin or ſinful, unleſs they will accuſe their Creator, which will be no proper companion or effect of godly ſorrow, and I ſuppoſe will not by you be expected from them. And ſo I had more reaſon for my expreſſions than perhaps you thought of. And ſo much for your two firſt objections in that point.

3. For your [idem per idem] which you impute to me, you are much miſtaken. For, ſuppoſing ſome inclinations to evil to be not cheriſhed, the thing that I concluded is, 1. That in that caſe 'tis victory, not ſin; And 2. that in that caſe, I hope you will not ſay, it is a ſin cheriſht or conſented to: which, if you mark, was paſſing an opinion how you muſt be fain to conclude (and that, a thing quite contrary to your former concluding) and not making any ſuch concluſion for my ſelf. You were at great leiſure when you obſerved that illogical probation.

5. For that [which it ſeems, I ſuppoſed and proved not] I muſt now give you an account. And it was, that I ſeemed to imply that there muſt needs be ſome conſent given to actual ſin. I confeſs I then proved it not, but promiſed to give you an account of it when I had your grounds of ſcruples; you have now mentioned them to me.

1. That original ſin is truly and properly a ſin in them that are not of age to conſent to it. 2. That corruption is ſo ſtrong in us that it doth many times break forth without our conſent. To the firſt I ſhall but need remember you, that 'twas every actual ſin to which I implied that conſent neceſſary, and I hope you are not ready to prove that original ſin in children (as you call it) is truly and properly actual ſin; and for the ſecond [the breaking forth of corruption in adultis] that doth (if again it be an actual ſin) certainly ſuppoſe ſome kind of conſent obtained, whether by ſuddden ſurreption, paſſion, &c. or by ſomething ſometimes that is worſe than one act of conſent, viz. by the cuſtome of ſin, and glibneſs toward it, contracted by many precedaneous acts of conſent to it, or the like. Beſides, there are two kinds of ſin, omiſſions as well as commiſſions, and there is a criminous conſent required to either of them; and he that is bound to uſe all diligence to ſubdue his corruptions, at leaſt to repreſs them; if he do not ſo, this indiligence of his hath ſome of his conſent: and that is a prime ingredient in the breaking forth of corruptions; which conſequently do not break forth without all conſent. And for me now to undertake the proof of that, that the Schoolmen upon Thomas have ſo fully proved, that every thing is ſo far ſinful or criminous (meaning ſtill actual ſin) as it is voluntary, the yielding of the will to the ſenſitive appetite being neceſſary to the conception of luſt, and that again to the bringing forth ſin, I ſhall venture the worſt of your cenſure, that I do not now proceed to demonſtrate more largely. For indeed actual ſin being a tranſgreſſion of the Law, will hardly belong to that faculty, or appetite, which is not capable of receiving the Law: and ſuch is that appetite that hath nothing of the conſent of the will in it.

For the complement you charge me with in the fifth, you had anſwer in mine to your firſt and ſecond of this ſubject.

[For my mentioning of Socinians] I confeſs I have been guilty of it in theſe Papers, and I think you know who was the cauſe of it; and therefore what want of wiſdom, or degree of folly ſoever that is, you ſhould not be the Author of it in me, and the puniſher alſo. As for any parallel Doctrines you can find between me and them, any farther than is agreeable to ſound doctrine, and analogy of Faith, I am not ſo humble, or ſo guilty, as to deprecate your threats. As for parallels between our expreſſions, 'tis poſſible you may do ſomewhat; and ſo perhaps with ſome ſtudy I could do the like between the Scripture and the Talmud: and to this I would not provoke you (though, I profeſs I know not yet of any one ſuch) becauſe it ſeems in your opinion [calling the Trinity a ſpeculative myſtery] was one of that kind, (and I doubt not but at the ſame rate there are many more to be met with) and then the provoking you might let open another ſluce or treaſure of your Animadverſions, wherein the ſins of your brethren are laid up, and among them one bundle of theſe parallels; and I tell you truly, I ſhall take little joy in ſpending ſo many ſheets more in proving thoſe (whatſoever you ſhall produce under that title) to be unfit parallels. Yet by the way, it is not ſo well, that you will do any thing upon a provocation, which you would not do otherwiſe: but I confeſs this ſets no ſuch character upon you, that I ſhould be willing to provoke you.

In

In your ſeventh, I confeſs to believe, that you meant not the Common-prayer-book by the deſigned Liturgy, (and cannot imagine why you ſhould think I did believe you meant it.) And therefore I conceive I inferr'd regularly, that I had nothing to do with that deſign, becauſe I deſired the continuing of the Common-prayer-book, and particularly thoſe parts of it which were moſt incompatible with that deſign; ſuch were the Doxologies, Creeds, Litany, &c. which no Arian or Socinian would join in. And I wonder you ſhould thus miſtake ſo plain an arguing.

In the eighth, where you take care that I magnifie not the View of the Directory; you might have ſpared your pains, for I can cite a Book for a matter of fact (and that is all that I do in that place, by referring you to thoſe places in it, my conſent to which teſtifies my diſlike of the deſign you ſpeak of) without any kind of magnifying it. But for the matter ſo fit for my humiliation, which you obſerve in that Author, [The uſing the ſuffrage of the Jews, Heathens, and Mahometans] that ſure will not much tend to your purpoſe, not only becauſe thoſe very particulars you pitch on are tranſcribed (and ſo profeſt to be) out of a Book of a Learned member of the Houſe of Commons and your Aſſembly, viz. Mr. Jo. Selden, but alſo for theſe two conſiderable reaſons more; Firſt, becauſe the ſuffrage of the Jews (from whence the other two are affirmed to have proceeded) doth carry ſome divine characters upon it, that whole Church and State having peculiar relation to the Theocraty, and ſo Gods judgment of the lawfulneſs implyed in their practice. And ſecondly, becauſe the Liturgy of the Jews was by the Apoſtles and Chriſt himſelf made uſe of, and out of it with ſome increaſes and alterations the Chriſtian Liturgies fram'd in the firſt age of the Church. If I thought it might be acceptable to you, I would ſerve you here alſo, and give you ſome obſervations to this purpoſe (very perfectly and eaſily reconcileable with what hath been formerly ſaid, but yet) which are not in the View of the Directory, nor yet mentioned in the haſte of my former Papers.

Du Pleſſ. de Miſſ. l. 1. c. 3. 'Tis the obſervation of a noble and a learned French Proteſtant, that the Apoſtles were ſent, not to deſtroy but eſtabliſh that pure worſhip or ſervice of God which was in the Synagogues of the Jews, which they therefore retained (after Chriſts example) as far as did not contradict the œconomy or diſpenſation of things under Chriſt: and therefore though they changed the Sacrifices, and the Sabbath, (Chriſt being the ſubſtance adumbrated by one, and the Lords day being appointed to take the place of the other) yet the ſervice it ſelf in other particulars they did continue. The grounds of this obſervation you have in the Scripture: Chriſt himſelf goes into their ſynagogues, and the Apoſtles ordinarily at the hours of Prayers; and certainly joined with them in their ſervice, as far as agreed with their preſent ſtate. And by this means ſome ſympathy hath been obſervable between the Jewiſh and Chriſtian ſervices. This is clear by the Jewiſh forms; for ſome of which, and for the rites of uſing them, we are beholding to a moſt excellent man (a Proteſtant alſo P. Fagius, and to ſome others ſince, who have made uſe of his collections. The firſt part of their ſervice was a confeſſion of the ſins of their people, (which was always ſolemnly uſed in their ſacrifices) a rule for which we have in the ſacred Writers, and in the Jewiſh Books the very verba concepta, the ſet conſtant forms mentioned by that Worthy on the Targum, Lev. 16. This they called confeſſio הדברים or verbalis; After that followed ſome Pſalms of David, &c. which were ſung the whole Pſalms together, as alſo ſome תודות hymns or givings of thanks, which, ſay the Jews, were inſtituted by Eſdras, who after the Babyloniſh captivity reſtored the ſervice of God. After that they had their leſſons out of the Law, which were divided into 54 Sedarim, or Paraſcoth, i. e. Sections, as alſo the leſſons of the Prophets diſtributed into as many haphtaroth or Aperturæ, or, as ſome render it, Dimiſſions, ſo divided that there may be one for every Sabbath in an intercalary year. Then again was the whole action concluded with prayer, viz. a general prayer for the neceſſities of the Church and State, publick and private, and in that many particulars. After theſe prayers the Archiſynagogus bleſſed the people, and diſmiſs'd them. Save only that on any great feſtival ſolemnity, the Paſsover, &c. there followed Benedictions particular to the occaſion, which on the Paſsover were pronounced by the mouth of the maſter of the family; a form of which, Miſerere Domine, &c. we have in P. Fagius on the Targ. Deut. 8.

Some veſtigia of this practice of theirs, in each part, we have in the New Teſtament; Of their confeſſion (ſaith that noble learned man) Mat. 3 6. Mar. 1. 5. Acts 13. 38. Of their leſſons Acts 15. 21. Acts 13. 14. Luke 4. 18. Of their pſalmodies and hymns, Epheſ. 5. Col. 3. where 'tis obſervable that the three words of Greek uſed by the Apoſtle are the very ſame which are uſed by the Septuagint to render the three Hebrew words uſed in the Old Teſtament, and ſo refer particularly to the practice of the Jews; Of their prayer for neceſſities (ſaith he) in the Lords prayer Mat. 6. which, with him, ſome other very learned men conceive to have had ſpecial reference to the formulæ ſolennes then among the Jews; Of their prayer for the Common-wealth, and all that were in place of power over them, 1 Tim. 2. 1. which words there in St. Paul ('twas St. Auguſtines affirmation) were nominatim intelligenda de ſolennibus Eccleſiaſtici officii precibus, &c.

* Primi Chriſtiani huic officio ſe accomodarunt. Morn. de miſſ. l. 1. c. 4. 4. For the practice of the firſt * Chriſtians, how agreeable 'twas to this practice of the Jews, will be eaſily diſcerned. St. Baſil in the deſcription of a Clergy-man officiating, ad Cler. Cæſar. Ep. 63. They go, ſaith he, to the houſe of prayer, and after the confeſſion, they prepare for the ψαλμῳδία, ſinging of Pſalms, (ſpeaking of the firſt Apoſtolical times; for now, ſaith he, we ſing the Pſalms in parts, or by turns: it ſeems they had not done ſo before, but all together) and by the intermixing of prayers, and interchange or variety of Pſalms, and hymns, they overcome or ſpend a great part of the night (ſpeaking of the antelucani conventus) and aſſoon as the day breaks, they offer to God the Pſalm of confeſſion, and ſo diſmiſs the Aſſembly. Beſides the leſſons out of the Old Teſtament, the Chriſtians (you will believe) added alſo others out of the new; and (ſaith Morney) ejus particulam aliquam Antiſtes interpretari ſolitus.

After Sermon they proceeded to the celebration of the Euchariſt (parallel to their cuſtoms on the great Feſtivities of the Paſsover, &c.) In it, 1. the words of the inſtitution were recited, with a thankſgiving or bleſſing, (as in Juſtine Martyr 'tis deſcribed) then the bread and wine (before received ceived by the offertory of the people) was diſtributed to the people; after which a Pſalm was ſung, &c. Before the Sacrament, ſaith St. Ambroſe, was the prayer for Kings, Et hæc regula Eccleſiaſtica tradita à magiſtro gentilium, ſaith he, de Sacra. lib. 4. cap. 4. and of the uſe of that alſo Tertul. is expreſs, Apol. c. 39. After the Lords Supper the τειοάγιον or Doxology was taken up in imitation of Chriſt, who after Supper ſung an hymn with his Diſciples, not diſdaining to make uſe of the ancient Jewiſh cuſtom. One teſtimony more I ſhall only add out of St. Cyprian de Orat. Dom. Ser. 8. Publica nobis eſt & communis oratio, &c. [Publick common Prayer] pro toto populo oramus, for all the people, (as among the Jews for all Iſrael; and we for the whole Church, eſpecially for Kings.) And that men may mind nothing but that their preſent imployment, Ideo ſacerdos præfatione parat fratrum mentes, dicendo, Surſum corda, ut dum reſpondet plebs, Habemus ad Dominum, moneatur nil ſe niſi Dominum cogitare debere. I ſhall trouble you no longer than to deſire that the Liturgy lately uſed in this Church may be compared with the ſeverals here mentioned, from the Jews firſt; and after, the Apoſtolical Chriſtians: and as you will find the general form exactly continued in Confeſſion, Pſalms, Leſſons, Hymns, Prayers for all the Church, eſpecially for Kings, &c. (and no reaſon to doubt but that ſometimes the very words were continued alſo; aſſuredly ſet Forms then, as now, as appears by the Surſum corda, and Habemus ad Dominum; Lift up your hearts, We lift them up unto the Lord) So it was not without reaſon that the Author of the View thought fit to draw one argument of many from the practice of the Jews; to which the other two of the Mahometans and Heathens come in ex naturali ſequelâ, but as rivulets and derivations from that fountain.

But then beſides theſe ſuffrages, you know there are in that View many other arguments produced, which may chance to be more concluding to you. And though a mans arguments (as our own prayers) may ſerve the turn, yet the ſuffrages of others will do no hurt alſo. If the point in queſtion, which you ſay you have ſhewed me, be that which in this Paper you formerly mentioned, you may in my anſwer to that ſatisfie your ſelf that you were not very lucky in ſhewing. Before I part with this Section, let me beſeech you to tell me, whether 'twere only a fault in your memory, that when you were pleaſed to tell me what you ſaid at Carfax againſt the Author of the Catechiſm, you did not pleaſe to name this particular of the Mahometans, &c. eſpecially when I am told that you cited it as a work of that Authors who made the Catechiſm, and ſpake pretty tragically about that ſubject.

9. For your contempt of my mention of Doxologies and Creeds, it is not ſo very ſeaſonable, becauſe being mentioned only in order to prove that I was none of the deſigners of the new complying Liturgy, you cannot but ſay that they were pertinent to that purpoſe. And for your proof, That Doxologies and Creeds may be left out, becauſe the Directory takes in the whole Scripture for a Liturgy, and there are Doxologies and Creeds enough in the holy Scripture] it is a kind of arguing that I confeſs I underſtand not; for ſure for all that, (or granting the Scripture to contain, as you ſay truly, all neceſſaries to ſalvation) it will ſtill remain true, that ſerving of God and worſhipping him by praiſes, confeſſions, and profeſſions of our Faith, may be allowed to be duties of ſuch a value, that if they do not deſerve to be brought in, yet 'tis not neceſſary they ſhould utterly be caſt out from the ſervice of God. For your Confeſſion of Faith which you ſay ſhall be publiſhed by your Aſſemblers, if that be to be uſed in the ſervice of God, then muſt there be ſome new direction for it put into the Directory, and then perhaps the Creeds of the Ancient Church might have continued there as well. If it be only for other uſes, you know it belongs not to the point in hand. And which way ſoever, you know it concludes not againſt any thing that I was about to infer from Creeds, &c.

10. For the queſtion you there put, you do it I ſuppoſe but ſportingly. For if you will needs have a queſtion, the only one that can be pertinent to the matter there in hand (or which will be betwixt things of any like nature) is that which is there ſet, betwixt the uſing the Common-prayer-book in each part of it, and the putting it wholly (or in thoſe ſo many mentioned parts of it) out of the Church: and then ſure the ſo many obſtacles to Socinian errours being retained in one, and turn'd out in the other, the vote will be quickly reſolved on. As for your deſired parallel, the Cat. or the Directory, I ſuppoſe you do not expect I ſhould ſpeak to that, yet that which countenances no one Socinian errour, and I think either profeſſly, or ὐ παρέργῳ diſcountenances every Socinian errour, will be able to compare (in that matter of countenancing them) with any other Writer in the world. For though it were granted, that it doth not ſo much diſcountenance them as other Books that are written particularly againſt them, yet not countenancing them at all, it doth as much not countenance them, as any other thing can be imagined to do. But

Now 'tis a little wearifome to me to ſee this 10. Sect. again breaking aſunder into queſtions, which you might ſo very well have ſpared. For ſure Sir, 1. I no where had ſaid in theſe Papers, That the Direct. had commanded all to ſit at the Sacrament; I had only ſpoken of the Proteſtants in Poland forbidding ſitting, becauſe it complied with the Arians. 2. I had alſo no need to ſay, That all familiarity inferr'd an equality; 'tis enough to me, that humility and diſtance, kneeling, &c. is more like to be an argument of inequality, and an expreſſion of it. 3. That Socinians think themſelves equal with Chriſt, &c.] I have no need to affirm, having only urged a matter of fact, which ſtands good without it, becauſe that familiarity in ſitting at the Sacrament will be more agreeable to their notion of Chriſt as a mere creature, than kneeling will be; and that is all was to be proved from it, and not that the Socinians equal themſelves with Chriſt. As for my ſaying, That Chriſt did not bleſs us till after his reſurrection, (which perhaps you repeat out of the way, to ſet ſome ill mark upon it) 1. I pray remember that they are the plain words of Scripture, having raiſed his Son Jeſus, he ſent him to bleſs us, &c. and I hope 'twill be no huge fault to ſay what Socinus doth, when if he do ſay it, he ſaith the ſame with Scripture. 2. That you may miſtake the meaning of that phraſe; and think, as ſome do, that for Chriſt then to begin to bleſs, is for him then to begin to have divine power: but ſure you know that is not my meaning; but that Chriſt may be conſidered in reſpect of his natures, or of his offices, i. e. in reſpect of the οἰκονομία or διοίκησις, as the Fathers uſe it; and that 'tis only in that latter reſpect that all power is then ſaid to be given unto him, and ſo this of bleſſing, and at laſt to be reſigned up to the Father: which will not at all hinder the renouncing of all Socinian nian or Arian hereſies in the buſineſs of Chriſts eternal Divinity, or of the Trinity. By this you ſee what an ill parallel you had fetcht out of Smalcius, and I muſt ſuppoſe moſt of your others are ſuch.

For your argument offered me for the Liturgy, I am not merry enough to receive, or reward you for it, (and you know, my buſineſs in hand is not to aſſert the Liturgy; that is ἐτέρου σκέλους; but the demonſtrating that I was none of the men for the new deſigned Liturgy) only let me tell you, that the eaſineſs and pleaſantneſs of the Liturgy was not thought to conſiſt in the eaſineſs of the task for the Miniſter, (for I do not perceive that the Directory-way, as 'tis exerciſed, hath any whit leſs of that eaſe in it) but in reſpect of the Auditors, who can go on in their duty with more eaſe and pleaſure: and ſure duty is not naturally ſo acceptable to all men, that there is any neceſſity of making it more tedious, toylſome, (eſpecially if it be added, as you ſay it is) and leſs profitable, than was neceſſary. And therefore you may perceive for all your ſcoffs, that Orators arguments (if the Author of that View were guilty of that faculty) even thoſe that you pick out for the very worſt, may have ſomewhat beſide Rhetorick in them. I am ſure this which you mention, is more proper and effectual to infer the concluſion, than the fetching that argument out of that Book, to expoſe and ſhew it openly, was to the queſtion in hand, whether I was in the deſign for the new complying Liturgy. But I have learnt to paſs by all ſuch Sarcaſms and impertinences, I hope, with ſome tolerable patience.

Now then you ſay you haſten to my diſcourſe of Godly ſorrow, I beſeech God to give each of us our part of it.

In that, you begin with a challenge to me, to prove that which you know was proved already, if explaining a thing, and laying it before you in ſuch a manner that you do not (I conceive, cannot) deny any part of it, may be called the proving of it. Your ſecond is but a repetition of what was ſaid by me; yet hath ſome art in it, depriving it of the proof that was brought for it, that it might look the more naked, and deſpicable. Your third was diſcreetly order'd to ſcoff at what was ſaid, for a dictate and admirable, (which was neither, but a plain evident truth, that the impurity of our humane condition may be matter of godly ſorrow to any, though not meerly quà an infelicity) and you ask again whether it be godly ſorrow to grieve for an infelicity? I ſay again, ſuch the infelicity may be (particularly that now ſpoken of) that it may be matter of Godly ſorrow, or κατὰ τι διὸ (and be otherwiſe deſcribed in a gracious ſtile of loving the appearance of Chriſt, which may rid us of our impurities) and yet not be this quà ſic, meerly as an infelicity; which was all that was needful there to be inferr'd.

In your fourth you mention your opinion, that all pollution of the ſoul of man hath been by ſin only. But ſure Sir, this doth not prove every pollution to be a ſin; but, as your words import, an effect or conſequent of ſin.

Next, you pronounce that I am much miſtaken: and your proof of it is petitio principii, a begging, i. e. not proving, yet aſſuming the thing before in queſtion (and prov'd on the other ſide by me, both before and now in the laſt Sect.) viz. That no man grieves for a ſin after a godly manner, but he that grieves for it as a ſin againſt God. When you know, that by that one inſtance of the impurity of our nature mourned for by him that took it not for a ſin, but only a thing that rendred him 1. imperfect; then 2. prone to ſin; and 3. leſs amiable in Gods ſight, &c. (with an addition of wiſhing and praying to be diſſolved, and be with Chriſt as far better) the contrary was undeniably inferr'd; and no anſwer offered by you to theſe premiſſes. For the undeniable grounds of repentance, I ſuppoſe they are laid in that Catechiſm both by requiring it for all ſin, and by naming inclinations to evil in the front of ſins, without [ifs] or [ands] or any dubious expreſſions. But yet after all your ſeverity in giving your advice for the deſigning of a Catechiſm, I conceive your inference, in the name of the Acute wretch, was far from any acuteneſs: for ſure whatever were reſolved about inclinations being no ſins when unconſented to, 'twould never follow for your Client, Ergo, the like acts, to which he is naturally inclined, are not evil. For ſure Sir, the acts may be allow'd ſins (and not be excuſed by our being naturally inclined to them) whatever were conceived of the inclinations. The concluſion from your premiſſes could only be this, Ergo this and that act, being natural alſo, are not evil. And if your wretch ſhould conclude ſo, you would ſoon be able to inform him that his acts are not natural, and therefore may be allow'd to be evil though he be naturally inclined to them, becauſe it is very evil not to reſiſt and deny thoſe inclinations.

You then go off in triumph with a [You know what I could adde.] Truly Sir, I profeſs I do not: and yet whatever 'tis, if it be like this you have allow'd me, I ſhould conſider it perhaps in obedience to you, but never be much wrought on by it. Yet ſhall I excuſe this for the good news it brings with it, being a tranſition to the fourth report, another ſtage toward the end of my very wearifome journey.

In that, you have begun with many little particulars which want of truth; particularly, that I make a ſecond acknowledgment that I was miſ-informed, when I only profeſs that by your diſcourſe I cannot diſcern whether I was in this miſ-informed or no. It ſeems you are willing to receive acknowledgments of miſtakes: you would otherwiſe think it more pertinent to tell me whether in either Aſſembly you inſiſted on that particular or no. For an anſwer to your quære's, you ſure perceive (though you complain for want of it) that I gave you that whole ſence of my ſoul in that point, not only by that means to be ſure to tell you my opinion of your then preſent quære's, but alſo of all others of that ſubject that 'twere poſſible for you to ask. And by this time I conceive you do diſcern that I am neither very forward to make quære's to divert, &c. nor to deny anſwer to them, when they are made.

About the firſt propoſition you mention, though you ſtand not to ask [why acceptation is put for pardon?] 'Twere no great matter if I ſaid 'twere de induſtriâ, on this head, becauſe God firſt accepts the penitent perſon in Chriſt, and then after (in order of nature, though not of time) he pardons his ſins: though indeed 'tis true again, that the ſins are pardoned in order of nature before the acceptation of the actions; I mean, of all the actions of the ſubſequent life. But then there is a double acceptation, acceptation, of the perſon firſt, and then of the actions; of Abel firſt (as the Fathers obſerve) and then of his offerings. Which yet I hope, will not paſs with you for the double juſtification; but this ex abundanti alſo.

But to your main queſtion (for I muſt now wholly deal in the old trade of anſwering queſtions: which I have been told is the far eaſieſt way for him that wants other proviſion, and yet would fain not make an end of diſputing) Why I ſpeak of remiſſion and acceptation, and leave out imputation? Sure 'tis, partly becauſe acceptation of the perſon, and ſo pardon alſo, includes imputation of Chriſts righteouſneſs, as the formal cauſe of our juſtification; God accepting of Chriſts λυτρὸν or payment (which is imputation of his ſufferings by way of ἀντίψυχα for us) and then accepting our perſons, and pardoning our ſins; partly, becauſe one kind of imputation is after our pardon of ſin in order of nature, a diſtinct thing from it, and ſo needed not to be there ſpoken of, as belonging rather to our ſanctification, for the completing or filling up the imperfections of that; I mean now the imputation of Chriſts perfect obedience to that penitent believer whoſe ſins are pardoned by the ſufferings of Chriſt: for to ſuch a one Chriſts perfect obeying the Law may ſo far be imputed as to give a gloſs or tincture to his ſtill imperfect obediences, ſo far as that they ſhall be accepted by God; Which imputation therefore may be antecedent to, and have to do with that acceptation of actions, but yet in order of nature be after the acceptation of perſons, and forgiveneſs of ſins. But the truth is, I then meant to give you plain groſſer propoſitions to prevent miſtakes and diſputes, and not to deſcend to ſuch nicer diſtinctions as theſe.

But truly you were very wary, when you laid ſuch an obſervation on the [This] in the ſecond propoſition, which ſure was an innocent particle of reference looking back to the Antecedent [juſtification] in the former propoſition, and meaning it in the very ſame latitude that there it had been uſed, for the entire, not partial (or firſt, or one part of) juſtification. To let this paſs, when you had taken notice of it, was not an act of charity, but juſtice in you, yet that which would have been very welcome to me many times. For juſt from as true or ſolid ground as this, have many of your other exceptions ſprang up, and have not ſo candidly been laid down by you.

To your next queſtions, which you profeſs to ask, that miſtakes may be prevented, upon that account, I profeſs to anſwer moſt chearfully; for I ſee how wearisome a thing it is to have been miſtaken.

To your firſt quære [Why the grace of God in juſtifying, &c. doth not extend to every man for whom Chriſt hath ſatisfied?] I anſwer clearly, becauſe Chriſts ſatisfaction is not abſolutely for all, or that they may be pardoned whatever they do, how infidel or impenitent ſoever they continue; but conditionally for all, and thereupon that grace of juſtification extends to none but thoſe who perform the Condition.

For your ſecond 'tis very nice (and might ſure have been ſpared in this buſineſs) That becauſe God hath been affirmed by me to require regeneration as a condition to juſtification, therefore I muſt tell you what condition God requires unregenerate perſons to perform, that they may attain unto regeneration. To queſtion thus were infinite, and to this matter of juſtification utterly unneceſſary. But yet I ſhall not fail you in any thing; Ile ſatisfy you in that alſo. God requires in the unregenerate man τὸ ὑπήκοον ἢ ὑπακοῆς, as the Ancients expreſs it, a readineſs to obey his call; not to reſiſt, but receive his grace, when he beſtows it on him; and having received it, what degree ſoever it be, to cheriſh, and make uſe of it; and this by his grace, God enables him to do.

As for your demand of me, by way of retribution, that I muſt grant that God doth juſtify the ungodly, i. e. the man that is guilty of many ſins, I make no queſtion of that, if he be a penitent, and ſo may he be, and yet be called ἀσεβὴς ſtill, in the ſence that I conceive belongs to that word, Rom. 4. 5. that is, ὁ μὴ ἐργάζων; not one that continues impenitent in ſin, but one that neither hath nor doth perform exact, perfect, legal obedience: which is very reconcileable, if not the ſame, with what you confeſs, [That God never juſtifies an impenitent infidel in ſenſu compoſito, i. e. never any that is then infidel or remains impenitent.

To your third I anſwer, that there is ſuch a condition, which doth ſo qualify the ſubject, that I can ſay, by it, and only by it I am juſtified, i. e. by it only as a condition, not including any cauſality in it. And if you will know, what that condition is, you have been oft told already, and I now tell you, Faith in the notion wherein it ſignifies a receiving the whole Chriſt, and contains in it a reſolution of obeying Chriſts Commands, as well as of depending on him for mercy. And on ſuppoſition, or condition that you grant that, and ſo ſpeak of faith as ἐνεργουμένη δι' ἀγάπης. and τελειμένη δι' ἔργων, I will ſpeak with you in the dialect of the firſt ſort of the men you mention, and ſay that faith is required to receive the object of juſtification, Chriſt, &c. but withal adde, that it is required as a condition too, to diſpoſe or qualify the ſubject, and that without this condition, no man living ſhall be juſtified. Which being premiſed, it ſhall not yet follow from thence that by this he ſhall be, as you ſay, conſtituted righteous, if by [conſtituted by] you attribute any cauſality to this qualification, or any thing but that of being a condition by which he is juſtified, i. e. is not juſtified without it. And ſo this is as plain as I can deviſe too; and me thinks there ſhould be no miſtake. For in the ſence wherein I have now expreſt my ſelf, I do again conſent to your concluſion, that God doth by his free and effectual grace work in the hearts of his elect to receive Chriſt, (that is, the Whole Chriſt) that they may be juſtified, not by their own obedience, or vow of obedience (as by a cauſe) but by obedience of Chriſt alone freely imputed by God, and reſted on by faith only: It being one act of that faith by which the juſt do live, to have affiance, or reſt on Chriſt.

In your [moreover] it may alſo be true, that there may be ſome difference between diſpoſing the ſubject to ſalvation and to juſtification: as the cordial habit of faith, and ſincere vow, may diſpoſe to juſtification; and, in caſe of living to occaſions and opportunities, the acts of faith and actual performances will be required; yet ſo that he that is diſpoſed for juſtification, if he ſhould then preſently dye, were diſpoſed to ſalvation alſo. Which notwithſtanding I ſhall alſo add with you, 1. That there is faith required, to receive the object, Chriſt, Jehova our righteouſneſs; and grace prerequired, to enable thus to believe; and obedience to, or making uſe of that grace (the ἴσχυν χάριτος, Heb. 12. 28.) a condition required in us, to that end that grace may have its perfect work on us, And 2. that all the acts and habits of grace, which are in the beſt men concurring together, are not ſufficient to juſtifie a man before God. And therefore faith concurring ſo, with ſuch a vow, or with faithful actions, cannot juſtifie us. This I write out of your Paper, as faſt as I can drive, (and, by the way, you ſee ſome difference between our tempers; I conſent to as much of yours as poſſibly I can, and labour to take as few exceptions; you on the contrary have another method in reading them that you are not kind to) and conſent to it moſt fully at firſt ſight, and never remember to have doubted of it, ſince I conſidered Divinity. But for your addition, [Of faiths juſtifying relatively] you muſt give me leave not to take that into my form of Doctrine (being not very intelligible) but to uſe my own expreſſions, as conceiving them more perſpicuous, and commodious to the notions I have of this matter, viz. Thus, that Chriſt only juſtifies, Faith receives Chriſt, but yet ſtill by no way of cauſality juſtifies; is cauſal indeed in receiving Chriſt, but only the condition in juſtifying; becauſe, though receiving is an act of ours, and in us, yet juſtification is an act only of Gods upon us, and concerning us. Which in effect you yield alſo, when you ſay, that [Faith cannot pardon ſins or accept.] For then it cannot juſtifie. At this time methinks we are excellently well agreed, I wiſh it may long continue.

But then in the next words, we are out again; I am now lookt on as one that abuſes Scripture for the maintenance of errors, whereas God knows 'twas no more but citing the words in St. James, faith conſummate by works, as a parallel place to faith ἐνεργουμένη δι ἔργων in St. Paul, and let the Papiſts ſay what they will, (and abuſe that or any other place) ſure this is no abuſing Scripture for maintenance of errors. But then what you mean by your not dreaming, that I thought Abraham was juſtified by the actual ſacrificing of his Son, I cannot dream or imagine; certainly I never ſaid any ſuch thing; or if you thought I meant that by works, you are much miſtaken: but only I conceived the reſolution of ſacrificing to have been accepted by God, to his juſtification without actual ſacrificing him.

But then Sir, in that which follows, when 'tis reſolved that we are agreed in the concluſion, 'tis very ſtrange that that will not ſatisfy you without ſome retractation. O how much a more pleaſant thing is victory than peace! Sir, I muſt tell you confidently, all that that Author ever hath ſaid in the Catechiſm is perfectly reconcileable with this concluſion; (and he may chance to be as fit to judge of the importance of his own words, as any man elſe) and therefore ſtill retractation muſt be ſpared, unleſs you pleaſe to retract cauſleſs diſpleaſures. But that it ſeems you will not ſuddainly do: for again you are deep in a queſtioning over again, what hath been ſo often anſwered, and profeſtly acknowledged. I ſhall proceed to do it over again once more. 1. I ſay, that we are not juſtified by any thing in us, i. e. either by vow of obedience, or faith, ſave only as by a condition, or cauſâ ſine quâ non; and in that ſence, by both of them together we are juſtified. But then you have an objection to thoſe words of mine The condition muſt be undertaken before the Covenant belongs to me] and ſay in your third, That if by Covenant I mean the whole Covenant of grace, I muſt make ſome condition go before our regeneration alſo. I anſwer, that the word Covenant there in that place, ſignifies any one part of the whole Covenant, which depends on the performance of any proportionable part of the condition, and ſo needs not belong in that place to regeneration alſo, but may be reſtrained only to that of juſtification. Yet for the condition prærequired to regeneration alſo, I have given you my ſence formerly, and need not ſo ſoon repeat it to you.

4. For the third [you know] I profeſs not to know how they belong to me, or any intereſts of mine.

5. That to receive forgiveneſs is an act of faith, I ſhall again acknowledge, ſo you conclude not from thence that it juſtifies by ſo doing. But that I ever ſaid, That we receive a pardon by an act of charity, &c. I ſhall not yet be perſwaded, nor can that propoſition have any truth, any otherwiſe than that charity is part of the condition, without which that Pardon ſhall not belong to me, (which were a very ridiculous ground of ſaying, that we receive our pardon by that act; becauſe [receiving by] notes an efficiency, and of that there is none in a mere condition.) Sir, I am confident I never ſaid theſe words, and therefore I cannot well forget them.

* Hâc edit. 12. As for your citation out of the * page 28. of the Cat. That a man is juſtified by faithful actions, and by them only. That you muſt underſtand (as 'tis there clearly ſet in the caſe of Abraham) in caſe there be a preſent opportunity to exerciſe the faith. For though when ſuch occaſions are not preſent, the faith which conſiſts in voto, the full reſolution, the cordial receiving the whole Chriſt, will ſerve the turn, without any actions; yet when the occaſion is preſent, the action muſt be ready, or elſe the faith will not juſtify. And therefore though in this caſe of ſuch opportunities, I plead for more than the bare vow, as neceſſary to juſtification, yet ſtill 'tis true that I plead for no more in any other caſe; and even in this, I can content my ſelf with this vow, if it be ſincere; nor will God acknowledge it ſo, if it act not in time of tryal, when the opportunity is offered. And ſo, ſure I am well enough off from a firſt and ſecond juſtification. For all, that I require by way of condition, is the ſincere receiving of Chriſt in heart and reſolution; which if it be ſincere, will fructify in its due ſeaſon; and if it be not ſuch as will do ſo, 'tis not fit to be accepted by God to our juſtification.

But for your arguing on the other ſide, That if we are juſtified by a vow if perſonal obedience, then we are not juſtified by Chriſt alone, or by faith only; that is but the old Sophiſm, ſo oft laid open, by our confeſſing nothing to have to do with our juſtification but Chriſt, as the cauſe of our juſtification, or that which conſtitutes us righteous; and for our vow of obedience and faith, that is only as the condition: granting ſtill faith to receive the pardon, but not thereby to juſtify.

And ſo once more I will agree with you, that is, with that concluding propoſition of yours, whether you will permit me, or no; and do it now again without any need of the leaſt ſyllable of retractation.

Thus have I attended you a moſt wearieſome journey, being ſcarce permitted to paſs over any line in your Papers without anſwering ſome either miſtake, or queſtion of yours. And truly I have ſerved you freely and faithfully, and that hath ſwell'd it to a bulk beyond what in any reaſon I was bound to pay you. And if you do not pleaſe that there ſhall ariſe to me ſome fruit by all this by your diſcerning and acknowledging the cauſeleſsneſs of your exceptions, yet if you pleaſe, let us put it to others to judge between us; for 'tis poſſible we may judge amiſs of our own performances. And therefore by your good leave (as before I told you) I ſhall be willing the world ſhall judge between us, or as many of them as ſhall be fitted with great patience to ſit out the hearing of ſo mean an Act. If this courſe will not pleaſe you, but you think good to write back again, I ſhall take confidence to expect (what is moſt juſt) that you return ad punctum, or ad carceres from whence we ſet out: and which ſoever of your publick charges upon that Author ſeems to you to remain unſatisfied by my returns, let it be ſpecified, and your reaſons joined with your expreſſions of diſlike, ſuch as you think will deſtroy the grounds, and be directly and clearly oppoſite to the ſtate of the queſtion on which I build. And having now twice ſubmitted to ſuch punctual anſwering of ſo long a catalogue of queſtions, let me I pray be freed from any more of that task. For I know when all other things are at an end, there will never be any end of them. There is a very unhandſome Engliſh proverb to that purpoſe; Let me beſeech you, not to fall under any ſuſpition of being guilty of it: and as you might juſtly accuſe me, if I applied it to you, ſo I beſeech you to ſee that it be not appliable. Yet let me tell you, When theſe controverſies now depending are at an end, there is no one queſtion concerning any line in thoſe Books ſo paradigmatized by you, or in any piece of Divinity, wherein I underſtand ought, but you or any man ſhall for the leaſt asking have the full ſence of

SIR,

YOU have ſent me many ſheets; and the only concluſion that I can pick out of them, is an Engliſh Proverb; and that but intimated: Truly Sir, if I being a fool have ask'd more queſtions than you in your wiſdom are able to anſwer, I am aſhamed of my folly, and you need not glory in your wiſdom; yet ſuch, it ſeems, is your high conceit of your own wiſdom, that you do paſſionately long to publiſh your wiſdom to the world in print. Sir, I ſhall not licenſe any Papers of yours that I have as yet received; and you may ſee cauſe hereafter to thank me for it: nor will I deſire you to licenſe ſo much as an * of mine. But it ſeems you cannot think of any other way of ſatisfaction for that injury which you conceive hath been offered to you by your Friend (for ſo I call every man that deals plainly with me,) and give me leave as a friend to adviſe you to beware leſt the ſatisfaction which you gain by getting into Print, be not as imaginary as the injury which hath been offered to you, by the repeated yet neceſſary admonitions of

Your humble Servant

Francis Cheynell.

If you think fit to object any thing againſt me in Print, I doubt not but by Gods help to give all that are impartial full ſatisfaction, as ſoon as my more weighty employments will permit.

SIR,

YOur Letter of return to my laſt I received not till this morning (though it were dated on the Lords day was ſeven-night:) and with it an advertiſement that Mr. W. whom you appointed to convey my former to you, was gone to London before it came to me. So that, although I know not how this paper will make ſhift to find out the way, yet can I not but addreſs it toward you, if it be but to take the leave of you a little ſolemnly, and to profeſs that I deſign not any farther trouble to you on this matter, having been aſſured by you of the unprofitableneſs of my former pains; and having little hopes, that any more will prove more fortunate than thoſe eight or nine ſheets, out of which you tell me you can pick but one concluſion, viz. an Engliſh proverb, and that but intimated. Sir, I am very unhappy if I have written ſo much ſo unconcludingly: but cannot be ſo ſevere to my ſelf, and thoſe papers, as to imagine that it was not in your power to have pickt out ſome others, (had they been for your turn to take notice of them) as eaſily as that one which you acknowledge was but intimated. It ſeems, your notes tend all to finding of faults; and ſo this came into your obſervation. I ſhall not from hence conclude that this was the only thing you had reaſon to diſlike in thoſe papers; Only I muſt ſay that your reaſons of diſliking this particular of the Engliſh proverb, as far as it was mentioned by me, are by no means concluding; and to make them appear ſuch, you are fain to affix a ſence on my words very diſtant from that which the contexture of them is capable of. For Sir, that you have yet appeared to be a fool, or that I undertake to have any wiſdom, or have any need to do ſo (the innocence of the cauſe which I have in hand being ſufficient to ſupply that place) or that you have asked me more queſtions than I am able to anſwer, I had no way ſo much as intimated; but on the contrary, had for the time paſt anſwered all your very many queſtions, or ſhewed you (as in ſome few) how unneceſſary it was to the matter in hand, to anſwer them; and yet promiſed you farther, That when the controverſies now depending betwixt us were at an end, there ſhould be no queſtion concerning any line in thoſe Books, or any piece of Divinity wherein I underſtood ought, but you ſhould for the leaſt asking have my full ſence or anſwer. All that that mention of the proverb could ſignify, was this, that I deſired you would take care hereafter not to fall under any ſuſpition of being guilty of it; which was but a circumlocution of this plain ſence, that if you returned any thing to thoſe ſheets, I deſired it might be ad punctum, without asking any unneceſſary queſtions, becauſe that would be a way unworthy of any Scholar, and would be infinite. And if I ſhould have told you plainly, that if you ſhould do this, you would, by the force of that proverb, be found guilty of folly, and poſſibly poſe a man wiſer much than my ſelf, this would not have amounted to any of the three things by you concluded from my Letter. Yet is all this as truly ſaid by you as what you next adde, That I paſſionately long to publiſh my wiſdom to the world in print. The rudeneſs of this ſcoff ſhall be pardoned by me. I ſhall only ſpeak to the truth of it. I had no ſuch opinion of the worth of any thing, that would be pertinent anſwer to your exceptions, as to have any paſſion or longing to have it printed; I only told you, That if you could not yet acknowledge the cauſleſneſs of your exceptions, by your leave I ſhould be willing the world ſhould judge betwixt us: and in one other place, When you had bid me venture your arguments to any reader, affirming that you feared none, I thought it ſeaſonable to tell you that I expected according to the purport of your ſpeech, that you would give your conſent that this whole matter ſhould be referred to others judgment, and to that end Printed. I ſuppoſe, neither of theſe ſpeeches imply either paſſion or longing after the preſs; And truly Sir, as long as there are ſuch Readers abroad as you, I think a man in prudence ought before-hand to be aſſured of their kindneſs, ere he have much appetite to be in print. The ſhort is, I was and am moſt willing to ſubmit the diſpute between you and me, and the truth of this queſtion [Whether you have wronged me or no,] to any or all reaſonable men: and having offered it ſucceſsleſly to you, I am ſtill ready, if you conſent, to make it more publick; and ſhall not conſider any intereſts of my own ſo much, as to retract my offer. You ſay, You ſhall not licenſe any papers of mine which you have yet received: and then, I ſuppoſe, you are confident they will not now be licenſed in this place; and it will only be in my power to take care that this be the laſt you ſhall receive. Only I ſhall adde (without expreſſing any longing) that if you will licenſe your own, you ſhall not need to trouble your ſelf in deſiring me to licenſe mine, or to give my conſent that they be licenſed. As for your advice to the contrary, I know not from what degree of kindneſs it proceeds: and having ſome reaſon to believe that there is nothing in them againſt piety, or charity, perhaps you may be miſtaken, if you think your not licenſing them will ever deſerve thanks from me; any more than that which you call an act of friendſhip, doth, viz. your having dealt plainly with me. To which give me leave to anſwer, that friendſhip is a ſtrange thing, and very diſtant from Chriſtian charity, if it be any thing like thoſe publick reproaches which you laid moſt cauſeleſly upon the Author of the Catechiſm in your Sermons. Aſſure your ſelf, if I were now in the temper of mind, in which you were when you did that, (and it ſeems, now continue to be) I would preſently ſend all your papers to the Preſs with my anſwer to them; and tell you, I was in this your friend. But I have other imployments for my thoughts, and other motives and principles of not revenging injuries, than thoſe which you offer me by way of friendly advice to beware, &c. Which perhaps may intimate ſomething of terror. I ſhall for the preſent ſit down with full patience and ſatisfaction of mind, that I have driven this buſineſs thus far: and till your more weighty imployments permit you to conſider me, as my pains to ſerve and ſatisfy you deſerve from you, I take my leave of you, and reſt

Your very loving Friend

H. Hammond.

I would you had ſignified your pleaſure poſitively, that I ſhould not permit to any mans eyes, what you only ſay, you do not deſire me, &c. I ſhould then think my ſelf obliged to burn that firſt part of my laſt anſwer: but as yet, wanting your directions, I have not done it.

A view

A view of ſome
EXCEPTIONS TO THE PRACTICAL CATECHISM, &c.

SEeing it again appears to me by a Book, that came to this Town on Saturday laſt, (entituled, A Teſtimony to the truth of Jeſus Chriſt, &c. pretending to be ſubſcribed by 52 Miniſters of Chriſt within the Province of London) that it is Gods good pleaſure to deliver me up to be evil ſpoken of, and accuſed, and to bear a yet deeper part of his bitter cup, than many others of my Brethren have done, I deſire to bleſs and praiſe his name for this his goodneſs and mercy to me, and to embrace all thoſe, who have join'd their hands to be inſtruments in this, as thoſe whom by Chriſts command (particularly belonging to me on this occaſion) I am bound to love, to bleſs, to pray for, and not to think of any other way of return toward them. This, I thank God, I can moſt chearfully do; and would ſatisfy my ſelf to have done it in private, between God and my own ſoul, were there not another occaſion, which makes it a little neceſſary for me to ſay ſomewhat publickly; and that is, the vindication of the truth of Chriſt Jeſus, which they who are willing to give teſtimony to it, will, I hope, take from me in good part.

Theſe men page 4. in the beginning of the ſecond branch of their teſtimony, (which it ſeems by page 37. the whole number of the 52 Miniſters have ſubſcribed) make mention of unſound opinions, eſpecially abominable errours, damnable hereſies, and horrid blaſphemies, which are broached and maintained here in England among us, under the notion of New lights, and new truths; many of which they have reaſon to judge deſtructive to the very fundamental truths of Chriſtianity, &c. All of them utterly repugnant to the ſacred Scriptures, the occaſion of much grief of heart to all the friends of truth and piety at home, the ſcandal and offence of all the Reformed Churches abroad, the unparallel'd reproach of this Church and Nation, totally inconſiſtent with the Covenant, and the covenanted Reformation, and in a word, the very dregs and ſpawn of thoſe old accurſed hereſies which have been already condemned, &c.

After this preface and expreſſion of their zeal to Gods truth, they conclude the period with a profeſſion, that they more particularly abominate theſe infamous and pernicious errours of late publiſhed among us, and hereafter recited in this enſuing Catalogue, viz. Errours, &c.

In this Catalogue, three particulars there are recited from the Practical Catechiſm of H. Hammond, 2 Edit. London, 1646.

From which premiſſes, I ſuppoſe, any Reader will conclude, that thoſe three particulars are by theſe Miniſters thought guilty of all thoſe Charges which they had affixt to All the unſound opinions, &c. noted by them, viz. that they are utterly repugnant to the ſacred Scriptures, &c. and in the modeſteſt of their expreſſions, that they are infamous and pernicious errours.

Upon this ſuppoſition, I hold it my duty, by ſetting down theſe three particulars punctually, to refer to all impartial Chriſtians to judge whether it be a Teſtimony to the truth of Jeſus Chriſt to paſs ſuch cenſures on them.

The firſt is recited by them, p. 9. and it is this, That Chriſt was given to undergo a ſhameful death voluntarily upon the Croſs, to ſatiſfie for the ſin of Adam, and for all the ſins of all mankind.

This is thus plainly ſet down in their catalogue of infamous and pernicious errours, but without the leaſt note to direct what part of this propoſition is liable to that charge, any farther than may be collected from the title of the Errours under which 'tis placed, viz. Errours touching univerſal or general redemption. From whence I preſume to diſcern their meaning to be, that to affirm Chriſt to have ſatisfied for, or redeemed all mankind, is this pernicious errour by them abominated. And ſuch I confeſs I ſhould acknowledge it to be, if it had any right to be joyn'd with that other, by theſe men ſet under the ſame head [that the damned ſhall be ſaved:] but I hope that errour hath received no patronage from that Catechiſm, nor ſure from that aſſertion of Chriſts redeeming all mankind. Theſe two propoſitions being very reconcileable; that Chriſt redeemed all men, and yet that the whole number of the impenitent, unbelieving, reprobate world ſhall never be ſaved by him. If there were any need of it, I ſhould eaſily ſhew the way of reconciling theſe two, by adding that the great Benefits of Chriſts death, which I affirm to be general, are given upon condition, not abſolutely (as Gods love to the world, and, the effect of it, giving his Son, is not deſigned, that all abſolutely, but that all conditionally, i. e. whoſoever believeth in him, ſhould not periſh, but have everlaſting life) and that they which do not perform that condition (as God knows a great multitude do not) ſhall never be ſaved by his death: To which purpoſe is that of Proſper, one far enough from all kindneſs to the Pelagians, Redemptor mundi dedit pro mundo ſanguinem ſuum, & mundus redimi noluit, &c. the Redeemer of the world gave his blood for the world, and the world would not be redeemed. ad Gall. cap. 9. But, to confine my diſcourſe (without conſideration of the conſequences) to the aſſertion it ſelf; I deſire it may be obſerved, that this was not crudely ſet down in that Catechiſm, but with this immediate addition [to taſt death for every man, Heb. 2. 9.] by that plain teſtimony of Scripture confirming the truth of what was aſſerted, as punctually as could be imagined. For ſure [every man] ſignifies all mankind, as that notes ſingulos generis humani, in the largeſt notion of the word, and taſting death for them is ſatisfying for their ſins. If this teſtimony (ſo clear, that it alone hath, to my knowledge, convinc'd one as learned a man man as doth in this Church of ours maintain the doctrines contrary to the Remonſtrants) be not thought ſufficient to ſupport this aſſertion, I ſhall then ex abundanti add theſe other plain teſtimonies; Not only that of Gods giving his only Son, mentioned by Chriſt as an effect or expreſſion of his love to the world, (which it would not be, if he did not give him for the world, whom he is ſaid to love) but (to prevent all diſtinctions concerning the notion of the World, as if it ſignified only the Elect) more particularly theſe two; Firſt that of 2 Pet. 2. 1. where the Lord, i. e. Chriſt, is plainly ſaid to have bought (i. e. paid the price, ſatisfied for) them, who deny him, and bring upon themſelves ſwift deſtruction: to which agrees that of 1 Cor. 8. 11. where the weak brother, of whom 'tis ſaid, that by another mans ſcandal he ſhall periſh, is deſcribed to be one for whom Chriſt died. The other teſtimony which I ſhall add, is that of Saint Paul, 2 Cor. 5. 14. which I deſire the intelligent Reader to obſerve: Where ſpeaking of the conſtraining obliging love of Chriſt, he ſaith, we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead, that is, ſurely, All in the full latitude, not only the elect but All others; and this concluſion the Apoſtle infers by this medium, becauſe one, i. e. Chriſt died for all, which being a proof of the other, muſt certainly be as true, and as acknowledged (if not more) as that which 'tis brought to prove: and particularly the [all] for whom he died, be as unlimited as the [All] that were prov'd from thence to be dead, or elſe the Apoſtle could not judge (as he ſaith he doth) or conclude the death of all in Adam by that medium. From this arguing of the Apoſtle I ſhall make no queſtion to infer, that in Saint Pauls divinity, Chriſt died for all who are dead in Adam; and on that occaſion I ſhall add, by the way, that the contrary doctrine [of Chriſts not dying for all] was by the Antients affixt on Pelagius upon that ground, of his affirming that all (i. e. that Infants) were not faln in Adam, and ſo needed not to be redeem'd by Chriſt. Thus it appears by S. Aug. cont. 2 Epiſt. Pelag. l. 2. c. 2. Pelagiani dicunt Deum non eſſe omnium ætatum in hominibus mundatorem, ſalvatorem, liberatorem, &c. and when the Maſſilans, to vindicate themſelves from that charge of S. Auguſtines, confeſs that Chriſt died for all mankind, (as it appears by Proſpers Epiſtle) Proſper expreſſes no manner of diſlike of that confeſſion, but forms other charges againſt them. And the truth is, there is ſcarce any antient Writer before Pelagius, but hath directly aſſerted Chriſts dying for all; The teſtimonies of Irenæus, Clemens, Origen, Macarius, Cyril of Jeruſalem, Euſebius, Athanaſius, and many others might readily be produced, if that were needful. And then let it be gheſt alſo, which of the two poſitions, the affirmative or the negative, beſt deſerves the charge of being the ſpawn of thoſe old accurſed hereſies, which have been already condemned, &c. The ſame I could add from many the learnedſt Proteſtants, which never were thought to be tainted with any ancient or modern hereſie (though others I know have expreſt themſelves otherwiſe) but I need not ſuch auxiliaries. To conclude this point; I ſuppoſe, in affirming or vindicating this poſition, I have born teſtimony to the truth of Chriſt, from whom, and whoſe Apoſtles I profeſs to have learn'd this truth, and to conceive it (for the ſence of it) as fully teſtified by plain Scriptures, as many Articles of the Creed; and for the expreſſion uſed in the Practical Catechiſm of [all mankind] I muſt acknowledge to have learn'd it from the Church of England (of which I do yet with joy profeſs my ſelf an obedient ſon and member) in thoſe words of her Catechiſm, eſtabliſht by Act of Parliament, and inſerted in the Book of Liturgy, where I was taught, [to believe in God the Father, who created me and all the world, In God the Son, who redeemed me and all mankind, and in God the holy Ghoſt, who ſanctified me and all the elect people of God;] where mankind as it is of a narrower extent on one ſide than all the world of creatures, ſo is it to be underſtood of a larger, than all the elect people of God; And ſo much for the firſt charge.

The ſecond is ſet down pag. 15. and it is this, That neither Paul nor James exclude or ſeparate faithful actions or acts of faith from faith, or the condition of juſtification, but abſolutely require them, as the only things by which the man is juſtified. What is thus ſet down I acknowledge to be in terminis in the Practical Catechiſm, but cannot eaſily gheſs wherein the errour or perniciouſneſs is conceived to lie, unleſs it ſhould poſſibly be thorow a miſtake of the phraſe [the only things by which the man is juſtified] as if by that ſpeech ſhould be underſtood, either that the faithful actions or acts of faith without faith it ſelf, were the only things by which we are juſtified, or elſe that all the things there ſpoken of Faith, and faithful actions, or acts of faith are the only CAUSE, and ſo ſome CAUSE of our juſtification, or by which, as by a CAUSE, we are juſtified; either of theſe I confeſs might paſs for an errour, but both theſe doctrines I have ſufficiently diſclaimed; and indeed in this very propoſition 'tis affirm'd that the faithful actions or acts of Faith are not excluded or ſeparated from Faith (which they muſt be, if they juſtify without Faith) or the condition of juſtification (i. e. from that faith which is conſidered as, and affirm'd to be the condition of our juſtification) but by the two Apoſtles abſolutely required, to what? Why to faith, or the condition of our juſtification, as the only things together with it by which as by a condition, and only ſo (as 'tis clearly ſet down all over that part of the Catechiſm, which handles Faith or Juſtification) the man is juſtified. This I ſuppoſe may give theſe men ſome light of their miſtake, if it were ſuch: but if they underſtand the ſpeech as then and now I do, and yet think it errour, and pernicious, I muſt then only prove that what was ſaid from Saint James and Saint Paul, was not by me falſly impoſed upon them, and then they muſt either maintain my ſpeech, or fall with me in the ſame condemnation. That Saint James doth not exclude or ſeparate faithful actions, or acts of Faith, from Faith, or the condition of Juſtification, but require them, (i. e. Faith, and faithful actions, or acts of faith) as the only things by which, as by a condition, the man is juſtified, will be clear by the definition of a condition in Logick, and the plain words of Saint James; A Condition is a qualification of the ſubject required to make him capable, or a cauſa ſine quâ non; and ſo a condition of juſtification is no more, than that without which a man cannot be juſtified; and that is the direct affirmation of Saint James, c. 2. 24. Ye ſee that by works (i. e. faithful actions, or acts of faith) a man is juſtified, and not by faith only: and again, Faith if it have not works, ver. 17. and Faith without works, ver. 20. is dead, and ſo ſure not ſuch as by which we are juſtified. From whence I form this ſyllogiſm; That, without which, in Saint James's opinion, we are not juſtified, and by which join'd with faith we are juſtified, not by faith only, is not by Saint James excluded or ſeparated from Faith, or the condition of our juſtification, but required together with Faith, or the only things by which (as by a condition) the man is juſtified: But without acts of faith or faithful actions, in Saint James's opinion, we are not juſtified, and by them we are juſtified, and not by faith only; Therefore faithful actions, or acts of Faith are not by S. James excluded or ſeparated from Faith, or the condition of our juſtification, but required together with faith, as the only things by which (as by a condition) the man is juſtified.

The firſt propoſition is clear from the nature of a Condition; the ſecond from the words cited out of Saint James, and then I hope the concluſion will neither be errour nor pernicious.

Then for Saint Paul, 'tis made evident in the Pract. Catechiſm that the faith by which according to his doctrine Abraham was juſtified (and not by works) Rom. 4. was not only a depending on God for the performance of his promiſe (which yet was a faithful action, or act of Faith,) but alſo a reſigning himſelf up wholly to him to obey his precepts; or more clearly, was a Faith, which, howſoever it was tried by promiſes or commands, did anſwer God in Acts of faith, or faithful actions; and ſo was accepted by God (without abſolute unſinning obedience, much more without obedience to the Moſaical law, without works) all which is clear in the ſtory of Abraham, and I ſuppoſe need not farther be evidenced. And then concerning Saint Pauls part in the buſineſs, my ſyllogiſm ſhall be this; He that affirms Abraham to be juſtified by that Faith, which, howſoever 'twas tried, did anſwer God in acts of faith or faithful actions, doth not exclude or ſeparate faithful actions or acts of faith from faith, or the condition of our juſtification, but abſolutely requires them, &c. But Saint Paul affirms Abraham to be juſtified by that faith, which howſoever 'twas tried, did anſwer God in faithful actions, or acts of faith; Therefore Saint Paul doth not exclude or ſeparate faithful actions, &c. The firſt propoſition I conceive wants little proving, after that which hath been already premiſed in this matter. And for the ſecond I ſhall deſire that Abrahams faith, as it hath juſtification attributed to it by Saint Paul, may be viewed both in the fourth to the Romans, and the eleventh to the Hebrews. In the former his faith was tried by the promiſe of a numerous ſeed, &c. and he anſwered that with one act of faith, or faithful action, believed in hope, beyond hope, ver. 18. was ſtrong in faith and gave glory to God, ver. 20. was fully perſwaded, that what God had promiſed, he was able to perform, ver. 21. all which what are they but acts of faith, or faithful actions? all, which (when the object of the faith is Gods abſolute promiſe) the matter is capable of; and for this it was counted to him for righteouſneſs, or he was juſtified, ver. 22. and thence ſure I may conclude, that theſe were ſo required, as the condition by which he was, and without which he ſhould not be juſtified. In the 11*th* to the Hebrews many other acts of his faith or faithful actions are mentioned, ver. 8. By faith he obeyed to go out of his own countrey, not knowing whither he went, and ver. 9. by faith he ſojourn'd in a ſtrange land, ver. 10. by faith he expected a City, that hath foundations, ver. 17. by faith he offered his Son, and ver. 19. counted that God was able to raiſe him up from the dead, ver. 20. by faith he bleſſed Iſaac concerning things to come. What are all theſe but acts of faith, or faithful actions in all kinds of tryals? And therefore I ſuppoſe all this being out of Saint Paul, as the former out of Saint James, 'twill be no errour, or pernicious, from their very words to have affirm'd this Doctrine, and affixt it on them. I ſuppoſe alſo this may ſerve for the ſecond propoſition.

The third is ſet down pag. 18. from Pract. Catech. * pag. 48, 49. and 'tis this, That [Thou ſhalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain] is undoubtedly no more than [thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf.] To this Charge I anſwer firſt, that it is a little ſtrange, that a bare explication of a phraſe of Scripture, a part of the third Commandment in Exod though it were acknowledged falſe, or forc'd, ſhould yet be ſo far improveable by any, as to come under the title of an infamous pernicious errour, a ſpawn of the old accurſed hereſies, &c. and be capable of all thoſe other aggravations at firſt mentioned, which being affixt to all the errours in the Catalogue, muſt alſo be affixt to this which is ſet down for one of them.

* Of this Edition.

But then ſecondly, for the truth, (moſt undoubted certain truth) of this explication, or interpretation, thus cenſured, I have formerly at large made it appear, that the words [to take the name of God] ſignifie to ſwear, and no more, and the Hebrew which we render in vain, ſignifies [falſly] and is ſo rendred in the ninth Commandment, and agreeable to that, Pſalm 15. to lift up the ſoul to vanity, is to ſwear by the ſoul or life falſly, as it there follows, nor ſworn to deceive his neighbour; and beſide my own judgment in this matter, back'd with the conſent of as learned as this age hath, or the Antient Church had any, I conceived that I had a moſt authentick warrant from Chriſt himſelf, who reads it οὐκ ἐπιορκήσεις, thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf: For ſo we read, Matth. 5. Ye have heard that it was ſaid to them of old, thou ſhalt not kill, and again in the ſame manner, thou ſhalt not commit adultery, that is, that of the ten Commandments delivered in Sinai, and brought down by Scripture, to them his preſent auditors, one Commandment was, thou ſhalt not kill, another, thou ſhalt not commit adultery; and ſo again in the very ſame form of words, another, Thou ſhalt not forſwear thy ſelf; from which I did aſſure my ſelf (and ſo ſtill do) that οὐκ ἐπιορκήσεις is as directly the interpretation (in Chriſts judgment) of the firſt part of the third Commandment, as οὐ μοιχεύσεις or οὐ φονεύσεις of the ſeventh and ſixth, and ſo that it is undoubtedly no more the one than the other. And indeed this was the only occaſion of delivering thoſe words in the Practical Catechiſm, to ſhew that Chriſt did not miſreport the words of the Commandments, nor yet refer to any other place but that Commandment in thoſe words of his. And though I have many other things, that I could ſay to that matter, able to free that ſpeech from all imaginable inconveniences (eſpecially when in that place Chriſts prohibition is explain'd to be againſt all kind of ſwearing (by any other as well as by God) in ordinary converſation, or in any caſe but wherein it is neceſſary to confirm by Oath) yet I am very willing to leave the matter here, upon this account at this time given of it, i. e. in my opinion, on Chriſts ſcore, and not fear what any ingenuous Reader will charge on me for this interpretation.

I beſeech God to forgive them which have brought this unneceſſary trouble upon the Reader; and for my ſelf I have to them theſe two only requeſts, 1. That they will examine themſelves ſincerely, and as in Gods ſight, what the motive or deſign was, which perſwaded them to ſingle out me alone (who profeſs my ſelf, and am by all that know me acknowledged to hold nothing contrary to the Church of England, and will juſtify it to any man that knows what the Church of England is) and join me with the Broachers of all the blaſphemies and hereſies of this age: And ſecondly, that they will lay to heart the conſequences which may naturally flow from hence, if God do not uphold weak Chriſtians, who ſeeing ſo many doctrines of very diſtant natures blended together, with the ſame brand of [hereſie and blaſphemy, infamous and pernicious] faſtned on them, and no kind of proofs annext, that any are ſuch, (beſide the judgment of the Cenſors) may poſſibly find ſome of them to be the infallible truths of God, and be tempted (if they have not ſtronger antidotes than this bare Teſtimony will afford them) to have the ſame thoughts of the other alſo; Or if not, whether they will not be inclined to have the ſame ſeverity and condemnation for me, or any other Aſſertor of ſuch propoſitions as theſe, as they are taught to have for the Authors of thoſe other blaſphemous propoſitions, and ſo be tempted to uncharitableneſs.

Having ſaid thus much, I ſhall hope it may find ſome good ſucceſs among ſome who have ſubſcribed that Teſtimony: But if I am miſtaken in all of them, I ſhall then deſire that this improſperous Paper may gain me but thus much, that either the firſt ſubſcriber Mr. John Downam (who did Licenſe the Printing of this very Book, from whence all theſe pretended Errours are cited) or elſe Dr. Gouge, or Mr. Gataker, who are foremoſt of the ſecond rank, or ſome other perſon of learning and Chriſtian temper, will afford me their patience perſonally, and by fair Diſcourſe, or any other Chriſtian way, to debate the truth of our pretenſions; and for this I ſhall wait their leiſure.

From my ſtudy, Chriſt-Ch. in Oxon.

CONSCIENCE, SCANDAL, WILL-WORSHIP, SUPERSTITION, AND IDOLATRY.

THE PREFACE

IT is a ſtrong preſumption that that Religion is falſe which is apt to be made uſe of for ſecular advantages, that thoſe opinions have ſomewhat of the ὁ πλάνος ingredient in them, which are produced as the ground to juſtifie or authorize practices, otherwiſe impious and infamous; There is ſo little Communion or compliance betwixt God and Belial, that it is very hard even for Satan himſelf, that great impure Artificer, to proſtitute or debauch any truth of God, (which is really ſo) to that mean or vile ſubmiſſion of yielding it ſelf pliable or inſtrumental to any deſign or intereſt of his. He which can be corrupted or employed by an enemy is either not ſo honeſt or not ſo clear, either not ſo faithful or not ſo wary, as might be expected. This one conſideration would prejudge a great part of the Divinity of theſe unhappy times, which in a perfect contrariety to the wiſdom which cometh from above, Ja. 3. or the fruits of the Spirit, Gal. 5. is ſo far from purity, peaceableneſs, gentleneſs, love, joy, long-ſuffering, &c. that it is engaged to owne another extraction, to confeſs it ſelf his Creature, and progeny, whom in the lineaments and features it ſo viſibly reſembleth. Among the many ſeverals of this kind, I have long conceived that the vulgar Notions of thoſe four names, which theſe enſuing Treatiſes have taken confidence to examine, have had no ſmall part of the guilt of thoſe fatal evils under which this calamitous wretched Kingdom now pants, a proſtrate, ghaſtly and direful ſpectacle. And conſequently that theſe obſtructing of the fountains might poſſibly abate thoſe ſtreams and torrents (which have taken riſe from thence) of uncharitableneſs firſt, and then of bloud. The miſtaking of every phancy or humour, carnal or Satanical perſwaſion for Conſcience (the acknowledged rule of action) and the ſetting up upon too weak a ſtock for that high priviledge of a Good Conſcience, hath embolden'd moſt of the vices of the World, * petrified the practical faculty, and made it inſenſible of any of thoſe ſtripes, or threats, or diſcipline, which the Law of Nature or of Chriſt hath provided for the reſtraint of their Subjects; and from thence it daily happens that not only the moſt Un-Chriſtian but unhumane practices, the moſt unnatural ſavage barbarities of theſe laſt years, (which no Paraſite can flatter, or Precedent extenuate) are now avowed to be dictates and commands of Conſcience, and ſo not only reconcileable with piety but advanced and ſet up for the only meaſure of it, and no man allowed to paſs for Conſcientious, which hath any remainder of Moral or Chriſtian Vertue (in the ancient Notion of the Word) diſcernible in his actions; and ſo not only Zoſimus his ſlander of Conſtantine is become the real guilt of too many Profeſſors, (thoſe ſins confidently committed by them, for which no other Religion allows any expiation) but, beyond the malice of that falſe tongue, the ſins themſelves reſolved on as a ſpecial

καθαρτικὸν or purgative, an act of ſupererogating Vertue, ſufficient to ſanctifie any other impurities. To theſe ſo groſs errours both in opinion and practice, the preſent height of animoſity and vehemence of the flame may poſſibly have betrayed men; but what it ſhould be that hath ſo heightened the paſſion, and firſt elevated it to this pitch of Diſtemper, will not be diſcerned any otherwiſe than by conjecture from the Quarrels which have been moſt inſiſted on, againſt the eſtabliſhed Government and Diſcipline of the Church, and the indifferent actions, and Ceremonies, and obſervances either preſcribed, or cuſtomary among us; to which when no direct immediate blame or accuſation could be affixt, it hath been the manner to object obliquely, ſometimes that they have been matter of Scandal, and that thought to have been ſufficiently proved, if any could be produced who have diſliked them (as if their being diſpleaſed were to be ſcandalized, or one mans being angry once without a cauſe, were for ever juſt cauſe for others to be angry at that which were of it ſelf moſt innocent;) Sometimes that the crime of Will-Worſhip were chargeable on them, ſuppoſing firſt, (but not proving) Will-Worſhip to be a crime, and then every the leaſt obſervance uncommanded (though withal as perfectly unprohibited) by Scripture to be the interpretation of that crime; and ſometimes that they have been Superſtitious; by the equivocalneſs of that word, firſt perſwading themſelves and others that every exceſs in Religion comes under that title, and then that the uncommandedneſs of any thing, induces that exceſs, and conſequently involves in that guilt. To which three ſo inauſpicious (I may add Scandalous) miſpriſions broached by Satan, εἰς πτῶσιν, to the fall, and ſo truly to the offending of many in Iſrael, theſe enſuing Treatiſes were deſigned as antidotes or cures; to which end if they may prove in any degree ſucceſsful, the writer of them will never repent that he hath ſubjected them to the various and paſſionate cenſures of the many, hoping thereby that the mature and impartial judgments of the few may be alſo provoked to interpoſe. By whoſe pleaſure and ſerious examination, whether they ſhall ſtand or fall, they are in all humility ſubmitted.

OF CONSCIENCE.

Sect. 1. AMong the many practical errors which are gotten abroad into the world, a very large proportion there is of thoſe which have either ſuck't their poiſon from, or diſguiſed it under that ſpecious venerable name of Conſcience. That which the Philoſophers could call their guardian Angel, and juſtify the phraſe by vouching none but Angelical dictates from it: That which ſome good-natured Atheiſts did ſo revere, that they defined the only deity in the world, and in proportion phanſied nothing but God-like of it, is now by ſome Chriſtians (like the true God among the Heathens) worſhip't in ſo many corporeous ſhapes, that there is at length ſcarce any thing ſo vile (Phanſy, humour, paſſion, prepoſſeſſion, the meaneſt worldly intereſt of the ambitious or covetous deſigner, like the Calves, the Cats, the Crocodiles, the Onions, the Leeks of Egypt) but hath the favour or luck to be miſtaken for Conſcience, and receive all the reſpect, that I ſay not adoration, that belongs to it.

μόνον ἄνευ συνειδήσιν θεόν. Tatian.

Sect. 2. 'Twill be then but an act of juſtice and mercy, juſtice to truth, and mercy to the abuſed world, and withal a ſpecial preparative to a prudent reformation, to reſcue ſo divine a name from ſuch heatheniſh cage, to reſtore it to its natural primitive ſimplicity, and caſt out all the falſe forms which it hath been forced to appear under. To which purpoſe all that I ſhall deſign will be reduced to theſe two enquiries, 1. what is the proper notion of conſcience, 2. what is required to entitle a man to a good conſcience.

Sect. 3. For the former of theſe, what is the proper notion of Conſcience, I ſhall labour to find out not among the Scholaſtical definitions or diviſions of it among humane writers, but only by obſerving the force and uſe of the word in the Scripture, particularly the New Teſtament. And he that ſhall meet it there 32 times, and but take a view of it at every meeting, will ſure come to ſome degree of acquaintance with it, and find upon judgment reaſon to reſolve, what for his eaſe I ſhall now lay before him:

Sect. 4. That the word συνείδησις, Conſcience, is no more than Science or knowledge, and therefore being but once uſed by the Greek Tranſlators of the Old Teſtament, Eccleſ. 10. 20. it is there ſet to expreſs a word which is otherwiſe by them commonly rendred σύνεσις and ἐπίγνωσις) only with a peculiar relation added to it, as that knowledge is in order to action. Thus Tit. 1. 15. when νοῦς and συνείδησις, mind and conſcience are diſtinguiſhed, 'tis obvious to any to diſcern the ground of that diſtinction, that former being properly the denotation of the faculty merely ſpeculative, or intellectual; this latter, of the practical judgment, or that whether act or faculty of the underſtanding ſoul, which extendeth to practice; the Apoſtle by that phraſe, [the mind and conſcience are defiled] meaning diſtinctly this, that this errour in mens judgments, (which is the defiling of their mind) carries Un-chriſtian practice along with it, (which is the defiling of the practical faculty) this Judaical miſtake in their underſtanding is attended with Judaizing actions in their lives, the former apportioned to the Ἰουδαϊκοὶ μῦθοι, the falſe Judaical doctrines, which relate to νοῦς the mind, the ſecond to the ἐντολαὶ ἀνθρώπων ἀποστρεφομένων τὴν ἀλήθειαν, the commands of men perverting the truth, v. 14. which relate to the συνείδησις, the Conſcience.

Sect. 5. For the clearing of which (that it is ſuch a practical knowledge in the acception of the Scripture) if there need any light, you may have it from the ſurvey of every place ſeverally, and in ſpecial from this one, 1 Pet. 2. 19. This is thankworthy, if διὰ συνείδησιν θεοῦ, for Conſcience of God a man ſuffer grief, &c. i. e. if for this obediential practical knowledge of God (this knowledge of truth attended with a reſolution not to diſobey God, though it coſt a man never ſo dear) he ſuffer grief, &c.

Sect. 6. This being premiſed, there is but one thing more to be added to this matter, and it is this; That we take notice of the ſeveral ways of aſpect that Conſcience hath upon practice; One forward in the direct line, another backward, or by way of reflection; which are ordinarily expreſt by the double office of Conſcience, 1. as a cuſtos or monitor, adviſing and inſtructing and keeping us to our duty; 2. as a witneſs teſtifying to our ſelves and to God what we have done; which is in plainer terms no more but this, That there are two ſorts of Conſcience; 1. Conſcience of duty to be performed, or full perſwaſion that ſuch a thing ought to be done, or not to be done by me, a being reſolved of the neceſſity or unlawfulneſs of any thing, and 2. Conſcience of having performed, or not performed it, a knowing or judging my ſelf to have done well or ill. And under theſe two notions, all the ſeverals in the New Teſtament, (and the one ſole place of the apocryphal books of the old) will be contained. If you pleaſe, you may ſee how.

Sect. 8. To the former kind belongs that famous place, Rom. 13. 5. You muſt be ſubject (to the Supreme powers, v. 1. i. e. to the men that are in ſupreme authority as in Polycarpus Ep. to the Philipp. Orate pro Regibus & Poteſtatibus & Principibus, Powers are put with Kings and Princes, p. 23.) not only for wrath, i. e. fear or danger of puniſhment, the effect of wrath (the Magiſtrate being Gods Miniſter, and avenger for wrath, or puniſhment to him that doth evil, v. 4.) but alſo διὰ συνείδησιν, for or becauſe of Conſcience, i. e. becauſe it is the command of God, and conſequently that which all inferiours (every ſoul) may, if they be not wilfully blind, know to be their duty, [to be thus ſubject]

Sect. 9. So 1 Cor. 8. 7. For ſome with Conſcience of the idol, i. e. being reſolved in mind, that it is not lawful to eat or taſt of any μέρος or τομὴ, part or portion of the idol-feaſt (whether ἐν εἰδωλείῳ, at the idol-table, or having bought it at the Shambles, as it ſeems, was the faſhion for thoſe τόμαι to be ſold there at ſecond hand, c. 10. 25.) accounting it unlawful to eat any meat conſecrated to that uſe, do yet eat that which is of this nature, and by ſo doing, their weak i. e. uninſtructed conſcience is polluted, i. e. they ſin againſt their Conſcience, do that which they are perſwaded they may not do, which although it be never ſo innocent a harmleſs thing in it ſelf (an idol being ſimply nothing) yet to them which do it, when they think it unlawful (and all have not knowledge, ſaith he in the beginning of the verſe, i. e. are not ſufficiently inſtructed in their duty) it is pollution or ſin, according to the fore-mentioned place Tit. 1. 15. To the pure all things are pure [all things] i. e. all things of that nature, of which there he ſpeaks, though in themſelves indifferent, [are pure] i, e. may lawfully be uſed [by the pure] i. e. by them which are rightly inſtructed, but to the polluted and unbelievers (i. e. to them that are miſled by Jewiſh fables, or by the dogmatizing of falſe teachers, and brought to believe things to be prohibited by God, which are not prohibited) to them that are guilty of this kind of Judaiſm, and (as it is interpretativè) unbelief, there is nothing pure, but their mind and conſcience are polluted, both their underſtanding is in an errour, taking falſity for truth, and their practical reſolution is ſinful alſo, nay obliged to ſin, which way ſoever they turn themſelves, whether they abſtain ſuperſtitiouſly, when they are not bound by God to abſtain, (which is the ſin of thoſe that are ſubject to ordinances, Col. 2. 20. of which I have ſpoken at large in another place) or whether they abſtain not, when they are perſwaded that they ought to abſtain, which is ſin againſt Conſcience.

Tr. of Will-worſhip.

Sect. 10. From whence by the way you may obſerve the miſerable lot of thoſe which have not γνῶσιν knowledge in the beginning of that verſe, which are miſled to think any thing unlawful which is lawful, and continue in that errour without ſeeking of light, which are thus impure (for to ſuch μηδὲν καθαρὸν nothing is pure,) they are, as long as they remain ſo, obliged to ſin, which way ſoever they take to, abſtain or not abſtain. For though in things indifferent and uncommanded, ſimply to abſtain were no ſin, yet then to abſtain ὡς ἀπὸ βδελυκτῦ, as from a thing abominable or unlawful, is both by Scripture and the ancient Councels, in caſe of marriage and meats, every where condemned as ſinful: and yet on the other ſide to eat without, or againſt Faith, i. e. being doubtful whether it be lawful or no, or being perſwaded it is unlawful, is ſin, (ſaith the Apoſtle) and there is great neceſſity to ſuch of ſeeking, (and in others great charity of helping them to) γνῶσιν inſtruction, or right information in this caſe, which is the only cure for this unfortunate malady.

Sect. 11. So again v. 10. συνείδησις ἀδεινῦς the conſcience of him that is weak, or (which is the ſame) v. 7. and v. 12. the weak conſcience] ſignifies that falſe perſwaſion of him that is in an errour, an erroneous Conſcience, weakneſs noting ſickneſs in the Scripture ſtile John 5. 14. 1 Cor. 11. 30. and errour being the diſeaſe or ſickneſs of the ſoul, and that with a little improvement growing deſtructive and mortiferous; as in caſe he that hath that erroneous ſick Conſcience, do act ſomewhat againſt conſcience, and ſo adde ſin unto errour, for then ἀποθνήσκει ὁ ἀδενῶν, v. 11. that ſick man dies, periſhes of that diſeaſe. So ch. 10. 25, 27, 28, 29. the word Conſcience is ſtill in the ſame ſence, for conſcience or conſideration of duty, and ſo 1 Pet. 2. 19. forementioned.

So likewiſe 1 Pet. 3. 21. where baptiſm is called ἀγαθῆς συνειδήσεως ἐπερώτημα εἰς θεὸν the anſwer of a good conſcience to God, the good conſcience ſignifies conſcience rightly inſtructed in its duty, as in baptizing thoſe of full age it is ſuppoſed to be; which Conſcience is then to anſwer and conſent to all Gods propoſals in baptiſm (or the miniſters in Gods ſtead) ſuch as [wilt thou forſake the Devil, &c.] and ſo the words will be interpreted in a ſence proportionable to that of denying ungodly luſts, Tit. 2. 12. which there the appearing of Chriſt is ſaid to teach us. For as luſt propoſes ungodly queſtions to us, which we are bound to deny; ſo God in baptiſm is ſuppoſed to propoſe good queſtions to us, which we are bound to grant, and ſtipulate the performance of them, and that is the ἐπερώτημα the anſwer of a good conſcience to God or to his queſtions propoſed in baptiſm, after the manner of ancient pacts among the Romans made by way of queſtion and anſwer, as part of the ritus ſolennis or formalities of them.

Sect. 12. But then for the ſecond acception of the word, as it notes conſcience of what we have performed, or paſſing judgment on my ſelf for what I have done, (and that either for any one individual act, or for the main of our lives, our ſtate; and that again either firſt acquitting, or ſecondly condemning, or thirdly conſidered in a third notion common to both thoſe, paſſing ſentence in general, ſo ſhall you find it in many other places, and indeed in all the reſt which we have not hitherto named.

Sect. 13. For the firſt of theſe three ſpecies as it acquitteth, you have it Acts 23. 1. I have lived, (or behaved my ſelf in all my converſation towards men πεπολίτευμαι in all my politick, or publick relations) with or in all good conſcience, in ſuch a manner, as I cannot accuſe my ſelf of any thing done contrary to my Chriſtian profeſſion, or dignity of my Apoſtolical calling. So 2 Cor. 1. 12. the Teſtimony of our Conſcience is expreſt by what follows, that in ſimplicity, &c. we had our converſation in the world. So good conſcience is taken 1 Tim. 1. 5. and 19. and 3. 9. and 2 Tim. 1. 3. Heb. 13. 18. 1 Pet. 3. 16. but above all you have a ſpecial place belonging to this firſt branch of the ſecond in Acts 24. 16. Ἀπρόσκοπον συνείδησιν] we render it a Conſcience void of offence, the meaning is, a confidence and aſſurance that he hath done nothing ſubject ſo much as to the cenſure of having ſcandalized others; for St. Paul being there accuſed by the Jews v. 5, 6. for three crimes ſedition, hereſie, and profaning of the Temple, he anſwers to the firſt v. 12. to the ſecond v. 14. to the third v. 16. 18. and his being purified in the Temple after the Jewiſh manner he makes an evidence of his innocence in that particular, a proof of his not having ſcandalized any Jew, which to have done would have been a fault in him, whoſe office it was to become all things to all men, that he might gain or ſave all, and not to diſcourage or deter any who might be gained by compliance; and the doing ſo, is it which is called being ἀπρόσκοποι Ἰουδαίοις, 1 Cor. 10. 32. giving none offence to the Jews, the very word uſed in the place of the Acts.

Sect. 14. In the ſecond place, the accuſing or condemning conſcience is often mentioned alſo; John 8. 9. Convicted by their Conſcience, or reproved ſome for one ſin, ſome for another. So by intimation, Heb. 9. 9. where 'tis ſaid of the Legal ſacrifices that they could not make perfect as pertaining to Conſcience, where the word τελειῶσαι] rendred to make perfect, ſignifies in the ſacred idiom [to conſecrate,] to make a prieſt, whoſe office being προσεγγίζειν τῷ θεῷ to draw near to God, proportionably τελειῶσαι κατὰ συνείδησιν to perfect or conſecrate as pertaining to conſcience ſignifies to give acceſs with boldneſs to God,

God, by taking off that guilt which formerly lay upon their Conſcience, the ſame that v. 14. is called, to purge the conſcience from dead works, to waſh off that guilt of ſin paſt, which hinders their approach to God, obſtructs all entrance to their prayers (for we know that God heareth not ſinners, Jo. 9. 31. and If. 1. 15.) whereupon 'tis obſervable, that Heb. 13. 18. when he beſpeaks their prayers for him, he adds this reaſon to encourage them to do ſo, For we truſt we have a good Conſcience, that good conſcience being neceſſary there to have other mens prayers heard for them, as here to give themſelves acceſs to God in prayer. So Heb. 10. 2. Conſcience, or conſcientiouſneſs of ſins, and v. 22. Evil Conſcience, and ſo Wiſd. 17. 11. there is mention of wickedneſs condemned by her own witneſs and preſt by conſcience.

Sect. 15. And of the laſt ſort, in the latitude common to both, are Rom. 2. 15. Rom. 9. 1. 2 Cor. 4. 2. and 5. 11. and 1 Tim. 4. 2. all clear enough without the help of our paraphraſe to add light to them.

Sect. 16. Having thus marſhalled all theſe places of Scripture into ranks, and given ſome hints of general inſight into them, it now remains that we return a while to the nearer ſurvey of the two general heads, and firſt of the former acception of the word, as it imports a monitor, or director of life, by which our actions muſt be regulated, and from the miſtaking of which the chief inconvenience doth ariſe.

Sect. 17. To which end, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to ſettle and reſolve but one queſtion, what is that Rule or κανων of Conſcience, from whence it muſt receive its regulation. For he that draweth a line of direction for another, muſt have a rule to draw it by, and that a ſtreight exact one, or elſe the directions will not be authentick, and they which walk ἀκριβῶς exactly or conſcientiouſly, muſt τῷ κανονι στοιχεῖν walk by rule, Phil. 3. 16. and τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν have their eye or thought alway upon that one thing, their rule of direction, or elſe be they never ſuch φθάσαντες in the beginning of that verſe, ſuch forward proficients, their end may be perdition, v. 19. This when once we have done, the difficulty will ſoon vaniſh.

Sect. 18. And to this purpoſe I ſhall take that for granted which in theſe I never heard any doubt of, (though many of our actions look otherwiſe in hypotheſi) that law is this only rule; κανων & νομος, rule and law being words of the ſame importance, and nothing fit or proper to regulate our actions, but that which the lawgiver, to whom obedience muſt be payed, hath thought fit to rule them by. To which purpoſe it is ordinarily obſerved that ἁμαρτία, ſin, or aberration from that rule by which we ought to walk (for ſo that word naturally ſignifies) is by St. John 1 Epiſt. 3. 4. defined ἀνομία which we render a tranſgreſſion of the law. In which place of St. John, though the truth is, (ἁμαρτία and ἁμαρτίαν ποιεῖν denoting more than the bare Commiſſion of ſin in that Author generally, viz. the wilful perpetration of it, and an indulgence in, and habit of ſo doing) the word ἀνομία and ἀνομίαν ποιεῖν muſt proportionably alſo ſignifie not only tranſgreſſing, but wilful habitual contemning the law, being an exlex, or without law (as the Idolatrous Atheiſt is ſaid to be without God in the world) i. e. without any account or reſpect of it, (and ſo ποιοῦντες ἀνομίαν John 3 1. 3. notes the greateſt degree of ſinfulneſs, we render it workers of iniquity, and ſo very frequently in the Septuagint we find ἀνομία, where we render the Hebrew by miſchief) yet ſtill the obſervation ſtands good, that law is the rule, in aberration from which all ſin conſiſts, and ſo ἁμαρτία is ἀνομία in both ſences, the leaſt degree of ſin a deviation from the law, and a malicious contentious ſinning, a malicious, contemptuous deviation, or tranſgreſſion; and ſo St. Paul hath alſo reſolved it, that where there is no law, there is no tranſgreſſion, no παράβασις, Rom. 4. 15. no going awry, when there is no rule propos'd to go by.

Sect. 19. This being ſo clear in it ſelf, and yet through the miſtakes, yea and impieties of the world become ſo neceſſary to be thus farther cleared; Two things there are which will hence inevitably follow, the firſt Negative, the ſecond Poſitive; the firſt or the negative, that whatſoever undertakes to direct, or guide our actions, to tell us our duty, that this we muſt, that we may not do, and hath not ſome law, (in force, and ſtill obligatory to us) to authorize thoſe directions by, is not Conſcience, whatſoever it is.

Sect. 20. 1. Humour it may be, to think our ſelves bound to do whatſoever we have a ſtrong inclination to do, it being a matter of ſome difficulty to diſtinguiſh between my natural and my ſpiritual inclinations, the motion of my ſenſitive appetite, and my diviner principle, my lower, and my upper ſoul, and the former commonly crying louder, and moving more lively, and impatiently, and earneſtly than the other.

Sect. 21. 2. Phancy it may be, which is a kind of irrational animal Conſcience, hath the ſame relation to ſenſitive repreſentations (thoſe laws in the members) which Conſcience hath to intellectual (thoſe laws of the mind) and then, as Ariſtotle ſaith, that in thoſe creatures which have not reaſon, phancy ſupplies the place of reaſon; ſo they which have not, or will not have conſcience to direct them, phancy moſt commonly gets into its place. Or,

Sect. 22. Thirdly, Paſſion it may be; Our fears will adviſe us one thing, our animoſities another, our zeal a third, and though that be perhaps zeal of God, yet that zeal is a paſſion ſtill, one of thoſe which Ariſtotle hath defined in his Rhetoricks, being not κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν, according to knowledge or Conſcience, Rom. 10. 2. for the Hebrew word, as I told you, is rendred by thoſe two words promiſcuouſly, ἐπίγνωσις and συνείδησις, knowledge and Conſcience. Or, דַּעַת

Sect. 23. Fourthly, diabolical ſuggeſtion or infuſion it may be, an enthuſiaſm of that black ſpirit; as it is, (or of ſome thing as bad in effect) infallibly, whenſoever Rebellion, Sedition, Murther, Rapine, Hatred, Envy, Uncharitableneſs, Lying, Swearing, Sacriledge, &c. come to us under the diſguiſe of Religion and Conſcience: and therefore the Spirits muſt be ſearcht whether they be of God, or of the Devil; and no ſurer way to do it, than by theſe and the like ſymptoms, theſe fruits and productions of that infernal Spirit, which ſo perfectly repreſent and own their parent, that none but blind or mad men or dæmoniacks can believe them in earneſt to come from God. Or,

Sect. 24. Fifthly, Falſe-doctrine it may be, and that again ſet off either, by the authority of the teacher, or by the dignity of ſome eminent followers and practiſers of it, and then the Apoſtle calls it [having mens perſons in admiration] or by the earlineſs of its repreſentation, being imbibed and taken in firſt, ſwallowed and digeſted before the truth was offered to us, and then 'tis prejudice or prepoſſeſſion, and this again always aſſiſted by the force of that old axiom, [Intus exiſtens, &c.] and by that which is natural to all habits, to be hardly moveable, and yet further improv'd ſometimes by pride and obſtinacy, always by ſelf-love, which makes us think our own opinions (i. e. thoſe which we are already poſſeſt of) the trueſt; which in this caſe is in effect to think our luck the beſt luck, and the ſame which was obſerved in one worſt ſort of Heathens, who, whatſoever they ſaw firſt in the morning, worſhip't that all the day after; a chooſing of perſwaſions as country men chuſe Valentines, that which they chance to meet with firſt after their coming abroad.

Sect. 25. Beſides theſe, many other things it may be, and ſo, 1. 'tis odds enough that it will not be conſcience, which pretends to be ſo, and 2. it is certainly not conſcience, unleſs it produce ſome law for its rule to direct us by. And this was the Negative or firſt thing.

Sect. 26. The ſecond or the Poſitive thing which follows from the premiſſes, is this, that Conſcience of duty in any particular action is to be ruled by that law which is proper to that action; as for example: The Chriſtian law is the rule of Conſcience for Chriſtian actions; the law of reaſon, or moral law, for moral; the law national, municipal, or local, for civil; the natural law of all creatures, for natural actions; and the law of ſcandal, (a branch of the Chriſtian law) for matters of ſcandal; and the law of liberty, for indifferent free actions. And as it is very irregular, and unreaſonable to meaſure any action by a rule that belongs not to it, to try the exactneſs of the circle by the ſquare, which ſhould be done by the compaſs, and in like manner to judge the Chriſtianneſs of an action, by the law of natural reaſon, which can only be judged by its conformity with the law of Chriſt, ſuperiour to that of nature; So will there be no juſt pretence of Conſcience againſt any thing, but where ſome one or more of theſe laws are producible againſt it; but on the other ſide, even in the loweſt ſort of actions, if they be regulated by the law proper to them, and nothing done contrary to any ſuperiour law, even by this God ſhall be glorified, 1 Cor. 10. 31. a kind of glory reſulting to God from that readineſs of ſubmiſſion and ſubordination of every thing to its proper rule, and law, to which the great Creator hath ſubjected it, and of all laws to that ſupreme tranſcendent one, the law of Chriſt. And though ſome touches there are in the Scripture of each of theſe laws, ſome fibræ or ſtrings of them diſcernible there, ſo far, that there is nothing almoſt under any of the heads foremention'd, but by the Scripture ſome general account may be given of it, and again, though that of Scripture be the ſupreme law of all, and nothing authorizable by any inferiour law, which is contradicted or prohibited by that, yet is not that of Scripture ſuch a particular Code or Pandect of all laws, as that every thing which is commanded by any other law, ſhould be found commanded there, or be bound to prove it ſelf juſtifiable from thence, any further than that it is not there prohibited, or thereby juſtly concluded to be unlawful.

Sect. 27. From whence by the way, I conceive direction may be had, and reſolution of that difficult practical probleme, what a man ſhould do in caſe he be legally commanded by his lawful ſuperiour to do what he may lawfully do, which yet he is perſwaded he may not do, or doubteth whether he may or no. For in this caſe if he be not able to produce ſome plain prohibition from ſome ſuperiour law, as from that of Scripture, he cannot be truly ſaid to be perſwaded in conſcience, (which implies knowledge) of the unlawfulneſs of that thing, nor conſequently hath he any plea for diſobedience, to that lawful command of his Superiour. All that may be ſaid, is, that he may from ſome obſcure place miſunderſtood have cauſe or occaſion to doubt whether he may do it or no; and then, although doubting ſimply taken (i. e. where no command interpoſes,) may keep me from doing what I doubt, yet it ought not to be of that weight, as to keep me from my lawful Superiours lawful command, becauſe that very command is a ſufficient ground to ſuperſede my doubting, when I have no plain prohibition of Scripture to the contrary, (which in this caſe I am ſuppoſed not to have, for if I had, Then, firſt, it were not a lawful command, and ſecondly, I ſhould not doubt, but be aſſured) it being my duty, and part of my Chriſtian meekneſs, in doubtful matters to take my reſolution from thoſe whom God hath placed over me, and it being the ſin of dogmatizing to affirm any thing unlawful for me or others to do, which ſome law of God, &c. ſtill in force, doth not prohibit; which ſin being added to that other of diſobedience to my lawful Superiours, will ſure never be able to make that commence vertue, which was before ſo far from any pretenſions to that title.

Sect. 28. Having proceeded thus far in the ſearch of the ground of Conſcience, 'twere now time to reduce this operation to practice, and ſhew you, 1. What directions Conſcience is able to afford from every of thoſe laws for the ruling of all actions of that kind, and ſecondly, what an harmony and conſpiration there is betwixt all theſe laws, one mutually aiding and aſſiſting the other, and not violating or deſtroying. But this were the largeſt undertaking that could be pitcht on in the whole circle of learning, Ævodius's Pandectæ rerum ab omni ævo judicatarum, and all the Schoolmens and Caſuiſts volumes, de legibus, de jure & juſtitiâ, and on the decalogue, would be but imperfect parts of this; I ſhall give you but one taſt or δεῖγμα of it, by which the reader will be perſwaded to ſpare me, or rather himſelf that trouble.

Sect. 29. The prime of theſe, the Chriſtian law, is the rule of all actions that come within that ſphere, ſets down the nature of all Chriſtian duties of piety, and love of our brethren in general, and more particularly of Faith, Hope, Charity, Repentance, ſelf-denial, taking up the Croſs, &c. of humility, meekneſs, mercifulneſs, peaceableneſs, obedience to ſuperiours, patience, contentedneſs, and the like; and the relation of a Chriſtian being a grand tranſcendent relation, there is no action imaginable, but may either in reſpect of the matter, or motive, or principle, or circumſtances, offend againſt one of theſe, (and then, malum ex quolibet defectu, the leaſt of theſe defects blemiſheth it) and ſo conſcience directed by that rule or law, will direct me either to do it, or not to do it in that manner, and then 'tis not any compliance with, or agreeableneſs to any or all other laws, which will make this action Chriſtian, which hath any ſuch notable defect or blemiſh in it; Not to purſue this any farther, having thus named it, and ſhewed you the vaſtneſs of the ſea it leads to, it will ſuffice to our preſent deſign to tell you, that from what is ſaid, theſe 3. corollaries, to omit many others, will be deducible.

1. That

1. That it is not poſſible for Conſcience (be it never ſo ſtrongly perſwaded) to make any action lawful, which is not regulated by thoſe rules, or laws which are proper to it, and reconcileable with the grand rule, the Chriſtian law. Conſcience can never transform profaneneſs into piety, ſacriledge into juſtice or holineſs, rebellion into obedience, faction into humility, perjury, or taking of unlawful oaths into religion, rapine into contentedneſs, inhumanity into mercifulneſs, adultery, fornication, divorces, (ſave in caſe of adultery) or any uncleanneſs into purity, labouring to ſhake a Kingdom, (to remove the croſs from my own ſhoulders to another mans) into taking up of the Croſs; but contrarywiſe, if it be truly and univocally Conſcience of duty, it will tell me that every one of theſe foul titles belongs to every ſuch action (the ſcripture being ſo clear in theſe particulars, that there is no place or excuſe for ignorance or miſtake) and by ſetting before me the terrors of the Lord, perſwade me not to venture on any one ſuch action upon any terms; or if I have ventured, it will ſmite and wound me for it, and drive me to timely Repentance; or if it do not, 'tis either a cauterized inſenſate conſcience, a reprobate mind, or elſe ſome of theſe Images, which even now I mentioned, miſtaken for Conſcience; or if it be a full perſwaſion of mind, that what I thus am about, I am obliged to do, (if that be a poſſible thing in ſuch matters and under ſo much light) 'tis then in the calmeſt ſtile an erroneous Conſcience, which is ſo far from excuſing me (unleſs in caſe of ignorance truly invincible, which here is not imaginable) that it brings upon me the moſt unparallel'd infelicity in the world, an obligation to ſin which way ſoever I turn my ſelf, on one ſide appearing and lying at my door the guilt of committing that ſin which I have ſo miſtaken, and on the other the guilt of omitting that (though ſin) which my Conſcience repreſented to me as duty; and nothing but repentance and reformation of judgment firſt, and then of practice, will be able to retrive the one or the other. Sect. 30.

The ſecond Corollary will be this; That 'tis the moſt unreaſonable inſolence in the world, for them that can ſwallow ſuch Camel-ſins as theſe without any regrets, nay with full approbation, and direction (perhaps) of Conſcience (if that may be called Conſcience which is ſo divided from, and contrary to knowledge) yet to ſcruple and interpoſe doubts moſt tremblingly, and moſt conſcientiouſly in matters of indifferency not ſo much as pretended to be againſt the word of God, (and ſo within the law of Chriſtian liberty, that they may be done if we will) and yet over and above their natural indifferency commanded by that authority, in ſubjection to which the Chriſtian vertue of obedience conſiſts; and all this either Firſt upon no ground of Conſcience at all, but only that 'tis contrary to their Phancy, their Humour, their Prepoſſeſſions; or Secondly becauſe it is a reſtraint upon their Chriſtian liberty, which yet Chriſt never forbad to be reſtrained quoad exercitium, as far as belongs to the exerciſe of it, but hath permitted ſometime the care of not offending the weak brother, i. e. Charity, and ſometime Obedience, to lawful ſuperiours, to reſtrain it, (for if in things indifferent they may not reſtrain, there can no obedience be payed to them;) or Thirdly becauſe they are offenſive (though not to them, yet) to others, who are perſwaded they are unlawful, Whereas firſt, that perſwaſion of thoſe others is erroneous, and not ſufficient to juſtify diſobedience in themſelves, much leſs in other men, in caſe of lawful humane command. And ſecondly, that their cenſuring of ſuch indifferent actions, i. e. being angry without a cauſe, may be greater matter of ſcandal, and ſo more offenſive to others, and more probable to work upon them to bring them by that example to be ſo angry alſo, than the doing that indifferent action, miſtaken by others, and condemned for unlawful, would be to bring them to tranſcribe that reprobated ſamplar, i. e. to do what they thus condemn; all men being far more apt and inclinable to break out into paſſions, than into acts againſt Conſcience, and ſo more likely to be ſcandalized or offended, or inſnared, by following the former, than the latter example, to ſin (for company or after another man) by cenſuring whom he cenſures, which is being angry without a cauſe, then by doing what they are adviſed and reſolved they ought not to do, which is ſinning againſt Conſcience. Or fourthly becauſe they are againſt their Conſcience to do, whilſt yet they produce no law of God or man againſt them, and ſo in effect confeſs there is nothing in them againſt conſcience; unleſs, as before was noted, they wilfully æquivocate in the word Conſcience; which will and skill of theirs, as it will not make any thing unlawful, which before was indifferent, ſo will it not conclude ought, ſave only this, that they which are ſo artificious to impoſe on others, and form ſcruples where there were none, would not be thought the likelieſt men to ſwallow groſs ſins under the diſguiſe of vertues, or if they do ſo, will have leaſt right to that only antidote of invincible ignorance to digeſt them. Sect. 31.

The third Corollary will be this, that ſcrupulouſneſs of conſcience in ſome lighter leſs important matters (if it may be ſuppoſed excuſable, as a weakneſs of an uninſtructed mind, joined with that good ſymptom of tenderneſs or quick ſenſe, yet) can never hope to be accepted by God by way of commutation or expiation for groſſer ſins, ſo that he that falls foully in any confeſſed ſin, ſhould fare the better at the great day of account, or be in leſs danger of being caſt out of Gods favour for the preſent, becauſe he is over ſcrupulous in other things. For ſure this were a ſtrange way of ſupererogation to pay one arrear to God by running into another with him, to diſcharge a debt by owing more. And yet this is an errour which may ſeem worth the pains of preventing, it being ſo notoriouſly ſeen, that ſome men, which profeſs to have care of their ways, and muſt in charity be believed to have ſo, go on confidently in grievous ſins, which they cannot but know will damn without repentance, (the ſentence of not inheriting the Kingdom of God, Gal. 5. being ſo diſtinct, and punctual, and abſolute, and indiſpenſable againſt them) and yet have no antidote to rely on for the averting that danger, but only this of their exactneſs and ſcrupulouſneſs in things indifferent; which if they ſhall ſay they do not confide in, they are then obliged in conſcience, and charity to their brethren (who may follow them to this precipice) either to give over hoping, or to ſet to purifying, without which there is no true ground of hope. This hint puts me in mind, that there is another part of my deſign ſtill behind, belonging to the ſecond notion of Conſcience, to examine. Sect. 32.

What 'tis that is required to entitle a man to a good Conſcience; which will briefly be ſtated by premiſing what before was mentioned, that the Good Conſcience belongs either to particular ſingle performances, Sect. 33.

performances, or to the whole ſtate of life and actions. To the firſt there is no more required, but that that particular action be both for matter and circumſtance regulated by the rule, or rules which are proper to it, and have nothing contrary to any ſuperiour tranſcendent rule. As that my meat be with ſobriety and thankſgiving, my alms with chearfulneſs, liberality, diſcretion, done in gratitude and obedience to God, and mercifulneſs to my brother, without reflexion on my own gain or praiſe in this world. But for the Good Conſcience, which belongs to the whole ſtate of life and actions which is called a good Conſcience in all things, Heb. 13. 18. or a good Conſcience conſiſting in having a good converſation in all things, (for ſo the * punctation in the Greek will direct rather to render it, [we have a good conſcience, willing to live well, (or have an honeſt converſation) in all things]) there the difficulty will be greater. And yet two Texts there are which tend much to the clearing and diſinvolving of that one, 1 Pet. 3. 16. where ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις, Good Conſcience in the beginning of the verſe, is explained in the cloſe by ἀγαθὴ ἐν χριστῷ ἀναστροφὴ, a good Converſation in Chriſt, or a good Chriſtian converſation, or ſuch as now through Chriſt, by the purport of the ſecond Covenant may and ſhall be accepted for good. Where the word [converſation] denoting firſt the actions and behaviour both toward God and man, and ſecondly, the whole courſe and frame of thoſe actions, (wherein it ſeems a good Conſcience conſiſts,) cannot better be explained than either by the Apoſtles ἀκριβῶς περιπατεῖν, an accurate exact walking, Eph. 5. 15. or the phraſe to Titus, c. 2. 12. living ſoberly and righteouſly and godly in this preſent world; the firſt reſpecting our duty to our ſelves, or actions, as private men, the ſecond, our duty to our brethren, in our more publick capacities, the third, our duty to God as creatures, men, and Chriſtians; or Saint Luke's character of Zachary and Elizabeth, Luke 1. 6. Walking in all the Commandments and Ordinances of the Lord blameleſs; Walking Blameleſs, In all: Univerſal ſincere obedience, (not entire or perfect without ever ſinning, but) conſidered with the rules of ἐπιείκεια, or moderation of ſtrict law, (which is now part of the νόμος πίστεως, the Goſpel-law, by which a Chriſtian is to be tryed, as equity is a part of the municipal law of this land; Such is mercy for frailties, and infirmities, and groſſer lapſes recovered and retracted by repentance) now under the Goſpel, ſo as to be acceptable to God in Chriſt; which was intimated (as in the ἐν χριστῷ, in Chriſt, 1 Pet. 3. ſo) in the former part of that verſe, and their character δίκαιοι ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ, righteous before God. Which phraſe [Before God] hath a double intimation worth obſerving in this place, firſt of the perſeverance or perpetuity of that righteouſneſs (as oppoſed to the temporary of the hypocrite) for the phraſe, ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ [before him] refers to the ſhew-bread of old, Exod. 25. 30. which was to be ſet before God alway; and therefore is ſometime called לחם פנים the bread of faces, or לפני bread before his face, literally ἐνώπιον, before him, and ſometimes, לחם תמיד perpetual bread, and ſecondly, of the acceptation or reception in the ſight of God, for that again was the end of ſetting the bread always before God, that God looking on it might accept them; and ſo righteouſneſs before God, is ſuch righteouſneſs as God will pleaſe in the Goſpel to accept of, as when viſiting the fatherleſs, &c. Jac. 1. 27. is called, religion pure and undefiled before God the Father; it noteth ſuch a degree of unblemiſh't purity, not as excluded all ſin, but as God in Chriſt would (or hath promiſed to) accept of. And the ſame phraſe therefore is in another place of the ſame Chapter, Luke 1. 75. rendred by our Church in the Goſpel for Midſummer day by theſe words, ſuch as may be acceptable for him.

Sect. 34. Which being all taken into the deſcription of a good conſcience, that it is ſuch a continued good converſation as God now under the Goſpel promiſeth to accept of; the only difficulty behind will be, what that is which God promiſeth to accept of; To which end, it will be very inſtrumental to take in that other place which I promiſed, and that is that forementioned, Heb. 13. 18. where the Good Conſcience is evidenced (or the ground of confidence that he hath a good conſcience, demonſtrated) by this [ἐν πᾶσι καλῶς θέλοντες ἀναστρέφεσθαι, willing, or reſolving, or endeavouring to live honeſtly, or to have honeſt converſation in all things. From whence the only thing which I deſire to collect is this, That the ſincere reſolution or endeavour to live honeſtly in all things (which I remember, one of our ancienteſt Church-writers Saint Cyril of Jeruſalem calls, θέλημα δικαιοπραγεῖν, and oppoſes it to ἔργα, works) is the Scripture-nomination of a good Conſcience, or the μέγας παῤῥησίας θησαυρὸς, that great treaſure of confidence to all which have it; that ground of mature perſwaſion for any, that he hath, or ſhall by God be allowed, and acknowledged to have a good Conſcience.

Sect. 35. And if it be farther demanded, what is neceſſarily required, (and how much will be ſufficient) to denominate a man Such, what is the minimum quod ſic of this ſincere reſolution, or endeavour, although that, I confeſs, will be hard, if not impoſſible, to define in ſuch a manner, as ſhall come home to every particular, (the proportions of more or leſs knowledge or ſtrength, the inequality of the talents of illuminating and aſſiſting grace ſtill interpoſing and making a variation) yet will it not be matter of much difficulty to give ſome general advertiſements, and πρόληψις, which will be acknowledged as ſoon as mentioned, and being put together, and by each man ſingly applyed to his particular caſe, by way of ſelf-examination, will be able to tell him in ſome meaſure, whether he hath a good Conſcience or no. And the firſt of theſe will be. That,

Sect. 36. Acts and habits of ſin in the former (heathen or unregenerate) part of the life, of what nature (and clothed with what aggravations) ſoever, if they are now retracted and renounced by repentance (as that ſignifies not only a ſorrow, but a thorow change) are reconcileable with a good conſcience. The truth of which is clear, firſt, becauſe the Goſpel allows place for repentance, and promiſes reſt to the heavy laden, ſo he come unto Chriſt, and mercy to him that confeſſeth and forſaketh. Secondly, becauſe the ſincerity of reſolution and indeavour now, (which is all that is required to a preſent good Conſcience) is reconcileable with paſt ſins, even of the largeſt ſize. Thirdly, becauſe Saint Paul himſelf, which was once a Saul, can yet ſay confidently, that he hath a good Conſcience. And Fourthly, becauſe (which I ſhall a little enlarge on) the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, which alone is by the Goſpel made uncapable of remiſſion, is as I conceive, no act, no nor courſe of any ſpecial ſin, but a ſtate of final impenitence, a continued perſevering reſiſtance of all thoſe ſaving methods which are conſequent to the deſcent, and are parts of the office of the Holy Ghoſt.

To

To which purpoſe I ſhall give you one hint which may perſwade the preferring of this opinion before the contrary, and it is by obſerving the occaſion of Chriſts delivering thoſe words concerning the irremiſſibleneſs of ſpeaking againſt the holy Ghoſt. Thoſe words are delivered by Chriſt both in St. Matthew and St. Mark upon occaſion of that ſpeech of the Jews, that Chriſt Caſt out Devils, by the Prince of Devils, which was clearly a blaſpheming or ſpeaking contumeliouſly againſt Chriſt himſelf, or the ſon of man, and there is no paſſage in the text which can conclude that that ſpeech of theirs was by Chriſt called the blaſphemy againſt the holy Ghoſt, but rather the contrary that it was a blaſphemy only againſt the ſon of man; for 'tis apparent that Chriſt Mat. 12. 15. for the ſpace of ſix verſes ſets himſelf to convince them of the falſity of that ſpeech (which probably he would not have done, if they, to whom he ſpake, had been in an irrecoverable irreverſible eſtate of blaſphemy.) For that he ſhould take ſuch pains only to leave them unexcuſable, firſt there was no great need, in this caſe they were ſo already: ſecondly 'tis a miſtake to think that Chriſt doth ſo at any time, they are bowels of mercy and not deſigns of miſchieving, or accumulating their ſin, and judgments, which incline him to call and knock, and labour to convince ſinners, and having done that, doth both invite them to repentance by ſhewing them the poſſibility of pardon yet, and give them an admonition able to ſhake them out of all impenitence, by telling them the danger which attended, if the only laſt method of working on them which was yet behind, did not proſper with or work upon them. This is the importance of that 31. and 32. verſe concerning the ſpeaking a word, i. e. ſtanding out againſt the ſon of man on one ſide, and the holy Ghoſt on the other; the ſum of which is this, there ſhall be by the coming of the holy Ghoſt a poſſibility of pardon and means of reformation for thoſe that reſiſt and hold out and even crucify Chriſt (as by the coming of Chriſt, there was for thoſe that ſhould believe on him, though they had formerly lived diſobedient unto God the Father, reſiſted thoſe methods of mercy uſed on them under the Old Teſtament) for them that ſpeak a word, i. e. by an Hebraiſm do an action (of affront, of injury, of contumely) againſt Chriſt, yea that reſiſt and believe not on him, but conceive and affirm him to caſt out Devils by the power of Beelzebub (which was as contumelious a thing as could be ſaid of him) but when Chriſt ſhall be taken from the earth, and the holy Ghoſt ſhall be ſent down to convince the world of that great ſin of crucifying Chriſt, and to ſettle in the Church of God ſuch an orderly uſe of all Goſpel-means that may tend to the bringing ſinners to repentance (the uſe both of the word and ſacrament and cenſures and all other things neceſſary to that great end of working on the moſt contumacious) that if this prevail not, there is little hope left of ever working on ſuch perverſeneſs, then 'tis to be reſolved, that thoſe that thus ſtand out againſt all thoſe ſaving methods of Gods laſt œconomy, ſhall be left uncapable of any good, of any whether means of yet-farther-working on them, or of pardon either in the Church or in Heaven, there being no more perſons in the God-head now behind (unleſs we will change the Chriſtians Trinity into Pythagoras's τετρακτυν) nor conſequently means in the providence of God, for the reducing of, or obtaining mercy for ſuch. By this 'twill appear that this blaſphemy againſt the holy Ghoſt is not any one act, no nor habit of ſin (particularly not that ſpeaking againſt Chriſt there, which you will alſo gheſs by Saint Luke, who mentions not that ſpeech of theirs concerning his caſting out Devils by the Prince of Devils, and yet ſets down this ſpeech of Chriſt, of the irremiſſibility of this blaſphemy againſt the holy Ghoſt, Luke 12. 10. which argues that this hath no near relation to that) but a final holding out againſt, and reſiſting the whole office of the holy Ghoſt, and all thoſe gracious methods conſequent to it. Sect. 37.

To which I ſhall only adde in reference to my preſent purpoſe (that there may be no place of doubting even to him which will not receive my interpretation of this place) that even by thoſe which conceive it to be ſome ſpecial kind of ſin, yet the unpardonableneſs of it is acknowledged to ariſe from thence, that 'tis impoſſible for any ſuch to repent, yet not for any that repents, to find pardon and mercy, which is ſufficient for the confirmation of my preſent propoſition. Sect. 38.

'Tis true indeed, that he that is ſold a ſlave of ſin, the unregenerate carnal man, is, whilſt he is ſo, in a moſt hopeleſs, comfortleſs eſtate, and if he have any natural conſcience left him it muſt needs be a kind of fiend and fury within him, No peace to ſuch wicked, ſaith my God, and 'tis as true that the recovery of ſuch a man out of the grave of rottenneſs, that Lazar-ſtate in ſin, is a miracle of the firſt magnitude, a work of greateſt difficulty (Chriſt groans at the raiſing of him that was four days dead and putrified in the grave) and coſts the ſinner much dearer to be raiſed out of it. Saul is ſtruck down in his march towards Damaſcus, blind and trembling before his converſion; but yet ſtill when this converſion is wrought, he may have a good Conſcience, what ever his fore-going ſins were.

And although the Apoſtles Cenſure Heb. 6. 6. and 10. 26. light yet heavyer upon thoſe who after the knowledge of the truth and guſt of the life to come, and participation of the holy ſpirit relapſe to their former ſins, it being there affirmed that there is no poſſibility to renew them, or (as the Greeks read it) for them to renew or recover to repentance, and conſequently the ſacrifice for ſin [ὐκ ἔτι ἀπολείπεται] no longer belonging to or remaining for them, yet doth not this hinder the truth of the preſent propoſition; for firſt thoſe places to the Hebrews belong not to the ſins of the unregenerate life, which only now we ſpeak of, but of the relapſe after the knowledge of the truth, ſecondly, even in thoſe places ſpeaking of thoſe ſins, the doctrine is not, that there ſhall be any difficulty of obtaining pardon for them upon repentance, (for the Subject of the Apoſtles propoſitions is the παραπεσόντες and ἁμαρτάνοντες men conſidered excluſively to repentance, as abiding in ſin unreformed impenitent, and to ſuch we deſign not to allow mercy) but that this is ſo great a grieving and quenching of the ſpirit of God, that it becometh very difficult, and in ordinary courſe impoſſible for them that are guilty of it to repent, πάλιν ἀναλανίζειν εἰς μετάνοιαν, again to recover to repentance: It being juſt and ordinary with God upon ſuch ſins of thoſe to whom he hath given grace, to withdraw that grace again according to his method and œconomy of providence expreſt in the parable of the talents, [from him that hath not made uſe of the grace or talent given, ſhall be taken away even that which he hath,] and Wiſd. 1. 5. the holy ſpirit of diſcipline will not abide where unrighteouſneſs cometh in, and ſo being thus deprived of that grace, 'tis conſequently impoſſible that thoſe ſhould ἀναλανίζειν, in a neutral ſence, renew and recover, or in an active reciprocal renew or recover themſelves, to repentance, though yet Sect. 39. ἀναλανίζειν.

for God to give a new ſtock of grace it is not impoſſible, but only a thing which he hath not by revealed promiſe obliged himſelf to do; and therefore whether he will do it, or no, is merely in his own hand and diſpoſitive power, and that which no man hath ground to hope and title to challenge from him. All which notwithſtanding our preſent propoſition ſtands firm, that where there is repentance, or true thorow-change, thoſe former retracted acts or habits are reconcileable with good Conſcience.

Sect. 40. The ſecond this, that Sins of weakneſs of all kinds, whether firſt, of ignorance, or ſecondly, of natural infirmity, the one for want of light, the other for want of grace, or thirdly, of ſuddain ſurreption, ſuch as both by the law of [Si quis præcipiti calore] in the Code of Juſtinian, and by the municipal laws of moſt nations, are matter of extenuation to ſome crimes, to diſcharge them from capital puniſhment, at leaſt to make them capable of pardon, or fourthly, of daily continual incurſion, either for want of ſpace to deliberate at all, or becauſe 'tis morally impoſſible to be upon the guard to be deliberate always, (opere in longo fas eſt obrepere ſomnum) or fifthly, which through levity of the matter paſſes by undiſcerned, and the like, are reconcileable with a good Conſcience, becauſe again, be a man never ſo ſincerely reſolute and induſtrious in endeavour to abſtain from all ſin, yet as long as he carries fleſh about him, (which is ſuch a principle of weakneſs, that ordinarily in the New Teſtament, the word fleſh is ſet to ſignify weakneſs) ſuch weakneſſes he will be ſubject to, ſuch frailties will be ſure to drop from him. This, I remember, Pariſienſis illuſtrates handſomely, firſt, by the ſimilitude of an armed man provided with ſtrength and proweſs, and wreſtling with another in lubrico, on a ſlippery ground, who though neither weapons nor ſtrength nor courage fail him, yet may he very probably fall, the ſlipperneſs of the footing will betray him to that; or ſecondly, by an horſeman mounted on an unmanaged or tender-mouth'd horſe, who cannot with all his skill and caution ſecure himſelf from all miſadventures, the beaſt may upon a check come over with him, or getting the bit upon the tooth run into the enemies quarters; or thirdly, by a City that is provided for a ſiege with works and men, and victuals, and ammunition, and yet by a treacherous party within may be betrayed into the enemies hands; There is a principle of weakneſs within like that ſlippery pavement, that tender-mouthed beaſt, that inſidious party, which will make us ſtill liable to ſuch miſcarriages, and nothing in this contrary either to courage or diligence, to reſolution, or indeavour. And for ſuch as theſe frailties, ignorances, infirmities, &c. So they be laboured againſt, and the means of preventing or overcoming them ſincerely uſed (which if it be done, you ſhall find them daily wayn in you, and if they do not ſo in ſome meaſure, you have reaſon to ſuſpect, and to double your diligence) there is ſure mercy in Chriſt to be had, obtainable, by daily confeſſion, and ſorrow, and prayer for forgiveneſs of treſpaſſes) without any compleat conqueſt atchieved over them in this life. It being St. Pauls affirmation, very exactly and critically ſet down Rom. 5. 6. that Chriſt ὄντων ἡμῶν ἔτι ὄν, ὄντας ἀσεβῶν ἀπέθανε, we being weak, died for the ungodly, to note the univerſal benefit of his death for ſuch weak ones and ſuch ſins as theſe to which mere weakneſs betrays them.

συγγνώμων ἐν τῷ ἁμαρτῶν ἀνθρωπίνως λήγοντα. Thucyd. l. 3. p. 198. and σύγγνωμον δ' ἔδοξε τὸ ἀκούσιον, ἅτε ἑκόντες μὲν οὐκ ἐλάσσαν. Ibid.

Hooper. The very doctrine which from that text at the beginning of our reformation our Reverend Biſhop Martyr did aſſert in his excellent preface to his explication of the commandments.

Sect. 41. To which purpoſe I ſhall only add one proof more, taken from the τὸ λογικὸν or rational importance of Saint Pauls exhortation, Rom. 15. 1. We that are ſtrong, ſaith he, muſt bear the weakneſſes, ἀσθενήματα, of them which are not ſtrong, ἀδυνάτων; and not pleaſe our ſelves, for v. 3. Chriſt did not ſo, but &c. which reaſon ſure muſt come home to both parts, the affirmative as well as the negative (or elſe the Logick will not be good) and ſo the affirmative be, that Chriſt bare the infirmities of the weak; and ſo again v. 7. [προσελάβετο ἡμᾶς] applied to the ſame matter he took us up when we were thus fallen. I might add more, but I hope rather that I have ſaid too much in ſo plain a point, and abundantly evinced the reconcileableneſs of ſuch frailties with a good Conſcience.

Sect. 42. A third thing is, that The luſting of the fleſh againſt the ſpirit is reconcileable with a good Conſcience, ſo it be in him that walketh in the ſpirit, obeys the deſires and dictates of that, and fulfilleth not the luſts of the fleſh, Gal. 5. 16, 17. There is no ſpiritually good thing that a man ever doth in his life, but the fleſh hath ſome mutinyings, luſtings, and objections, againſt it, there being ſuch a contrariety, betwixt the commands of Chriſt and the deſires of the fleſh, that no man, which hath thoſe two within him, d th the things that he would. (For ſo 'tis, ἵνα μὴ ποιῆτε, that you do not, not that you cannot do) [The things that he would] (i. e. the things, which either he reſolves to do, or takes delight in) thoſe he doeth not, i. e. either purely without ſome mixture, or ſtill without ſome oppoſition of the contrary, or (as again the place may be rendred,) this oppoſition of theſe two one againſt another tendeth to this, that we may not do, or to hinder us from doing every thing that we would, as indeed we ſhould do, were there not that oppoſition within our own breaſts. This is the meaning of that 17. verſe, which notwithſtanding it follows v. 18. that if we be led by the ſpirit, if that be victorious over the contrary pretender (as it may, though t'other luſt againſt it) if the production be not works of the fleſh, adultery, &c. v. 19. but the fruit of the ſpirit, love, peace, &c. v. 22. againſt ſuch there is no law, no condemnation, no accuſation of Conſcience here, or hereafter.

Sect. 43. For it muſt be obſerved, that there is great difference betwixt this luſting of the fleſh againſt the ſpirit in them that are led by the ſpirit, Gal. 5. and the warring of the law in the Members againſt the law in the mind, which bring th into captivity to the law of ſin, i. e. to it ſelf, Rom. 7. For thoſe in whom that latter is to be found are there ſaid to be Carnal, ſold under ſin (as a ſlave was wont ſub haſtâ to be ſold) and ſo ἄγεσθαι ὑπὸ σαρκὸς to be led by the fleſh and fulfil the luſts of the fleſh, which is of all things moſt unreconcileable with that mans ſtate, againſt whom there is no condemnation in Chriſt, Rom. 8. 1. and ſo with a good Conſcience.

Sect. 44. And if the reſiſtance of the mind, or the law moral, of the ſpirit, or the law Chriſtian, be ſufficient to excuſe that action or habitual courſe which is committed and lived in, in oppoſition to both of theſe, or while both of theſe check and contradict, then ſure are ſins againſt Conſcience become (if not the moſt excuſable ſins, yet) the more excuſable for this, that they are againſt Conſcience; that woulding or contending of the mind, or the law of the mind being no other but the dictate of the inſtructed Conſcience, (in them which know the law, Rom. 7. 1.) which he that obeys not but follows the the law or command of ſin againſt it, hath not ſure a good Conſcience, in our ſecond ſence as that ſignifies a Conſcience of well-doing or doing nothing againſt rule of Conſcience, for that this man in terminis is ſuppoſed to do.

Having now proceeded thus far in the affirmative part in ſhewing what ſins are reconcileable with a good Conſcience, I ſhould now proceed to the negative part and ſhew what are not reconcileable therewith. But before I advance to that, there is one claſſis or head of ſins, about which there is ſome queſtion and difficulty of reſolving, to which of the extreams it ſhould be reduced, i. e. whether it be reconcileable, or unreconcileable with a good Conſcience. And that is the ſingle Commiſſion of ſome act of known ſin, which hath not the Apology of weakneſs to excuſe it, and yet is not indulged or perſiſted, or continued in, (for of thoſe that are ſo, you ſhall hear anon in the 8. propoſition) but without delay retracted by humiliation and reformation; For the ſtating and ſatisfying of which 'twill be neceſſary firſt, to obſerve that, Sect. 45.

Any ſuch act of willful ſin, Firſt, hath in it ſelf a being, and ſo is capable of a notion abſtracted from the retraction of it. Yea ſecondly, is a work of ſome time, and though it be never ſo ſuddainly retracted by repentance, yet ſome ſpace there is before that retractation; and if we ſpeak of that time or ſpace, there is no doubt, but that act, firſt, is contrary to good conſcience, and contracts a guilt, and conſequent to that, the diſpleaſure of God and obligation to puniſhment, which nothing but repentance can do away; yea and ſecondly, is a natural means of weakening that habit of good, of ſauciating and wounding the ſoul, and for that time putting it in a bloudy direful condition, and ſhould God before repentance ſtrike, for ought we know there would be no remiſſion, and ſo, fearful would be the end of that ſoul. Sect. 46.

But then ſecondly, if before God thus viſit in juſtice, repentance interpoſe, (as in this preſent caſe we ſuppoſe it doth) if this plank be caught hold on inſtantly upon the ſhipwrack, if he that hath committed this act of carnality, &c. lye not down (after the manner of the Grecian horſes in St. Ambroſe's expreſſion, qui cùm ceciderint, quandam tenent quietis & patientiæ diſciplinam, are taught, when they fall in the race, not to ſtrive or endeavour to get up again, lye ſtill on the ground with great ſtilneſs and patience) walk not after the fleſh, Rom. 8. 1. Then preſently is he ſet right again in Gods favour, upon (performance of the ſolemnities, as it were, payment of the fees of the court) humiliation, contrition, confeſſion, and lowly ſupplications to God for pardon in Chriſt, and ſo then to him thus repaired there is no condemnation; beſide the forementioned effects that attended that ſin at the time, there is no future arrear behind in the other world. Sect. 47.

As for the other effect of ſin in this life, the waſting of the Conſcience, or provoking of God to withdraw his grace, though any ſuch act of wilful ſin may juſtly be thought to do that alſo in ſome degree, firſt, to ſtop God from going on in his current of liberality, and ſecondly, to caſt us back from that plenitude and abundance, which before in the riches of Gods bounty in Chriſt was afforded, and ſo much weaken our ſtock of grace, leave us much more infirm than we were before the commiſſion; yet we find not any threat in Scripture that God will, upon this provocation of one ſingle act not perſiſted in, preſently withdraw all grace, but we have reaſon to hope what the article of our Church ſuppoſes, that in this caſe he leaves ſufficient grace to enable that child of his that thus falls, by that his grace to return again. Sect. 48.

And if that ſad preſage, Heb. 6. 6. ſeem to any to withſtand this, the anſwer will be prompt and eaſy, by obſerving that the word παραπεσόντας, there [the fallers away] ſignifies more than ſome one ſingle act of ſin preſently retracted again, even a general apoſtaſy in their practice, (if not in their faith) a return to their former unregenerate ſins, (as the phraſe ἐμπλακέντες ἡττῶνται, [they being entangled are overcome] notes 2 Pet. 2. 20. a place perfectly parallel to this, and) as in this place the ancients have generally interpreted. And then though ſuch indulgence in ſin, ſuch returning to the vomit or mire again in that other place, do provoke God to withdraw his grace neceſſary to enable them to repent, yea and caſt them back into a worſe eſtate than they were in, not only before ſuch ſinning, but even before their converſion, 2 Pet. 2. 20. Yet that God will ſo puniſh with total deſertion any one act or commiſſion preſently retracted again, 'tis not affirmed here nor any where elſe, that I have obſerved, but rather on the contrary, that he will viſit them with chaſtiſements, which are a grace and a means to recal them, without any utter forſaking or taking of his loving kindneſs from them, Pſal. 89. 33, 35. Sect. 49.

That this matter may be throughly cleared, I ſhall ſuppoſe this objection made againſt what hath hitherto been ſaid of it, that it may ſeem by this doctrine, [that the regenerate man may be under Gods diſpleaſure] that he that remains ſanctified may be unjuſtified, for ſo he will be, if all his ſins be not forgiven him, which they are not, if this act of ſin not yet repented of, be not forgiven. In anſwer to this, I ſhall reinforce my affirmation, that of neceſſity it muſt be granted, if we believe the Scripture, that any ſuch act of ſin unretracted by repentance, doth certainly ſtand upon the ſinners ſcore unremitted; for that God (as ſome affirm) doth at the firſt act of my being juſtified forgive all my ſins not only paſt, preſent, but alſo future too, cannot be ſaid, but upon a ſuppoſition that that man will never commit any ſuch ſin againſt which the Goſpel threatens periſhing, i. e. any deliberate preſumptuous ſin, (which ſuppoſition if it were true, would infer an impoſſibility of the regenerate mans thus ſinning, not an aſſurance of his pardon without (or abſtracted from the conſideration of) his repentance, (which is the only point in hand) for if he do, then upon confeſſion and forſaking there is promiſe of mercy, and not otherwiſe, and in brief without repentance there is no remiſſion: and therefore 'tis obſervable, that they which thus affirm, find themſelves enforced to fly to Gods omnipotence and immenſity, to whom all things are preſent, by help of which they can conceive and reſolve that at the time of that ſins being upon him unrepented of, God yet ſeeing his future repentance as preſent, may ſeal his pardon, and then may by the ſame reaſon do ſo alſo before the commiſſion; the weakneſs of which arguing, I ſhall no farther demonſtrate than by this rejoinder, that by the ſame reaſon it might be ſaid, that a man is juſtified before he is born, which yet the objectors do not affirm, but that at the time of his firſt converſion, be it at ſuch a Sermon or the like, he was juſtified, and then all his ſins paſt, preſent, and to come forgiven him, which is as Sect. 50.

contrary to the notion of all things being preſent with God, as to ſay that this act of commiſſion is not forgiven till it be repented of, for ſure the time before that mans birth, and the time after it, are as truly preſent to God before all eternity, as the time of this commiſſion and that repentance.

Sect. 51. The only way for us to underſtand our ſelves or any thing that belongs to Gods actions concerning us, is that which the Scripture ſuppoſes and commands us to walk in, not the way of Gods ſecret counſels, (which if we knew, were no longer ſecret) not the way of Gods immenſity, (which if it were intelligible by us, were not immenſity) but the way of his revealed will, which is, that whenſoever the ſinner repenteth him of his ſin, and amends his life, he ſhall have his ſin blotted out and put out of Gods remembrance, i. e. forgiven unto him and not till then: and to ſuppoſe he may have remiſſion before ſuch repentance, is to ſuppoſe God perjur'd who ſwears he ſhall not, and to lay falſity to the Charge of the whole Goſpel, which reſolves, except ye repent, ye ſhall all periſh.

Sect. 52. To all this I might farther add that Gods juſtifying the faithful man, is the approving his fidelity upon trial of it, and ſo acquitting him (upon a δοκιμὴ or probation) from ſuſpicion of hypocriſy, pronouncing him faithful, or Evangelically righteous, and upon that, owning him as a friend, entering into League with him, as might appear by Gods juſtifying Abraham and calling him friend (in the ſence wherein they are Chriſts friends, which do whatſoever he commands them, ſo approve themſelves unto him) if it were now ſeaſonable to examine that buſineſs. This being ſuppoſed, it would be moſt evident, that ſuch an act of known deliberate ſin committed in time of trial, is quite contrary to juſtification, even as contrary as Abrahams refuſing to believe Gods promiſe firſt, or after to ſacrifice Iſaac, you may ſuppoſe would have been. Of which the leaſt that can be ſaid, will be this; that ſuch a failing is a ſhrewd blemiſh to ſincerity, which will make it neceſſary for him that is guilty of it, to repair his credit with God by expreſſing a great ſenſe of his miſcarriage, and by many future performances of conſtancy, and reſolution, if ever he hope to be approved, or juſtified by him.

Sect. 53. But now having thus far confirmed this, and ſo rather ſtrengthened, than weakned the objection, the next thing I ſhall deſire may be obſerved is this, that every non-remiſſion of a ſin for ſome time, every diſpleaſure of Gods, every not-imputing to righteouſneſs, is not an utter interciſion of juſtification, is not a calling all the former forgotten ſins to remembrance, for to ſuch only an Apoſtaſy, or continued falling away from God betrays the ſoul. For, the whole current of my life may approve my fidelity to God, though ſome one action be very contrary to it; Nay ſecondly a Father may be diſpleaſed with his Son for ſome one fault, and yet not diſinherit him, nay upon farther provocation he may caſt him out of his family, and yet afterward receive him into it again.

Sect. 54. So that there are three degrees obſervable in this matter, firſt diſpleaſure, ſecondly wrath, thirdly fury. Firſt withdrawing of the Fathers favour, ſuſpenſion of pardon, ſo 'tis in caſe of any ſuch ſingle act of ſin preſently repented of, conſidered before its retractation. Second, caſting out of the family, total interciſion of mercy for that preſent, ſo 'tis in caſe of ſuch ſin perſiſted in indulgently. Third, utter final irreverſible abdication, ſo 'tis in caſe of final obduration.

Sect. 55. This may be illuſtrated, firſt by a vulgar, then by an eccleſiaſtical reſemblance. Among friends firſt there may be a matter of quarrel, diſlike, diſpleaſure, and one friend juſtly frown upon the other, yea and keep ſome diſtance from him, and be really angry with him, for ſome act of injury done by him, contrary to the laws of friendſhip, which till he hath ſome way repaired, the friend may juſtly not pardon him, and ſo abſtain for that preſent from the former degree of familiarity with him: but then ſecondly the injurious friend may continue as injurious ſtill, and go on and perſiſt in that courſe of falſeneſs or unfriendlineſs, and then the injur'd friend wholly forſakes his company, breaks off thoſe bands of friendſhip with him, yet ſo as that upon the others relenting and amending, he may yet again return to him, and ſo that total ſeparation prove no final one: thirdly there is, upon obduration or no manner of relenting, a final irreverſible breach.

Sect. 56. The eccleſiaſtical reſemblance is, that of the three degrees of excommunication among the Jews, the firſt or loweſt, was niddui ſeparatiou, not total turning out of either ſacred or civil ſociety, but remotion to a diſtance, that the offender ſhould not come within four Cubits of any other, and ſo be denied the peace of the Church, and the familiar kind of Communion, which others enjoy. Above this there was cherem which was a total excluſion or diſtermination with anathemas or execrations joined with it, but yet was not final; then thirdly there was Schammatha giving up to deſtruction or deſolation, delivering up to Gods coming in judgment, and that was irreverſible.

Sect. 57. Now for the full ſatisfying of the argument, (having already ſhewed you the ſtate of this offender in reſpect of juſtification) it will only be neceſſary to add one thing more, that the ſtate of the ſame man as it reſpects ſanctification, is parallel and fully proportionable to the ſtate as it reſpects juſtification, and ſo the objection will quite fall to the ground.

Sect. 58. To the clearing of which you muſt know that ſanctification may be conceived in a double notion, firſt as a gift of Gods, ſecondly as a duty of mans: to prevent miſtake, this I mean; God gives the grace of Converſion and ſanctification, and he that is effectually wrought on by that grace, is converted and ſanctified, this is it which I mean, by the firſt notion of ſanctification, as it is a gift of Gods: But the man thus converted and ſanctified, i. e. thus wrought on and effectually changed by the ſpirit of God, is bound by the Goſpel-law, to operate according to this principle, to uſe this talent, and this is called, to have grace, Heb. 12. 28. i. e. to make uſe of it to the purpoſe there ſpecified of ſerving God εὐαρέστως (i. e. either well pleaſedly, chearfully, willingly, or well pleaſingly, ſo as God may and will accept) in righteouſneſs and godly fear, according to the notion of Having in the parable of the talents, where 'tis ſaid that to him that hath ſhall be given, i. e. to him which makes uſe of the talent intruſted to him, operates accordingly, doth what that enables him to do, offends not againſt it by idleneſs, or by commiſſion of contrary ſins, which he that doth, is the non habens, he that hath not there, from which ſhall be taken away, &c. And this having of grace is it which I mean by the ſecond notion of ſanctification, as it is a duty of mans, which I conceive is meant by the Apoſtle, ſtle, when he ſaith, this is the will of God, even your Sanctification, and he which hath this hope purifies himſelf, and let us cleanſe our ſelves from all filthineſſes perfecting holineſs, all which places ſuppoſe the thing ſpoken of, to be the duty of man, which by the help of Chriſt ſtrengthning him, he is able to perform, and therefore upon the ſuppoſition of Gods working in him both to will and to do, to will, by ſanctifying, to do, by aſſiſting grace, he is incited and exhorted by the Apoſtle, to work out his own ſalvation.

This being thus cleared, 'twill be eaſily granted in the ſecond place, that every ſuch act of deliberate commiſſion as we now ſpeak of, is contrary to ſanctification in this latter notion, contrary to the duty of the ſanctified man, from which breach of duty it was, that we bound him before under that guilt, which nothing but repentance could rid him of, and if you mark it, that is the only thing which contracts a guilt, the doing ſomewhat contrary to duty, and ſo the want of this ſecond notion of Sanctification it is, the want of ſanctified operations, which interpoſes any rubs in the buſineſs of our juſtification, and not ſo properly that wherein God only was concerned, his not giving grace; guilt being ſtill a reſult from ſin, and ſin being a breach of the law, a contrariety to duty and not to guilt; and though he that hath not received the gift of ſanctification be not juſtified, yet the cauſe of his non-juſtification then, is not, in proper ſpeaking, Gods not having given him grace to ſanctify, (for that is but a negative thing, and cannot produce non-juſtification, which is in effect a poſitive thing by interpretation, ſignifying condemnation, two negatives making an affirmative, non-juſtifying being non-remitting of ſin, and that the actual imputing of it to condemnation) but the ſins of his former and preſent impenitent unſanctified life. Sect. 59.

This alſo being thus cleared, I ſhall only add a third thing, and then conclude this matter, that in the ſame proportion that any ſuch act of ſin doth unjuſtify, it doth unſanctify alſo, i.e. ſhake and waſt, though not utterly deſtroy, that ſanctified ſtate that before the man was in, by the gift and grace of God. Sect. 60.

For as there were three degrees of provocation in the matter of juſtification, ſo are there alſo in this of ſanctification, the firſt, grieving the Spirit of God, Eph. 4. 30. reſiſting it, traſhing of God in his courſe of grace and bounty towards us, putting our ſelves under niddui, as it were, in reſpect of Gods grace, as well as his favour, and ſo weakning our ſtock of ſanctity, and this the deliberate act of ſin may be thought to do. The ſecond, is quenching of the Spirit, 1 Theſ. 5. 19. putting it quite out, rebelling and vexing his Holy Spirit, Iſ. 63. 10. a total extinction of grace, the Cherem that brings the preſent curſe, or anathema along with it; and this is not done by one ſin not perſiſted in, but only by a habit or indulgent courſe of ſin; and the third, is the deſpighting, or doing deſpight to the ſpirit of grace, Heb. 10. 29. that which is proportioned to Scammatha, that makes the final irreverſible ſeparation between us and Gods ſanctifying grace; the firſt did not wholly deprive the ſinner of all grace, no nor of ſufficient to enable to repent; the ſecond did ſo for the preſent; the third did ſo finally alſo. Sect. 61.

If you will now demand what are the effects and conſequents of that diſpleaſure of God, which this ſingle act of ſin brings upon the offender; I anſwer, that I have in ſome meaſure anſwered that already, ſhewed you at the beginning many lugubrious effects of it; and if that be not ſufficient to ſatisfy you, or to ſhew the non-remiſſion of ſuch ſin till it be retracted by repentance, I ſhall then proceed one degree farther yet, to tell you, Sect. 62.

That the method of Gods dealing in this caſe (of ſuch ſingle acts of commiſſion) ſeemeth by the Scripture to be after this manner. Upon any ſuch commiſſion, Satan is wont to accuſe that man before God, [ſuch or ſuch a regenerate child of thine is fallen into ſuch a ſin, and ſo into my hands as the lictor] an example you have of it Zach. 3. 1. where Satan ſtands at the right hand of Joſuah to be his adverſary ἀντικεῖσθαι αὐτῷ, to plead againſt him, and it ſeems Joſuah, though a pious man, was guilty of a crime (for ſo his filthy garments, the mark of a guilty perſon, denote) viz. that he ſuffered his ſons to live with ſtrange wives againſt the Law, Deut. 14. 15. Ezech. 44. 22. and for this it was that Satan accuſes him: After accuſing, he proceeds then to deſire, or require ſolemnly, to have him to winnow, by inflicting puniſhments upon him, and God yields many times to this demand of Satan, delivers the offender up to him in ſome limited manner; but ſometimes yields not, as Zach. 3. 4. Sect. 63.

To which delivering though temptations (or afflictions which ordinarily are ſignified by temptations in Scripture) are conſtantly conſequent, yet not utter deſertion or withdrawing of grace, but allowing of ſtrength ſufficient to Victory, δύναμιν τῦ ὑπενεγκεῖν, ability to bear, 1 Cor. 10. 13. ἔκβασιν, paſſage out of thoſe difficulties in that ſame place, ἀρκοῦσαν χάριν, ſufficient grace, 2 Cor. 12. 9. and aſſiſtance of his faith, that it fail not totally, (which is the importance of Chriſts having prayed for Peter, Luke 22. 32. his interceſſion being a powerful interceſſion (as may appear by his [Father, I knew that thou heareſt me always, Joh. 11. 42.] and ſo in effect, the obtaining from his Father, and actual conferring on his Diſciple the grace which he prays for.) And therefore it is obſervable, that as thoſe which are thus accuſed and demanded by Satan are generally ſuch as, were it not for this preſent particular commiſſion, would paſs both with God and him, for faithful Diſciples and good Chriſtians, and therefore do ſtill retain that title (as appears by the word ἀδελφῶν, when Satan is called the accuſer of them, Rev. 12. 10. κατήγορ & ἀδελφῶν, the accuſer of the brethren, or the faithful, it ſeems they are faithful ſtill, though they have been guilty of ſome act, for which he thus accuſeth them, and ſo he is called, ἀντίδικ & διάβ, 1 Pet. 5. 8. the plaintiff or enemy, ὑμῶν, of you, i.e. the elect, to whom he writes, c. 1. 1.) ſo the end of yielding to Satans requeſt in delivering them up to him is alſo gracious and fatherly, ἵνα παιδευθῶσι, that they may be diſciplined, or taught not to blaſpheme, 1 Tim. 1. 20. ἵνα ἐντραπῇ, that he may be aſhamed, 2 Theſ. 3. 14. ἵνα πνεῦμα σωθῇ, that the ſpirit may be ſaved, 1 Cor. 5. 5. Whereupon it is, that the Fathers ſo clearly reſolve it far better, and more eligible to be delivered up to Satan, than to be delivered up to ones ſelf, or ones own affections or deſires; the firſt of them being the ordinary puniſhment of ſome act, or acts of ſin on purpoſe to recal to repentance; the ſecond being the great plague of ſpiritual deſertion, inflicted on indulgent continuers in ſin; the firſt of them a mark of their not-yet-total abdication, their continuance in Sect. 64.

ſonſhip whom God thus chaſtens here, that he may not condemn them with the world; the ſecond, of their being cut off from that prerogative, whom God thus forſakes.

Sect. 65. To which purpoſe, of Gods dealing mercifully with his ſervants in caſe of ſingle treſpaſſes preſently retracted by repentance, (ſo far as not to inflict any grand ſpiritual puniſhment upon them ſuch as abſolute deſertion, or utter diſinherizon) I conceive an Image repreſented to us in Chriſts command to his diſciples, how oft they ſhould forgive the treſpaſſing brother, Luke 17. 4. If he treſpaſs againſt thee ſeven times a day, and ſeven times a day turn again to thee, ſaying, I repent, thou ſhalt forgive; where treſpaſſing ſeven times is a phraſe, for [how oft ſoever he treſpaſs] the word [forgive] notes the obligation to puniſhment without forgiveneſs, and the interpoſing the word [Repent] proportioned to every treſpaſs, ſhews the neceſſity of that condition to waſh off that guilt; and the word [Turn] prefixt to that, argues the Repentance unavailable, if it contain not turning in it; upon which forgiveneſs being there commanded, if we ſhall now add that other place Mat. 6. 36. where Gods mercy to us is made the meaſure of our mercy to our brethren, the argument will come home to prove that God doth ſo deal with us, and conſequently that every ſuch act of ſin contracts a guilt, which is never pardoned but upon repentance, that upon the ſpeedy performance of that duty the patient is preſerved from any heavy ſpiritual puniſhment, which would otherwiſe attend that ſin: as it will appear in the caſe of Joſhua which even now I mentioned Zach. 3. the filthy attire ſignified a fault, and the guilt or pollution ariſing from it, the Angels commanding to take away thoſe foul cloths, v. 4. notes (ſaith the Chaldee Paraphraſe) the caſting out of his houſe the ſtrange women, i. e. the reforming of the ſin, and the commanding to do it, notes the neceſſity of that performance; then follows in the ſame verſe, the pardoning of the ſin, and the token of that, the change of raiment, and then the cidaris munda, the clean mitre is put upon his head, intimating that which he had before to have been polluted by his ſin.

Sect. 66. What we have hitherto ſaid on this particular, will ſhew the danger of every act of deliberate ſin, and yet withal the difference betwixt ſuch ſingle acts preſently retracted by repentance, and the like perſiſted, or continued in. To which purpoſe 'twill be worth the while to behold what we find recorded of David. He, we know, had been guilty of ſeveral acts of ſin, mark't and cenſured in the word of God; and ſome of them ſuch, as for them he was in a manner delivered up to Satan to be contumelioufly uſed (as he ſeems to conceive from Shimei's curſing of him, 2 Sam. 16. 10. For Shimei being an inſtrument of Satans in curſing, and Satan thereto permitted by God upon ſome crime, for which he had accuſed him to God, he there calls it, Gods ſaying to Shimei, Curſe David:) And yet becauſe he continued not with indulgence in any of them, (his heart preſently ſmiting him, as in the caſe of numbring the People, and recalling him to inſtant reformation) ſave only in that concerning Uriah the Hittite; (wherein it appears that he continued near the ſpace of a year, from before the conception till after the birth of the child, as is clear by the time of Nathans coming to him, 2 Sam. 12. 1. 14. 16.) 'tis therefore left upon record by God, That David did that which was right, in the ſight of the Lord, and turned not aſide from any thing that he commanded him all the days of his life, ſave only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite, 1 Kings 15. 5.

Sect. 67. From whence although I ſhall not conclude, that God ſaw no other ſin in David but that in the matter of Uriah, (becauſe I know he ſaw and puniſht that of numbring the People, and for that other though not acted, yet deſigned under oath againſt Nabal, 1 Sam. 25. 22. Abigail diſcerns that it was a cauſleſs ſhedding of bloud, and an act of Revenge, v. 31. and ſo no ſmall ſin in Gods ſight) yet 'tis clear, that the ſin in the matter of Uriah, that only ſin continued in for any long time, made another manner of ſeparation between God and David, contracted another kind of guilt, (and was a far greater waſter to Conſcience) than any of thoſe other more ſpeedily retracted ſins did, was the only remarkable ὑποστολὴ drawing back, or turning aſide from obedience to God, the only grand defection, ſhaking off Gods yoke, and ſo the only chaſm in his regenerate ſtate.

Sect. 68. Theſe four Propoſitions being premiſed, whereof three were affirmative, and this laſt of a middle nature, The reſt will be negative; As Sect. 69. Fifthly, That Hypocriſy is not reconcileable with a good Conſcience. I mean not that Hypocriſy which conſiſts in the concealing from the eyes of men the ſins or frailties he is guilty of: for ſuppoſing thoſe frailties to be what they are, i. e. acknowledging in them a guilt proportionate to their nature, I cannot ſee why the bare deſire to conceal them from the eyes of men (ſeparated from the ſins or frailties themſelves, and from any treacherous deſign in ſuch concealing) ſhould be thought to ſuperadd any farther degree of guilt; when on the other ſide the publickneſs of a ſin is an aggravation of it, makes it more ſcandalous and ſo more criminous alſo. Nor again do I mean that hypocriſie, which is the taking in any thought of the praiſe of men (and the like) in our beſt actions; for as long as we have fleſh about us, ſome degrees of this will go near ſometimes to inſinuate themſelves, and then though they prove blemiſhes to thoſe beſt actions, and by anticipating the payment and taking it here beforehand, rob us of that heavenly reward hereafter, which would otherwiſe be rendred to us according to thoſe works, yet ſtill being but ſpots of ſons, reconcileable with a regenerate eſtate, (as the ſtraw and combuſtible ſuperſtruction, is (in Saint Paul) compatible with the true ſubſtantial foundation,) they will be reconcileable with good Conſcience alſo, which is always commenſurate to a regenerate eſtate.

Sect. 70. But the hypocriſie which I mean, is, firſt, that which is oppoſite to (and incompatible with) ſincerity; firſt, the deceiving of men, with a pretence of piety putting off the moſt Unchriſtian ſins, having no more of Chriſtianity than will ſerve to miſchief others, i. e. only the pretence of it to diſguiſe the poiſon of a bitter heart. Secondly, the deceiving of God, or thirdly, his own ſoul, not dealing uprightly with either; and nothing more contrary than this to a good Conſcience.

Sect. 71. Secondly, the maimed mutilate obedience, the compounding betwixt God and Satan, the Samaritans fearing the Lord and ſerving their own Gods, joining others with God, and paying to them a reſpect equal or ſuperiour to that which they pay to God, ſerving Mammon and God, or Mammon more than God; or

Sect. 72. Thirdly, the former profeſſion, the σχῆμα or outſide garb of Godlineſs, not joining the inward,

but making a meer pageant of piety, denying the power thereof; or Fourthly, the hypocriſie of the wiſher and woulder, that could wiſh he were better than he is, could be well pleaſed to dye the death of the righteous, to have all the gainful part, the revenue and crown of a good Conſcience, but will not be at the charge of a conſcientious life; or Sect. 73.

Fifthly, the hypocriſy of the partial obedient that is a προσωπολήπτης of duty, chooſes out the eaſy, ſmooth, pliable doctrines of Chriſtianity, the cheap or coſtleſs performances; the ἀδάπανον ἐνσέβειαν, will ſerve the Lord his God of that which coſts him nothing, will do ſome things that have nothing contrary to paſſions in general, or particularly to his paſſions, like Herod that could hear John Baptiſt gladly, be preſent at as many Sermons as he could wiſh, (and many the like painleſs performances) but when the weightier matters of the Law expect to be taken up alſo, cannot ſubmit to ſuch burthens; or Sect. 74.

Sixthly, the hypocriſy of the temporary, which abſtains only as long as the puniſhment is over his head, and awes him to it, or as long as he meets with no temptations to the contrary; both which what place they have in the Death-bed repentance even when it is not only a ſorrow for ſin, but a reſolution of amendment alſo, I leave it to be conſidered; or Sect. 75.

Seventhly, the hypocriſy of thoſe which commit evil that good may come of it, who venture on the moſt Unchriſtian ſins for Gods glory, accept the perſon of the Almighty, do injuſtice for his ſake, or rather ſuppoſe him impotent, and fetch in the Devil or their own vile luſts to relieve and aſſiſt God, of whom the Apoſtle pronounceth their damnation is juſt, Rom. 3. 8. Or Sect. 76.

Laſtly, the hypocriſy of him which keeps any one cloſe undepoſited ſin upon his Soul. Theſe are each of them contrary to ſome part of the ground of good Conſcience, to the foundation of Chriſtian confidence, ſome to the ſincerity, ſome to the reſolution, and ſome to the obedience, ἐν πᾶσι, in all, and ſome to the perſeverance which is abſolutely neceſſary to the good Conſcience. Sect. 77.

A ſixth Propoſition is, that a ſupine wilful courſe of negligence and ſloth, whether in duties of mans particular calling, or more eſpecially in the duties of the general calling as we are Chriſtians, that ſin of ἀκηδία, is not reconcileable with a good Conſcience, (omiſſions being deſtructive, ſuch they may be as well as commiſſions) whether it be omiſſion of the performance of moral or Chriſtian precepts (Chriſts improvements of the Law in the Sermon on the Mount, being not only as Counſels but Precepts obligatory to Chriſtians) or whether it be onely the wilful ſupine ſlothful neglecting the means of knowledge, ſuch as are agreeable to my courſe of life; Or the neglecting to make uſe of thoſe means which are neceſſary to enable me to get out of any ſin: (One act of which nature was by Chriſt noted and cenſured in his Diſciples, Their not faſting and praying to caſt out that Devil that would not otherwiſe be caſt out;) Or the not avoiding ſuch occaſions which are apt to betray me to it; Such acts as theſe, are (as Chriſt ſaith to thoſe Diſciples) acts of faithleſneſs and perverſeneſs, Mat. 17. 17. and conſequently the continued courſe of them contrary to the ſincerity of endeavour, and ſo unreconcileable with a good Conſcience. Sect. 78.

The ſeventh Propoſition is, that all habitual cuſtomary obdurate ſinning is unreconcileable utterly with a good Conſcience. I add the word [Obdurate] which ſignifies the hardnining of the heart againſt the knowledge of the truth, againſt exhortations, againſt threats of Gods Word, againſt checks of natural Conſcience, or illuminations of Grace, againſt reſolutions and vows to the contrary, for this will make any habit certainly unreconcileable with a good Conſcience; Whereas 'tis poſſible that ſome Cuſtomary ſinning may be through ignorance of the duty, and that ignorance if it be not contracted by ſome wilfulneſs of mine may be matter of excuſe to me; and ſo reconcileable with good conſcience by force of the ſecond Propoſition. But the obdurate holding out againſt Gods Spirit, either knocking for admittance but not opened to, or checking and reſtraining from ſin after converſion, and not hearkned to, reſiſting all Gods methods of working on us and ſtill reſolutely walking after the fleſh, this is by no means reconcileable with a good Conſcience, nay nor any habit of ſin ſimply taken (for that is excluſive of the habit of piety neceſſary to the good Conſcience) unleſs it have that authentick plea of faultleſs ignorance to excuſe it. Sect. 79.

The eighth Propoſition is, that any deliberate preſumptuous act or commiſſion of any ſin againſt which damnation, or not inheriting the Kingdom of heaven, is pronounced in the New Teſtament, being not immediately retracted by repentance, humiliation, and all the effects of godly ſorrow, 2 Cor. 7. 11. is wholly unreconcileable with good Conſcience. Such are Gal. 5. 19. Adultery, fornication, uncleanneſs, laſciviouſneſs, (four diſtinct degrees of incontinence) Idolatry, witchcraft, (two degrees of impiety) hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, ſtrife, ſedition, hereſies, envyings, murthers, (nine degrees of the pride of life, or that other branch of carnality flowing from θυμὸς, or the iraſcible faculty) drunkenneſs, revelling, (the ſpecies of intemperance) and ſuch like: and the ſame with ſome variation and addition, 1 Cor. 6. 9, 10. and Eph. 5. 5. Every one of theſe at the very commiſſion have the nature of peccata ſanciantia, wounding the ſinner to the heart, letting out a great deal of good blood and vital ſpirits, and weakning the habit of Chriſtian vertue; of peccata clamantia, crying ſins, the voice of conſcience ſo wronged by them, calling to heaven for judgment againſt ſuch oppreſſors, or perhaps Satan carrying an accuſation thither againſt ſuch offenders; and if upon this they be not ſtraight retracted by an earneſt contrition, humiliation, and repentance, they then proceed farther to be (any one act of them) peccata vaſtantia conſcientiam, ſins waſting and deſpoiling the conſcience, betraying to ſome ſadder puniſhment, even deſertion, and withdrawing of Grace, and delivering up to our own hearts luſts, a conſequent of which are all vile affections, Rom. 1. and that κατάρα, curſing, Heb. 6. 8. Sect. 80.

Juſt as it was the manner of the Jews Judicatures, He that was puniſhed by their נדוי ſeparation or ἀφορισμὸς (not permitted to come near any man within four cubits) if he did not thereupon ſhew and approve his repentance within the ſpace of two months, on that contumacy was then ſmitten with their חרם anathema or execration, and ſometimes caſt into priſon. So is Gods dealing with the ſinner remaining impenitent for ſuch a ſpace, ſubſtraction of Gods Grace and Spirit, the curſe of the Goſpel is his portion. Sect. 81. Vid. Coch exc. Gem. Sanh. p. 148. & Buxtorf. inſtit. Epiſtol. p. 57.

For the clearing of which truth yet farther, 'twill be obſervable that the danger that ariſes from Sect. 82.

one ſin of the firſt magnitude, againſt which the ſentence is pronounced, that they who are guilty of ſuch, ſhall never inherit eternal life, is or may be to him that after the knowledge of the truth relapſes into it as great as that which is incurred by many leſſer ſins, or by a relapſing into a generality of impure life, and therefore the remaining in that one ſin, will be as unreconcileable with a regenerate eſtate, as the remaining in many other; and proportionably one act of it as noxious and waſting to conſcience, as apt to provoke God to withdraw his Spirit, as many acts of thoſe leſſer ſins, and though neither any ſingle act either of leſſer or greater ſin in a ſincere lover of Chriſt, preſently retracted, (as it will be if he continue ſo) doth ſo grieve, as to quench Gods Spirit utterly, ſo provoke God, as to make him wholly withdraw his Grace and totally deſert him; yet if that one ſin be continued in, favoured and indulged to, either by multiplying more acts of it, or by not expreſſing repentance for it by all thoſe means which the Apoſtle requires of his inceſtuous Corinthian, or which are named as effects of godly ſorrow, 2 Cor. 7. 11. this direful puniſhment of deſertion is then to be expected as the reward of any one ſuch ſin, and from thence will follow an impoſſibility for that man ſo deſerted ever to return to repentance again, Gods ſpecial aid, which is now withdrawn, being abſolutely neceſſary to that.

Sect. 83. Where yet of thoſe, that thus remain in any ſuch ſin, there is ſome difference; For ſome that ſo remain in ſin, do ſo remain that they deſire not to get out of it, hate to be reformed; others though enſnared ſo in ſin that they cannot get out, yet are very earneſt and ſollicitous to find out ſome means to break through and eſcape out of thoſe ſnares, and then this latter ſtate of ſoul though it be not ſufficient to give claim or right to mercy, (the victory over the world, the actual forſaking of all ſuch ſins being neceſſary to that, and not only our wiſhes that we were victorious) yet is it a nearer and more hopeful capacity of the grace of repentance, more likely to be bleſſed by the returning of Gods Spirit enabling to repent, than that former ſtate of contemptuous continuers in the ſame ſin appears to be.

Sect. 84. For though in both theſe ſtates there is no repenting without Gods new gift of Grace, and no abſolute promiſe that God will be ſo gracious to ſuch ſinners, yet there is a place, 1 John 5. 16. which makes a difference between ſin unto death, and ſin not unto death (both of them ſtates of impenitence and perſiſting in ſin, but differing as the two latter degrees of excommunication did among the Jews, Cherem and Schammatha both noting a total ſeparation, but the latter a final alſo, and by the compoſition of the word intimating death or deſolation, giving up the ſinner to divine vengeance, as hopeleſs or contumacious, in reference to which the phraſe is here uſed, a ſin unto death, whereas the other, of impenitence, not arrived to that deſperate contumacy, is a ſtate of curſe under Cherem or anathema, but not unto death yet,) and allows this priviledge to the prayers of faithful men for others, that they ſhall obtain life for thoſe that have ſinned not unto death, where that [the not being to death] of a ſin, is to be taken not from the matter of the ſin, but from the diſpoſition of the ſinner, and ſo from this deſiring to get out, though he remain in it, or ſomewhat anſwerable to that, might, if any doubt were made of it, be proved as by other arguments ſo by putting together the peculiar uſe of the word ἁμαρτάνειν in that Author, for abiding and continuing in ſin, and the no extenuation that ſuch abiding is capable of (ſo far as to make one ſuch abiding ſo much leſs than another ſuch abiding, as that one ſhould be called εἰς θάνατον, t'other not) ſave only this of wiſhing and heaving and labouring to get out, (which ſuppoſes ſome remainder of exciting, though not of Sanctifying or aſſiſting Grace) while the other goes on without any care or love or deſire of Reformation.

Sect. 85. And though ſtill there be no promiſe that ſuch a relapſt unreformed ſinner's prayers ſhall be heard for himſelf upon that bare deſire to get out, which his praying for Grace will ſuppoſe (there being no ſuch promiſe of Grace to the relapſt perſon upon his prayer, as there is to any elſe) yet 'tis clear from that place of Saint John that this priviledge belongs to the prayers of other faithful penitents for ſuch a more moderate degree of unfaithful impenitents, upon their requeſt God will give life to ſuch, i. e. ſuch a degree of Grace as ſhall be ſufficient to enable them to recover back to repentance, of which being given them upon the others prayers, if they make uſe, (as infallibly they will if they were and continue to be really ſollicitous to get out of that ſtate) they ſhall undoubtedly live eternally.

Sect. 86. The practice of which doctrine of Saint Johns thus explained you ſhall ſee every where in the ſtories of, or canons for the penitents, where they that for any ſin of Eccleſiaſtical cognizance were excommunicated, did return to the peace of the Church, (an image of the peace of God) by ſeveral degrees, of which the firſt was, to ſtay and oft lie without the Church doors, and in the porch at hours of prayer, and deſire thoſe that retained the honour of being accounted faithful, and ſo had liberty to go into the Church, to pray to God for them. Which as the ſecure ſupine negligent impenitent was not likely to do, ſo was he not to expect the benefit of it, nor the Chriſtian brother obliged to pray for him; though yet by St. Johns [οὐ περὶ ἐκείνης λέγω, I ſay not of that or concerning that ſtate of ſin, that he ſhall pray] I am not convinced that it were unlawful ſo to do.

By all this thus ſet and bounded with its due limitations, the truth of my eighth Propoſition will appear, of the unreconcileableneſs of ſuch preſumptuous acts of ſuch branded ſins unretracted, with a regenerate eſtate or good Conſcience, as being indeed quite contrary to every part and branch of the premiſed ground of a good Conſcience.

Sect. 89. To which all that I ſhall add is only this, that he that tenders but the comforts of this life, i. e. of a good Conſcience, will be ſure never to commit deliberately and preſumptuouſly, or having by ſurreption fallen, never to lie down or continue one minute unhumbled unreformed in any ſuch ſin, on which that direful fate is by Chriſt or his Apoſtles inſcribed [ſhall not inherit the Kingdom of heaven] where yet as I ſhall not affirm that none ſhall ſubject us to that danger but thoſe which are there ſpecified, (for there is added and ſuch like, and other ſins there may be committed with the like deliberation and preſumption, and ſo as contrary to Conſcience) ſo ſhall I not ſay that all that commit any one act of any of theſe without that deliberation and preſumption, or that are preſently by their own heart ſmitten and brought to repentance for them, ſhall incur that danger; for the words πράσσοντες and ποιοῦντες, the doers and committers of them ſignify the deliberate committing and indulgent yielding to them, contrary to which the excuſe of ſurreption at the time and the inſtant ſubſequent retractation of them (by contrition, confeſſion, forſaking, and reinforcement of greater care and vigilance for the future) will be ſure means to deliver from that danger.

Whereto yet this caution muſt be annext which may paſs for Sect. 90.

A ninth Propoſition, That the frequency or repetition of any ſuch acts after ſuch contrition and reſolution is an argument of the unſinderity of that contrition, of the deceivableneſs of that pretended greater care, and ſo a ſymptome of an ill Conſcience, as the ſpreading of the skall or leproſy after the Prieſts inſpection is ſufficient to pronounce the patient unclean, Lev. 13. and as that diſeaſe in the relapſe may be mortal which at firſt was not.

Other more particular niceties I confeſs there are, the diſtinguiſhing of which might be uſeful for Sect. 91. ſome mens ſtates, and help to diſabuſe them both out of an erroneous and a ſecure, yea and an over-trembling Conſcience. But becauſe that which would be thus proper to one, being laid down in common, or caſt into the lottery, might have the ill hap to be drawn by him to whom it is not proper, (as that Phyſick which would purge out a diſtemper from one, will breed a weakneſs in another) and becauſe no wiſe man ever thought fit to take Laws out of generalities, I ſhall reſolve rather to obey ſuch reaſons, and to be directed by ſuch examples, not to deſcend to particulars, than to be in danger firſt of tempting the Readers patience, then of interrupting his peace.

Pray for us, for we truſt we have a good Conſcience, in all things willing to live honeſtly, Heb. 13. 18.

OF SCANDAL.

Sect. 1. HE that would know the true proper full importance of the word Scandal or Offence, or to be Offended or Scandaliz'd (as they are taken for the ſame) need not ſeek into many Authors for it. The new Teſtament, and the Apocryphal Books, and the Greek tranſlation of the old Teſtament, are the prime Authors that have uſed theſe words, and all other later Chriſtian Writers may juſtly be thought to have had them from that Fountain; ancient prophane Writers not affording them. From hence 'twill be ſure juſt to infer, that in as many ſenſes as the Scripture Canonical and Apocryphal hath uſed the words, in ſo many they may be juſtly uſed, and in no more. Now the uſes of the word Scandal among them are either natural (as generally in the old Teſtament,) or borrowed, i. e. metaphorical, (as chiefly in the new.) It naturally ſignifies three things. 1. A Trap, a Gin, or Snare to catch any thing: So in the Greek tranſlation of Pſalm 69. 22. the word is us'd, (being joyn'd with two other words which ſignify ſnare and gin,) and in our new tranſlation is rendred a trap: and therefore in the place of Rom. 11. 9.) where the ſame words are cited out of the Septuagints tranſlation, and not out of the Hebrew text of the Pſalm, I ſhould conceive it ſhould be rendred by analogy, not ſtumbling blocks but gin, or ſome other word belonging to this firſt ſignification. In this ſence it is uſed 1 Mac. 5. 4. where it is all one with ſnare, and it is farther interpreted by (laying wait by the way) to catch them treacherouſly. So again Wiſd. 14. 11. the word is uſed, and explained by another word, ſignifying a trap, or ſnare, the very ſame that was uſed in the Pſalms, and to the Romans.

Sect 4. 2. It ſignifies any Obſtacle or hindrance laid in a mans way, by which the paſſenger is detain'd or ſtopt, peculiarly a ſharp Stake, ſuch as in time of War men were wont to put in the fields where their enemy ſhould follow, to wound their feet or legs in their paſſage: againſt which being ſo ordinary in War, they anciently uſed greaves of braſs to defend their feet or legs, 1 Sam. 17. 6. to which you may refer that Epithete ſo frequent in Homer, ἰυκνημίδες, and χαλκοκνημίδες Ἀχαιοὶ, to ſignify thoſe greaves brazen or otherwiſe, that the Grecians uſed; deſcribed by that Poet, Ια. Φ. by κνημὶς νεοτεύκτω κασσιτέροιο made of tin, and covering the whole leg to the knee, of ſo firm a ſubſtance that it made a loud noiſe at the ſtroke of the weapon on it, σμερδαλέον κονάβησε, ſaith he. Thus is the word σκάνδαλον uſed, Judith 5. 1. where we render it impediments, a word ſomewhat too general to ſignifie thoſe ſharp ſtakes or other inſtruments to wound or gall the paſſengers, which are known to every body: for which I believe we have ſome proper Engliſh word, I think it is a gall-trap.

Sect. 5. 3. The word ſignifies a ſtone or block in the way, at which men are apt (if they be not careful, or if they go in the dark) to ſtumble and fall: and thereupon in the old Teſtament it is taken for a fall: and ſo ſometimes for ſin, the fall of the ſoul, as Judith 12. 2. (where theſe words [leſt it be an offence] would more clearly be rendred out of the Greek, leſt it become an offence, i. e. a ſin or pollution, as you may ſee in the ſame matter which is there treated of, Dan. 1. 8. Tob. 1. 11.) and 1 Sam. 25. 31. and ſometimes for ruine or deſtruction, the fall of the whole perſon, which we are brought to by ſin, as Judith 5. 20. our Engliſh renders it ruine, and Pſal. 49. 13. where though we read folly, the Septuagint read Scandal, by that rendring an Hebrew word which ſignifies both folly and ruine. I confeſs this laſt acception of the word for ruine, is ſomewhat rare (yet authoriz'd by our Engliſh in the place of Judith,) and therefore if any diſlike it, I ſhall not ſtand much upon it: becauſe in both thoſe places laſt mentioned it may well enough ſignify ſin, as that is a ſnare or ſtumbling block, an occaſion of ruine, or falling, or deſtruction, in which ſence I conceive 'tis uſed, Judg. 8. 27. where 'tis rendred a ſnare, i. e. a ſin enſnaring or occaſioning ruine.

Sect. 6. Beſides theſe three ſignifications, in which, the word in Greek retain'd in our language, is read in the old Teſtament, I am confident there is no other, ſave once Pſalm 50. 20. for ſlander or calumny or defamati n, (for ſo the Hebrew there ſignifies) a ſence which is vulgar amongſt us in Engliſh; by a Scandal meaning a ſlander: but that ſence being but once met with in the whole Bible, or twice at moſt, (Eccl. 27. 23. where yet I conceive the tranſlation might be mended) will not deſerve to be taken into conſideration.

דפי

Sect. 7. Now for the uſe of the word in the new Teſtament, 'tis firſt obſervable, that the beſt nomenclature for hard words in that is the obſerving the uſe of them in the Greek of the old, for the Writers of the New Teſtament, being Jews not Greeks, wrote in an idiom proper and peculiar to them only, and thoſe other Jews that wrote alſo in Greek, ſomewhat differing from that of the Attick, or natural Greek Writers. And therefore we may well reſolve, that the uſes of the word, which we have there found and already obſerved, will be very inſtrumental to the underſtanding of the ſame word, and others derived from it in the New Teſtament. And ſo much the rather becauſe, as I ſaid, no prophane Greek Writer before the Scripture, is known to have uſed it; only Ariſtophanes once a word near it. This being premiſed, 'twill be worth our pains (at leaſt by ſo doing we ſhall put the whole matter beyond exception) to ſurvey briefly all the places in the new Teſtament, where the word is uſed.

Sect. 8. To that end I ſhall begin with the firſt in my Concordance, which is Matth. 13. 41. the Angels ſhall gather out all Scandals: 'tis in a ſence borrowed from the ſecond mentioned ſignification of a ſharp ſtake, which he who hath once met with and been gall'd by it, is wont to gather up and caſt into the fire, fire, as there it follows the Angels for our ſakes ſhould do, verſe 42. (to which Saint Paul alſo ſeems to allude, 2 Cor. 11. 29. in putting Scandalizing and burning together) and denotes ſimply whatſoever may wound, or gall us in our Chriſtian courſe, and by that means foreſlow our pace, cauſe us to ſlacken, or give over, or lye down in the ſervice of Chriſt, ſo Mat. 17. 27. Chriſt pays tribute, that he may not offend the Jews, i. e. that they might not think him a Contemner of the Temple, to which the tribute was due, and ſo forſake and not believe in him; that he might not diſcourage them from following him. So Matth. 15. 12. the Phariſees hearing a doctrine that gall'd them particularly, were offended and forſook him, that doctrine drave them away from following him. So again (Matth. 18. 7.) it muſt needs be that offences come, which ſeems to refer to falſe doctrines and hereſies, if you compare that verſe with 1 Cor. 11. 19. there muſt be Hereſies (and Rom. 16. 17. where offences are ſaid to be contrary to the Apoſtles Doctrine, and that they muſt be avoided, as the Heretick muſt Tit. 3. 10.) the venting of which of all things moſt hinders others in their Chriſtian courſe, but whether it be meant peculiarly of [a] Hereſies or exemplary ſins it matters not. To which ſoever you apply it, another place, Luke 17. 1. will belong unto it alſo, being the place directly parallel to it. So Matth. 18. 6. He that ſhall offend one of theſe little ones, i. e. he that ſhall occaſion their falling off into any ſin; or, which the place eſpecially imports, by contemning them, diſcourage them from the ſtudy of piety. For ſo on the contrary ſide to receive them, ver. 5. is by Saint Mark 9. 41. expreſt to conſiſt in doing them kindneſs to encourage them in the ways of godlineſs. So Chriſt crucified is ſaid a Scandal to the Jews, i. e. they that were otherwiſe not ill opinion'd of him, and ſo followed him with the multitudes, when they ſaw him crucified, were quite diſcourag'd, and fell away from him, (as they that are ſo gall'd by thoſe ſtakes are fain to give over the purſuit, to return) and ſo reſolved, ſeeing him dye, that he was not the Meſſias whom they expected, a glorious temporal deliverer. To which belongs that notable place, Mat. 11. 6. and Luke 7. 23 Bleſſed is he that ſhall not be offended in me, i. e. ſhall not be gall'd and diſcourag'd, and ſo fall off by ſeeing the ſufferings that befal me, and await my diſciples or followers. So again Mat. 13. 57. Mark 6. 3. It is ſaid, that the conſideration of his known and mean birth occaſioned their being offended in him, i. e. their deſerting and not believing of him, when the miracles which he had done inclin'd them ſomewhat to a valuing of him. So John 6. 61. When Chriſt talks of eating the fleſh of the ſon of man, they were offended, (that is) that ſpeech carnally underſtood (either that Chriſt was to dye, (which the eating his fleſh preſuppoſed, and they did not like to hear of; dreaming of a temporal glorious Meſſias) or that they were to turn Cannibals and eat mans fleſh,) diſcourag'd them from following him, at leaſt for taking him for the Meſſias. So Gal. 5. 11. perſecution is called the Scandal of the Croſs, or that upon which ſo many are diſcourag'd from profeſſing the crucified Saviour, according to that in the parable of the ſower, Mat. 13. 21. Mark 4. 17. upon the coming of perſecution preſently he is offended, i. e. gall'd, and falls off, and Matth. 24. 10. on the ſame occaſion and in the ſame ſence. So Matth. 26. 31. Mark 14. 27. this night (to wit of my attachment) ye ſhall all be offended becauſe of me, i. e. fall back, forſake me: and ſo in Saint Peters anſwer, verſe 39. Although all men ſhould be offended, yet will I never be offended: upon which, that which Chriſt rejoins (before the cock crow; i. e. before morning, or day break, all one with this night, verſe 31. thou ſhalt deny me thrice) is an interpretation of the word offended, and ſhews, that to be offended, is to deny Chriſt. And ſo Joh. 16. 1. Theſe things have I ſpoken unto you, that ye ſhould not be offended; where Chriſt foretels the perſecutions that ſhould befal them, that they might be forewarn'd too, and not fall off, when they befal them.

[a] So in Polycarpus Epiſt. to the Philipp. p. 20. where ἀπεχόμενοι τῶν σκανδάλων is joyned with καὶ τῶν ψευδαδέλφων, καὶ τῶν ἐν ὑποκρίσει φερόντων τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ κυρίου, ἕτινες ἀποπλανῶσι, &c.

Theſe are the chief, if not all the places to which the ſecond old Teſtament acception of the word Scandal in a Metaphorical borrowed ſence belongs, and of all of them, and each, you may obſerve, Sect. 9.

1. That Scandal ſignifies either ſome ſin, the occaſion of farther ſin in others; or elſe ſomewhat elſe, which though it be not ſin, yet occaſions ſin in others, though very indirectly ſometimes, as the Croſs of Chriſt: and whether in one or other, the rule will be, that he that is offended or ſcandalized, doth directly commit ſome ſin, and that, for moſt of the places, the ſin of infidelity, or forſaking or denying Chriſt. Sect. 10.

2. That the being Scandaliz'd, falling off from Chriſt, (or the effect which follows that occaſion) hath no reflection or influence (in any of the places) on that which was the occaſion; ſo as to make it ſinful or avoidable, if it were not ſo before, (as will appear to any that will ſurvey the places) and conſequently that anothers being Scandaliz'd is not ſufficient to lay a charge on him, whoſe action (otherwiſe not chargeable or criminous) was the occaſion of his being ſcandaliz'd. Let the Croſs of Chriſt, with which ſo many were in this ſence, ſcandaliz'd, ſuffice for a proof of this. Sect. 11.

Other places there are which muſt be interpreted by bringing the metaphor from the firſt of the three ſences, as it ſignifies a ſnare or gin to catch one in. So Mat. 16. 23. Thou art an offence unto me, i. e. by expreſſing thy deteſtation againſt my ſufferings, thou laboureſt to bring me into an horrour and fear of ſuffering, and ſo in effect tempteſt me to ſin; where you muſt mark, that though Peter were an offence to Chriſt, that is, tempted him, laboured to enſnare him, yet Chriſt was not Scandaliz'd, offended, enſnared, or overcome by the temptation. In the ſame ſence is that Revel. 2. 14. of Balaam who taught Balaac βαλεῖν σκάνδαλον, we render it to caſt a ſtumbling block; but ſure it is moſt clearly, to lay a ſnare before the Children of Iſrael, to entice them by their Daughters to Idolatry, and by Idolatry to intrap and deſtroy them. Sect. 12.

In this ſence Scandal is ſo perfectly all one with Temptation, that as a learned man hath obſerved, the Ethiopick interpreter of the new Teſtament, inſtead of Scandal puts a word that ſignifies Temptation, and the ſame that in the Lords prayer is put for Temptation: in this ſence is that of the eye and the foot offending us, Matth. 5. 29. 18. 8. Mark 9. 47. i. e. when a mans eye, or any other member of his body proves a ſnare to him, an in-let to Temptations, a means of bringing him to any ſin. Sect. 13. Lud. de Dieu. מנסות from נסה

And of thoſe places you may obſerve again, 1. That no man is ſaid to be offended, but he that commits the ſin to which he is tempted, and therefore Chriſt is not ſaid to be offended, that is, really to be wrought upon by that Scandal; but as Satan tempted him, Matth. 4. yet he yielded not, but overcame the tempter: So here he uſes that other Satan: for to have been offended in Sect. 14.

this ſence had been all one with being overcome by a temptation.

Sect. 15. Secondly, That the Agent, or he that is ſaid to lay the ſnare or to offend, ſinneth alſo (as in all the places it will de facto appear that they did) though no body be taken in it, as he that tempteth to evil commits a ſin, though his temptation prove not effectual. The ſetting of a ſnare being a poſitive act, a note of a treacherous deſign, though it do not ſucceed. And therefore in 1 Maccab. 8. 35, 36. the laying of ſnares for to intrap the Iſraelites, or bring them from obſerving the Law, is call'd there by the devils name, an evil Adverſary, or as the Greek hath it, a devil to Iſrael.

Διάβολον τῷ Ἰσραήλ.

Sect. 16. A third and laſt ſort of places there are that refer to the third mention'd acception of the word, as it ſignifies a ſtumbling block, ſo when the word ſtone is joined with it, or the Greek word, that ſignifies ſtumbling, ſo Rom. 9. 33. Chriſt is called a ſtumbling block, and rock of offence, i. e. an occaſion of fall, or ſin in many, and conſequently of encreaſing their condemnation, as he ſaith, if he had not come, &c. they had not had ſin, i. e. had not been ſo great ſinners, had not been guilty of the great ſin of unbelief, and crucifying of Chriſt: and therefore Simeon propheſies of Chriſt, that he would be for the fall of many in Iſrael, many ſins his coming ſhould be the occaſion of, ſo Rom 14. 13. That no man lay a ſtumbling block, or ſcandal (which we render an occaſion of falling) in his brothers way, that is, do or practiſe any thing, that may bring another that comes after him, upon his noſe, or to commit any ſin. So 1 Pet. 2. 8. Chriſt is called a ſtone of ſtumbling, and rock of offence, at which to ſtumble is to be diſobedient to Chriſt. So Rom. 14. 21. ſtumbleth or is offended, or is made weak, i. e. by following thee, doth fall, commits ſome ſin, doth ſome act unlawful for him (though ſimply it were not for thee; it being againſt his Conſcience, though not againſt thine) and ſo by falling bruiſes and weakens himſelf, makes himſelf leſs able for Gods ſervice, than he was: for ſo every ſin againſt Conſcience being a grieving the ſpirit, is conſequently the ſpiritual weakening of the man, or if you will (as in Saint James ἀσθενῶν ſignifies c. 5. 14.) the wound or diſeaſe of the ſoul. So again, 1 Cor. 8. 9. ſtumbling block to the weak, and verſe 13. where the caſe is clearly the ſame that we laſt mentioned: that if any man by doing any indifferent thing (which he in Conſcience is inform'd to be perfectly lawful for him to do) ſhall occaſion another mans ſin by doing that after him which he is not reſolv'd to be lawful, that man offends againſt that charity due to his brother, and therefore muſt think fit to deny himſelf the uſe of that liberty which Chriſt hath given him. To this may belong that other place, 1 John 2. 10. where that phraſe (there is no Scandal in him) ſeems to ſignify, falls not into thoſe ſins that ignorant men or uncharitable (who are ſaid in the Antitheſis, verſe 11. to walk in the dark) are ſubject unto. One place more there is belonging to this purpoſe, where though the word Scandal be not uſed in the Text, yet προσκοπὴ, offence, is uſed, and that I confeſs to be all one, and it is 2 Cor. 6. 3. giving no offence in any thing; where yet offence is interpreted by Beza, quidpiam ad quod poſſint impingere, any thing that others may ſtumble at, or be alien'd from the Goſpel by; as if we fail in any Chriſtian duty (mentioned ver. 4, 5, 6.) they that ſee us, would be apt to do: and ſo that which follows imports alſo (that the Miniſtry be not blamed) that is, that our Actions be not juſtly reprehended or found fault with, but in all things approving our ſelves, &c.

Sect. 17. And of this third ſort of places 'tis obſervable again, firſt, that he that is offended, ſins himſelf, ſtumbles, and falls, and bruiſes himſelf, and ſecondly, that he that is the occaſion of his fall doth not always ſin (for Chriſt, and Grace, and that which ſhould have been for their wealth, proves to many an occaſion of falling) but yet ſometimes he doth: as if he purpoſely in a matter indifferent, when he might have choſen, doth any thing which another whoſe Conſcience is doubtful, doth after him, and ſo ſins; nay, if he do not abſtain from that indifferent action, when he ſees that conſequent likely to follow; nay if he be not careful to obſerve, whether the conſequent be likely to follow, and if ſo, to abſtain. This third ſort of Scandal you ſee is applyed peculiarly to one kind of actions, thoſe by the doing of which another coming after, and doing the ſame, falls into ſin, as when either the example was ſinful, or being indifferent in it ſelf is againſt the other mans conſcience, and ſo being imitated by him, is in him a ſin againſt conſcience and not indifferent. And then

Sect. 18. Another ſort of actions there are which may though not ſo directly, yet not improperly be refer'd to this head, as, when I do any thing in it ſelf not unlawful, yet very apt to be miſtaken by other men, for ſomewhat elſe which is unlawful; and ſee it ſtrongly probable, that thoſe which will be apt ſo to miſtake, will be as apt alſo by occaſion of this action of mine, to commit that other ſin which they conceive me to have committed, or to confirm and harden themſelves in that ſin through that miſtaken example of mine, which they might otherwiſe probably have reformed, if they had not received encouragement by this action of mine; And if queſtion be made, what is to be thought of this, I anſwer, that although I am not ſure that that place of Scripture in our Engliſh Bibles which commands [to abſtain from all appearance of evil,] doth come home to this purpoſe, (becauſe ἀπὸ παντὸς εἴδους which we render [from all appearance] may bear another ſence, and ſignify no more than from every kind or ſort of evil, for ſo both the Greek εἶδος, and Latine ſpecies import; and withall, appearance of evil is ſo uncertain, and inconſtant a thing, that to abſtain from it univerſim cannot be the matter of any poſſible command. And again, though I dare not from that other precept of ὅσα εὐφημα whatſoever is of good report, Phil. 4. 8. conclude it unlawful to do any thing which hath the ill luck to be of ill report, i. e. to be miſtaken for a ſin (becauſe firſt there is no prohibition in that place interdicting the doing of every thing which is of ill report, ſecondly no analogy of other Chriſtian rules to infer ſuch prohibition, it being rather the fate of all Chriſtian vertues to be evil ſpoken of, and the receiving the praiſe of men, being branded by Chriſt as unreconcileable with believing, thirdly becauſe ſome actions of Chriſt were of ill report, particularly that of eating and drinking with Publicans and ſinners, (which rendred him ſuſpected for a glutton) and that of caſting out of Devils, (which was defamed for ſorcery or compact with Belzebub,) fourthly becauſe that which is of ill report with one, may be of good report with a thouſand others, and there the judgment of that one will not be conſiderable againſt thoſe thouſand to defame an innocent laudable action) yet ſtill I conceive that the great obligation to φιλανθρωπία and φιλοψυχία, loving of all men, and deſiring the good of their ſouls, which lies upon all Chriſtians (by force of Chriſts example, and legacy, and precept of charity) will will extend ſo far, as to have the force of precept that every man abſtain from ſuch purely indifferent actions (being ſo in themſelves, and then by the Magiſtrate uncommanded) which he foreſees will be thus miſtaken for unlawful by thoſe who are likely to be moved by his example to commit thoſe ſins which they conceive him to have committed; this being an inſeparable attendant of my charity to my brothers ſoul, to uſe all lawful means which my conſcience tells me will be his ghoſtly health, or preſervation.

Mean while ſome difference may be obſerved in things indifferent, ſome being commendable, though not commanded; of uſe, though not of neceſſity; and ſuch as extra cauſam ſcandali, I ſhould on pious conſiderations be moved to chooſe, or practice: and in this caſe, if it be demanded whether that ſole fear of ſcandal ought to reſtrain me from that which all other motives rather incline me to, and to make me abſtain; or whether I ſhould rather claim the priviledge of my Chriſtian liberty, and that make me not to abſtain. I anſwer, that a middle courſe may yet be better than either extreme crudely taken: that is, that I ought to do my beſt to free this laudable indifferent action of mine from the evil colour that it is capable of, by rectifying his judgment whom I diſcern to be miſtaken in it, and by declaring, (either expreſly, or by ſome ſignificative character of my intentions faſtened to my action) the clearneſs and innocency of my purpoſes to any other that may be ſo miſtaken; and by ſo doing if I cannot free my ſelf from his uncharitable cenſure, yet I ſhall be ſure to keep him from any danger of following me to that ſin; for ſure my very diſclaiming of that ſin which he ſuſpects me guilty of, will diveſt that ſin of all authority which it may receive from my committing it, and not invite, but rather deter and fortify others from falling into that ſin, which they ſee diſavowed and diſliked by me. For if my authority be of any force with them, it will perſwade them to abſtain from that which I diſclaim, and profeſs my ſelf to hate (who certainly know my own mind beſt) rather than to do, what they only conceive I do, but I profeſs I do not. And therefore the caſe being thus ſet of the commendable uſeful indifferent, not of the meer frivolous unconſiderable, when the uſe and gain of my action to me is certain, and the danger of being miſtaken by others at moſt but poſſible, and that alſo preventable by theſe other means, neither piety nor prudence will adviſe to abſtain from that healthful food, which if it be by accident unhealthful to others, hath yet an antidote adminiſtred with it. Which will be yet farther heightned alſo, if this laudable indifferent fall out to be ſuch as the example of holy men in Scripture, or the practice of the Church in purer times have given countenance to, eſpecially if the perpetual current of antiquity have commended it to us: for certainly theſe will be of great authority with all prudent pious men, and the more early and Catholick that practice, the greater that authority. Sect. 19.

'Tis true, very ſtrict rules in many particulars the Judaical law of the old Teſtament did preſcribe, forbidding many indifferent things, on this only ground, becauſe the uſing them might ſeem a complyance with the Heathen cuſtoms of Idolaters. Such was that prohibition, Exod. 34. 26. thou ſhalt not ſeethe a kid in the mothers milk, in the ſacrifice of the in-gathering; given no doubt in oppoſition to the Gentile practice of thoſe which at the time of gathering in their fruits, ſolemnly uſed this cuſtom of ſeething a kid in the dams milk, and then in a Magical way, ſprinkled their trees and fields, and gardens with it to make them fructify the next year, as Abrabenel, and others out of Jewiſh Writers have obſerved. Such was alſo the prohibition, Lev. 19. 27. againſt rounding the corners of their heads, in reference to the περιτέμνεσθαι κύκλῳ, or, στρέφειν τὰς κεφάλας the round cut uſed by the Arabians ſaith Herodotus, and thereupon forbidden the Jews, and a woe pronounced Jerem. 9. 26. ἐπὶ πάντα στεφανούμενον, &c. on every one that was ſo cut round, Si adjuverit tonſorem, ſaith Maimonides, if he directed, or willingly permitted the Barber to put him into that heatheniſh guiſe: And many others in the Old Teſtament of the like nature, and the following Rabbins have added many more directions, if not precepts of the ſame nature. That one book of Maimonides concerning Idolatry will furniſh the Reader with ſtore of examples: but ſome ſuch as do not ſo well become the gravity of that Author; as that, If the Jew hath a thorn in his foot, when he is near an Idol, he muſt not ſtoop to take it out. If a tree have been worſhipt, or an Idol ſet in it, it is not lawful to ſit in the ſhade of the trunk or body of that tree, though of the boughs or leaves it be lawful; if there be any other way, it is not lawful to paſs under it; if none, then he muſt run by it. Dionyſius Voſſius in his notes on that Author hath added ſome parallel paſſages out of other Jewiſh Writers, as that of R. Menaſſe, who being ſhewed an Idol, did in contempt caſt ſtones at it, which action of his, becauſe the Image was the image of Mercury (who was wont to be worſhipt by the Heathens after that manner, by throwing ſtones at it, or ſcattering ſtones before him, to which cuſtom or ceremony the [a] Mercurial Statues refer, ſaith Phornutus θεὶ θεῶν) was therefore noted, accuſed, brought before the Judge, and by him pronounced to be unlawful, becauſe it was the proper worſhip of that Idol, though uſed in deſpight, not civility by that man. So again if there be but one way to an Idolatrous City, it is unlawful to go that way, Aboda Zara ca. 1. ſect. 4. and ſo, ſaith he, the Hebrews in Rabot mention a Tradition, that the reaſon why Mordechai would not bow to Haman, was, becauſe there was woven in his garment the image of a falſe God. Sect. 20.

Some inſtances alſo might perhaps be brought out of the practice of the ancient Chriſtian Church (mentioned by Tertullian de Cor. mil.) to this purpoſe of abſtaining from things indifferent, for fear of any appearing complyance with the Heathens. Of which yet it muſt be obſerved, firſt that this was in things of no manner of ſpiritual uſe or profit, neither commendable, nor advantageous, in things of ancient Chriſtian preſcription, or practice of purer times: ſecondly, that it was in matters of ſuch a quality, as that complyance would have ſeemed a diſſembling or renouncing of the Chriſtian faith, (and not of imitating of former purer Chriſtians) and ſo contrary to that great Chriſtian duty of confeſſing Chriſt before men, which they could not be ſaid to do, who when that confeſſion was perſecuted, did thus comply with or not profeſs open diſlike of the actions of thoſe perſecutors. And ſo thoſe inſtances will not be ſo proper to the matter of Scandal, as to that other head of Chriſtian duty, the neceſſity of confeſſing of Chriſt before men, (thoſe eſpecially who are the greateſt oppugners of him, to which matter alſo thoſe other Judaical inſtances do belong) unleſs that non-confeſſing of Chriſt, may by the example ſcandalize alſo. Thirdly, That the ſame men thought it Sect. 21.

not amiſs, or unlawful at other times to comply with other as great enemies of Chriſtianity as the Gentiles, namely with the Jews in obſervation of ſome of their outdated ceremonies, nay thought themſelves obliged ſo to do, when in prudence they conceived it more likely to gain thoſe enemies by that means, than to confirm them in their diſlikes of Chriſtianity, or drive others to thoſe diſlikes. Fourthly, That even with the Heathen themſelves they could in other things think fit to comply alſo, when prudence dictated that complyance as more inſtrumental to Chriſtian policy; and from theſe premiſſes, Fifthly, that this whole matter is to be referred to the Chriſtians pious diſcretion or prudence, it being free to him either to abſtain or not to abſtain from any indifferent action (remaining ſuch) according as that piety, and that prudence ſhall repreſent it to be moſt charitable and beneficial to other mens ſouls; and he that ſhall not thus regulate his actions by what he is convinced will be thus moſt conducing to that grand Chriſtian end, the ſaving or not deſtroying, or not ſuffering ſin upon his brother, ſhall not by me be excuſed from the guilt and blame of having ſcandaliz'd his brother in this laſt new Teſtament ſence, at leaſt in ſome other which is not far diſtant from it; though after all this it muſt be obſerved, that he which thus is betrayed to, or confirmed in any ſin by conceiving me to have committed it, when I have not, (this eaſie proſtitute ſeducible ſinner who will thus ſin upon any, upon no occaſion) is not Saint Pauls weak, i. e. doubtful-conſcienc'd Chriſtian of whom he takes ſuch care that he ſhould not be ſcandaliz'd.

Sect. 22. For ſuch is he only, that for want of knowledge of his juſt Chriſtian liberty, thinks it unlawful to do thoſe things, which being indifferent in themſelves, are only unlawful to him, which believes them ſo, or is not ſatisfied that they are lawful; This weakneſs in faith, (a kind of diſeaſe of the mind, and ſo in the new Teſtament phraſe ἀδύνατα) being only want of knowledge or of Orthodox inſtruction, as will appear by comparing Rom. 14. with 1 Cor. 8. where the ἀδυνῶν τῇ πίστει in one, is all one with the οὐκ ἐν πᾶσιν ἡ γνῶσις in the other, weakneſs in faith, with want of knowledge.

Sect. 23. The only matter of queſtion or difficulty behind in this particular will be, why thoſe who are in ſuch Judaical errours are ſometimes appointed by Saint Paul to be ſo tenderly handled, not to be vilified, or ſet at nought, Rom. 14. 3. but care taken that they be not ſcandaliz'd in the end of that chapter, 1 Cor. 8. and yet in the Epiſtle to the Galathians, they are by the Apoſtle reviled [O fooliſh, &c.] c. 3. 1. and chid and reproached out of their Judaical performances, and no care taken of not ſcandalizing them. The anſwering of this will require us to conſider the different eſtate of thoſe Galathians from thoſe Romans. The Galathians had been formerly Gentiles, and (though as it ſeems not improbable from Gal. 4. 9. formerly converted from thence, as Proſelytes to Judaiſm, yet) by Saint Paul thoroughly converted from thence and baptized into Chriſtianity, as that is oppoſite both to Judaiſm and Gentiliſm alſo, i. e. fully inſtructed by him in the nature of Chriſtian doctrine, and liberty, and had given up their hearts as well as names unto it, only after they had been begotten by Saint Paul in the Goſpel, had begun in the Spirit, Gal. 3. 3. had come to an abſolute abrenunciation of all their former Jewiſh perſwaſions, and to ſome good progreſs in Chriſtianity, ſome falſe Judaizing teachers began to corrupt and poyſon them, Gal. 3. 1. and 5. 7. and to bring them back again to that yoke, that they had been taught to caſt off; and theſe tares the Apoſtle could hope by reprehenſions and ſharpneſs to root out without endangering the wheat, and therefore ſets ſeverely and heartily to it, thinks not fit either in civility or charity to uſe any complyances, or condeſcendings, or ſofter medicines, (knowing their errours to be contrary to the Doctrine, to which they had been baptized, and conſequently that they might in reaſon give place unto it, and there was * no fear that the rooting out of them would root out Chriſtianity with them, as it might probably do, if they had been ſown or planted together) but employs all his vehemence and bowels of kindneſs towards them, in conjuring out that evil ſpirit had ſo lately got poſſeſſion of them, and doubts not but Chriſtianity that was earlier planted in them, (and that by him who had begotten them in the Goſpel, and ſo had a paternal authority with them) than theſe vain legal dreams, that ſome falſe teachers had lately inſtilled into them, might be able to ſurvive them alſo. And in this caſe being to deal with adverſaries and falſe teachers, not with weakelings but corrupters, had the Apoſtle uſed any compliance, had he circumciſed Titus, Gal. 2. 3. (as at another time he did Timothy) had he then given place but for an hour, ver. 5. ſuſpended the uſe of his liberty then, when liberty was decryed, this had been ſcandalous in the Apoſtle, this had probably been the confirming of the erroneous, the encouraging of the adverſary, the miſleading the doubtful, ſhaking the faithful, and diſturbing what he had before ſetled among them.

* no cauſe of fear.

Sect. 24. Whereas on the other ſide the Romans at their firſt converſion to Chriſtianity had not all of them been taught to put off the opinion of the neceſſity of legal abſtinences τῷ τῷ νόμῳ κατηχοῦμενοι συνηθείᾳ καὶ τῇ πίστει, ſaith Saint Chryſoſtome in proœm. ad ep. ad Rom. but continued their obligation to the Law after receiving of the faith, being ſome of them (as may appear by the matter of Saint Pauls diſcourſe to them, in the former part eſpecially of that Epiſtle) natural Jews, diſperſed thither; who could not be eaſily brought to aſſent to ſuch doctrine, but would probably have refuſed to embrace Chriſtianity, if it had been offered to them on ſuch hard conditions, ſome others of them (who were Gentiles by birth) being perhaps Proſelytes to Moſes and Chriſt together, partakers of the infelicity of thoſe who are mentioned, Acts 15. 5. that by the doctrine of the Phariſee-Chriſtians (or believers of the ſect of the Phariſees) had at their entrance on the faith, a neceſſity of receiving Judaiſm alſo preſt upon them. This Saint Paul teſtifies clearly of Saint Peter, Gal. 2. 14. that he conſtrained the Gentiles to Judaize, to receive the Moſaical as well as Chriſtian law, and himſelf durſt not converſe or eat with the Gentiles whilſt any Jewiſh Chriſtians were by, ver. 12. by which whether doctrine or complyance of Saint Peter, it was no ſtrange thing if it came to paſs, that thoſe which were by him converted to the faith, (as Euſebius and other Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorians agree that the Romans were, vid. Eccl. hiſt. lib. 2. ca. 14. and 15.) although they were Chriſtians in the poſitive part, acknowledging ſo much as was anſwerable to the now-articles of the Creed, &c. yet being not ſo in the negative, concerning the evacuating of the Judaical law (but rather perſwaded of the contrary) could no more eat ſwines fleſh, than a meer Jew could do, and therefore 'tis Saint Chryſoſtome's opinion that theſe being being ſo wedded to thoſe Judaical obſervances, rather than they would eat forbidden fleſh, would in univerſum eat no fleſh at all ὥστε μὴ γίνεσθαι εὐφυᾶεῖλοι, ἢ χοιρείων ἀπεχόμενοι μόνων, πάντων ἐξῆς ἀπεί-χοντο ἢ κρεῶν, and ſo came to eat nothing but Herbs, Rom. 14. 2.

Sect. 25. Of theſe therefore that were thus weak in faith, ver. 1. that is either infirm, feeble, uninſtructed Chriſtians, babes not men; or elſe (as the Fathers enlarge the ſence, and as weakneſs ἀδύνατα moſtly imports in the new Teſtament) ſick and diſeaſed in mind, brought up in this Judaical errour, the Apoſtle Rom. 14. gives theſe directions: Firſt, That the ſtronger healthfuller, i. e. more knowing and more Orthodox Chriſtians ſhould προσλαμβάνεσθαι (the vulgar read aſſumere) take them to them, firſt friendly to afford them communion, and not ſeparate from them for this errour, ſecondly, labour to cure their malady, get them out of their errour, and not leave them in the pride and folly of their own hearts, to judge and cenſure thoſe who have done nothing amiſs, but rather deſire their good (which Saint Chryſoſtome underſtands by προσλαμβάνεσθαι μὴ εἰς διακρίσεις διαλογισμῶν, and ſo Saint Jerome alſo, intending it thus, Nolite ſecundum veſtras cogitationes, quæ lex non judicat, judicare, alius enim credit, &c.) and from that verſe obſerves, that though the Apoſtle exhorts the ſtrong, yet he covertly reprehends, and on their backs as it were whips, the weak or erroneous Judaizers, firſt in ſaying they are ſick, ſecondly, in bidding προσλαμβάνεσθε αὐτὸν, which is an evidence, ſaith he, ἐσχάτης ἀῤῥωστίας that they are in very ill caſe, and thirdly in mentioning διακρίσεις which notes (ſaith he) that they judge and cenſure thoſe that leaſt deſerve it, and that are willing to communicate with them, and labour the curing of them; and indeed that theſe weak ones did ſo judge the ſtrong is plain, verſe 3. where the exhortation is diſtinct, let not him that eateth not, judge him that eateth.) Secondly, That the knowing again ſhould not vilify or ſet at naught the weaker [μὴ ἐξουθενείτω ver. 3.] not call him Racha, empty ſenceleſs fellow, not reproach or ſcoff at his ſcrupulous conſcience, but in charity ſuppoſe it to proceed from want of knowledge only, and conſequently to have the excuſe and benefit of that Goſpel antidote, weakneſs or ignorance to plead for it. Thirdly, That the ſtronger Chriſtians (which although they have liberty, yet are not obliged alway to make uſe of it) abſtain from thoſe lawful enjoyments which thoſe weak ones, which count them unlawful, may yet by their example be embolden'd againſt Conſcience to venture on.

Sect. 26. But then on the other ſide, the weak or ſick erroneous Chriſtian, that cannot with a good Conſcience uſe that liberty himſelf, is commanded, 1. Μὴ κρίνειν that he do not judge or cenſure the ſtrong, upon two reaſons: 1. becauſe ὁ θεὸς αὐτὸν προσελάβετο, ver. 3. God hath by calling him to the faith, aſſumed or received the ſtrong (as that ſtrong had been exhorted to do the weak, ver. 1.) εἰς φιλίαν to friendſhip or communion firſt, (as προσλαμβάνεσθε is uſed Philem. 12.) then to help and cure him of his former defect or diſeaſe, and bring him to perfect health and growth in Chriſtianity: and ſecondly, becauſe he is Gods ſervant and domeſtick, and ſtands and falls to his own Maſter, v. 4. Secondly, That he be ſure never to do any thing againſt Conſcience, or which he is not fully perſwaded in mind, that it is lawful for him.

Sect. 27. Having thus ſeen the ſtate of thoſe Romans, it will be ſuperfluous to add much about the Corinthians in the almoſt parallel place, 1 Cor. 8. This only difference will be worth noting between them, that (as there were two ſorts of Proſelytes among the Jews, one of Juſtice, or of thoſe that undertook the obſervation of the whole Judaical Law; the other of the Gates, thoſe that received only the precepts of the ſons of Noah, of which the abſtaining from things offered to Idols was one, and as when the difference was betwixt the brethren, Acts 15. whether the Gentile-converts ſhould be circumciſed, verſe 1. i. e. be admitted Proſelytes of Juſtice, or only receive the ſeven precepts of Noah, abſtain from things offered to Idols, &c. verſe 19. it was determin'd in the Council of the Apoſtles, that it ſhould ſuffice, if they were Proſelytes of the gates, and therefore they tell them that if they thus be entred, abſtain from things offered to Idols, &c. they ſhall do well, ſo) the Romans being either Jews, or under the firſt head of Jewiſh proſelytes, in Saint Chryſoſtoms opinion, and ſo thinking themſelves bound to all legal Moſaical abſtinences, the Corinthians were only under the ſecond, and ſo by their principles, which they had received of thoſe, who converted, baptiſed, and begot them in the faith, (and that according to the reſult of that Apoſtolick conſultation, Acts 15.) did continue to think it unlawful to eat any thing offered to Idols, or that came from an Idol feaſt (which yet by the way Saint Paul reſolves was but an errour in them, 1 Cor. 8. 4. and by that judgment of his you ſee the unobligingneſs of that interdict, Acts 15.) and therefore (in like manner, as before) thoſe, that were better inſtructed than they, ought to have that charity to them, as not to do any thing in their preſence which might by the example draw them to venture on that which was againſt their conſcience, eſpecially conſidering, that they had not knowledge or underſtanding enough to judge how nothing an Idol was, v. 7.

Sect. 28. Having thus compared the Romans and Corinthians with the Galathians, and given ſome account of the reaſon of their different uſage, it will not be amiſs to add what Saint Chryſoſtome obſerves to be the cauſe of the like difference in Saint Pauls behaviour to the Coloſſians from that fore-mentioned to the Romans. It is a ſpecial paſſage in his proœm to the Epiſtles. Where having mentioned the order wherein the Epiſtles were written, different from the order of ſetting them in our books, concludes that this was no unprofitable diſquiſition, for thereby many paſſages in the books would be interpreted: As, that Rom. 14. he condeſcends to the weak brethren, but not ſo Col. 2. which, ſaith he, was for no other reaſon, but becauſe, that to the Romans was written before the other, and therefore as Phyſicians and Maſters deal not ſo ſharply with Scholars or Patients at firſt as afterwards, ſo the Apoſtle in the beginning συγκαταβαίνει Ἰουδαΐζουσι, μὴ ἢ ταῦτα ἐκ ἔτι, adding that he was not ſo familiar with the Romans as yet, having never been amongſt them at the time of writing that Epiſtle to them, as appeareth Rom. 1. 13.

Sect. 29. By all this 'tis clear indeed, that thoſe which are thus weak (either in the notion of babes or ſick men) ſo that they are not able to diſcern lawful from unlawful (as the Idol to be nothing 1 Cor. 8. 7.) merely for want of ſufficient inſtruction, or ſomewhat proportionable to that, principles of underſtanding, or the like; but eſpecially if they received thoſe errors or miſtakes together with their Chriſtianity from the Apoſtle or from the Church which gave them baptiſm, they muſt then, firſt in meekneſs be inſtructed, and cured of their ill habit of ſoul: ſecondly not be vilified or reproacht: yea thirdly be ſo charitably conſidered, that till they have received ſatisfaction of conſcience and reformation of errour, we are not to do any thing in their preſence, that may by the example bring them to do what their conſcience is not perſwaded to be lawful, or if we do, we are ſaid to ſcandalize a weak brother, i. e. an erroneous Chriſtian. But then withal 'tis as clear, Firſt, That thoſe who have firſt received the true doctrine, and are for ſome good time rooted in it, that are otherwiſe taught by the Church that gave them baptiſm, are not within the compaſs of this the Apoſtles care, but, (as the Galathians) to be reprehended, chid, and ſhamed out of their childiſh errours, theſe diſeaſes of ſoul that their own itching ears have brought upon them: Secondly, That they that have knowledge in other things, nay are able to diſtinguiſh as critically as any, even to divide a perſon from himſelf, and obey one when they aſſault the other, (and by their ſubtlety in other matters demonſtrate their blindneſs in this one to be the effect of malice, of paſſion, of luſts, of carnality, and not of any blameleſs infirmity or impotence,) are again excluded from the Apoſtles care: and ſo thirdly, that they that are come to theſe errours by the infuſions of falſe teachers, which not the providence of God but their own choice hath helpt them to, preferring every new poyſon before the ancient daily food of ſouls, have no right to that care or providence of the Apoſtle, any farther than every kind of ſinner hath right to every thing in every fellow-Chriſtians power which may prevent or cure his malady, i. e. by the general large rule of charity, and not the cloſer particular law of Scandal. Nay fourthly, that the caſe may be ſuch, and the adverſaries of Chriſtian liberty, the oppoſers of the uſe of lawful ceremonies ſo contrary to weak blameleſs miſtakers, that it may be duty not to allow them the leaſt temporary complyance, but then to expreſs moſt zeal in retaining our lawful indifferent obſervances, to vindicate our liberty from enſlavers, when the truth of Chriſt would be diſclaimed by a cowardly condeſcending, the adverſaries of our faith confirmed and heightened, and the true weakling ſeduced, (a copy of which we read in St. Peters ὑποκρισει, Gal. 2. 12. and Barnabas and the Jewiſh converts being carried away with it v. 13. falling by his example into the ſame fault of diſſimulation, puſillanimity, non-profeſſion of the truth) which is a moſt proper kind of ſcandal, as frequent, and incident, as any, and ſo being as dangerous, as fit alſo to be prevented. To which I might add a fifth propoſition alſo, That the Apoſtles ſpeech of ſcandal Rom. 14. and 1 Cor. 8. hath been thought by holy men among the ancients to have much of civility in it, at the moſt to be but an act of Apoſtolical care for thoſe weak ones, (proportionable to thoſe which in other places he preſcribes for every other kind of ſinner) both which are far enough from being able to infer any claim or challenge of thoſe weak for themſelves, any farther than what the firſt part of it amounts to, that of inſtruction; or at leaſt the ſecond, that of not being vilifyed, as the ſick hath right to the Phyſician, to cure him and not to reproach him, civilly to get him out of his malady, i. e. to rectify not to ſcoff at his miſtake. For that he ſhould challenge any right to the third part of that care, that he ſhould reſtrain me from the uſe of my lawful liberty, becauſe elſe he will ſin againſt his own conſcience, do after me what he reſolves unlawful to do, ſuppoſes a wilful ſin of his to be to him a foundation of dominion over me, and ſo that every man that will thus damn himſelf, doth for that, merit and acquire command over me, which if it be ſuppoſed, is ſure as wild an extravagant irregular way to power, as that of its being founded in gratia, or any that theſe worſt days experience hath taught us.

Sect. 30. Having thus far expatiated on this laſt kind of ſcandal, and taken in that which is proper to it, and alſo that which is more diſtant from it, I ſhall now reſolve it neceſſary to add yet one thing more, inſtrumental to the underſtanding of this kind of Scandal in the ſtricter notion of it, by way of farther caution and reſtraint, and 'tis this, that

Sect. 31. This being offended, ſtumbling and falling in this third and laſt ſence, is not to be extended to all kinds of ſins, which a man may commit upon occaſion of another mans indifferent action; but only to that one kind, that conſiſts in doing that after him, either doubting or againſt Conſcience, which he did with an inſtructed Conſcience; or at moſt to this other kind alſo, of doing ſome unlawful thing which anothers lawful action was yet by miſtake conceived to give authority to; and which that man probably would not have done, had not that miſtaken example thus emboldened him. For if all ſins that by any accident might be occaſioned by my indifferent Action, ſhould come under the nature of being offended or ſcandaliz'd, conſequently I muſt be interdicted all indifferent actions at all times, becauſe at all times each of them may occaſion (by ſome accident) ſome ſin in another: and 'twill be impoſſible for me to foreſee or comprehend all ſuch accidents that may occaſion ſuch ſins. An action of mine may by accident produce a contrary effect; my faſting from fleſh, may move another (that diſlikes me) by way of oppoſition to me, to eat fleſh, though in Conſcience he be perſwaded he ought not; as in philoſophy there is a thing call'd Antiperiſtaſis (by which exceſſive cold produces heat) and equivocal generations, as when living creatures are begotten of duſt and ſlime: and for ſuch accidental, perhaps contrary productions, no law makes proviſion, no care is effectual: only for thoſe effects, that per ſe, of their own accord are likely to follow (as tranſcribing a Copy is a proper conſequent only to the writing of it) theſe the law of the Apoſtle belongs to, and to them our care and ſpiritual prudence muſt be joined, ſo that we do nothing, though to us never ſo lawful, which we have reaſon to fear, that another who thinks it unlawful, may yet, without ſatisfying his Conſcience, be likely to do after us, or on occaſion of which he may probably do ſomething elſe, which otherwiſe he would not venture to do.

Sect. 32. Having thus far dealt in the retail and gone over all the kinds of ſcandal ſingle, we may now aſcend to the conſideration of all in groſs, and then alſo theſe Corollaries will be found true, that from all the kinds of Scandal it is clear, 1. That no man is offended or ſcandaliz'd, but he that falls into ſome ſin, and therefore to ſay I am ſcandalized, in the Scripture ſence is to confeſs I have done that which I ought not to have done: and then my only remedy muſt be repentance and amendment.

Sect. 33. 2. That to be angry, grieved, troubled at any action of another, is not [to be offended] in the Scripture ſence, nor conſequently doth it follow, that I have done amiſs in doing that which another man is angry at, unleſs my action be in it ſelf Evil. For if it be not, then firſt he is angry without cauſe, cauſe, and that is his fault, not mine; yea and κρίνει ἀδελφὸν, he judges or cenſures his brother that hath done no hurt, which the weak is forbid to do. Rom. 14. 3. And ſecondly, he is of all men moſt unlikely to do that after me, which he is angry at me for doing, and therefore I have leaſt reaſon to fear, or poſſibility to foreſee, that he will be Scandaliz'd in the Scripture phraſe: which fear or foreſight were the only juſt motive to me to abſtain from any juſtifiable indifferent action.

The occaſion of the miſtake (or in the Philoſophers ſtile the ἄτιον τῦ ψεύδους) the reaſon that men think it a fault to do any indifferent thing that another is angry or diſpleaſed at, is firſt the equivocalneſs of the Engliſh phraſe to be offended, for that in Engliſh ſignifies to be diſpleaſed; but in Greek (the language wherein the New Teſtament is written) it ſignifies no ſuch matter, unleſs by accident, when being diſpleaſed with Chriſt, makes a man deny him and forſake him: but then alſo 'tis not the being diſpleaſed, but the forſaking or denying him that is meant by being offended, that is Scandaliz'd. Sect. 34.

Or Secondly, the uſe of a word that ſounds like this in that chapter concerning this matter, Rom. 14. for there v. 15. this phraſe is uſed εἰ διὰ βρῶμα, [If becauſe of thy eating, thy brother is grieved, or made ſorry.] Where yet firſt 'twill be much more juſt that that one ſingle word ſhould receive its importance from the whole context, than the whole context from that one word. The whole context from the 13. to the laſt verſe belongs to the ſecond ſort of Scandal, when a weak brother, a ſcrupulous Chriſtian, is by another, that is not ſo, caſt off, and ſeparated from, judged and rejected by him, which cannot but be matter of diſcouragement to the weak, and hindrance in his Chriſtian courſe; and therefore in all probability that muſt be the meaning of the 15. v. alſo, [is grieved] i.e. galled, and diſcouraged from the Chriſtian courſe] explain'd by two words, v. 21. being ſcandalized, and being weak or ſick. And ſo it may eaſily be reſolv'd to ſignify. For ſecondly λύπη, grief, may be taken for the cauſe of grief, a diſeaſe, or wound, or gall, &c. as ὀδὰξ ψυχῆς Eccluſ. 30. 10. one that cauſeth grief to the ſoul, and as fear in Scripture ſignifies danger, which is the cauſe of fear, according to a vulgar Hebraiſm ordinary in the New Teſtament, where for want of the conjugation hiphil, which in Hebrew ſignifies [to make to do any thing] the Greek is fain to uſe the active to do. An obſervation which Hugo Grotius makes uſe of to explain that Phraſe (I ſhall not enquire how truly) Mat. 19. 9. and reſolves that there μοιχᾶται [committeth adultery] muſt ſignify [maketh her from whom he divorceth, to commit adultery] parallel to what we read, Mat. 5. 32. So alſo πενθῶν, to bewail 2 Cor. 12. 21. ſignifies to puniſh, to uſe ſharpneſs, which will cauſe grief, or wayling in them that ſuffer it. The word is very near this other of which now we ſpeak, and therefore Heſychius (the beſt gloſſary for the New Teſtament,) renders πένθος both by συμφορὰ calamity, and λύπη grief: i.e. grief and the cauſe of grief; which is alſo very obſervable in the uſe of this very word λύπη or λυπεῖν in the Septuagint; the word דוה which ſignifies infirm, or weak, or ſick, being rendred λυπούμενος Lam. 1. 22. ὅλη καρδία μῶ λυπεῖται, where we render my heart is faint; and ſo Iſ. 1. 5. πᾶσα καρδία εἰς λύπην, the whole heart is faint, faintneſs meaning ſickneſs, which is the cauſe of grief; and therefore the ſame Hebrew word, is in other places rendred ὀδύνη, affliction, or pain, and νόσος Diſeaſe Deut. 7. 15. agreeable to the 21. v. of that Rom. 14. where being ſcandalized, or offended is explained by being made weak, which phraſe is not to be taken in the ſence that weakneſs is uſed in, v. 1, 2. that of infirmity or error (for ſuch he is, before ſtumbling) but in this other as weakneſs and diſeaſe, i.e. ſin, are all one. So alſo another Hebrew word אבד which ſignifies perdition, and deſtruction, and is frequently rendred by ἀπώλεια, is once interpreted λύπη Prov. 31. 6. οἱ ἐν λύπαις, for which our Engliſh read ready to periſh; very agreeable to which doth St. Paul here interpret, grieving the brother by deſtroying him, i.e. driving him away from the Chriſtian courſe, the notion of Scandal, which all this while we ſpeak of. From all which obſervations, and analogies it will be no raſhneſs to conclude, that λυπεῖται, being grieved, in that place, is perfectly ſynonymous with ἀσθενεῖ which we there render, is made weak, (and in divers places of the New Teſtament ſignifies κοινῶς diſeaſe, or ſickneſs, and is ſo rendred by us, James 5. 14. ἀσθενεῖ τις; is any man ſick?) and with ἀπολλεῖται ὁ ἀσθενῶν 1 Cor. 8. 11. in the ſame matter, thy brother is weak, and dieth, or periſheth through weakneſs, and with the like phraſe in this chapter alſo, in the end of verſe 15. All which clearly denote the diſeaſe or periſhing of the ſoul, i.e. ſin, which will deſtroy, if repentance and mercy intervene not. Sect. 35.

The third (which is indeed the main) occaſion of the miſtake, is an ordinary but an unjuſtifiable humour of men, to accuſe and condemn all whom they do not like, i.e. a deſire to lay ſome crime to the charge of them, with whom they are angry, if it be but ſe defendendo, that they may not be ſaid to be angry without a cauſe, and when they cannot find any ſuch real crime, then they fly to the caſe of Scandal, and miſtaking that for offending, or diſpleaſing, or occaſioning anger and diſlike, their being angry with them, muſt make them with whom they are angry, criminous; which what a circle it is, firſt to be angry without cauſe, and then to make that a cauſe of anger, (i.e. a ſin in the other) becauſe I am angry, I conceive will not be hard for any to underſtand. Sect. 36.

I will only add, that if another mans diſpleaſure or anger at my indifferent action, ſhould make that my indifferent action a ſin againſt him, then any mans ſin of uncharitableneſs againſt me muſt make me to be uncharitable, for ſo I ſhould be, if I ſinned againſt him in ſcandalizing him: but if I were not ſo before, his ſin (being utterly accidental and extrinſecal to me) ſhall not, I hope, make me to be ſo now. Sect. 37.

To all which I ſhall here inſert this appendage, that even for proper-ſcripture-ſcandals, the criminouſneſs of them is not to be meaſured by the event, but by the natural ſcandalouſneſs, or aptneſs to give Scandals inherent in them; for I conceive God paſſes Judgment upon ſinners by intuition, not by previſion, by ſeeing what the ſin is in it ſelf, and in the aggravating circumſtances that are inſeparable from it (as that it is apt to give ſcandals, &c.) not by the caſual conſequents that may poſſibly either follow or not follow. And I conceive, that that opinion of the Papiſts (on which they lay part of the foundation of their Purgatory) that men may after their Deaths ſin, and have more acts of ſin lying on them, (by reaſon of other men ſinning by the ſcandal which they gave in their lives) than they had at their Death, and ſo require in juſt recompence, ſome puniſhments increaſeable above what they could be adjudg'd to at their death, is but a phanſy or School-notion, that hath ſome ſhew of truth, but little ſubſtance, ſeeing God puniſheth every man by the verdict of his own Conſcience; Sect. 38.

Conſcience; and therefore that other ſin, which my ſin is apt to produce in another, will be by way of aggravation, laid to my charge by God, that ſees my heart, and the inherent ſcandalouſneſs of that action of mine, (though that other man by the grace of God do reſiſt the Temptation which my Scandal gave him,) as much as if he had not reſiſted it, and ſo as his not ſinning ſhall not excuſe and leſſen my fault which was apt to have brought him to ſin; ſo in like manner, if he do not reſiſt the temptation, or if by occaſion of it, he fall by accident (i. e. by the motion of ſome other part of his temper) into ſome other ſin, to wit that of cauſleſs anger (which no action of another can be ſaid apt to produce; for if it might, the anger would ceaſe to be cauſleſs) this accidental fall of his ſhall not add to the ſinfulneſs of my act, any more than his former not ſinning did detract from it, nor conſequently make it ſinful, if of it ſelf it were not ſo.

Sect. 39. You will beſt judge of this truth by an example. That Heliodor a Biſhop committed a fault, firſt in writing, then in ſetting forth an amorous light fiction or Romance, and then improving that fault by chooſing rather to loſe his Biſhoprick than to ſubſcribe the condemnation of his work, is and may be reaſonably acknowledged; That ſome men alſo by reading that Author have ſince been tranſported to the commiſſion of ſome ſins, may not improbably be imagined; but having granted all this (and withal that the aptneſs to give ſuch Scandal, was matter of aggravation to his ſin) let me now ſuppoſe, that immediately after his death that book had been burnt (as before his death it was condemn'd) when he was no longer able to preſerve it, would the Councils condemning and committing that execution upon that work, any whit have mitigated his Sentence in Heaven? to affirm that, were to ſuppoſe Purgatory, or ſomewhat like it, or elſe that God by his foreſight of that act of the Council ſhould have allowed him that mitigation at the day of his particular judgment, i. e. imputed the caſual future actions of others to the preſent acquitting of him; and then, beſides the many inconveniences that might attend ſuch conceſſions, it muſt alſo follow, that every reprinting of that book ſince that time, hath been a damnable ſin (not only of giving Scandal to ſuch as have been ſince infected by it, but eſpecially) of uncharitableneſs to that poor dead Biſhop, in increaſing his Torments, or making them capable of increaſe ever ſince, by giving him a capacity, and of corrupting more readers; which humanity and charity, and our great obligations to the nature of which we partake, would not permit any good Chriſtian to do willingly; and beſides though our prayers may not be allowed to be able to fetch ſouls out of Purgatory, yet ſuch a not reprinting of his book might do ſomewhat like it, prevent the enlargement of his pains, though not make expiation for him. So again when thoſe obſcene pictures that hiſtorians mention (as I remember in Tiberius his time) after the Authors death were burnt, and not permitted liberty to corrupt the eyes of poſterity, but Aretynes have had that luck to do it, it would by that School reaſon follow, that Aretyne though in the work and the deſign but equal ſinner, were yet by this miſhap of not periſhing, become far more criminouſly guilty, than that other Author; which ſure to affirm were a very irrational nicety.

Sect. 40. 3. A third Corollary, from the view of all the places together will be this, that to give Scandal is then moſt criminous, when it ſignifies, by my example to bring another man to a ſin, eſpecially if this ſcandalous action of mine be of it ſelf a ſin, abſtracted from the ſin adherent of Scandal; and then let any indifferent man judge in what degree may thoſe be truly ſaid to ſcandalize or offend others, (or indeed how they can be excuſed from that crime) who by being angry with me without a cauſe, and ſo committing that ſin againſt Chriſts law, Mat. 5. 22. do alſo by ſo doing not only provoke and tempt me to anger back again, which is a ſin in me, if I yield to it, and that more than accidentally cauſed by them that provoke me, Eph. 5. 4. but give other men, who have a good opinion of their Judgment and ſanctity, a plain pattern of that ſin of uncharitableneſs to tranſcribe and copy out, I mean, to ſin alſo by cauſleſs anger.

Sect. 41. 4. That the great ſin of Scandal in the uſe of things indifferent, that St. Paul ſo ſpeaks of, and reſolves againſt, Rom. 14. is the ſin of uncharitableneſs, or pride in deſpiſing and not condeſcending to the weak brother; meaning by the weak brother not every one that may fall into any ſin (for ſo every one living will come under that title) but particularly him that is ἀδυνὸς τῇ πίσει, weak and ignorant, and unſettled in the faith, as it is oppoſed to the ſtrong, i. e. the knowing Chriſtian.

Sect. 42. And then let any judge whether this can belong to them who profeſs themſelves leaders of others, and would be unwilling to be counted ignorant, and particularly who in the points wherein they profeſs themſelves to be offended, are ſo knowingly reſolv'd, that they will never be induced to do that after me which they affirm themſelves ſcandalized at: which you may diſcern, becauſe they are angry and inviegh againſt me for doing of it, and do not ſo much as pretend that they are by my example enclined to do what I do, and ſo ſcandalized; but only angry at me, or my Action, and ſo offended.

Sect. 43. Mean while I cannot but confeſs that any mans wilful ſin, though it cannot be called weakneſs in our vulgar notion; yet in the other notion of weakneſs, for diſeaſe of ſoul, it may well paſs; and deſerve to be the object of my charity and compaſſion, as much or more than weakneſs is: and therefore the uncharitableneſs of my brother or his cauſleſs anger againſt me being ſuch, I conceive my ſelf bound to uſe any lawful means which I can hope may be able to prevent any ſuch ſin in him, or to get or recover him out of it; eſpecially if that ſin of his may become probably over and above his uncharitableneſs, a means to ſtop or hinder him in his courſe of reformation, or farther growth in piety; as probably it will be, if I againſt whom he is thus unjuſtly wroth, be his lawful Paſtor; for then that cauſleſs anger or rage of his againſt me may, through his farther default, occaſion in him ſome vow or reſolution, never to hear me, never to be moved or perſwaded by me in any thing, that out of the Pulpit or in private reaſoning or exhortation, I ſhall (never ſo convincingly) propoſe unto him.

Sect. 44. In this caſe it may be demanded whether I ought in charity to abſtain from this indifferent action, which I foreſee will be the matter, though not the cauſe of all this ſin in him, of uncharitableneſs and non-proficiency in his Chriſtian courſe, and whether if I do not ſo abſtain, this be not to ſcandalize my brother? To which I briefly anſwer, Firſt, That this anger or uncharitableneſs of his, is not the being ſcandaliz'd in the ſcripture ſence, nor conſequently in that reſpect my Action a Scandal,

Scandal, though it be the matter of the anger, or that which he is angry with.

Secondly, 'Tis true indeed that his resolving against my preaching, is in him to be Scandaliz'd, i. e. to fall and be stopt in the service of God: but this only in a general sence; as every other such hard-hearted obdurate resisting of Gods Grace is, or may be called also: and that which occasions this being Scandaliz'd, is not my indifferent action, but his anger or uncharitable conceit of me for it, unless equivocally, or remotely, as my action is the object of that anger, which anger is the Author of that prophane resolution. Sect. 45.

Yet thirdly, if I might foresee that my indifferent action would occasion, though unjustly, his anger, and his anger produce the effect before-mentioned, I think I should do well to abstain from that indifferent action, in charity to him. Sect. 46.

But that with these cautions, First, Unless my indifferent action be ordinable to some good Christian use, and designed by me to it; for then, as the Jews resolve that a tree set for fruit though it chance to be worship'd, is not made unlawful by that means, so that indifferent useful action of mine will not be made unlawful by the possibility of that ill consequence: Or secondly, unless that action in it self indifferent, by lawful authority be commanded, and so cease to be indifferent to me who am under that authority: Or thirdly, unless my abstaining may as probably prove matter of anger to some other of contrary perswasions: Or fourthly, unless that my abstaining or receding or undoing what before I had done, be more likely to confirm him in his errour (which otherwise in time being not yielded to, he may forsake) than to prevent or allay his causeless anger and those effects of it. Or fifthly, unless I use some means in prudence not only sufficient, but probable to prevent this sin of unjust anger in him before, or to reform it afterward. Sect. 47. Maimon. Hilch. ca. 5.

But if my abstaining be like to fall into all or any of these inconveniences, then sure I ought not thus to abstain; because when these consequences do attend my abstaining, they are nearer and more immediate to my abstaining, than his resolving against my preaching is to my doing of it. Sect. 48.

And another consideration also may be taken, that he that will so causelesly be angry and resolve against the ordinary means of his salvation, will by the suggestion of the Devil or temptation of his own corrupt humour, be likely to find out some other matter of quarrel against me and my preaching, i. e. against his own salvation, though I by abstaining from that particular action, deprive him of that. Sect. 49.

And lastly, though I shall not define, yet I would have it considered, whether he that is so disposed in soul and affection, that so gives up the reins of his passions, as upon every or no occasion to break out into causeless anger, uncharitableness, and the effects of it forementioned, be at all the more innocent or less culpable in the sight of God by the not committing of some one act of that sin, only through wanting that or any other one occasion of committing that act. For as in good things God accepts the will for the deed (if it be a firm and ratified will, a full actual intention, and want nothing but opportunity to shew it self) and again accepts him that hath expreſt that will by ten only acts, being by want of opportunity deprived of a possibility of adding one act more to the number, as well as him, which having the opportunity that the other wanted, hath exceeded him in the number of outward acts. So there may be some reason to fear, that an unresisted, unrestrained propension or consent to evil, that wants nothing, but an occasion to actuate it, will be as criminous in the sight of God, as if (without any improvement or change, but only by meeting with that occasion) it break forth into act: or that an habitual inclination to sin in one man ten times actuated in the members, having no more occasions to actuate it, shall be as sadly punished, as the same degree of inclination and intention through presence of occasion once more actuated. Sect. 50.

The same Consideration will be proper to other particulars incident to the matter of Scandal. As when any thirsty drunkard actually importunate in the pursuit of his espoused sin, shall by occasion of my feast fall into an open act of that sin, (and a hundred the like.) The question then may be, whether supposing him bent to excess, and not only habitually guilty of it, but actually intent upon it, and only kept off by want of Occasion, He would have had less guilt upon his soul, if I had not then invited him. I conceive it hard to maintain the affirmative, for though with men, who see not the heart, no sin is punishable but that in the members (unless in case of Treason) yet with God the sin of the heart and the hand seems to be equally great, the act of the mind and the act of the body; And the minutely preparations of that to sin as punishable, as the minutely execution of this. As in the Schoolmens resemblance the pressing of the stone to the ground is as great when it is withheld by my hand, as when it is actually moving toward the center. Sect. 51.

I confess there is somewhat to be said, and perhaps with probability, on the other side. And I think St. Augustine somewhere expresseth his opinion, that though in good things God mercifully accepts the will for the deed, yet out of the same mercy and indulgence he punisheth not so in evil things; Yet because St. Augustine may perhaps mean the incompleat and not perfect act of the will, (which though we yield to be less than the outward act, yet the compleat act of the will, wanting nothing but opportunity of execution, may still be as great,) Or however, because there are not such demonstrable grounds of resolution, as to yield clear conviction to all in this matter, and to assure the Christian that such an Addition of any outward act of sin shall make the punishment the heavier to the habitual sinner, and so the absence of that outward act alleviate it; therefore although I said I think he should do well to abstain, I dare not yet affirm that he is bound in charity to do so; Nothing but charity binding him to it, and the man that still hath that propension unresisted, being (upon this supposition, which we have made not improbable) like to reap little profit from that charity. Sect. 52.

As free, and not using your liberty for a Cloak of Maliciousness, but as the servants of God, 1 Pet. 2. 16.
But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the Judgment, Mat. 5. 22.

Sect. 1. THE word ἐθελοθρησκία, or Will-worſhip, hath for ſome time had the ill fortune to paſs under an ill notion, and be taken for ſomewhat reprovable in a Chriſtian: how juſtly, I ſhall briefly enquire.

Sect. 2. That this word is not uſed in the Greek Tranſlators of the Old Teſtament, or the Apocryphal Authors, (no not ſo much as θρησκία, of which it is compounded, but once or twice in the Book of Wiſdom) will be acknowledged by any which ſhall make enquiry: and therefore it cannot be expected, it ſhould receive any light from thence. And in the New Teſtament, it is an ἅπαξ λεγόμενον, but once uſed, Col. 2.23. and for other Authors it may ſuffice to have obſerved, that it is not uſed by any, but thoſe who (in all probability) have it from this place of Saint Paul. And ſo the reſult of this enquiry will be, how it is uſed, and what it ſignifieth in this one place: which muſt be done by examining the context.

Sect. 3. The Apoſtles diſcourſe in that place is of δόγματα, or doctrines of men, teaching ſome things to be forbidden by God, that God forbiddeth not; where yet you muſt obſerve, he doth not ſpeak of commands, but doctrines, i. e. not of the prohibition of the Magiſtrate expreſſed by any act of poſitive humane Law (which in indifferent things is permitted to him to interpoſe, and being ſo interpoſed, by vertue of the Apoſtles precept for obedience will have the power of obliging;) but of falſe teachers impoſing them upon their brethren, as Gods commands, when they are not; this is called Dogmatizing in this place, v. 20. (and teaching for doctrines the traditions of men, Mat. 15.9. which if the Magiſtrate ſhould do, he ſhould thereby incur the cenſure of a falſe teacher alſo) i. e. (as it is clear by the former part of the Chapter, and particularly, v. 16.) urging ſome aboliſh'd Ceremonies as ſtill in force by divine precept, which whoſoever doth, he tells them, Gal. 5. 2. That Chriſt ſhall profit them nothing: upon this ground, that Chriſt coming, as the ſubſtance typified by thoſe legal Inſtitutions, did conſequently ſet a period to the obligingneſs of thoſe Inſtitutions; which, if it ſhould be ſtill urged, would be interpretativè the denying of Chriſt, and ſo moſt juſtly the forfeiting thoſe benefits, which are to be expected from him; and therefore though St. Paul might lawfully (and did) circumciſe Timothy, yet the urging of Circumciſion, (or any ſuch Judaical rite, which Chriſt meant to abrogate) for a Doctrine, or teaching that it was then neceſſary for Chriſtians, was in his opinion, the denying of Chriſt: in like manner, as the teaching the abrogation of any of the moral commandments, meant by the Law and the Prophets, Mat. 5. 17. which Chriſt meant not to abrogate by his coming, is on the other ſide cenſured as a moſt unchriſtian thing, v. 19. and a kind of denying of Chriſt alſo.

Sect. 4. This will by the way explain that difference (convenient to be premiſed) betwixt making of poſitive humane Laws in indifferent things (which the frequent commands of obeying Magiſtrates preſuppoſe to be Lawful; for if there were no legality in the giving of ſuch commands, the obedience to them being given could not be impoſed on Conſcience, as it is Rom. 13. 5. And if the matter of the command were before commanded by God, 'twere then no longer obedience to the law of the Magiſtrate, but only to God: and for an example of this even in matters of Religion, take the example of David, who 1 Chron. 23. v. 24. and 27. numbred the Levites, or appointed them to ſerve and do the work of the houſe of the Lord from the age of twenty years and upward (upon a ground there ſpecified, v. 25.) whereas by the command of God to Moſes, Num. 8. 24. this ſervice belong'd to the Levites, but from twenty five years old and upward, till the age of fifty years, and then they ſhall ceaſe waiting, v. 25.) and urging or teaching things for divine commands, which either never were commanded by God, or elſe are now out-dated, and the obligingneſs taken from them by Chriſt. The latter of theſe is it on which the diſcourſe of the Apoſtle proceeds here, without any reflection on the former.

Sect. 5. His meaning in this particular he farther expreſſeth, by naming ſome forms of theſe dogmatizers, verſe 21. [touch not, taſte not, handle not] noting thereby thoſe kinds of doctrine, which affirm men obliged to faſting, or abſtinence from ſuch or ſuch meats (the word ἅπτεσθαι, to touch, ſignifying to eat, among good authors) which now 'tis by Chriſt made free to all men to uſe ſine diſcrimine. Then v. 22. he paſſeth a cenſure on ſuch dogmatizing, and on all ſuch out-dated, yet continued legal performances [ἅ ἐστι πάντα εἰς φθορὰν] all which are to deſtruction, i. e. deſtructive or dangerous, (not as we render it [all which are to periſh] τῇ ἀποχρήσει, by the abuſe (not as we render it [with the uſing:] The Original enforces no ſuch ſence, and the way of interpretation that is ordinarily affixt to that ſence [the periſhing of the meat by going out into the draught] (when the Apoſtle ſpeaks not of the meat, but of the commands of abſtaining) makes the ſence ſufficiently improbable. The full importance of the words is, that when theſe abſtinences are thus impoſed and taught, as divine obliging precepts, this is an abuſe of them, (which were otherwiſe innocent things) and that abuſe annext, makes the very uſe of them dangerous or deſtructive: which is the ſence of what the Latine Fathers St. Auſtine, and St. Ambroſe, have ſaid on this place; Sunt in interitum & æternam perditionem, ſi credant ea neceſſaria ad ſalutem, They are to deſtruction and eternal perdition to them that believe them neceſſary to ſalvation.

Sect. 6. Having thus ſet a mark on them for caution, he adds a diſtinct ſpecification of that which makes them ſo dangerous, or deſtructive (which in themſelves were not) [κατὰ τὰ ἐντάλματα καὶ διδασκαλίας τῶν ἀνθρώπων, after the commandments and doctrines of men] which words, whether they be annext to δογματίζεσθε verſe 20. (the middle words being read in a parentheſis, as our Engliſh reads them) or whether to the immediately precedent, they do point out that wherein the danger doth conſiſt, to wit, impoſing on men humane ordinances or doctrines; i.e. thoſe things, which though they are not commanded by God, are yet by men affirmed, and pretended, and taught (though as we ſay, magiſterially, or without proof) to be ſo commanded.

Having thus far expreſſed the danger of taking up ſuch doctrines upon falſe-Teachers impoſing them, the Apoſtle then by way of cloſe (either to take off the varniſh under which they are commended to mens practice, and by which it is made probable to them, that they are commanded; or elſe to ſet down the ſimple nature of theſe things abſtracted from all ſuch accidental abuſe) adds this brief deſcription of the doctrines themſelves or the abſtinences they teach [Ἅτινά ἐστι λόγον μὲν ἔχοντα σοφίας, ἐν ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ, καὶ ταπεινοφροσύνῃ, καὶ ἀφειδίᾳ σώματος, οὐκ ἐν τιμῇ τινὶ, πρὸς πλησμονὴν τῆς σαρκὸς] theſe words are variouſly rendred by Interpreters, as having great difficulty in them. The moſt ſimple genuine ſence methinks might be this [which things have λόγον σοφίας rationem ſapientiæ, ſome true, at leaſt appearing notion of wiſdom in them (wiſdom in Scripture phraſe ſignifying piety, i.e. have either ſome real matter of piety in them, (for ſo λόγον ſignifies: and this would be more clear, if we ſhould read ἅ τινα, disjoined, not in one, but two words, thus [ἅ τινά ἐστιν ἔχοντα λόγον, &c. which things have ſomewhat of piety in them, or being conſidered in ſome reſpect have piety in them;) or, as the Fathers ſeem rather to have underſtood it, ſome colour, ſome appearance of piety; to wit, in voluntary worſhip and humility, and ſeverity toward, or puniſhing of, the body; as the word ἀφειδία ſignifies, and the margent of our Bibles acknowledges; and not in any honour or care of the body, (for ſo τιμὴ in the New Teſtament by an Hebraiſm ſignifies, that honour which is expreſt in relieving of wants, Mat. 15. 5. 1 Tim. 5. 17.) not in adminiſtring to the body omnia neceſſaria ad ſaturitatem carnis explendam, as St. Hierom hath it, all things neceſſary to the filling, or ſtuffing, or ſatiating of the fleſh: for ſo πλησμονὴ ſignifies. And I confeſs I cannot ſufficiently wonder what ſhould move ſome learned Interpreters to explain that word by mediocritatem ad ſimplicem uſum reſtrictam, A mediocrity without any exceſs, when the word in all Authors ſignifieth ſatiety or fulneſs: In Galen 'tis uſed for repletion or ſurfeit; and in all Attick writers for ſomething like that: which made Robertus Stephanus in his Greek Concordance render it ſatietas in this place: and among the tranſlators of the Old Teſtament, all the Hebrew words that are rendred by it, are of the ſame nature, ſuch are רשן fatneſs, טרח gravamen, רביבים from רבב multiplicare, and eſpecially שבעה from שבע ſatiatus eſt, which is by them eighteen times rendred πλησμονή. Sect. 7.

This laſt part of the verſe is added, I conceive, to illuſtrate the former à contrario, and ſo to ſhew that there is ſomewhat of true or pretended piety in thoſe former doctrines by their contrariety to that tending, and filling, and pampering of the fleſh, which is ſo unlike piety or Chriſtianity: and though the connexion of this laſt clauſe with the reſt be ſomewhat perplext, yet you ſhall find it but little more cleared by any other interpretation that will be affixt to it; and upon examination I am a little confident, that this which I have given is the moſt prompt, and proper, and genuine rendring of the verſe, that will be met with among interpreters. Sect. 8.

Which being acknowledged, there will be no doubt or difficulty in reſolving, that there is no ill character ſet upon ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ, or will-worſhip by the Apoſtle in this place. And if you demand what it is that is noted by it, I anſwer punctually, That voluntary worſhip, or acts of Religion, which the Hebrews call נדבה the free will-offering often mentioned in the Pentateuch, which was not required of them by any obligation of particular law, and yet was not wont to be condemned or ſuſpected, but accounted as acceptable to God: under which head the abſtinences here ſpoken of may not unfitly be comprehended. Sect. 9.

For the clearing of all which, I ſhall, firſt, give my reaſons for my firſt aſſertion, that ἐθελοθρησκεία is here uſed in a good creditable ſence. Secondly, I ſhall gheſs at the grounds, or occaſions of the ordinary miſtake of it in them that take it for a fault. And thirdly, I ſhall add ſomewhat concerning thoſe voluntary oblations noted by it, as they may be appliable to us Chriſtians. Sect. 10.

A firſt reaſon of my aſſertion is, becauſe will-worſhip is here joined with two, not only lawful, but laudable Chriſtian vertues: as, firſt, with humility, which being by Calvin interpreted in this place Dei & hominum reverentia, the reverence both of God and men, is without doubt a Chriſtian vertue (and hath nothing in this place to ſet an ill character upon it, what ever it may verſe 18. being joined with worſhip of Angels) and being ſo, cannot be ſo ill company as to defame the will-worſhip to which it aſſociates, but will rather plead for it, that it is of the ſame making, a Chriſtian vertue alſo. Secondly, 'tis joined with puniſhing, or not ſparing, or (as Calvin varies the phraſe) mortifying of the body, which as an Act of ſelf-denial cannot be unacceptable to Chriſt, and as a ſpecies of ἐκδίκησις, revenge, 2 Cor. 7. 11. will deſerve to be numbred among the effects of godly ſorrow. Sect. 11.

A ſecond reaſon is, becauſe theſe very doctrines of abſtinence, &c. are here ſaid in reſpect of the will-worſhip, &c. diſcernible in them, to have λόγον σοφίας, rationem ſapientiæ, ſomewhat of wiſdom or piety in them: which [ſomewhat] if it be real according to the former interpretation of the word λόγος, it will then be parallel to that which is ſaid upon the like occaſion of σωματικὴ γυμναsία bodily exerciſe, 1 Tim. 4. 8. which doth belong not to the gymnici agones, the Olympick exerciſes, as ſome contrary to the context would wreſt it, but to ſuch kind of ἀσκήσεις abſtinence, continence, &c. mention'd, v. 1. which though, when they are taught as neceſſary (to the defaming of marriage or meats, as ἀποβλασία, unlawful, and to be refuſed, v. 4. and in the ſtyle of the Fathers, and Councils, βλαβερὰ καὶ βδελυκτὰ hurtful and abominable) are then ſigns of apoſtaſy from the faith, v. 1. yet conſidered in themſelves as voluntary acts, are there ſaid to be profitable, or (though in an inferiour degree, being compared with piety, yet) ὠφέλιμοι, a little profitable ſtill, or profitable for a little. But if that interpretation of [λόγον] will not be accepted, but [ſpeciem] ſhew of wiſdom be required to be taken in its ſtead, yet will the argument be ſtill of validity: For can any thing be ſaid to have ſo much as a ſhew of wiſdom or piety in reſpect to will-worſhip in it, if that will-worſhip thus pretended, paſs confeſtly either for fooliſh, or impious? Can any thing be repreſented to me as having ſo much as a ſhew of piety, in reſpect to rage or luſt diſcernible in it? Certainly, whoſoever would make ſuch a recommendation, muſt, if he ſpeak in earneſt, ſuppoſe ſomewhat really of piety in thoſe paſſions alſo, or otherwiſe they cannot impart ſo much as a ſhew of piety to any thing elſe.

Sect. 13. A third reaſon is, becauſe the Greek Fathers in their expoſitions of this place, though they interpret λόγον, only of appearance or ſhew, as contrary to δύναμις and ἀλήθεια, power and truth, or as Oecumenius hath it, πιθανολογίας λόγον ψιλὸν, a bare ſhew of probability, yet generally they paraphraſe will-worſhip, and humility, and not ſparing of the body, by words of good ſavour. Thus Saint Chryſoſtom, δοκεῖ γὰρ εὐλαβὴς τις εἶναι καὶ μέτριος καὶ τοῦ σώματος καταφρονεῖν, ἂν τύχῃ δὲ· He appears pious, and moderate, and a contemner of the body; and then all the fault is, that he is not truly what he appears: and Theophylact hath the ſame words, and Oecumenius comes very near ὑποκειμένων εὐλάβειαν ἐν τῇ θρησκείᾳ, &c. pretending (i. e. having a ſhew of) piety and devotion in worſhip: by which 'tis clear what notion they had of ἐθελοθρησκεία, to wit, that of devotiouſneſs, piety, the thing which is commended (by that word) in Simeon, Luke 2. 25. δίκαιος καὶ εὐλαβὴς, juſt and devout: and Acts 2. 5. and 8. 2. and preſcribed by St. Paul, Heb. 12. 28. and ſo ſure far enough from any
P. 447. ill notion; even ſo far, that the interpreter of Clemens Alex. rendreth ἐν ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ in religione, in religion.

Sect. 14. A fourth reaſon, becauſe by this way of interpreting, that very obſcure place, which hath poſed ſo many, may conveniently be underſtood, and this prove the importance of it. That ſuch doctrines are deſtructive of Chriſtian Religion, in obtruding humane out-dated Judaical conſtitutions for divine precepts, ſtill obliging Chriſtians (as they that urge the neceſſity of circumciſion, evacuate the doctrine of the Goſpel, Gal. 5. 2.) and yet in ſome reſpects have piety in them, at leaſt a ſhew of it, to wit, in Will-worſhip, Humility, &c.

Sect. 15. A fifth, becauſe that which Heſychius ſaith of this word, is very agreeable to this interpretation, for he renders ἐθελοθρησκεία by ἐθελοσέβεια, voluntary worſhip or piety (as ἐθελοκωφῶν, a word uſed Eccl. 19. 27. is, ſaith he, ἐθελόπλως κωφεύων, ἐθελοπερίεργος, ἑκὼν περίεργος) the very notion of the נדבה I told you of, ſo ordinarily rendred by the LXXII. ἐκούσια, voluntary gifts, or offerings, or performances.

Sect. 16. A ſixth, becauſe reaſon it ſelf aſſures us, that thoſe things which are done in the ſervice of God, are not therefore ill becauſe they are ſpontaneous, (the [a] voluntarineſs of an action is not able to defame it, if there be no ἀνομία, no irregularity imputable to the action it ſelf, abſtracted from the voluntarineſs: there being no univerſal negative command in the Scripture, eſpecially the New Teſtament, prohibiting all things and degrees of things, beſides what are in particular commanded) but on the other ſide, when in the ſervice of God, a man out of a pious affection (of love and gratitude inciting to do things acceptable to God: as well as of fear deterring from all that is prohibited) ſhall (in conformity to God's general commands, and the doctrine of the Goſpel) do any thing elſe, beſide what God hath commanded by any particular precept, this action of his, is to be accounted ſo much [b] more commendable and acceptable to God, piety being one of thoſe vertues quarum tantæ ſunt amplitudines, ut quantò auctiores ſunt, tantò ſint etiam laudatiores; which have ſuch width of compaſs, that the larger they are, they are alſo ſo much more commendable; and withal, the more voluntary and ſpontaneous, the more acceptable. To which that of the ſon of Syrach is agreeable, Eccl. 43. 30. When you glorifie the Lord, exalt him as much as you can, for even he yet will far exceed; and when you exalt him, put forth all your ſtrength, for you can never go far enough, i. e. how far ſoever you exceed the particular command, you are yet within the compaſs of the general, and in reſpect of that can never be thought to have done enough, though the particular act or the degree of it, be ſomewhat that you are not particularly obliged to.

[a] Vide Socr. Eccl. hiſt. l. 5. c. 22. Ἐπειδὴ οὐδεὶς οὐδὲ τοῦτο (ſpeaking of Eccleſiaſtical rites) ἔγγραφον ἔχει δεῖξαι παράγγελμα ὅλον ὡς περὶ τούτου τῇ ἐκείνου γνώμῃ καὶ προαιρέσει ἐπέτρεψαν οἱ Ἀπόστολοι, ἵνα ἕκαστος μὴ φόβῳ, μηδ' ἐξ ἀνάγκης τὸ ἀγαθὸν κατεργάζοιτο ſuppoſing that to be good when 'tis done, which yet was not commanded. [b] Ἃ μὲν ὑπὲρ τὴν ἐντολὴν γίνεται, πολλὴν ἔχει τὴν μισθὸν καὶ τοῦτο, ἂν ἐν ἐντολῆς τάξει ᾖ τοσοῦτον. Chryſ. in 1 Cor. 9. 18. A. Gellius Noct. Att. l. 4. c. 9.

Sect. 17. Having thus vindicated this word from the abuſe and reproach laid on it, it follows in the ſecond place that I point at the αἴτιον τῆς ψεύδους that which ſeems to have cauſed or occaſioned this abuſe, and that I conceive to be ſome one or more of theſe four things.

Sect. 18. 1. That the vulgar Latine tranſlation renders ἐθελοθρησκεία ſuperſtitio, from whence I conceive it is that Maſter Calvin hath taken confidence to ſay, that Superſtitio Græcis dicitur ἐθελοθρησκεία, and St. Jerome agreeable to that tranſlation, (which in this was moſt probably his) Infelices Judæi quantâ ſuperſtitione vivant inter nationes, dicentes, Ne tetigeris, ne guſtaveris, &c. Whereas the truth is, δεισιδαιμονία is the Greek for Superſtition, and ἐθελοθρησκεία ſignifies it no more, then θρησκεία doth, which although it be by Etymologiſts deduced from θρῶξ, and ſo appropriated to ſome cuſtoms of the Thracians, and abuſively belongs to καλαχόρους καὶ ἀδείφαγους ἱερουργίας, ſuperfluous and curious worſhips, as Plutarch hath it, yet in ſimplicity of ſpeech ſignifies worſhip, and in holy writ is uſed in this good ſence, Acts 26. 5. Ja. 1. 17. (and never otherwiſe but when the adjuncts alter it) and from thence the compound ἐθελοθρησκεία, voluntary or ſpontaneous worſhip.

Sect. 19. 2. That as among the Jews in the time of the θεοκρατεία, or God's immediate preſiding among them, all was to be done according to the pattern (in monte) in the mount; ſo ſome men have reſolv'd themſelves and laboured to perſwade others, though without any New Teſtament evidence, (Chriſt having no farther interpoſed in this matter, nor the Apoſtles, than that all be done decently and ordinately, and that obedience be paid to the higher powers in thoſe things, wherein the law of nature, and the Goſpel hath neither commanded, nor prohibited) that no rite, no circumſtance, no degree of worſhip may be uſed in the Chriſtian Church, but what hath Chriſts example or particular precept to authorize it; which aſſertion being ſo irrational and proofeleſs, and yet ſo reſolute not to yield, hath been fain to catch at any thing to ſuſtain it, which can come within its reach, and in deſtitution of other auxiliaries, hath faſtened on this (though but ſound of) word, and taken advantage by the obſcurity of this one Text to impoſe upon eaſy readers this falſity, that what-ever is not commanded by Chriſt by his particular precept, or juſtified by his example, is cenſurable under the title title of Will-worſhip, though otherwiſe in reſpect of the matter of it, it would not be cenſurable. Which concluſion when we conſider what ſmall ground it hath in that obſcure Text thus explained; we ſhall have little temptation to reſolve on, as a foundation to ſuperſtruct any other doctrines upon, (which we muſt not do but upon plain undoubted Texts) or to conclude thoſe actions criminous, becauſe voluntary, which we may rather moſt juſtly conclude juſtifiable, becauſe not prohibited; and not only ſo, but alſo acceptable to God, if agreeable to his general commands, and the doctrine of the Goſpel, and the more acceptable for the voluntarineſs, as being in that parallel to thoſe oblations which are pronounced moſt acceptable. Two paſſages I have lately obſerved, which though they be not of any great authority, yet appearing at the firſt ſight diſtinctly contrary to my preſent affirmation, I have thought not impertinent here to take into conſideration. The firſt is in Photius's ἐκλογαὶ out of Philoſtorgius ſet out very lately by Jacobus Gotofredus in Greek and Latine. The words in Latine (which is the language which thoſe who are moſt ſubject to be abuſed in this matter will be moſt likely to read him in) are theſe. Theophilus ad Indiam profectus eſt, multaq; quæ apud eos haud ritè fiebant, emendavit; nam & ſedentes audiebant lectiones Evangelicas, & alia quædam faciebant quæ lex divina non præcipit. Which words affirming [that 'twas a fault, to be mended in them, to do ſome thing which the divine Law commands not] ſeem to conclude againſt all voluntary worſhip uncommanded by the word of God, as abſolutely unlawful; how juſtly, you ſhall now diſcern. To which purpoſe you muſt firſt obſerve the words in the Greek, which in Gotofreds copy run thus, ἢ ἄλλα τινὰ οὐ μὴ θεῖος διατάξει διατέτακτο, but in the manuſcript in the publick Library, have ἐπιτρέπει inſtead of διατάξει; this undoubtedly is the truer reading, and the meaning of the word is, to admit, permit, or to uſe, invaleſcere, vel obtinere, to prevail or obtain for the uſage of any thing. To which if you add that θεῖος διατάξις ſignifies not the Law or word of God, but the ſacred Canons or cuſtoms of the Church (which beſide other * arguments is clear by Nicephorus his repeating thoſe ſame words (out of Photius, for 'tis clear by other evidences that Nicephorus made uſe of Photius's Ecloga, and not of the entire copy of Philoſtorgius) only with this change of ἐκκλησιαστικὸς for θεῖος, as Gotofred in his notes acknowledges) the product will then be only this, that the thing which in thoſe Indians was amiſs, and reformed by Theophilus, was the ſitting at the reading of the Goſpel, and doing ſome other things which the Eccleſiaſtical or ſacred Canons did not allow of, or uſe, for which they were not in force, and ſo the place will yield us an authority from the antient Canons for ſtanding at the reading of the Goſpel, but offer us nothing which we ſhall need to quarrel with. He that is not ſatisfied with this account which I have given him of this place, I ſhall deſire, will conſider whether it be probable that the ſitting at the reading of the Goſpel ſhould go for a fault, only becauſe the Scriptures command it not. This I am confident will not be affirmed by the adverſaries of my preſent aſſertions, who for the moſt part chooſe to ſit at the reading of the Goſpel, upon this very ground, becauſe ſtanding at that time is not commanded in the Scripture. The caſe I conceive ſo clear that I ſhall not farther enlarge upon it.

Hiſt. Eccl. l. 3. c. 8.

* As Epiphan. Hær. 8. adv. Meſſalian. ſpeaking of the Conſtitutions of Clemens, [ἐν ταῖς διατάξεσι τῶν Ἀποστόλων φάσκει ὁ θεολόγος] thoſe antient Canons being indeed antiently accounted and read among Apocryphal Books of Scripture, ὃ κανονιζόμενα μὲν, τετυπωμένα δὲ παρὰ τῶν πατέρων ἀναγινώσκεται.—Athanaſ. in Epiſt. ἑορταστικῇ 39. Et in Synopſi. (nay Jo. Damaſcenus numbers the Canons of the Apoſtles among the Canonical Books of Scripture, and the Pſeudo-Clemens commands his Conſtitutions to be admitted among the Scriptures of the New T.) and in the στιχομετρία (telling how many lines every Book contains) of Nicephorus Patriarch of Conſtantinople, among the Apocryphal writings of the New T. is numbred Διδαχὴ Ἀποστόλων στιχ. σ and Κλήμεντος στιχ. βχ. and ſo in the Index of Canonical and Apocryphal Books ſet in the Oxford Library at the end of the Queſtions of Anaſtaſius Nicænus, there is both Διδαχαὶ Ἀποστόλων, and Διδασκαλία Κλήμεντος.

The ſecond place that I promiſed to mention, is in our Anglican Councils ſet out by that excellent Gentleman, Sir Hen. Spelman, p. 449. Canon. ſub Edgaro, Can. 60. where among other particulars we find theſe words, þe læra ð —— We teach that all Prieſts ſhall blot out all Superſtitions of the Gentiles, and we forbid þilpeorþunga, which word from the ſound of it (wilneorthunga) is there tranſlated in Latine into fictas ad libitum adorationes, and in the margin a reference is made to ἐθελοθρησκεία, Will-worſhip, Col. 2. But there is a miſtake in that tranſlation; which will be evident to any, by putting theſe two things together; firſt by comparing with this place, an antient Saxon Pœnitential which repeats thoſe very Canons, where an ancient hand hath expounded that word by fontis veneratio, the worſhip of wells, or Well-worſhip: (the probability of which interpretation will be the greater, not only by obſerving, that the Saxon word þil ſignifies a well or fountain, as frequently as voluntatem, will, but alſo becauſe in this very Canon, he ſpeaks of heathen worſhips of ſtones and trees, to which the rendring this of Wells or fountains will be moſt agreeable:) ſecondly, by adding to this another Canon in that Pœnitential, l. 7. c. 22. where there is a prohibition againſt vowing, or bringing almes or offerings to any well, or ſtone, or tree, or to any other creature, but only in Gods name, to Gods Church, and when we conſider how ordinary it was in former times to worſhip, and bring offerings to wells and fountains, the reaſonableneſs of ſuch prohibitions will be acknowledged. Of which kind are divers Injunctions to be ſeen, particularly in the office of Lincoln, of Oliver Sutton againſt the worſhipping of St. Edwards well without St. Clements in Oxford, and St. Laurences well at Peterburgh. So in a Saxon Homily of Biſhop Lupus, ſpeaking of vitious men, by the aſſault of tribulations, brought to ſome ſenſe of their eſtate, he ſaith, that then ſuddainly by the ſeduction of the Devil, they vow their almes oðþonto pylle, oðþonto ȝrane —— fol. 6. either to well, or ſtone. —— And in another De Baptiſmo, f. 20. he warns them againſt luxury, adultery, and witchcraft, &c. and then adds, ne peorðian ȝe pyllar, &c. and worſhip not wells, nor trees, for all theſe are idle phantaſms of the Devil. But this by the way, to prevent miſtakings.

A third ground or occaſion of this abuſe of the word I ſuppoſe to be the affinity of the 18. verſe of that chapter to the Col. [Let no man deceive you in a voluntary humility ——] to this now in hand. For I am perſwaded, many men have not obſerved the great diſtance between them, and for want of doing ſo, have thought ἐθελοθρησκεία here ſubject to all the ſame charges which the worſhip of Angels is there guilty of, and ſo particularly of that crime of Superſtition, which the worſhippers of Angels cannot be freed from, eſpecially ſeeing that they, like the Dogmatizers here, did teach that worſhip to be the will of God, and that God was honoured in the worſhip of thoſe Officers of his; the error which, as Maimonides obſerved, hath brought the greateſt part of Idolatry firſt into the World, exiſtimando hanc varietatem eſſe Dei voluntatem, when men conceived and taught that theſe vain Idolatrous or ſuperſtitious worſhips were the will and pleaſure of God.

Sect. 20.

Sect. 21. For the clearing of this matter, and rectifying the miſtake, I ſhall not doubt to affirm, that the prohibition in the 18. verſe (though in ſome tranſlations it ſeems to belong to this matter of Will-worſhip, and conſequently to ſet an ill character upon it, and although Clemens Alexandrinus compound both theſe verſes together, reading thus, μηδεὶς ὑμᾶς καταβραβευέτω ἐν ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ ταπεινοφροσύνης καὶ ἀφειδίᾳ σώματος, yet) will be found not at all to belong to it, if the Greek Text in that Chapter be conſulted with, and the Hebraiſm in θέλων be taken notice of.

Strom. l. 3. p. 447.

Sect. 22. To which end you may obſerve theſe two things, Firſt, That the words are not in the original ἐν ἐθελοταπεινοφροσύνῃ, καὶ ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ, but θέλων ἐν ταπεινοφροσύνῃ, καὶ θρησκείᾳ. Now the word θέλων hath in the Septuagints tranſlation of the old Bible, (and by proportion may have alſo here) a ſence which Attical writers have not taken notice of, and it will by Analogy be fitteſt rendred thus [pleaſing himſelf, or delighting in humility and worſhipping of Angels;] or as St. Hierome explains it, Superbus ficta humilitate, proud of a feigned humility) as 1 Sam. 18. 22. the Septuagint read θέλει ἐν σοὶ ὁ βασιλεύς, which the Engliſh out of the Hebrew render [The King delighteth in thee,] and ſo 2 Sam. 15. 26. and very often in other places, upon this ground or Original that the Hebrew ſignifies both acquievit, and voluit, to delight in, and to will; and ſo in the old Teſtament is rendred promiſcuouſly, εὐδοκέω I am well pleaſed, and θέλω I will, and one ſometimes uſed when the other would be more proper, (which cuſtom is not unuſual in the New Teſtament, for thus you ſhall find it, Mat. 27. 43. ῥυσάσθω αὐτὸν εἰ θέλει αὐτόν, which though we there render, (Let him deliver him if he will have him, inſerting the word [have] and by that indeed ſomewhat changing the ſence) yet, Pſal. 22. 8. (whence 'tis apparent the words are taken, and where the Septuagint render חפץ by θέλει) we render it, let him deliver him, if he delight in him; In like manner as Tob. 13. 6. Τίς γινώσκει εἰ θελήσει ὑμᾶς; we render, Who knows if he will accept you, i. e. be pleaſed with you?

חפץ

Sect. 23. But beſides, as this delight or will in this 18. Verſe is faſten'd on an unlawful thing, to wit, worſhipping of Angels (a thing not only not preſcribed, but prohibited by God) and includes ſuch an impious kind of miſtaken humility that takes in others either as Mediators to God, or as to be adored beſide him, (as the Angelici in the Chriſtian Church, and the Eſſeni among the Jews did) ſo and in this ſence this worſhip (if you would from hence ſtile it Will-worſhip, or what you pleaſe) ſhall be without any difficulty acknowledged by me to be an unlawful thing, as being the willing of that which God forbids; which though it be readily granted, yet it will remain true nevertheleſs, that voluntary worſhip, where the matter is perfectly lawful, not forbidden, nay approved by a general (though not commanded by any particular) precept, is far enough from having any tincture of evil in it. But this would deſerve a larger diſcourſe by way of comment on that Verſe. In the mean while, this may ſerve to ſhew how groundleſs the miſtake is that ariſeth from hence.

ἀναξίων λόγου τῆς μεταλήψεως τοῦ μονογενοῦς τὸ προσάγειν ἡμᾶς τῷ πατρὶ, καὶ μεῖζον ἢ κατ' ἄνθρωπίνην σμικρότητα. ἐνλογώτερον δ' ἂν εἴη λέγειν, ὅτι, οἱ ἄγγελοι ἀνάρχησαν τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ προσαγωγῇ, ἐκ τούτου δὲ ἀσῶζον τὴν ἀγγέλων θρησκείαν, καὶ ἔπεθον τὸ ἀφελεσίφες τούτοις προσέχειν, ὡς σωτικὸν ἡμᾶς. Theophyl. in Col. cap. 2.

Sect. 24. The fourth and laſt occaſion of this miſtake which I ſhall obſerve, is the uſe of a word in Epiphanius (which I perceive to be taken notice of by learned men) ἐθελοπεριτροθρησκεία, which being attributed to the Phariſees there, (who, ſaith he, were ſo called for that reaſon, the word Phariſee coming from an Hebrew primitive, which ſignifies ſeparation or diſcrimination, and ſo denoting ſome performances in them, wherein they exceeded other Jews) may perhaps ſeem to be taken in an ill notion.

Sect. 25. To which I anſwer, Firſt, that if ἐθελοπεριτροθρησκεία were a denotation of ſome ill, it would not yet neceſſarily prejudice ἐθελοθρησκεία which we ſpeak of; becauſe the περισσὸν added in that word, noting abundance or ſuperfluity (which perhaps may refer either to ſome unlawful, or at leaſt vain luxuriant matter, taken into that worſhip; as for example, either prohibited objects, or noxious, at leaſt burthenous in the number, or in the quality ridiculous ceremonies) might turn that into evil which the voluntarineſs or uncommandedneſs of them were not able to do.

Sect. 26. But then, Secondly, I cannot acknowledge, that that word is by Epiphanius there taken in an ill ſence: all that the context enforces, is but this, that that is the meaning or interpretation of their name; and ſure it is not neceſſary, that becauſe the Phariſees were evil men, or had ſome great faults, therefore their name ſignified ſome ill thing, for ſure if their name was aſſumed by their own choice, they would not be ſuch ill Carvers to themſelves, (I am ſure other Hereticks were not, as the Novatians called themſelves καθαροί. pure, and the Montaniſts, οἱ πνευματικοί, the ſpiritual, &c.) and that it was impoſed on them by other men 'tis not affirmed: and beſides I remember that ſome other ancient Writers interpret that name by ἀφωρισμένοι τῷ θεῷ, ſeparate or ſet apart to God, and no man will think there is any hurt in that, ſave only the vanity of uſurping that title, and incloſing it from all others.

Chryſoſtome, Oecumenius, &c.

Sect. 27. The truth is, that was the main crime that defamed the Phariſees, their cenſorious proud deſpiſing of other men, whom they thought not ſo godly as themſelves; and therefore I remember 'tis Saint Chryſoſtom's advice, that when the Phariſee and the Publican are compared by Chriſt, and the Publican prefer'd, we ſhould be careful, not to prefer the Publicans ſins before the Phariſees good qualities, before his faſting and tithing, but only the Publicans humility before the Phariſees pride, the Publicans judging himſelf, before the Phariſees faſtidious contemning of others. For the Phariſees exactneſs in thoſe particulars neglected by others, or not obſerved in that height, is ſo far from being reprehended in the Scripture, that 1. 'Tis diſtinctly ſaid, that the ἔδει or oportuit [theſe things ought ye to have done] belonged (to the doing of thoſe other things omitted by them, judgment, mercy, and faith, and) not to the leaving thoſe undone, which they did obſerve. 2. Saint Paul ſpeaking not contumelioufly or ſarcaſtically, but ſadly of himſelf, calls that Sect of the Phariſees by an honourable title ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν τῆς θρησκείας, Act. 26. a way of the greateſt ſtrictneſs in religion. Which though it excuſes not the Phariſees other faults, yet it is far from being it ſelf any ill character, or leaving any blemiſh upon their voluntary religious performances, wherein their ſuperlative ſtrictneſs conſiſted.

To

To theſe I ſhall add a third anſwer, which the learned Critical Writers concerning the Sects among the Jews will authorize, that the original of theſe Phariſees was from the חסידים or Haſidæi, who were ſo called for their exceſs of piety and charity, their voluntary performances above what the Law required of them. Theſe are mentioned, 1 Mac. 2. 42. and defined to be ἐκουσιαζόμενοι τῷ νόμῳ, we render it voluntarily devoted to the Law, but the phraſe ſignifies thoſe that in their obedience performed voluntarily ſome things which the Law required not, (or perhaps particularly in that place, thoſe that liſted themſelves voluntarily to defend the Law by arms) and ſo differed from the Karraim or Karæi who did that only which was commanded by Law. Of both which compared together, 'tis the learned and the Proteſtant Scaligers obſervation, Elench. Trihæres. cap. 22. that as no man is required to do more than is commanded him, (and ſo the Karraim are juſtified) ſo no man is to be quarrel'd with for doing better, when he is bound to do well; or for performing much when a mediocrity is required of him, and ſo the Haſidæi juſtified alſo, and with them the ἐθελοθρησκεία we ſpeak of. But when that ἐκουσιασμὸς (ſaith he) became ἀνάγκη, when thoſe voluntary free-will-offerings began to be formed into precepts, and entred into books, then from Haſidim or pious men, they became dogmatizers, laid obligation upon all to do as they did, and then being not obeyed in their ſevere preſcriptions, diſcriminated themſelves from all others, as the only obedient ſervants of God, and ſo called themſelves פרושים Phariſees, divided not only from the reſt of the prophane World, which did not as they did, but from the very Haſidim themſelves, who performed as much as they, but thought not themſelves obliged by Law to do ſo. Which being the notion of the Phariſees, may by Epiphanius be expreſt and cenſured by the word ἐθελοφαρισαιοθρησκία, as they that in Coloſſ. 2. offended not in the Will-worſhip, did yet in the dogmatizing, and ſo the Haſidæi we may juſtify, though not the Phariſees, the ἐθελοθρησκεία though not the ἐθελοφαρισαιοθρησκεία. And this I thought not amiſs to add ex abundanti, more than the neceſſity of the preſent diſquiſition required of me, that I might have my נדבה or voluntary oblation to preſent to the Reader alſo. Sect. 28.

Now for the third and laſt thing propoſed, concerning thoſe voluntary oblations under the Law, it will be worth obſerving; firſt, that they were a part of the worſhip and ſervice of God when they were performed, and therefore avowed by thoſe General precepts which reſpect that worſhip of his; Secondly, that they were not commanded particularly by any particular command of God's in the Law, but were left to every mans liberty (except it were in caſe of vow, which yet it was free to him not to make,) and ſo were Spontaneous, not neceſſary; to which purpoſe 'tis obſervable what the Pſeudo-Clemens, an antient Writer, Διαταξ. 1. 6. c. 22. affirms (I ſay not how truly) that before the golden Calf and their other Idolatries, ſacrifices were not commanded or impoſed on the Jews, but only left to their free power, ἐὰν ποιῆς, &c. and upon thoſe provocations of theirs, impoſed ὅπως πεζόμενοι ἢ ὑπὸ κλοιὸν ἀγχόμενοι ἢ πολυθέω πλάνης ἐκσῶσι, that theſe weights might traſh, and keep them from Idolatry; and thirdly, that Lev. 22. there is a Law, by which he that offers them is forbid to offer them maimed or blemiſht, ver. 20. from all which together it appears, that they were voluntary, and yet allowed by God and accepted. And then I cannot ſee why there may not be ſomewhat in Chriſtianity of the ſame conſtitution alſo, voluntary and not particularly impoſed, and yet allowed by (and acceptable to) God; Nor why he that doth any ſuch thing, may not be called ἐθελοθρησκὸς, and the oblation or action it ſelf ἐθελοθρησκεία. Under which head or title I ſhould place whatſoever may by the doctrine of the Goſpel appear to be acceptable to Chriſt; and yet is not commanded by any particular command of his; or which is commanded for the act, but not for the ſpecification of it to time, or place, or degree, &c. Sect. 29.

Of which kind there be many particulars incident, both in the worſhip of God, (as Abels oblation, which the Fathers generally obſerve, not to have been by any precept from God; and as the day of Dedication among the Jews, not commanded by God again, though by pious Princes brought into their Church, and obſerved by Chriſt himſelf; ſo the celebration of Purim, and the faſts of the fourth, and fifth, and ſeventh, and tenth month, all acceptable to God, though not commanded by him:) and in actions of common life, if it were ſeaſonable to inſert them here. I ſhall only mention one or two πρὸς δεῖξιν. God commanded not David to build him a Temple, nor to make tender of that ſervice, as will appear, 2 Sam. 7. 5, &c. Nay, profeſſes himſelf content to live in Tents and Tabernacles. And yet David's intention to build a Temple for God, that magnificent deſign of his, though never ſo much exceeding God's command, is very acceptable to God, as appears by Nathans meſſage to him in that place, and Solomons comment upon it, 1 Kings 8. 18. Thou didſt well that it was in thine heart. Sect. 30.

In like manner [a] Saint Paul might have received hire for his labour from the Corinthians, but would not; which matter is ſet down at large by him, 1 Cor. 9. The preaching of the Goſpel was committed to him as a truſt, and was under precept, and therefore that was no free-will-offering of his. That is his meaning, when he ſaith, εἰ γὰρ ἑκὼν τοῦτο πράσσω, μισθὸν ἔχω, εἰ δὲ ἄκων, οἰκονομίαν πεπίστευμαι, If I do this as a volunteer, i. e. [b] If I did preach the Goſpel without any command, and ſo no neceſſity to do ſo, if I did it of my ſelf freely, this would be rewardable in me, i. e. the very preaching would, without any other more honourable circumſtances to enhaunſe it: but if involuntarily, i. e. [c] If my preaching be an act of obedience to a plain command, and ſo neceſſary, ver. 16. (and woe to me if I do it not) and not voluntary in me, then all that can be ſaid of me is, that being truſted with a ſtewardſhip, I do diſcharge it, and [d] ſo there is nothing of excellence in this, nothing of contention toward that which is heroical or high. Upon which it follows, Τί οὖν μοί ἐστιν μισθός; what reward then ſhall be to me? i. e. what in this whole matter ſhall bring in any reward to me? To which he anſwers ἵνα εὐαγγελιζόμενος, ἀδάπανον, θήσω τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, that preaching the Goſpel, I do it freely, without making it chargeable to the Auditors, εἰς τὸ μὴ καταχρήσασθαι τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ μου, ſo that I make not uſe of my power or liberty which I have in the Goſpel, i. e. of the power of receiving maintenance from others (ſuch as Phœbe, and the like, referr'd to ver. 5.) without putting my ſelf to bodily labour, v. 6. or by any other ſuch means perfectly juſtifiable for me to uſe, ver. 7. 12. The doing of this thus, was that which would yield him the reward. And although this was not obſerved by Cephas, and other Apoſtles, ver. 5. yet ſure Cephas is not conceived Sect. 31.

ceived to have ſinned thereby, but 'tis poſitively ſaid, that 'twas lawful for all, ver. 7. 11. 14. for Paul as for Cephas and others, though only Paul would not uſe it, ver. 12. and accordingly both there, ver. 15. and after, 2 Cor. 11. 9, 10. he diſtinctly counts and calls this, matter of boaſting; This was a נדבה in the Apoſtle towards his Corinthians: and ſo 'twas eſteemed by Saint Chryſoſtome, τὸ μὲν ἦν ἐπίταγμα, τόδε τῆς ἐμῆς προαιρέσεως κατόρθωμα· One was a precept, the other a vertuous action of his choice: ἃ μὲν γὰρ ὑπὲρ τὴν ἐντολὴν γίνεται, πολὺν ἔχει τὸν μισθὸν κατὰ τοῦτο, for what is done above the command, hath proportionably a plentiful reward. And again, of the word neceſſity, that it refers to the command πρὸς ἀντιδιαστολὴν τῆς ἐλευθερίας τῆς ἐν τῷ λαμβάνειν, in oppoſition to the freedom in receiving (i. e. the power to receive, ver. 12.) forementioned. So again Theophylact, Τὸ εὐαγγελίζεσθαι ἐπίταγμά ἐστι μοι καὶ χρέος, κἂν ἐὰν πληρῶ τοῦτο, οὐδὲν κατόρθωμα — Preaching the Goſpel is a command to me, and ſo a debt, and if I do it, there is no great matter of vertue in it: τόδε δὲ ἀδαπάνως κηρύττειν προαιρέσεως φιλοτιμία, κἂν διὰ τοῦτο καύχημά ἐστι· but to preach without charging them, is the honour of my will, and in that reſpect there is place of boaſting, or I may boaſt.

Sect. 32. So again, he might have abſtained from going up to Jeruſalem, Act. 21. a Prophet told him that bonds expected him there, if he went, ver. 11. and in that caſe to fly was juſtifiable by Matth. 10. 23. yet Paul would needs go up, ver. 13. that was his נדבה again.

Sect. 33. Thus works of mercy or Alms-giving are commanded by God; liberality and largeneſs of hand and heart commended and promiſed a liberal reward, 2 Cor. 9. 6. Laying by us weekly in ſtore, as God hath proſpered us, is by Saint Paul appointed, 1 Cor. 16. 2. But then for the quotum, how much every rich man ſhould ſet apart for this purpoſe out of his yearly revenue, what proportion of the whole, whether a thirtieth, twentieth, or tenth part, is not at all particularly defined. Or ſuppoſing that one of theſe proportions were defined, namely the thirtieth part every year, (equivalent to the tenth every third year, which among the Jews was deſigned for the δευτερόδεκάτη, πλουσιόδεκάτη, the ſecond or poor mans tithing) yet if I acknowledging this my duty, ſhould yet reſolve to exceed this proportion, and ſet aſide a twentieth, or tenth, or fifth part of my eſtate, this muſt be acknowledged more than what I am particularly obliged to; and then ſo much of it as is more, will be my נדבה or free-will-offering, that now I ſpeak of. And ſo 'tis apparent by Saint Paul, who ſpeaking of the Corinthians equalling the Macedonians in liberality to the poor Jews, 2 Cor. 8. 2. he gives them no precept, ver. 8. but γνώμην, his advice or opinion, as in the matter of ſingle life, 1 Cor. 7. 25. Juſt as among the Jews, that proportion which they were by Law obliged to, was called their צדקה (from whence the Tſadikim or Sadduces) their righteouſneſs, which he that performed, ſatisfied the obligation of the Law in that behalf; and that which exceeded, חסד (from whence the Chaſidim, or Aſidai, or Eſſeni) יתרון הטובה abundance or excellency of goodneſs, or mercy, or piety, τὰ ἐπιμετρα τῷ νόμῳ, the additions to the Law, as among the Rechabites antiently in Jeremiah's time, and with the acceſs (as I told you) of dogmatizing among the Phariſees after.

Sect. 34. In like manner prayer is a Chriſtian duty, part of divine worſhip; Or all prayer a part of that, and that in the Cloſet as well as the Congregation.

In the performance of this duly qualified, there is no doubt, but the adjoyning of bodily worſhip, whether of the eye, or hand, or knee, is not only lawful, but acceptable in the ſight of God, yet thoſe not commanded particularly by any particular command of Chriſt, but only avowed by the general command of glorifying God in our bodies as well as ſpirits, by the example of approved precedents in the Scripture, &c. Or if any ſhall conceive theſe to be under any particular command, then inſtead of diſputing againſt him, I ſhall ſuppoſe it, and proceed, and inſtance in proſtration as a lowlier and humbler act of bodily worſhip than kneeling is, and this not affirmed to be particularly commanded, and ſo voluntary, yet ſure acceptable to God if it flow from that vehement zeal of ſpirit and dimiſſion of mind, in confeſſion and ſenſe of ſin, that I ſhall hope it doth, and be not polluted by any appendant vanity, or corruption, more than kneeling might be ſuppoſed to be, and then this is a נדבה again, a free-will-offering of the ſame kind alſo.

Sect. 35. So again, in reſpect of the frequency of performance, prayer is a duty commanded, and for the frequency of uſing it, inceſſant, continual prayer, i. e. ſay the learned, in proportion to the continual or daily ſacrifices among the Jews, prayer morning and evening every day, (or as the word uſed by Saint Paul, 1 Theſſ. 5. 17. [ἀδιαλείπτως] is uſed by the Author of the firſt Book of Mac. cap. 12. 11. ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ ἀδιαλείπτως we render them at every ſeaſon inceſſantly, i. e. as the reſt of the Verſe explains it) both in our feaſts and other convenient days, in the ſacrifices, and in our prayers, &c. Not omitting the daily conſtant times of prayer and ſacrifice.) To theſe two, David and Daniel added a third time, and a Chriſtian now may ſurely do well to improve it in publick and in private to ſix or ſeven times a day; which number though countenanced by Davids reſolution of [ſeven times a day will I praiſe thee;] yet being not preſcribed by Chriſt will be his נדבה free-will-offering again. The matter of it commanded, to wit, prayer, but not the frequent reiterating of it daily. For if it ſhall be pretended that the precept of praying inceſſantly doth particularly deſign this frequency; I ſhall anſwer that the [inceſſant] ſo interpreted, doth either require uninterrupted continued prayer, in that ſence that as Paul in preaching continued his ſpeech till midnight, Acts 20. 7. (which to affirm, is the hereſie of the Euchitæ, and that which the Objector cannot in earneſt think himſelf obliged to; For then, ever to give over or intermit, or do any thing elſe, muſt be acknowledged a ſin) or elſe denotes particularly that definite number of ſeven times, which if it ſhall be affirmed, will firſt be prooffleſs, and denyed as reaſonably as demanded: and then ſecondly, I ſhall add one time more to my ſuppoſition, (and yet ſo as not to neglect the other duties of my calling) and that will be the נדבה I ſpeak of.

Sect. 36. If to all or any of theſe inſtances it be excepted or oppoſed, that theſe may be ſuppoſed in Saint Paul, &c. to be incitations and motions of the Spirit, diſobedience to (and reſiſting of) which would have been a ſin; I anſwer, firſt, that every ſuch free-will-offering is not a particular incitation or motion of the Spirit, ſuch as was obſervable in the Prophets of old, or indeed any farther than that ſignifies an act of a ſoul firſt renewed, then aſſiſted and excited (which differs much from being incited) by the Spirit of God. That Spirit is a ſoul to the ſoul, and is to that as the ſoul to the body; the body having a ſoul, and animated by it, moves and works by that principle, and ſo the ſoul animated mated and ſtrengthen'd by Chriſt and his Spirit, ἰχύει πάντα, is able to do all things, and actually doth them by the ſame ſtrength.

Not to enter any deeper into that queſtion, than to this preſent matter is neceſſary, that which I mean will be beſt underſtood by noting the difference between the grace of ſanctification, and the ſpirit of prophecy ſo vulgarly known; and I deſire it may be extended no farther than one example of David will explain and juſtifie, ſet down by way of narration, 2 Sam. 7. but repeated more clearly to our purpoſe, 1 Kings 8. 17, 18. It was (ſaith Solomon) in the heart of David my father to build an houſe for the name of the Lord God of Iſrael, and the Lord ſaid unto David my father, Whereas it was in thy heart to build an houſe unto my name, thou didſt well that it was in thine heart; Nevertheleſs thou ſhalt not build the houſe. On occaſion of this paſſage I ſhall ask; Was this which was in Davids heart, by the incitation of God, in the ſence that the Objector underſtands incitation, or was it not? If it was, then God incited him to do ſomewhat which God had determined he ſhould not do; as it's plain by the laſt word, Nevertheleſs thou ſhalt not build. 1. I ſhall in charity hope the Reader will not affirm this, that God incites, or inwardly moves to that which he will not have done; therefore the ſecond muſt be reſolved on, that he did not incite; and yet the thing which was in Davids heart pleaſed the Lord [Thou didſt well that it was in thine heart] and thence it follows that what is in good mens hearts, what they reſolve to do, may be without this incitation of Gods, and yet be acceptable to him, which is the ſum of the firſt part of my anſwer. Sect. 37.

But then 2. I anſwer, that if it be ſtill called an incitation of God, yet having expreſt what a kind of incitation it muſt be, the non-obedience to it will not be a ſin; for to make it ſo, it will be required, 1. That it be expreſt to come from God, And 2. That it comes from him ſub ratione præcepti, under the notion of a precept; whereas this incitation being ſuppoſed to be an inarticulate ſilent motion, not revealed in Scripture, or by voice from Heaven, or as the Prophets were, (φερόμενοι, moved or carried by the Holy Ghoſt, 2 Pet. 2. 21.) or by any other extraordinary way, ſo as to be clearly intelligible or diſcernible, whether it be from God or no, much leſs that it is a precept of Gods, it cannot be thus obliging as a precept would be, to which obedience is ſo due, that non-obedience would be ſin. Sect. 38.

In brief, this voluntary oblation, as every good gift or Chriſtian action, I ſhall acknowledge to deſcend from above, from the father of lights; and thereupon David put it into his Thankſgiving or Magnificat, 1 Chron. 29. 14. (bleſſing God that the people offered ſo willingly.) But this will not conclude the particular, to which he or they were thus enabled and thus moved or inclined by God, to be leſs, but rather more voluntary, the action being the action of the man, thus willingly doing what he is by God enabled and moved by the Spirit, (God working in him both to will and to do, the firſt by his renewing, the ſecond by his aſſiſting and exciting Grace) and voluntarily working or operating upon that ſtrength and motion, and then all that this infers is the obligation to gratitude, to humility, and not boaſting in them that have thus received, but not any kind of obligation to that particular action, for that muſt ſuppoſe a particular command. Sect. 39.

And there is great difference between theſe two, the precept, and the grace. 1. In that the precept belongs (becauſe given) to all, the grace to none but him that hath it, (and not obliging him neither, unleſs the matter of it be ſub præcepto already, i. e. unleſs the thing to which he is thus moved by the Spirit of God, he were otherwiſe obliged to by ſome other command, For in that caſe it is that Saint Stephen's reproof hath place, Acts 7. 51. [Ye do always reſiſt the Holy Ghoſt,] which in the caſe in hand we ſuppoſe him not to be. 2. Becauſe it is the deſign of a precept to lay an obligation, and that ſub periculo animæ, if it be not obeyed; but of grace not ſo; but only to ſtrengthen and incline, which he that makes uſe of as he ſhould, is promiſed a reward for ſo doing, more grace here, (according to the parable of the Talents concluded with Habenti dabitur) and a richer Crown or reward hereafter; and upon not uſing of it, is threatned particularly with the withdrawing of the grace before given, Take from him the pound, &c. Luke 19. 24. and whereas in Saint Matthew, 'tis added [take him and caſt him into utter darkneſs,] 'tis clear by Saint Luke that there was a precept of occupying, verſe 13. to the neglect of which this puniſhment was apportioned. 2. I ſhall acknowledge, that the bringing God no return of all his grace, is a great and damning ſin. But then 3. that comes not home to prove it a ſin, to omit the doing of any one particular, in that degree which God's grace enables me to do, there being no obligation in this matter ad ſemper, or ad gradum, to do it always, or to do it in ſuch a degree; though ad ſpeciem (or that the thing be done) there be. For in the Parable of the Talents, though the bringing in no encreaſe at all be puniſhed; yet the bringing in increaſe in a lower degree is accepted, and rewarded according to its proportion; he that had of his pound made five pounds, Luke 19. 18. is rewarded with five Cities, as well as he that had gained ten pounds is rewarded with ten. Sect. 40.

If again it be objected, that, all concomitant circumſtances conſidered, nothing remains free and voluntary; and that affirmation proved by this, becauſe in this caſe prudence added to other Chriſtian rules of piety, mercifulneſs, &c. will require us to do that which is fitteſt to be done. Sect. 41.

To this I anſwer, 1. That every man is not bound under pain of ſin to be prudent, or pious, or merciful in ſuch a degree; there is a great latitude in prudence, and piety, and in mercifulneſs. I may give ſo much, as will denominate me merciful, and pray ſo often as to denominate me pious, and yet be capable of growing in each of theſe graces; nay, I may in prudence give ſo much to ſuch a man, and yet this not ſo conſiſt in an indiviſible point, but that if I had given leſs, or given more, it might have been prudent too. Sect. 42.

It is, I confeſs, poſſible to offend againſt prudence in too prodigal a giving, as in too parſimonious againſt piety, and then I ſhall not juſtifie that imprudence any more, than excuſe that unmercifulneſs, I deſire my voluntary oblations may be free from both, but then ſtill the poſſibility and danger of ſuch faults in the extreams proves not either the unlawfulneſs or neceſſity of any other degree which is within thoſe extreams, but ſtill allows a latitude within which one may be more or leſs merciful, and yet merciful ſtill, yea and prudent too. 2. Though prudential conſiderations do always help to direct us, yet do they not always command or lay obligations upon us, and therefore are ſtill compatible with voluntary oblations. Sect. 43.

For

Sect. 44. For if it be affirmed from prudential conſiderations, that a man (knowing the greateſt perfection, to be moſt gloriouſly rewarded, and that reward far above all other deſigns, that to the neglecting of that he may faſten upon) ought therefore, and is bound to aſpire to perfection, and not to content himſelf with any thing but the beſt: To this I anſwer, that this whole reaſoning is falſe.

For 1. although prudence would adviſe one to this, yet doth it not lay any command which hath power of obliging ſo, as not to obey will be preſently ſinful; for if any ſuch command be ſuppoſed, it ceaſes to be prudential, and becomes neceſſary, and mean while by being only prudential, appears to be under no ſuch command.

Sect. 45. 2. Though 'tis prudent to uſe thoſe means which may advance us higheſt in glory, and though perfection will do that, yet 'twill not be always prudence to undertake the way of perfection, becauſe that being an high ſteep, may be alſo a dangerous way, every man cannot receive it, ſaith the Apoſtle; and for him that cannot overcome the difficulties, to reſolve upon the courſe, may perhaps be precipitious, and even the precept of God may interpoſe ſometimes, and traſh us, and make it unlawful for us to aſpire to the moſt perfect eſtate; as if the diſcharge of a duty of our calling ſhould await us on one ſide, and an opportunity of Martyrdom on t'other ſide, then in that caſe obedience will be better than that richeſt ſacrifice; and as Cyprian, though moſt paſſionately deſirous of Martyrdom, yet on ſuch an occaſion avoided it, when he was near it, and (as Pontius Diaconus ſaith of him,) maluit præceptis Dei obedire, quàm vel ſic coronari, he preferr'd the conſcience of his duty before the glory of ſuch a Crown, ſo may it be reſolved the Chriſtians duty ſometimes not to aſpire to ſome perfection.

Sect. 46. But then, 3. the perfection that we are by Chriſt commanded to aſpire to, is capable of degrees; for if you compare Matth. 5. 48. where that precept is given [Be ye perfect, as your Father in Heaven is perfect] with Luke 6. 36. where the ſame paſſage is recited, or if you conſult the context in either place, you will find that perfection to ſignifie mercifulneſs, and ſo Matth. 19. 21. [If thou wilt be perfect, ſell all, and give to the poor] which is another argument that that is the meaning of perfection, and then the ſame degrees that are in mercifulneſs, will be in perfection alſo. Or if you will not admit of that ſence, yet if it be any perfection acquirable in this life, 'twill be capable of degrees and growth alſo; or if it be not here acquirable, 'tis certainly not under Evangelical precept now, that light, i. e. ſupportable burthen, that Codex of not grievous, i. e. of poſſible commands, which he and his grace brought into the World.

Sect. 47. As for that ordinary ſaying that ſeems ſo plauſible, that every one is bound to do that which is beſt, it is moſt diſcernibly falſe; (and that which a world of falſities are built on) which to prove, I ſhall need no farther teſtimony, than that of the Apoſtle, 1 Cor. 7. 38. (He that giveth in marriage doth well, and he that giveth not, both better) nor argument than this, that the beſt being a ſuperlative ſuppoſes the poſitive to be good; whereas if all were bound to do that which is beſt, that which were only good, were evil, for ſo is that whatever it is, which comes ſhort of what we are bound to.

Sect. 48. Once more, if it be objected that whatever is thus performed, is commanded by thoſe large incluſive words [Thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, with all thy ſoul, &c.] nothing being of ſuch latitude, as that the [with all] ſhould not contain it.

Sect. 49. I anſwer, that that phraſe denoteth two things only, firſt, ſincerity of this love of God, as oppoſed to partial divided love, or ſervice; and withal, that what they do according to the precepts of Gods Law, they ſhould do out of love toward God, not hypocritically, nor as on conſtraint: ſecondly, the loving him above all other things, and not admitting any thing into competition with him, not loving any thing elſe in ſuch a degree; and in neither of theſe reſpects excluding all other things from a ſubordinate place in our love; which being ſuppoſed, 'twill be eaſie to diſcern that this ſincere love of God above all, is capable of degrees, and that it is very poſſible for two men to love God with all their hearts, i. e. ſincerely and above all other things, and ſo both to obey that precept, and yet one to love him in a more intenſe degree, than the other doth. (Which may be obſerved amongſt the Angels themſelves, the Seraphin being ſo called, becauſe they are more ardent in Zeal, than other Angels.) Nay, for the ſame perſon conſtantly to love God above all, and yet to have higher expreſſions of that love at one time than another. Thus we read of Chriſt himſelf, Luke 22. 44. (who we know did never fail in performing what was mans duty, in prayer, or any thing elſe: Yet) that he at that time prayed more earneſtly; which is a demonſtrative evidence, that the lower degree is not neceſſarily ſinful, when the higher is acceptable to God. Which when it is granted, there is no doubt, but theſe free-will-offerings will be reconcileable with that command, and he that loves God with all his heart may have ſome poſſibility of loving God better than yet he doth, and ſome room left for a voluntary oblation.

Sect. 50. I deſire to foreſee the worſt that is imaginable, and therefore though in conſcience very guiltleſs, and free from having any favourable thoughts of the doctrine of ſupererogation among the Romaniſts, ſhall yet conceive it poſſible for ſome body to be ſo unwary as to add that objection to the former, that this may tend to the aſſerting of that doctrine, that if it be acknowledged poſſible for a Chriſtian to do more than he is commanded, he may then ſupererogate.

Sect. 51. To which I anſwer, 1. That there is a great difference between affirming that a man may do more than is commanded, and that he may do ſomething which is not commanded; the former ſuppoſes him that doth more to have done all, whereas the ſecond may be true, though in moſt or all other things he have been wanting. Now it is the ſecond we aſſert, not the former; which being ſuppoſed,

Sect. 52. I anſwer ſecondly, That to ſupererogate ſuppoſeth one of theſe two things, either that the perſon ſpoken of hath paid God all that is due to him, by way of perfect obedience, i. e. hath never ſinned: Or 2. that having ſinned and ſo become a debtor to God, he hath paid that debt by ſatisfaction, i. e. done ſomething elſe which may ſatisfie God for his former ſins; the latter of which is the way which the Romaniſts pitch upon, and not contenting themſelves with the ſatisfaction wrought by Chriſt, teach the doctrine of their own ſatisfaction, which, ſay they, they may perform ſo far, as not only to ſatisfie for their own ſins, but alſo to do more than ſo, help toward the raiſing of a bank, or treaſure for others alſo, and that is it they mean by ſupererogating.

Now from either of theſe our preſent doctrine is perfectly free; for 1. it ſuppoſeth no perfect obedience, but willingly yieldeth as much of the corruption of our nature, and of our daily failings and treſpaſſes, as ever any Catholick affirmed againſt Pelagius. And 2. ſuppoſing every man to have ſinned, it pretendeth not to the leaſt degree of ſatisfaction to God for any the leaſt ſin to be wrought by any means, but only the ſufferings of Chriſt, and ſo is out of all poſſibility of thinking to ſupererogate, acknowledging ſo heavy an arrear of ſin lying unremoveably upon every ones ſcore, if God be not mercifully pleaſed to accept of Chriſts ſufferings for perfect ſatisfaction, that there is nothing compaſſable by us, or within our reach, that can ſatisfie for any the leaſt ſin we have committed; and from thence 3. forbiddeth any the moſt juſtified man to pretend toward ſatisfying for others; but to work out his own ſalvation with fear and trembling, i. e. with all the humility in the World. And to this ſence I deſire to apply that ſaying of Saint Cyprian in the Epiſtle ad lapſos. Qui in Eccleſia ſemper gloriosè & granditer operati ſunt, opus ſuum Domino nunquam imputaverunt, They which have wrought gloriouſly and heroically in the Church, yet never thought their Maſter beholden to them. That is the meaning of imputare, to reckon their layings out, and charge him with whom they reckon to be in their debt: For want of underſtanding of which, or from ſome worſe principle, the latter Edition of Cyprian by Pamelius leaves out the word nunquam, which the old Baſil Edition doth retain, and the ſence requires in that place. Sect. 53.

If I could foreſee any further Scruples or difficulties in this matter, I ſhould be as free in producing them, as in theſe I have been, and find no reaſon to fear, but that by Gods help I ſhould be able to ſatisfie them alſo. In the mean time, till by the fate of this Paper I be further inſtructed, I have no temptation to importune or detain the Reader any further, than with my Prayers for him, that the Lord give him a right underſtanding in all things.

He that ſoweth ſparingly, ſhall reap ſparingly, and he that ſoweth bountifully, ſhall reap bountifully. Every man according as he purpoſeth in his heart, not grudgingly, or of neceſſity; For God loveth a chearful giver, 2 Cor. 6. 7.

OF SUPERSTITION.

Sect. 1. SUPERSTITION being a crime ſo ordinarily charged on thoſe whoſe Conſciences aſſure them that they are far enough from the guilt of it, it will be an Act of double charity, firſt to the honeſt calumniated Proteſtant, Secondly, to the contumelious unjuſt defamer of his beſt actions, to conſider a while of this matter, and firſt to enquire what is the natural importance of the word in Latine and Greek, eſpecially as we find it in the New Teſtament.

Sect. 2. Superſtition in Latine is moſt clearly according to the uſe and Origination of the word, Superſtitum Cultus, The worſhip of ſome departed from this World, ſuppoſed yet to have life in another. This is obſerved and acknowledged amongſt many others by Lactantius, and made probable even by the different conceit of Cicero, who deduceth the word from the [a] practice of thoſe that uſed to pray whole days together, ut ſibi liberi ſuperſtites eſſent, that their children might outlive themſelves, (agreeable to which is the original of Dæmon-worſhip ſet down by Daiphantus a Lacedemonian in his Books of Antiquities, out of a ſtory of Syrophanes an Ægyptian, as Fulgentius tells us, Mythol. l. 1. and not far from it is Sect. 3. that of Wiſd. 14. 15.) by that acknowledging the truth of the Etymology from the word [Superſtites] but diſguiſing it into a ridiculous phanſie, out of fear, ſaith Saint Auſtin, to condemn the practice of the Romans, among whom he lived. Theſe Superſtites, whom the Heathens thus worſhipped, were by them called Heroes, men of worth and excellency ἀποθεωθέντες, aſſumed into the ſtate of Gods, but among Chriſtians, the Souls of the Saints departed, quæ ſuperſunt corporibus; which when their bodies are buried in peace, are imagined to live for evermore. And the worſhipping of theſe (as among the Papiſts 'tis moſt ordinary) is moſt properly called Superſtition. And in that ſence I conceive it is, that in ſome authentick Writings of our Church, the Idolatry and Superſtition of the Papiſts is cenſured; by Idolatry meaning the worſhip of Images among them, and by Superſtition the worſhip and prayers to Saints departed. A cenſure authorizable by that part of Saint Auſtin's words, De Doct. Chriſt. l. 2. Superſtitioſum eſt quicquid inſtitutum eſt ad colendum, ſicut Deum, Creaturam, partémve ullam creaturæ. Superſtition is the worſhipping a creature as God, or any part of a Creature. By the latter of which I know not what he ſhould mean ſo probably, as thoſe ſuppoſedly deified parts of Creatures, the ſouls of dead men.

[a] De Nat. Deor. l. 2. 53.

Sect 4. De var. relig. The Greek word parallel to this is δεισιδαιμονία, which literally is, as Saint Auſtin defines the Latine Superſtition, Dæmonum cultus, the worſhip of Dæmons.

Sect. 5. The full importance of which muſt be taken, 1. from the various uſe of the word δαίμων. 2. of the other word [δείδω] ingredient in the compoſition.

Sect. 6. δαίμων ſignifies ſometimes in a wider ſence a God, as generally among the Poets, Juno and Apollo and Minerva, and all beſide the ſupreme Jupiter, are numbred among Homer's δαίμονες. This Maximus Tyrius demonſtrates at large, and adds πολλὴν τὴν δαιμόνων ἀγέλην εἶναι, that there are a great flock of thoſe δαίμονες. Sometimes 2. in a ſtricter ſence the Angels, as 'tis uſed among the Philoſophers, eſpecially the Pythagoreans and Platonicks; for ſo the deſcription of them in Hierocles, and Maximus Tyrius, and Plotinus, and Proclus will evidence, particularly that every man's proper tutelary Angel the συνὼν or οἰκεῖος or ἰδιαιχὼς ὑμᾶς δαίμων, as Plotinus calls him, The cohabitant or domeſtick Dæmon or Angel that is allotted us. So when in Ignatius, Chriſt ſaith, ὐκ εἰμὶ δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον, it ſignifies ſimply a ſpirit, Ep. ad Smyrn. So δαιμόνια ἄσαρκα, Conſtit. Ap. l. 6. c. 25. So incorporale dæmonium, Hieron. proœm. l. 18. in Iſa. & in Catal. Script. Eccl. though Sophronius his Greek tranſlator read σωματικὸς, as Marianus Victorius on that place obſerves. This ſaying of Chriſt, Saint Jerome cites out of the Nazaren-Goſpel, proœm. l. 18. in Iſa. Origen. l. 1. περὶ ἀρχῶν, out of a Book called Doctrina Petri.

Sect. 7. A thing ſo frequent among thoſe Philoſophers, that the word φιλοσοφία Philoſophy, Col. 2. 8. ſeems to me to be directly all one with θρησκία τῶν ἀγγέλων, worſhipping of Angels, v. 18. And ſo thoſe two exhortations in thoſe two Verſes to be coincident, καταβραβεύειν in one (which we render deceiving of reward) being equipollent to συλαγωγῶν, ſpoiling in the other, only in divers notions. The firſt referring to prizes in the Olympick games, the other to ſpoils in War, the reaſons of which conjecture it will not be ſeaſonable here to inſert.

Sect. 8. And thirdly again the departed Worthies, which (beſides the frequency of that acception among the Philoſophers) may ſeem to be meant Apoc. 9. 20. where the δαιμόνια, which are ſaid to be worſhip'd, are join'd with Idols of Gold, &c. and communicate with them in their effects and liveleſneſs, that they neither ſee, nor hear, nor walk.

Sect. 9. To theſe ſences might be added that other moſt vulgar for evil ſpirits, agreeable to which, is that definition of δεισιδαιμονία, in the Etymologicum magnum, that 'tis ἡ πρὸς τὺς πονηρὲς δαίμονας ἐπιμέλεια ἐν φόβῳ, a care and fear of evil ſpirits. And a fifth leſs frequent, yet to be found among the Philoſophers, for wiſe men here in this life, which Hierocles deſcribes at large under the Title of καταχθόνιοι δαίμονες earthly ſpirits, or Dæmons.

Sect. 10. Now the word δεισιδαιμονία refers indifferently to the three firſt of theſe, and ſignifies the worſhipping either of the many Poetical Gods, or Angels, or Dead-men, or indeed any thing but the one ſupreme God. Thus is it ſaid of the Gentiles, 1 Cor. 10. 20. That what they Sacrifice, they Sacrifice δαιμονίοις, and not to God, i. e. not to the one true God. And in the book of Baruch 4. 7. Offering δαιμονίοις, and not to God. Where (as alſo in many other places of holy Writ) 'tis not proper to render it [Devils or Infernal Spirits] but (with Maſter Mead) Dæmons, meaning thereby either Angels or Dead men, or any thing elſe beſide the true God. Which ſeems to be expreſs'd Rom. 1. 25. by worſhipping worshipping the Creature παρὰ τὸν κτίσαντα, besides (not as we render more than) the Creator; and by Phavorinus saying of the word δεισιδαιμονία, that it signifies τὸ πάντα σέβειν καὶ τὰ μὰ σεβάσμια, worshipping all things, even those which are not to be worshipt, and that δεισιδαίμων signifies sometimes ἀμφίβολος περὶ τὴν πίστιν, καὶ ὁ δεδιὼς τὰ δαιμόνια, one that is doubtful concerning the faith, knows not in whom to believe, or worship, or who worships or fears the Damons also.

Thus when Saint Paul tells the Athenians Acts 17.22. κατὰ πάντα ὡς δεισιδαιμονεστέρους ὑμᾶς θεωρῶ, I consider and behold you in all things (or in all that I see of you) as men that are more superstitious than any other; He means they worship'd more Gods or Damons than the Romans, or any other sort of Heathen people; or were more devout, more pious in the Heathen worships than any others; for so it follows εὐσεβῶτε, ver. 23. Te worship; and accordingly Phavorinus, having explained δεισιδαίμων by ὁ εὐσεβὴς, pious, he adds, ὡς ὁ θεῖος Παῦλος, δεισιδαιμονεστέρους ὑμᾶς θεωρῶ, as Saint Paul saith in those words, Acts 17. 22. and so indeed 'tis generally attested by the Greek Writers [a] Pausanias, [b] Philostratus, Strabo, Max. Tyr. &c. That the Athenians were more religious than other people, at least were more hospitable to new and strange Deities, than the Romans, who (saith Dionysius Halicarnassæus) were so averse from all Foreign Deities (unless some few that their Ancestors had from the Grecians) that they might be more truly said μισοξενῶν περὶ τὰ θεῖα, ἢ φιλοξενῶν, to be haters of such kind of hospitality or admission of foreign Gods, than lovers of it. Sect. 11.

[b] Philostratus of Apollonius l. 4. c. 6. φιλοθύτας τοὺς Ἀθηναίους ἴσμεν. & Strabo. Ἀθηναῖοι δὲ ὥσπερ περὶ τὰ ἄλλα φιλοξενοῦντες διατελοῦσιν, ἕτω καὶ περὶ τοὺς θεούς· πολλοὶ γὰρ τῶν ξενικῶν ἱερῶν παρεδέξαντο, &c. Max. Tyr. διαλ. λθ. ὁ Ἀθηναῖος ἡμῖν ἕτερος καινὸς δαιμόνια εἰσφέρων. So Josephus 2. contr. Appion. Ἀθηναίους τῶν Ἑλλήνων δικαιότατους ἅπαντες λέγουσιν: and Sophocles Oedip. Col. θῆ' ἵππι' ὅστις γε θεοὺς δίκαιος τιμαῖς σεβίζειν, ἥτε τῆδ' ὑπερφέρει.

So Acts 25. 29. Festus or Saint Luke in his story saith, That the Jews had certain ζητήματα, Questions, or Accusations against Paul, περὶ τῆς ἰδίας δεισιδαιμονίας, concerning his own Religion, or Superstition, or Worship, peculiar to him from them, and (as it follows to explain what they meant by the word) περὶ τινὸς Ἰησοῦ τεθνηκότος, Of one Jesus that was dead, putting him under the vulgar notion of a δαίμων or dead Heros, and so meaning the worship of him by δεισιδαιμονία. Sect. 12.

Beside this method of examining the sence of this word, another I mentioned by observing the force of the word δείδω, the former part in its composition, which though it signifies simply to fear, (and therefore the word is rendred by Hesychius φοβοῦμαι, fearing God, or Religion in general; by others φίβος θεῶν καὶ δαιμόνων, The fear of God and Damons) yet perhaps may be set sometimes to import a cowardly trembling fear; and so may have an influence on the word in some Authors. Thus Phavorinus, δεισιδαιμονία, ἡ περὶ τὸ θεῖον δειλία, ἢ ὁ ἄλογος φίβος τῆς θεῶν, it signifies a cowardice toward the Deity, or an irrational fear of the Gods. And the Etymologist, δεισιδαίμων, δειλαβὴς καὶ δειλὸς περὶ θεούς, the superstitious man is religious and cowardly, fears the Gods, and is afraid of them; and Clemens, ὁ γὰρ δεισιδαιμονία πάθος, φίβος δαιμόνων ἐστί, Superstition is a passion, being a fear of the Damons; and [a] Theophrastus δειλία πρὸς τὸ δαιμόνιόν ἐστι, 'tis a cowardly fear of the Damon. Thus Maximus Tyrius having compared a pious man to a friend, a superstitious to a flatterer, [ὁ μὲν εὐσεβὴς φιλοῖ θεόν, ὅτι δεισιδαίμων κόλαξ θεοῦ] he explains the meaning in the words following, the pious man comes to God ἄνευ δέους without fear, the superstitious μετὰ πολλοῦ δέους with much fear, δυσκολῶς, καὶ δεδιὼς τοὺς θεοὺς ὥσπερ τοὺς τυράννους, &c. dreading the Gods as so many Tyrants: So saith Diod. Sic. of Bomilcar, δεισιδαίμονές εἰσιν οἱ μέλλοντες ἐγχειρεῖν ταῖς παρανόμοις καὶ μεγάλαις πράξεσι, l. 2. p. 779. they that are about to undertake any unlawful or notable actions are generally afraid of the Gods or Damons: according to which notion of the Greek word, Saint Austin is affirmed to say, Deum à religioso vereri, à superstitioso timeri, The Religious man reveres God, the superstitious is afraid of him; and consequently to that, Religio Deum colit, superstitio violat, Religion is the worshipping of God, Superstition the wronging and violation of him. So again Plutarch. ὃν οἴεται ὁ ἄθεος θεοὺς εἶναι, τούτους δεισιδαίμων ἐβούλετο, The Atheist thinks there are no Gods, but the superstitious wishes there were none, but in spight of his Teeth believes that there are. An argument whereof is, that he is unwilling to die. Where the believing of any punishment after this life is the main piece of Superstition. Sect. 13.

[a] Char. περὶ δεισιδ. δειλαξ. δ.

I conceive my self able to give the Reader some light in this matter, by what I have gathered out of some scattered λείψανα of Epicurus's Philosophy, and it is this: Epicurus, we know, was willing to rid God of the trouble of a providence or care of humane affairs, resolved that all things were done naturalibus ponderibus, & motibus, by natural weights and motions, and consequently that men were to revere and adore God for his greatness, and excellency, and beatitude, and immortality, and transcendent beauty; but not to fear, or dread, or be afraid of him. Of those therefore that differed from him in judgment, As they which thought there was no God at all, were the down-right ἄθεοι, and for that by him censured; so those that believed a providence, and consequent to that, rewards and punishments, he rejected also, as the other extreme, under the title of δεισιδαίμονες, or Superstitious, or fearers of a Deity. This appears not only by the title of a Book of Plutarchs not now extant, inscribed περὶ δεισιδαιμονίας πρὸς Ἐπίκουρον, differing (it seems, both by the addition of πρὸς Ἐπίκουρον, and in all probability by the subject of it) from that which is now extant of his περὶ δεισιδαιμονίας, which looks very little on Epicurus, either to defend or accuse him; But also by several passages in Cicero and other of the Ancients out of him, and by what we find in the lives of the Epicureans in Laërtius. In Cicero l. 2. de nat. deorum, Ut Superstitione liberarem, &c. to be freed from Superstition, is explicated by metum omnem Deorum pulsum esse, to have all fear of the Gods banished from us. And again, having described the wise man to be such as can sine metu vivere, live without fear, he repeats it again in these other words, Omnium rerum naturâ cognitâ levamur Superstitione, liberamur mortis metu, the knowledge of the nature of all things (and among them of God himself) frees men and releases them from Superstition and the fear of death. This in the same Book he calls metum religionis, fear of Religion, or such a fear as the believing Gods providence was apt to beget in men, (especially in those which did what they ought not) viz. terrours and expectations of evil from God, which they which took it to be an errour in Divinity (as Epicurus did,) must needs count a very uneasy, unplea- Sect. 14.

Cic. l. 2. Academ. Quæst. Sic ille deum opere magno liberat, & me timore; Quis enim potest, cùm existimet à Deo se curari, non & numen divinum horrere? &c. Cic. ib. Intelligitur à beata immortalique natura & iram & gratiam segregari, quibus remotis nullos à superis impendere metus. Cic. l. 1. de nat. deor.

Imposuistis in cervicibus nostris sempiternum Dominum quem dies & noctes timeremus. Quis enim non timeat omnia providentem, curiosum & plenum negotii Deum? Hinc δεισιδαιμονία, Hinc μανικὴ, qua tantâ imbueremur superstitione, si vos audire vellemus, ut, &c. His terroribus ab Epicuro soluti non metuimus eos, quos intelligimus nec sibi fingere ullam molestiam, nec alteri quærere, &c. Cic. l. 1. de Nat. Deor.

ſant errour, and ſo as much diſlike Superſtition, i. e. a Religion that brings ſo much affliction to their lives, as any man now adays doth under the moſt odious notion of it.

Sect. 15. Agreeable to this is that of Ariſtippus and the Cyrenaici in Laërtius, which upon the ſame principles reſolve that it is the part of a wiſe man neither to be moved with envy, nor to be ſuperſtitious, and afterwards explained the [δεισιδαιμονίας ἀπὸς εἶναι] being without Superſtition by τὸ μὴ δεδιέναι φόβον ἀφυγῶν, putting off all fear of death, and as a foundation or conſequent of that fearleſneſs, a reſolution that nothing is by nature juſt or unjuſt, but only νόμῳ καὶ ἔθει, by poſitive law or cuſtom, and from thence never doing any (ἄτοπον) unbecoming thing, never admitting any unfaſhionable piece of Piety on contemplation of any Mulct or danger.

Sect. 16. Whereupon it is, that Lucretius an Epicurean Philoſopher ſpeaking of the eternity of Torments threatned in another World, confeſſeth that, if that were true, there would be no way of reſiſting the religions and threats of the Divines. Nam ſi nullum finem eſſe putarent Ærumnarum homines, nullâ ratione valerent Religionibus atq; minis obſiſtere vatum. Making that belief of the infinite Torments in another life, and the menaces of the Prieſts attending it, to be the Religion or Superſtition, that was to be confuted and baniſht out of the World. And I wiſh 'twere now uncharitable to ſuſpect, (what the actions of many make too viſible) that the abhorring of Superſtition (which many ſo boaſt of, and by which they ſo diſcriminate themſelves from other men) hath at leaſt brought them to this piece of Epicurean faith, To diſcarde all fear of another life as a relique of Superſtition, and to reſolve with him in Plutarch, Δεινὸν ἀπιστία πρὸς τὰ θεῖα, καὶ καταφρόνησις αὐτῶν, δεινὰ δ' αὖθις δεισιδαιμονία. Unbelief and contempt of all that is Divine is a ſhrewd fault indeed, but on the other ſide Superſtition is a ſhrewd fault too, the ſhrewder of the twain, and meant by ſuperſtition what you had even now from the ſame Author, The fear of death, or any ill thing after it. But this by the way.

Sect. 17. This generally is the notion of δεισιδαιμονία, Superſtition, (and the ſame of Religion too) among the ancient heathen Writers when either Epicureans or Atheiſts ſpeak of any Religion, or thoſe who are neither, ſpeak of ſome kind of Religion which they do not like. For in both theſe caſes whatſoever they ſee men of other perſwaſions do, which they like not, or think them not bound to, they call it ſtraight their Superſtition or Religion.

Sect. 18. Thus in Plutarch's Tract περὶ δεισιδαιμονίας, it goes indefinitely for Religion, but particularly for ſome fearful apprehenſions of the Gods, which he makes to be contrary to Atheiſm, and to offend as ill in the other extream; a being awed with ſome frightful Doctrines to do ſome things which he thought not men obliged to, an Aſtoniſhment of ſoul, looking on the Gods as ſo many δείματα, furies or ſprights, conceiving them to be cruel, bloody-minded, and other ſuch things, which rather than he would believe, he profeſſeth he would wiſh there had been never a man in the World, μηδὲ εἶναι Πλουτάρχου, and that Plutarch himſelf had no being. All which are but odious expreſſions faſtned on thoſe practices of Religion which he did not approve of, and the very ſame that Epicurus before him had laid upon Religion or belief of Providence.

Sect. 19. Among theſe he mentions keeping of Sabbaths, and caſting on the face, or Proſtrations, particularly that ſo ſtrict obſervation of the Sabbath among the Jews, that when they were invaded by the Enemy they would not riſe from their ſeats δεισιδαιμονίᾳ ὡς σαγήνῃ συνδεδημένοι, tyed and bound by their Religion or Superſtition as with a Net, that they could not move. And then adds the killing and ſacrificing of children which by the deſcription one would think referred to the cuſtom in the valley of Hinnom, or Tophet mentioned in the Scripture.

Sect. 20. And ſo have we paſſed through the ſecond part of our deſigned courſe or method to find out the meaning of the word.

Sect. 21. From whence it appears that the word in Greek and Latine both in the claſſical Authors and the Scripture uſe is ſet to ſignifie one or more of theſe ſeverals.

Sect. 22. In general, Religion or worſhip of God without any cenſure or mark ſet upon it of true or falſe; agreeable to which is that of the old Greek and Latine Lexicon found at the end of ſome of Cyrils works Δεισιδαιμονία, Superſtitio, Religio, rendring it indifferently by thoſe two words. And what Stephanus obſerves of Cicero that he renders δεισιδαιμονία Religio, and that in Athenæus δεισιδαιμονίᾳ θεὸς ἔχεσθαι is religione teneri, (and thereupon Budæus hath ſo rendred it) and an ancient gloſſary, δεισιδαίμων, θεοσεβής. To which purpoſe a conſiderable place there is in Polybius a grave and an excellent heathen Writer, who ſpeaking of the Romans, l. 19. p. 497. and giving his opinion of their Government that it excelled other Commonwealths extreamly ἐν τῇ περὶ θεῶν διαλήψει in the opinion and apprehenſion they had of the Gods, expreſſes what it was, he ſo commends in them, λέγω δὲ δεισιδαιμονίαν, I mean, ſaith he, their Superſtition, which διὰ τοσοῦτον ἐπετεχνήθησαν, was raiſed ſo tragically, or to ſo high a pitch, καὶ παρεισῆκται, &c. was ſo far taken in both to their private and publick affairs ὥστε μὴ καταλιπεῖν ὑπερβολήν, that it was no leſs than an exceſs. Where although (that I diſguiſe not any part of his words) it be by him affirmed, that this was παρὰ τοῖς ἄλλοις ἀνθρώποις ὀνειδιζόμενον, made matter of reproach to the Romans among other men, as indeed every thing in Religion is ſpoken ill of by thoſe who are of other perſwaſions and practices) yet 1. that which thoſe others are laid to reproach in the Romans is their ὑπερβολὴ, or exceſs, or that which others counted to be ſo, and not δεισιδαιμονία it ſelf, and ſecondly Polybius himſelf doth not only commend and extol extreamly (μεγίστην διαφορὰν ἔχειν μοὶ δοκεῖ πρὸς τὸ βέλτιον) both the δεισιδαιμονία and the exceſs of it, but attributes much of the good Government of that Nation to it, and that it doth συνέχειν τὰ Ῥωμαίων πράγματα, keep their affairs in good order and compaſs. If any doubt be made of this importance of this place, I ſhall then, inſtead of farther aſſerting it, add three other to it which ſeem to me beyond all exception to demonſtrate the word to be uſed in a good ſence; The firſt is in Diodorus Siculus bibl. l. 5. p. 305. Where ſpeaking of the ancient Gauls, he taketh notice of one ſpecial thing in them in their behaviour toward the temples of the Gods, There lies (ſaith he) in their Temples a great deal of gold conſecrated to the Gods, which yet no one of the Natives toucheth διὰ τὴν δεισιδαιμονίαν, through their ſuperſtition, or Reverence they bear their Gods, καίπερ ὄντων αὐτῶν Κελτῶν φιλαργύρων καθ' ὑπερβολήν, although theſe Countrey men are extreamly covetous. Which words muſt needs ſet a good notion on δεισιδαιμονία to any that do not count ſacriledge a good quality, and abſtaining from that a vice, or ſcrupulo-

sity. The only thing I can foresee possible to be objected to it, is, that the not touching of the gold may be such a scrupulosity; But that will be soon answered by putting the Reader in mind that ἅπτεσθαι to touch signifies to take away, and that it doth so in this place appears by the addition of the mention of their covetousnes which surely would not put them upon the desire of touching only, but also of taking it away. So the same Author speaking of Imilco, l. 14. p. 295. after an act of sacriledge, saith he, he condemn'd himself, and died, πολλῷ τοῖς πολίταις ἀπολιπὼν δεισιδαιμονίαν (which the Interpreter rightly renders Dei reverentiam) leaving behind him to his Citizens a great superstition, or reverence, or fear of God. The second testimony is out of Heraclitus περὶ Ἀπίστων speaking of Orpheus, κεφ. κγ'. εἰς δεισιδαιμονίαν ἀγαγὼν, ᾗ ὅτι τὸ εὐσεβὲν παρεκάλυψαι, leading to superstition, or worship of the Gods, and exhorting them to be pious. The last is out of an Edict of the Emperour Tiberius, set down by Josephus Ant. l. 19. c. 4. where immunities are by him allowed the Jews, on condition that they misuse not the Emperours kindness towards them, ᾗ μὴ τὰς πρὸ ἄλλων ἐθνῶν δεισιδαιμονίας ἐξουθενίζειν, and that they do not set at nought the superstitions, i. e. the Religions (some of which, he that wrote the Edict thought to be the true) of other Nations.

Secondly, the worship of the deified dead men and Angels which the Heathens took to be true Gods, but the Christians do not, and therefore saith the Etymologist, ἰσθι ὅτι παρὰ μὲν τοῖς Ἕλλησι δὴ καλῶ λαμβάνεται, παρὰ δὲ ἡμῖν τοῖς χριστιανοῖς δὴ ἐπ' ἀσεβείας λέγεται, The word among the Heathens is taken for a good thing, but among Christians for impiety. Sect. 23.

Thirdly, any part of Divine worship, which in obedience to his God, or for fear of vengeance from him, any worshipper doth perform to him. A thing which every sect or sort of people liking in themselves, but disliking in others of a distant worship, do either honour or defame with the Title (as of Superstition, so) of Religion also. Sect. 24.

Fourthly, A trembling fear of Gods punishment due for every sin, which the Epicureans were willing to scoffe out of the World, lest every man being a sinner, every man should be left to terrours and astonishments of Conscience, and so lose that γαλήνη τῷ βίῳ, that tranquillity and ease of life, which they proposed to themselves as the chiefest good. Sect. 25.

To which I need only add a fifth not yet toucht upon, The use of magical Spells, Ligatures, Characters, &c. Execranda superstitio ligaturarum, in quibus inaures, &c. non ad placendum hominibus sed ad serviendum Dæmonibus adhibentur. Aug. Ep. 73. that execrable superstition of ligatures, among which are the ear-rings, &c. used not to please men, but to serve devils (of auspicious and ominous days, the not observing of which Hesiod makes to be impiety, ὅλβιος ὃς τὰ δὲ πάντα (that whole book being a direction to that purpose) Εἰδὼς ἐργάζηται, ἀναίτιος ἀθανάτοισιν, Ὀρνίθας κείνων, ᾗ ὑπερβασίας ἀλεείνων) and all the observations and books of the Augures and Aruspices, a Catalogue of all which Clemens Alexan. (Strom. 3. p. 312.) tells us, was to be seen in a Comedy of Menanders called δεισιδαίμων, in which he scoffs at those that make every Accident almost σημεῖόν τινος, a presage, or sign of something, divining by the flight of birds (δεξιὸς ὄρνις Αἰητοῦ ὑψιπετὴς, in Homer,) by the feeding of Chickens, as in that famous story of Valens which cost so many men their lives for having names which began with those letters which the Chicken peckt at on the Table; to which you may add the Ῥαβδομαντεία by striking a staff against the ground; to which 'tis thought the Prophet referred, Hos. 4. 12. and Κλειδομαντεία, and a many more collected by learned men out of their books, and the rest of the ἐναίσιμα σήματα auspicious signs, such as ἀστράψειν ἐπὶ δεξιὰ, lightning on the right side in Homer Il. β. The like with more ease you shall find in Saint Austin de Doctr. Christiana l. 2. under the Title of Significationes superstitiosæ, superstitious significations, which, saith he Epist. 73. ad serviendum Dæmonibus adhibentur, are used to serve the Devils, and thence it seems are called Superstitious, and they that use them δεισιδαιμονοῦντες ἐπὶ τοῖς σημείοις in Suidas, superstitious observers of signs. Sect. 26.

All which being thus premised, three things there are in our modern customary use of this word among men, that will appear very inconsequent and improper at least. First, that Superstition simply and abstractly taken should be resolved in all Authors to signifie somewhat which is evil; That sin particularly of False-worship. Whereas first those that use the word to express their own worship either of God or Angels, or Saints, conceive that to be a creditable word, or else would not call it by that name, and the Etymologist even now affirmed that among the Heathen ἐπὶ καλῷ λέγεται, 'Tis taken for a good thing, and for religion in general. And secondly, When St. Pauls Religion, or Christianity it self is called by that name by Festus an Heathen, Acts 25. 19. it appears not that he did use that word as an accusation, or in an ill sence, but only in general to signifie Pauls Religion, or somewhat in that different from the Religion of the Jews, and no whit less favoured by him than the Jews Religion. For he that reads the story, shall see that he rather favoured St. Paul's part against the Jews, or at most doubted whose side to judge on, so far is he from prejudging Saint Paul's cause, or his Religion in comparison of theirs, or expressing that by this word. Thirdly, St. Paul himself Acts 17. 23. saith, they do εὐσεβεῖν worship the true God, though ignorantly, (taking him for a δαίμων as the rest of their many Gods were) whom he had called δεισιδαιμονεστέρους. Fourthly, he calls them δεισιδαιμονεστέρους, more religious than other men, not in relation to any vitious rite or performance, wherein they exceeded others, but in relation to their worshipping the unknown God, which others worshipt not, which saith he was the true God of Heaven whom he preached, though the truth is they knew him not. Sect. 27.

A second inconsequence is, that the use of Ceremonies or Rites in the worship of the true God, if they be not distinctly prescribed either by the example or precept of Christ, should 1. be called superstition, then without farther matter of accusation be condemned only for deserving that Title. Whereas first there is no example in the Scripture, nor ancient Author, nor ground in the nature of either Greek or Latine word to affix that Title to that matter (Superstition to unprescribed Rites) or if there were, yet secondly no Authority to defame that Title, being so applyed; or to conclude every thing evil that were called by it, unless it might appear to be in it self evil, abstracted from the Odium of that Title. Sect. 28.

The third Inconsequent thing is, that men on pretence and in the name of Piety should abstain from some observances (in themselves and their own nature acknowledged to be indifferent) as superstitious, Sect. 29.

ous, either becauſe they are commanded by lawful authority, or at moſt, becauſe they are or have been uſed by Papiſts; And yet themſelves not expect to be accompted ſuperſtitious in hating and deteſting and not daring to practiſe any one of them (and that ſometimes for no other crime but becauſe they are by lawful authority commanded to practiſe them) but as ſtrictly obliging themſelves to do the contrary ſometimes, that which Anabaptiſts, and other Perſons (1. not in authority, ſecondly as much or as well condemned by our Church both for doctrine and manner of worſhip as the Papiſts) are wont to do; Whereas in things indifferent, firſt it is certainly as criminous, and Superſtitious to place piety in the Negative, as the affirmative, in not kneeling, as in kneeling; in abſtaining ſcrupulouſly from Ceremonies, as in uſing them as ſcrupulouſly; And ſecondly 'tis as dangerous a kind of dogmatizing to teach the neceſſity of abſtinence from lawful unprohibited Ceremonies, as from lawful unprohibited meats, Col. 2. And thirdly it is not imaginable that the intervening of a command on one ſide and not on the other, ſhould leave the Superſtition only on that ſide, where the command lies, for then the Superſtition muſt conſiſt in obeying lawful magiſtrates, or elſe the magiſtrates themſelves be the only Superſtitious Perſons in commanding. Either of which acts (either of giving or obeying commands in things indifferent) if it were acknowledged a fault, might ſure be Adultery, or Witchcraft, as well as Superſtition.

Sect. 30. If to all which hath been ſaid in this matter, it be ſtill objected, that ſuperſtition may and doth in ſome authentick Writers either ſacred or profane ſignifie a nimiety or exceſs in Religion, I ſhall briefly make this return, Sect. 31. 1. That the word Superſtitioſus may indeed denote ſuch exceſs from the force of the termination [oſus] and ſo alſo (ſaith Agellius out of Nigidius Figulus) the word Religioſus denotes; but then, firſt, by that Grammatical obſervation I might conclude, that Superſtitio denotes this no more than Religio doth; Nay ſecondly, that 'tis Agellius his animadverſion upon Nigidius Figulus, that all ſuch exceſſes are not culpable, nor conſequently all words of that termination to be taken in ill ſences.

Sect. 32. But then Secondly, granting the word to be thus uſed by ſome Authors, I muſt firſt ſay, That ſome, and thoſe not of the meaneſt of the ancient Heathens (as appears by what we produced out of Cicero) did it on that ground of Epicurean Divinity, Gods no providence, no puniſhments in another life, to which it was but conſonant to condemn all ſuperſtition (becauſe all fear of God) for a Nimiety in opinion firſt, and then in practice. Secondly, That for other later Chriſtian Writers the uſe of a word in this or that ſence in ſome Authors, is ſo ſlight and caſual a thing, that it muſt not be thought ſufficient to faſten an ill character on any thing, to which thoſe Authors have applied it, unleſs that thing be firſt proved to be ill by ſome other Topick. Thirdly, that thoſe Authors which come home to the point in hand, are ſo few or ſo modern and of ſo ſmall authority, that they would ſcarce be worth producing. Fourthly, that this ſuppoſed Nimiety or exceſs in matters of Religion may be reduced to theſe two ſorts, as conſiſting either in the degree, or in the number of Actions; either in the quality, or quantity; in the intenſion or extenſion.

Sect. 33. If it be ſuppoſed in the firſt kind only, then I ſhall without ſcruple deny, that there is any ſuch thing as Nimiety or exceſs in Religion. There is no poſſibility of being Religious in too high a Degree, of praying too fervently, or too often. For though the Meſſalians or Euchitæ were condemn'd in this matter, yet 'tis clear, that that which was their crime, was not that exceſſive practice, but the laying that obligation upon themſelves and all others, to be always a praying, upon authority of that Text [Pray continually] which being by the Apoſtle delivered in reference and in analogy to the continual i. e. daily Sacrifices, was by them miſinterpreted and applied to uninterrupted, inceſſant pouring out of Prayers. And again though 'tis poſſible alſo, that in too frequent or intenſe a practice of holy Duties ſome incident fault there may be, as for example, if by ſo doing a man neglect the Duties of Charity or of his own particular calling, yet then alſo 'tis clear that this fault is the neglecting of thoſe Duties, and not the Exceſs of Devotion (to which this neglect is but extrinſecal and accidental, and ſo not fit to deprave the nature of that devotion it ſelf) which you will diſcern by this, that if that ſuppoſed exceſs might be ſeparated from thoſe adherent Neglects or Omiſſions, it would then never be accounted criminous, no man that diſcharges all his other Duties will ever be ſaid to be too zealous, or to pray too often; and that he doth not diſcharge thoſe Duties, though a fault it is, and an argument of partial hypocritical obedience in him that is wilfully guilty of it, yet ſure not properly the ſin of ſuperſtition. For 'tis St. Auſtin's argument againſt Cicero (who thought that the praying day and night, ut filii eſſent Superſtites, was ſuperſtition) de Civit. l. 4. c. 30. Si Superſtites dicti, qui dies totas precabantur & immolabant, nunquid non & illi qui inſtituerunt deorum ſimulachra? If't were Superſtition to pray and ſacrifice whole days together, then ſure they were ſuperſtitious alſo that ſet up thoſe Images of the Gods to which they ſo Prayed and Sacrificed, intimating his opinion that the frequency of Prayer could not be Superſtitious, unleſs the worſhip and inſtitution it ſelf were Superſtitious: that is, the Gods or Images to whom they thus pray'd, falſe Gods.

Sect. 34. But if this exceſs be ſuppoſed to be in the extenſion, i. e. the taking in too many things, to wit too many Rites and Ceremonies, &c. into the ſervice of God, I ſhall then ſay, Firſt, that by this it ſeems to be granted, that the Rites and Ceremonies themſelves are not ſuperſtitious, but only the multitude of them. I make ſuch haſt to aſſume this as granted, becauſe I conceive it ſuch a reaſonable poſtulatum, that I would perſwade my ſelf no pretender to rational diſcourſe would deny it me; it being demonſtratively as impoſſible to deveſt Religion of all Rites and Ceremonies wholly, as to perform the duty of Prayer in an humane body, and yet to do it at no time, in no place, with no geſture.

Sect. 35. Or if our oppoſite Brethren will diſtinguiſh betwixt Circumſtances and ſignificant Ceremonies, and only diſclaim the latter; Then firſt they muſt fall out with their friends who generally uſe elevation of the hand in taking of Oaths, and that is a ſignificant Ceremony. And ſome of them aſſert the neceſſity of ſitting at the Sacrament as ſignificative of their aſſurance of their Familiarity with Chriſt on Earth at his ſecond coming. And ſecondly, they muſt affirm it to be a fault too in a Ceremony, that it is ſignificative, which ſeems very unreaſonable alſo.

Sect. 36. For the ſignificancy of a Ceremony may be of three ſorts. Firſt, when it naturally ſignifies the thing which I am about, and properly floweth from it; as the lifting up the Eyes to Heaven floweth from zeal in Prayer,

Prayer, and ſignifies or expreſſeth it; and no ſober man would ever think fit to quarrel with that for being ſignificative, or to preſcribe limits to the uſe of ſuch kind of Ceremonies. Secondly, When by the cuſtom of the place it becomes in like manner alſo ſignificative of the Action in hand. As among us, kneeling ſignifies humility, &c. and to blame ſuch a ſignificancy again, or ſuch a Ceremony, becauſe it is ſignificative, were as irrational. 'Twill not be fault in any thus to uſe it privately himſelf, or being a Magiſtrate to preſcribe others (for decency and uniformity) the uſe of it. Thirdly, when it is ſet to ſignifie ſomething elſe, whether that which it ſignifies be matter of Chriſtian Doctrine; as in the Antient Church, the cuſtom of ſtanding in the Church between Eaſter and Whitſuntide, was deſign'd to ſignifie the Reſurrection of Chriſt; or whether it be matter of promiſe, as the Types in the old law were of Chriſt to come; or whether matter of fact and Story, &c. and then alſo to quarrel with the ſignificancy of them, and diſlike them more than if they were empty and unſignificant, is Firſt, very irrational again (for it will not be more fault to have ſome profit in them, than to have none.)

Secondly, it will lay a cenſure upon the Types of the Law appointed by God himſelf, for they were ſuch; And though thoſe particulars are now out-dated by the coming of Chriſt whom they ſignified, yet ſince that, others that are now ſtill ſeaſonable by ſignifying and commemorating ſomewhat paſt, or prefiguring ſomewhat yet future, will by that Analogy and proportion which they hold with thoſe which were then lawful, be evidenced to be lawful too. Sect. 37.

The not obſerving of which matter, and of the ſole reaſon why the old Jewiſh Ceremonies, Circumciſion, &c. are interdicted us Chriſtians (not becauſe ſignificative Ceremonies are toto genere unlawful, but becauſe the obſerving of thoſe particularly which foreſhewed Chriſt, and teaching the neceſſity of obſerving them, would be interpretativè the denying of Chriſt, or that the Meſſias was come) is, I conceive, that which hath given occaſion of the miſtakes of thinking ſignificative Ceremonies to be now unlawful; which errour if upon this advertiſement it may now be reformed, and this ſo reaſonable a poſtulation for the lawfulneſs of Ceremonies ſignificative be thus granted, the greater part of this preſent Controverſie will be at an end; for I ſhall not then be Advocate for the multitude or abundance of that laſt ſort of ſignificative Ceremonies, but rather give my full vote to the confirming of the old rule concerning them, that they be pauca & ſalubres, few and wholſome; and particularly few for theſe Reaſons: Sect. 38.

Firſt, becauſe there are really not many ſuch wholeſome Ceremonies to be found; Secondly, becauſe thoſe that by Law are received into the Church, are but very moderate for number; which with me hath no ſmall Authority. Thirdly, becauſe 'tis not impoſſible that the number may encumber the Soul, by buſying it about many things, and ſo diverting it from the One great Neceſſary. Fourthly, becauſe the multitude of ſuch was counted a Burden to the Jews. Fifthly, becauſe it ſeems ſometimes to be an ill ſymptom of ſome inward neglect, to ſpend over-much Care and Time in the Outer-waſhings; as in the Phariſees it is noted to have been; And as Ariſtotle obſerves of the inſectile Animals, that the want of blood was the cauſe that they ran out into ſo many legs. Sect. 39.

But then Secondly, I muſt add by way of caution, that in this matter men are ſometimes miſtaken (as Miſers are in judging of exceſſive expences, or ſluggards of exceſſive labour) think, they or others excede, when they do not. Sect. 40.

To which purpoſe you may pleaſe firſt to take this direction, that though the premiſed caution concerning Ceremonies in a Church be very good, that they be pauca & ſalubres, few and wholſome, yet if they be wholſome, not only negatively, but poſitively, not only harmleſs but tending to edification (for ſo ſalubrity, or wholſomeneſs imports) then there will be little reaſon to accuſe them of exceſs; for if they be ſalubrious, they will then more probably help the inner devotion, than encumber it. Sect. 41.

Secondly, you muſt diſtinguiſh of ſuch Acts, wherein that exceſs is ſuppoſed to be, that they either are ordinable, fit, &c. proper to that end, the ſervice of God, to that which they are annex'd; and then again being uſed in their kind, they are ſalubrious, and no danger of exceſs; or Secondly, they are inordinable, unfit, improper, of which nature there are great ſtore noted in the Church of Rome; and in this caſe though any one may be a nimiety, and that nimiety a fault, yet ſtill this is not the fault of Superſtition, but rather of folly and vanity, or whatever other guilt, the uſing things in the worſhip of God, which do no whit tend to that end (but are aliene from it) may amount to. And theſe vanities, or this fault, I deſire to allow no favour or patronage or countenance to, but have as full diſlikes to them as any charitable man hath, though as yet I am not ſatisfied, that they are to be called Superſtition. Sect. 42.

And yet concerning a word I ſhall not contend neither, but rather grant them liable to that title alſo, on condition that I may but evince, and be granted this one thing, that it is a circle of injuſtice, and a noxious fallacy, firſt to apply the title of Superſtition to ſuch trifles or faults as theſe, then to extend it farther to thoſe things which have no ſuch fault to be charged on them, and then to condemn thoſe alſo, as faults and crimes becauſe they are Superſtitious; juſt like the old Heathen Tyrants dealing with the primitive Chriſtians, firſt to entertain themſelves with the bloody ſpectacles of baiting of Wild-beaſts, then to take off thoſe Wild-beaſts Skins, and put them upon Chriſtians, then to bring forth thoſe Chriſtians to be baited and devoured in thoſe ſhapes. The injuſtice of which is the ὅπερ ἔδει δεῖξαι the prime thing which this paper was deſigned to demonſtrate. Sect. 43.

And if ſtill it be urg'd and preſſed that Superſtition is a Nimiety and Exceſs in the uſe of good Authours, and demand be made wherein, or what is that Nimiety, that may properly be called Superſtition? I anſwer, that if we will needs take Superſtition in that notion, then the moſt proper matter of it will be, Sect. 44.

Firſt, The placing more vertue in ſome things than either naturally, or by the rule of Gods word, or in the eſtimation of purer Ages of the Church of Chriſt may be thought to belong to them; as the placing virtue or force in the ſign of the Croſs, and the womens parvula Evangelia in St. Jerom on Mat. Cap. 23. The Opus operatum of the Sacrament, and other Chriſtian performances, (parallel to the φελάκτηρια or amulets among the Heathen, to the φυλακτήρια the Phylacteries among the Jews (having Sect. 45.

(having their audi Iſrael, Deut. 5. faſtned to their wriſts and foreheads) to drive away Devils, and to the precatiuncula the little Prayers that the Turk carries about with him, as a defenſative againſt all dangers, The doing of which is either utterly groundleſs, and then it is folly; or elſe it faſtens ſome promiſe on Chriſt which he hath not made in the Goſpel, or ſome doctrine on the antient Church, of which that is not guilty neither, and ſo is a Nimiety: or elſe,

Sect. 46. Secondly, (That to which the literal importance of δεισιδαιμονία refers) An exceſs of fear, or δειλία πρὸς τὸν θεὸν, being afraid of God, when we need not, thinking our ſelves bound (or obliging others) as from God, when God immediately neither commands nor forbids, nor the lawful power under which we live (which would be mediately the command of God alſo:) of this kind is the doing or abſtaining religiouſly (i.e. upon pretence of divine precept or prohibition) from thoſe things which the word and the law of Chriſt doth neither immediately, nor by conſequence of commanding obedience to the higher powers, command nor interdict us. I ſay not, the ſimple doing and abſtaining (for that may be ſimply lawful) nor the doing and abſtaining upon ground of command or prohibition from our lawful ſuperiours, (for if there be any ſuch, we are bound by the word of God to ſuch obedience, and the not paying thereof is as truly, I will add, as immediately a breach of Gods Law and ſin againſt God, as any act of theft or adultery, or ſin againſt the ſecond table: for though the commands of the Magiſtrate are but mediately the commands of God, yet the diſobeying of thoſe commands is an immediate diſobedience to God, in the fifth Commandment which commands to honour, i. e. to obey him; and then to be moſt exact and preciſe in caution never to ſin againſt that obedience, cannot be ſuperſtition, or fault, though perhaps by being in a man that makes little Conſcience of greater diſobedience, it be an ill Symptom of that Hypocriſy which conſiſts in ſtraining at Gnats and ſwallowing Camels) but the doing or abſtaining religiouſly (which is in effect dogmatizing Col. 2. 20. laying burdens upon our ſelves, and others as from Chriſt) where Chriſt hath wholly left us free. As if a private man ſhould think himſelf obliged by (or a Magiſtrate preſs upon others by vertue of the Moſaical Precept, the obligation of) the Jewiſh Law long ſince abrogated by Chriſt, or any other out-dated or not-yet-given command; This might be called Superſtition, under this Notion of Nimiety, becauſe that man adds to the Commands of Chriſt (as the former to the Promiſes) annexes to the Chriſtian Religion, to the Goſpel Rule, thoſe things which belong not to it, and ſo is an exceeder in the fear and ſervice of God, doth things in obedience to God, which he neither immediately nor mediately commands, and ſo walks ἀκριβῶς ὡς ἄφρων, Epheſ. 5. 15. Circumſpectly, but as a fool, fearing where no fear is, doing ſome things ſervilely (that is, fearing damnation if he ſhould not do them) wherein Chriſt hath left him free, and no authority of the Church or lawful Magiſtrate reſtrain'd that Liberty.

Sect. 47. And this is a culpable or criminous Exceſs, not in doing what God commands not (for that may be innocent enough) but in affirming (as a falſe Teacher) God to command when he doth not command, or to forbid when he doth not forbid; and ſo inthralling himſelf or others, whom God hath freed. Which way of dogmatizing, or impoſing as neceſſary ſuch things as the law of Chriſt hath not made neceſſary (no, nor ſo much as the higher powers authorized by Chriſt, nor the Primitive or univerſal Church of Chriſt, which will have authority amongſt all ſober men) and ſo proceeding to make ſuch things marks and characters to condemn others and illuſtrate themſelves by, is the ſpecial kind of Superſtition, which I have reaſon to believe any kind of Proteſtants to be guilty of. Yea and

Sect. 48. The only one, unleſs it be that ridiculous one of making groundleſs obſervations of ominous things, inauſpicious events, unlucky days, and ſuch like old-wives divinations, to which one part of Theophraſtus his Character of Superſtition, and of Agellius his notion of it, and of S. Auſtin's alſo refers; which yet is rather believing firmly what we have no ground to believe, and ſo an exceſs of credulity, than doing what we are not bound to do, and ſo an exceſs of Religion; or if you will, a civil Superſtition (being not in any order to the worſhip of God) in an affected retaining or embracing of ſome old Heathen Traditions, taken up by the δεισιδαίμονες, firſt fooliſh in them, and then of evil report for us to continue from them, being ſo much better inſtructed than they were; and if taken up upon their authority, and continued under that notion, then alſo poſſibly matter of ſcandal (as the eating of the εἰδωλόθυτα, Things offered to Idols, was 1 Cor. 10. 29.) But then ſtill this is rather an effect of natural magick, or Heatheniſh perſwaſions, than an Exceſs of the Chriſtian Religion; and not at all the thing which is now adays preſt with that odious title of Superſtition, and therefore it may ſuffice to have named this without farther enlarging on it.

Sect. 49. As for thoſe other things which are ſo ordinarily branded under this name, by many that are now ill pleaſed with the legal ſtate of things in our Church, though I ſhall not deſcend to the particular conſideration of them, and vindication of each, yet this it will not be unſeaſonable to have adverti-ſed in this place, that that main proof and common way of evidencing the ſuperſtitiouſneſs of ſome obſervances or performances among us, only becauſe either we do place (or others have placed) holineſs in them, is, (whatſoever may be ſaid of it in theſi) in hypotheſi or application to the particular caſes generally very falſe, or impertinent.

Sect. 50. For, whenſoever in any ſuch particular I ſhall be thus accuſed, I ſhall firſt ask what is meant by קדש * holineſs? any real inherent vertue? or only (according to the * Hebrew, and ſo Scripture notation of the word) ſeparation from common uſes? For the firſt of theſe, that real inherent holineſs, no Proteſtant that I have heard of, affirms it of any created thing, but only of perſons, as God, in the high degree, and Saints of his, in a lower and imperfect degree, by way of communication from him. Either therefore the charge muſt be falſe, or elſe by holineſs muſt be meant that ſecond kind of it, ſeparation to holy, from common uſes; and thus times, and things, and actions, &c. may be truly called holy, and if we place no more of this holineſs in them, than thus truly belongs to them, then ſure we offend not again, nor are to be defamed for Superſtitious in ſo doing.

Sect. 51. In this caſe the only thing behind for inquiry will be, by whom and how far this thing whatever it is, is thus ſeparated, and that I ſhall ſuppoſe will be found to be done either by Chriſt or the Apoſtles, or the univerſal Church in the pureſt ages, or the particular Church (and rulers thereof) wherein we live; or if by none of theſe, then (being left free and at our own diſpoſing) by our own voluntary act, act, or that confirmed with a reſolution, or vow perhaps in ſome caſes. Now if theſe or any of theſe be the authors of the ſeparating any thing, then to diſcern whether we exceed in any of theſe, and whether we place more holineſs than is due to them, it will not be very difficult: For, if that, which is thus ſeparated by Chriſt, I ſhall count holy in that degree, and conceive my ſelf obliged to it virtute præcepti divini, by virtue of divine precept, I ſurely offend not. And ſo in the ſecond, If I count my ſelf obliged by the Apoſtolick precept, or in the third by the example or precept of the primitive univerſal, or in the fourth, of the particular Church, (each of which ought to have their authority with us, though that in different degrees) all this while I offend not, becauſe the holineſs which I place in them is ſtill proportioned to the ground of it, the authority of him that thus ſeparated them.

And ſo again, if my voluntary oblation I perform as a voluntary oblation, and only expect that God that hath promiſed to accept ſuch, will, if it be as it ought, accept this; and in caſe of reſolution and vow, add that reſpect in my performance, which is due to ſuch, all this while I am not blame-worthy. Sect. 52.

But if I ſtrain either of theſe any degree above its rank, elevate an Eccleſiaſtical or humane Conſtitution into a divine Precept, &c. then I ſhall acknowledge this a fault, and that fault perhaps capable of the title of Superſtition: which yet muſt not be extended thus far, that the giving of the like obedience to one as the other, is this fault, (for obedience being due to both Divine and Humane Laws (keeping their terms of ſubordination) I am alike bound by Chriſt to obey both, and I muſt not make any difference in that Obedience, but do both for Conſcience ſake) but that the confounding the grounds or foundations of my obedience, which ought to be diſtinguiſhed, is in it ſelf an errour, and that which may prove of ill importance, by making me equal them, when perhaps they come in competition with (and ſo thwart) one another; in which caſe the inferiour ought to give place to the ſuperiour. Sect. 53.

If to this it be replied, that though I do not elevate this above its pitch, do not thus attribute more holineſs to this or that than it deſerves, yet Papiſts or other Superſtitious perſons have done ſo, and therefore the thing is become Superſtitious, and conſequently muſt be forborn by me alſo. To this I anſwer Firſt, That the ill uſe of any will not corrupt a thing in it ſelf either commanded, or but laudable, or only innocent before; and conſequently though the Papiſts be ſuperſtitious, yet will not every thing from thence be ſufficiently proved to be ſuperſtitious, unleſs it have ſome crime beſide their uſing it; for otherwiſe, not only the Creed and Pater-noſter, but even the Scripture it ſelf muſt be ſuperſtitious alſo. Sect. 54.

This inconſequence being acknowledged, I add, Secondly, that there is nothing which can oblige me to abſtain from that which they have uſed ſuperſtitiouſly, unleſs either the danger that I be thought to do ſo too, to be as Superſtitious as they, or the poſſibility that others following me in doing it, may follow them in doing it ſuperſtitiouſly, and either of theſe dangers being ſuppoſed, will not yet come home to prove it Superſtitious, (which is the only thing we have now to conſider) the moſt that they can do, is to make it ſcandalous, and (beſide that this belongs to another matter and is abundantly handled in another Diſcourſe on that Subject) I ſhall add one thing more that this conſideration of the danger or poſſibility, is not ſo much a religious as a prudential one (for an act of prudence it is to weigh and ponder whether this be a probable danger or no) and ſo belongs to the higher powers to conſider of (not to every private man) who if they think fit by law to forbid it, I muſt not then venture on it; if (non obſtante this appearance of danger) to command it, though 'tis poſſible they may do amiſs in ſo doing, yet I (having nothing to do in that act of theirs, unleſs I am a Counſel adviſed with in it) may be innocent enough in ſo obeying, and if they have thought fit neither to command nor forbid, then am I left free in my own particular, and may do either, ſo I do it with thoſe cautions, that in the tract of Scandal are ſet down. Sect. 55.

To which if it be replied, that though this be true in theſi, yet in hypotheſi 'twill not be pertinent in this Kingdom. The Laws of this Kingdom have taken away all Ceremonies uſed in the Roman Church, ſave thoſe that are named in thoſe Laws, and ſo have left no man any ſuch liberty. I anſwer, They have taken away the obligingneſs, but not lawfulneſs of them, unleſs of thoſe which either our Church or ſome higher principle hath pronounced unlawful; my meaning is, that whatſoever laudable performance was taken up by the Papiſts, and by them commanded, now though that command be taken away, and ſo we free from the obligingneſs or burthen of it, 'tis not therefore made unlawful or prohibited to us (for that were to reſtrain our liberty alſo, and only to exchange one burthen for another) or if it were, I ſhould then think my ſelf obliged to abſtain alſo. Sect. 56.

The Concluſion from all this diſcourſe will be, that if ſome men, as they will abide no Rites, ſo they would avow no quarrels but what Scripture will give them particular directions or commands for, and conſequently if they would not judge or damn their brethren, when neither Chriſt and his writ, nor the authority of the primitive univerſal Church, nor the orders of the particular within which they live, nor the indecency of the thing it ſelf (of which yet every private man muſt not be allowed a competent judge) condemns them, it might be hoped that truth and peace and juſtice and charity that have taken their joint flight from this earth together, might together return to it again, which till it be done it muſt be ſtill expected that they who have learn'd one of the Devils attributes, that of Satan, Adverſary, or ἐχθρὸς ἀνὴρ enemy Man, will alſo advance to another, that of διάβολος calumniator, and κατήγορος ἀδελφῶν accuſer (as of the brethren, i. e. true believers ſo) of every Chriſtian or innocent action of theirs, and that if there be no known plain ſin to be charged on them with any probability, then ſome unknown, obſcure, miſunderſtood name ſhall ſupply that place, and as once Herodius obſerved that there was a Law made that no crime ſhould be capital but treaſon, but then every the leaſt misbehaviour, or even innocent harmleſs action, in ſuch whom they had a mind to puniſh, was brought in under the title of Treaſon, and ſo every thing became capital by that means, ſo now it being by ſome men reſolved (if the teſtimony of the reſt of their lives may be believed) that there is no capital damning ſin, worth heeding, or abſtaining from but Superſtition, every rite or geſture or motion in them whom they pleaſe to quarrel with, ſhall be accuſed and arraigned and ſentenced under that title. Sect. 57.

It were to be wiſh't that the pains that is taken in defaming all bodily worſhip, under the mormo of Superſtition, were more profitably employed, either in finding out means to encreaſe our inward at- Sect. 58.

tention and fervour in performing that great duty of prayer (to which purpose (I am confident) fasting, and humility of bodily gestures, those two main branches of the modern Superstition, will not be found unprofitable) or else in the search of that spiritual pride and uncharitableness and contention, that filthiness of the Spirit, which is apt to steal into and defile the best mens hearts, and if it may please, of one real, blasting, damning, and yet (as if out-dated) little considered sin, you may take your option, either that of ἱεροσυλία Sacriledge, Rom. 2. 22. or that other of irreverence and prophaneness.

Take heed that no man deceive you with vain words.

OF IDOLATRY.

Sect. 1. AS the Judgments of other men have perswaded me to think it pertinent and seasonable to add this one unto four former disquisitions, with which it holds some analogy and cognation, So the nature of the enquiry hath prompted and directed me to take rise (as those former have) from the examination of the word, and that by observing the origination first, and then Critical peculiar importance of it among ancient writers, those especially of the Scripture.

Sect. 2. To that end, the word Εἴδωλον, Idol, of which it is compounded, must first be viewed. And of that there is no question, but that in the literal notation of it, it signifies an Image or representation of any kind, and accordingly in the Old Testament is set to express both צלם an Image, or similitude, any kind of figure in general; and פסל a carved or graven Image in specie, a statue of wood, or stone, any kind of Sculpture: Though the truth is, εἴδωλον is not the most ordinary rendring of either of these, but εἰκὼν imago of the former, and εἴδωλον but twice; and γλυπτὸν sculptile of the latter, and εἴδωλον but thrice.

Sect. 3. Three words there are to which it is most ordinarily applied. 1. אליל a nothing, that hath no being, (to which St. Paul refers when he saith an Idol is nothing) or if you please a no God, אל אל that hath no Divinity, no power to help the Client or Worshipper; parallel to that passage, Deut. 32. they have provoked me בלא אל with that which is no God, and the Author of the Book of Esther, c. 14. 11. μὴ παραδῶς, Κύριε, τὸ σκῆπτρόν σου, τοῖς μὴ οὖσι, give not thy scepter, O Lord, to them that are not.

1 Cor. 8. 4.
1 Cor. 10. 19.

Sect 4. Secondly, אלהים Gods, the many false Gods of the Heathens, by the Greek seven times rendred εἴδωλα Idols, unless perhaps it may be conjectured, that they which so rendred it in those places, mistook, or misread אלהים Gods (which in other places they constantly render θεοὶ, at least two hundred times) for אלילים nothings, vanities, which is very near in writing and sound unto it, and such mistakes are no great news in those translators.

Sect. 5. Thirdly, נדוד Pollution, Filth by which any man is contaminated; This is rendred sometimes βδέλυγμα abomination, but more frequently εἴδωλον (Idol) than any thing else, (and sometimes the idol or false God meant, when the word βδέλυγμα abomination or pollution is used, as Wisd. 12. 23.) which certainly refers not only to the pollution of the Soul by the commission of that sin, (for by every other sin some such pollution is contracted;) nor only to that other notion of spiritual fornication; but principally to the abominable sins of uncleanness, and filthiness, which those Idol worships were ordinarily guilty of, (and of which, saith the Author of the Book of Wisd. distinctly, the invention of idols was the beginning, c. 14. 12.) and from thence received a great aggravation and heightning of their guilt, and punishment. And to the same purpose the word שקץ abomination, or filthiness, (and so most commonly rendered βδέλυγμα and μίασμα) is sometimes εἴδωλον Idol also.

v. Grot. in Hos. 9. 10.

Sect. 6. Other words there are, that sometimes (but more rarely) are thus rendred also, as 1. במה (from whence the Greek βωμὸς) high places, the Altars or Temples of their false Gods peculiarly, (as may appear 1 Mac. 1. 59. where βωμὸς the Heathen Altar was by Antiochus set upon the θυσιαστήριον or Altar of the Jews) and these would be more properly rendred εἰδωλεῖα Idol Temples, or Altars, than εἴδωλα Idols; and therefore perhaps in that one place, Eze. 16. 16. where 'tis rendred εἴδωλα, it may be a false print for εἰδωλεῖα: I am sure our English most properly renders it high places, and those are called εἰδωλεῖα not only by the Author of that Book 1 Mac. 1. 47. but by St. Paul himself 1 Cor. 8. 10. speaking of him that eateth ἐν εἰδωλείῳ in a Temple or other place where those false Deities were worshipt.

Sect. 7. Secondly, הבל vanity, so Esth. 14. 10. μάταια is set by the Greek, and rendred by us [Idols] and so 3 Mac. both κενὰ and μάταια signifie, from whence it is that the Gentile-Idol worshippers under the title of [πάντες ἄνθρωποι] all men, the generality of mankind (or all the World but the Jews) are said to be φύσει μάταιοι, Wisd. 13. 1. vain or Idolatrous by Nature, i. e. either by birth, born in that Idolatrous Age among those Heathens; or else by long popular, natural, œcumenical custom, which is, saith Galen, ἐπίκτητος φύσις, an acquired nature; Thus hath Suidas intepreted the word φύσις nature, that 'tis sometimes χρονιὰ καὶ πονηρὰ συνήθεια, a chronical evil custom, (as on the other side Dion Chrysostom ἀγαθὴ ἔθος, of custom, comprehends the Law of Nature under that stile) and instances in that place where St. Paul tells the Ephesians, c. 2. 3. that they had been by nature the Children of wrath, where (as υἱοὶ ὀργῆς children of wrath signifies peculiarly Gentiles, so) the prime if not only intent of that adjunct φύσει is (as many circumstances in the context will convince) that they were such Idolatrous Gentiles either φύσει by birth, (born such Gentile worshippers ὡς καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ as the rest also of the Heathen World was) or else φύσει by custom, by long popular habit of education, or (which will unite both those senses and more fully express the word φύσις from φύω) by a long habit deduced from their very first being or birth, and so continuing till the time of their conversion; customary Idolaters, working κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου according to the age or vicious custom of the Heathen World, v. 2. and the practices of the υἱοὶ ἀπειθείας infidels or unbelievers. So when the Apostle saith of the Gentiles, that παρὰ φύσιν, beside beſide nature, they were grafted into a fair Olive tree, being but a wild Olive themſelves, Rom. 11. 24. he ſure means by [nature] the cuſtom of the Jews, which they ſay by analogy with Lev. 19. 17. was extended to a prohibition of grafting one fruit-tree into another kind, or elſe he refers to the conſtant rules of gardening, never to graft an ill fruit upon a good ſtock. And ſo will the word be beſt rendered, when the ſame Apoſtle expoſtulates with the Corinthians 1 Cor. 11. and demands whether φύσις (we render nature) did not tell them, that it was a ſhame for a man κομᾶν, which we render to wear long hair, but I conceive, would more properly (according to the uſe of the word in the Greek Authors) be tranſlated to let the hair grow at length. If either of the Interpretations be accepted, then ſure φύσις muſt only ſignifie the cuſtom and faſhion of the place, or of the * generality of men, or elſe birth, as that containeth in it the diſtinction of Sexes, (as the word γένεσις near kin to φύσις, doth, Wiſd. 4. 26.) or in the mixt ſence, an univerſal continued cuſtom from their birth till then; and not nature in the ordinary acception, or as it ſignifies the law of nature written in our hearts. For then not only Abſolon's hair muſt be againſt nature, (which yet the Scripture charges not with that crime) but even the vow and practice of Samſon, and the Nazarites had been an unnatural ſin. A later Critick would have κομᾶν be taken for braying of hair, or making a dreſſing of it (which I confeſs the Apoſtles argument in that place, and the mention of περιβολαῖον, a covering, would perſwade) but then ſtill φύσις muſt ſignifie (though not only a local, yet) an univerſal cuſtom, ſuch as hath deſigned and fitted diſtinction of attires to diſtinction of ſexes, which it would be hard to impute to the dictate of nature in every man's heart, ſo that that ſhould be thought to define what attire is natural to a man, what to a woman, but is an act either of local cuſtom, συνήθεια, (which in this matter the Apoſtle appeals to, ver. 16. againſt all diſputers) or elſe of univerſal cuſtom of all nations, which he ſeems to plead in this place. But I conceive it without example in Authors ſacred, or Heathen, that κομᾶν ſhould ſignifie a dreſſing, (whatſoever κομάω and other words of ſome affinity may be thought to do.) I remember an eminent place to the contrary in Libanius, ſpeaking of Prometheus picture, with an horrid uncut beard, of which, ſaith he, σωφρονεῖ αὐτὰ ἡ πρὸς τὸ μετεῖναι κομᾶ. ἀεὶ ἐοικ. pag. 102. and that it noteth not a dreſſing, 'tis clear by that other expreſſion * there, κομὴ ἀνειμένη πρὸς ἀνέμους. The notion which at firſt I gave you, will ſatisfie all pretenſions both of the Grammarian and the Textuary, that it ſignifie to let the hair grow at length without cutting or poling it; that will ſatisfie the Critick, for that is κομᾶν comam promittere, and to do ſo, there can be little reaſon aſſigned, unleſs it be in order to braiding it, or making a covering of it, on occaſion of which it is that the Apoſtle here ſaith, that it is an honourable or decent thing for a woman to do ſo, ver. 15. (and the contrary for a man) and not to do ſo is all one for her, as to be ſhorn or ſhaven, ver. 5, & 6. and ſo that ſatisfies the Textuary alſo.

* So in the Digeſts de ſtat. hom. L. Lex noſtra, that which was but the Law of many nations, viz. ut qui naſcitur ſine legitimo matrimonio matrem ſequatur (which though it held among the Græcians and Romans, yet did not among other nations, Grot. de Jur. Bell. l. 5. c. 29. viz. in partu ſervili) is called Lex naturæ.

* Pag. 110.

But this by the way; From this acception of the word הבל vanity, for idols, it is that Rom. 1. 21. St. Paul ſaith of the Heathen, that ἐματαιώθησαν they became vain, i. e. fell to thoſe impious idol-worſhips: and ſo Rom. 8. 20. where 'tis ſaid of ἡ κτίσις the creature, or creation, i. e. the whole Gentile world (which v. 19. is ſaid to have waited for the Goſpel or Kingdom of Chriſt, and to grone, v. 22. and to be delivered from their ſervile cuſtom of beſtial ſins under the phraſe φθορᾶς corruption, v. 21.) that ὑπετάγη τῇ ματαιότητι, it was ſubjected to vanity, the plain meaning is, that thoſe idolatrous cuſtoms reigned amongſt them.

Thirdly, בְּעָלִים Loras or husbands (or, as we retain the Hebrew word in Engliſh, Baalim) 2 Chron. 17. 3. Jer. 9. 14. is rendred in the Greek again εἴδωλα, idols, and ſo clearly ſignifies thoſe other heathen deities taken into a rivalry with the God of Heaven. Sect. 8.

Fourthly, חמנים; we render it the Sun images in the margent, Iſ. 17. 8. but whoſoever conſiders the places, and Ezec. 6. 4. will acknowledge that it ſignifies (not the images, but) the places of worſhip of חמה i. e. the Sun, called by the Greeks πυρεῖα & πυρθεῖα, the places where the ſacred fires were made in honour to the Sun, and the word is therefore by the Targum rendred, Iſ. 17. 8. חנסנסיא delubra, temples, (a deſcription of which is given us by Benjamin in his Itinerary, and by ſome of the Rabbines affirmed to have been firſt of a religious inſtitution to God in the thankſgiving for that glorious creature) theſe I ſay are once rendred εἴδωλα, idols, Iſa. 27. 9. but in other places, ναοὺς, temples, &c. Sect. 9.

Fifthly, the word עלל (far enough naturally from any ſuch ſignification) is rendred Ez. 36. 18. εἴδωλα, idols, and our Engliſh from thence have continued that rendring [their idols] where yet I conceive the Hebrew ſhould be tranſlated [their actions or inventions] (the word properly denoting any good or evil work or enterprize) and the Greek rendring may poſſibly have been a miſtake of the Hebrew עלל for גלל (from which before he had גלול for idols) and then 'twill be the ſame in our Engliſh alſo. Sect. 10.

Sixthly, the word עצב that ſignifies any cauſe of grief, of toil, of frightful paſſion, is often rendred εἴδωλον, noting again their heathen Gods, which uſed their Clients exceeding ill, the δαίμονες, dæmons, the fear and dread of whom produced the Greek word which we render Superſtition. And near of kin unto that, is a ſeventh מפלצת which once is rendred εἴδωλον alſo, and from the origination of the word is juſtly rendred [horrors] in our Margent, 2 Chron. 15. 16. Sect. 11.

Once more, the word תרפים Teraphim, thoſe which Rachel ſtole from Laban, are rendred εἴδωλα, idols alſo, and ſeem to have been ſome images (τύποι θεῶν, ſaith Joſephus, images of his Gods) but as others gheſs, images ſet to a certain poſition of the Stars, with the figures of the Planets upon them, according to the cuſtom of the Syrians then, by which they were wont to divine; not any thing like the Cup, whereby, ſay the Egyptians of Joſeph, he divineth, for that I conceive was but a drinking Cup, wherein he uſed to drink in thoſe ſacrifices by which he prepared to receive preſages from God (and therefore I ſhould render thoſe words Geneſ. 44. 5. [with which he receiveth preſages) but Aſtrological inſtruments, with pictures of Stars upon them, which ſome conceive to have been ſo made, that they were able to ſpeak ſometimes, and then they will differ but little from the Sun-Idols even now mentioned, for thoſe they ſay, by the operation of the fire, became vocal. Sect. 12.

This ſo particular wearisome trouble have I given the Reader at the entrance, to give him occaſion of obſerving that the word εἴδωλον, idol, though it ſignifie an image, or ſculpture, or repreſenta- Sect. 13.

tion ſometimes, yet it ſignifies ſomewhat elſe beſides that, particularly theſe two things, 1. the Heathen Gods under the notion of falſe (together with the Temples wherein they were worſhipped.) 2. The ſame again, and their worſhip under the notions of filthy, unclean, and abominable. Which two notions of the word (that we may proceed a ſtep farther) we ſhall now look on, as they were in order to worſhip, and that will open to us ſome entrance to a view of Idolatry, or the worſhip of idols what it is.

Sect. 14. For the former, the worſhipping of falſe Gods, and images, I ſhall give you a brief narration of it out of the ſobereſt of the Jewiſh writers, Maimonides l. 1. de Idololatriâ.

The firſt riſe of Idolatry is, ſaith he, to be referred to the days of Enoſh, when men (taking notice how God had created the Stars and Spheres for the government of the World, and by placing them in ſo eminent a ſtate ſeemed to make them partakers of his honour, and uſed them as his Miniſters and Officers) reſolved it their duty to laud, and extol, and honour them, and taught others that this was the will of God, that we ſhould magnify and worſhip thoſe whom he had preferred and dignified (as a King would have his Miniſters honoured) and that that is the honouring of God. Upon this foundation, ſaith he, they began to build Temples to the Stars, to ſacrifice to them, bow themſelves before them, that by ſo doing they might obtain Gods favour, and this was the ground of Idolatry, not that they thought there was no God but the Stars, but that they thought this worſhip performed to them to be the will of God. In proceſs of time falſe Prophets aroſe, pretending meſſages from God, and directions for the worſhipping of ſuch or ſuch a Star, nay for the ſacrificing to all the hoſt of them, building them Temples, making Pictures of them that might be adored by Women, Children, and all others; and to that purpoſe they invented certain figures, affirming them to be revealed to them by prophecy, to be the images of ſuch Stars. Thereupon men began to make images in Temples, under Trees, on the top of Hills, and all men to meet, and worſhip them, reſolving and proclaiming that from thoſe images all good and evil did proceed, and therefore in all reaſon they were to be fear'd and worſhipt, the Prieſts promiſing all increaſe and proſperity as the reward of this worſhip, and preſcribing of rules for the performance of it. After theſe, other impoſtors roſe, that affirmed ſuch a Star, or Sphere, or Angel, to have ſpoken to them, and preſcribed their way and manner of worſhip; in ſum, 'twas generally ſpread over the World, that images were to be worſhipt, each by a peculiar manner of ſacrifice, and adoration, and the Name of God was quite loſt out of the mouth and minds of all men; ſo far as not to be acknowledg'd by them, but all ſorts of people worſhipt nothing but images of wood and ſtone, built Temples on purpoſe for them, adored and ſware by their name, and even the Prieſts and wiſe men among them thought that there was no other God but thoſe Stars, &c. for whoſe ſakes theſe images were made. As for the great God of this World no mortal knew him, ſave only Henoch, Methuſalek, Noah, Sem, and Heber, and ſo it continued, till Abraham was born, the pillar of the World. Thus much Maimon. and much more by way of ſtory and obſervation. And what is thus by him obſerved of the Heavens, is by Iſtiæus Mileſius in Euſeb. Chron. l. 1. p. 131. deduced as clearly for the idolizing of Kings and great perſons, Thus; Of the line of Japhet was born Serug ὅτις πρῶτος ἤρξατο τῶν Ἑλλήνισμῶ, καὶ τῷ δόγματι τῆς εἰδωλολατρείας, who began the Gentile Idol-worſhip: Αὐτὸς γὰρ, &c. For he and they that were with him did with ſtatues of Pillars honour thoſe which had antiently been Warriers or Captains, or that did any vertuous or valiant act in their lives, worth the commemorating, and worſhipped and ſacrified to them as Gods. After them others ariſing, and not knowing their Predeceſſors intention, viz. that they honour'd them as their Anceſtors, and inventors of good things, with memorials only, they worſhipt them as Gods of Heaven, and ſacrificed to them. (Where yet I ſee not how it can be ſaid that they honour'd them μνημαῖς μόναις, with memorials only, when before he had ſaid, ὡς θεὸς προσεκύνουν καὶ ἐθυσίαζον αὐτοῖς. I ſhould rather gueſs, that in Scaligers Edition of thoſe fragments there is an οὐκ left out in thoſe words, and that it ſhould be thus, that Zerug — οὐχ ὡς θεὸς προσεκύνουν — did not worſhip them as Gods, as their followers did.) And this was their form of making Gods of them. After their deaths they put their names in the Books of their Prieſts, and ſolemnized a feaſt to them at a ſet time, ſaying that their ſouls were gone to the fortunate Iſlands, &c. And this, ſaith he, remain'd till the time of Terah the Father of Abraham. Of theſe St. Chryſoſtom ſpeaks under the title of ἄνθρωποι ὑπὸ ἀξίαν θαυμαζόμενοι, men admired by their flatterers; which beſides the teſtimony of Wiſd. 14. 17. and Ariſtotle Met. 1. (where he ſhews how admiration of great men and benefactors hath been the great principle of idolatry or men-worſhip) is every where obſervable in the ſtory of the Roman Cæſars, no man dying without an ἀποθέωσις, or being made a God; and then conſtantly the ſetting up of their ſtatues in their Temples, following as an Attendant of it.

Sect. 15. Many Stages you ſee in this accurſed progreſs of idol-worſhip, before they came to images, and that laſt ſo prodigious a pitch, ſuch a diſhonouring of the deity, that the Pſalmiſt could not ſay any thing more reproachful of the makers of them, and truſters in them, than that they were ἰσόθεοι, like or equal to their God.

Sect. 16. To this purpoſe there are three notable paſſages which I ſhall but mention, and leave to be view'd at large; the one Iſai. 44. 13. to the twentieth verſe; and the other Wiſd. 13. 11. and ſo to the end of that Chapter; the third, in the Epiſtle of Jeremy; ſhewing the ridiculous progreſs of a knotty piece of wood into a ſolemn deity, and the irrational ſenceleſneſs of that worſhip, even in the judgment of Heathens themſelves, witneſs Heraclitus, Ὅμοια, ὡς εἴ τις τοῖς δόμοις λεσχηνεύοιτο, ποιοῦσιν οἱ προσίοντες οὐ θεοῖς τοῖς ἀψύχοις, praying to inanimate things is like talking to Houſes. And yet this madneſs the conſtant diſeaſe of thoſe that had ſet up any other deity but that of the only true God of Heaven, that ever adored any creature, παρὰ τὸν κτίσαντα, Rom. 1. (not only more, as we render it, but) beſides or except the Creatour: There being no ſtay for thoſe (that became thus vain to worſhip any thing but God) no ſtop in their tumbling (as Maimon. phraſes it) to that deep gulf of impiety, the worſhip of the moſt inanimate mean creatures in the world.

Sect. 17. To this purpoſe there is another memorable paſſage in an heathen Tragedian in Stobæus, who having poſitively pronounced that there is but * only one God that made all the world, mentions the making and worſhipping of, and ſacrificing to images as that which men through the errour of their heart have miſtaken for piety, and made uſe of them for the ſolaces of any evils that befal them in this life.

* Εἷς ταῖς ἀληθείαισιν ἐξ ὄντων θεὸς Ὃς οὐρανὸν τ' ἔτευξε, γαῖαν μακράν, Πόντου τε χαροπὸν εἶδμα κατέμων βίαι. Θνητοῖτε πολλοὶ καρδίαν πλανώμενοι Ἰδρυσάμεσθα πημάτων παραψυχὰς Θεῶν ἀγάλματ' ἐκ λίθων ἢ χαλκέων Ἢ χρυσοδίκτων, ἢ ἐλεφαντίνων τύπους Θυσίας τε τούτοις καὶ κλῆσις πανηγύρεις Τελοῦντες ὕπως εὐσεβῆν νομίζομεν.

The

The truth is, Maximus Tyrius gives a yet more favourable ingenious account of this matter, Διαλ. λθ. That as letters were invented for the expreſſing of words, (that ſo by the help of writing, the weakneſs of mens memories might be repaired) ſo the images of the Gods were provided to help the infirmities of men, in which they may lay up the names of their Gods, καὶ τὰς φημὰς αὐτῶν, and the famous things that are worth remembring of them, and in brief to help them to celebrate their Gods as they ought, as ſo many ὑπομνήσεις καὶ ἀναγωγίαι εἰς ἀνάμνησιν, helps, and manuductions for remembrance, and σύμβολα τῆς τῶν θεῶν τιμῆς, ſigns and tokens of their honouring them, Trophees as it were of their Noble acts to perpetuate the memory of them. So that although, as he acknowledges, God be inviſible to eyes, yet in reſpect of our infirmity, and again of the nature of Lovers to love to behold their pictures whom they love, it will not be amiſs to uſe any thing that may thus bring us in mind of God; and all this with a caution, that nothing be terminated in the picture, but the love, and remembrance, and every thing beſtowed upon God only. This is a piece of Heathen divinity very handſomely managed, being indeed no pretence of plea for the worſhipping of Images, but only the uſing them as helps to perform our duty to God; But 'tis no news to ſee the actions of the many, and the writings of the few very unlike one the other, (it being very eaſie to write vertuouſly, and hard to live ſo.) And certainly the Heathen practice was quite another thing than this Platonick ſpeculation. And ſo much of the firſt notion of an Idol. Sect. 18.

Now for the other notion of an Idol, as it ſignifies filthy or abominable, it will be worth obſerving, what the Author of the Book of Wiſd. ſaith of it in univerſum. Wiſd. 14. where after an enumeration of many other wickedneſſes in their τελεταὶ and κρύφια μυστήρια, v. 23. in their inhumane ſacrifices and ſecret myſteries (ſuch were the Cereris arcanum ſacrum, in Horace, ſecreta Cereris, in Seneca, Herc. Fur. and Cadmais orgia condita ciſtis, in the Tragœd. Oetæus; and alſo their ἐμμανεῖς κῶμοι, i. e. amorous night-meetings (as the Scholiaſt on Theocritus explains that word, Κωμάζειν λέγεται ἐπὶ τῶν νύκτα εἰς τὰς ἐρωμένας ἀπερχομένων, he concludes with μίασμα, γνώσεως ἐναλλαγὴ, γάμων ἀταξία, μοιχεία καὶ ἀσέλγεια, pollution, inverſion of nature, diſorder of marriage, adultery, and ſhameleſs uncleanneſs, v. 26. and at length concludes that the worſhip of the nameleſs Idols, or thoſe not to be named, is the beginning and cauſe and end of all evil; all the villanies in the world the deſign and ſpecial parts of thoſe worſhips. And ſo Jer. 44. 19. by the Ægyptians juſtifying themſelves to Jeremy, that they did no harm in their ſacrifices to the Queen of Heaven, becauſe they did it not ſecretly without the privity of their Husbands, 'tis clear that there were ſuch private night-ſacrifices uſed by the women, and ſuſpected, and diſliked by the Husbands. Sect. 19.

To that purpoſe that I may not lead my Reader into the Heathen ſtories, or the relations made by the Fathers in thoſe acts which they wrote againſt the Gentiles, (that excellent * ſet of Books, which may ſerve any ſtudent for the Iſthmus, or μεσθεῖον, or paſſage between the ſtudy of humane and divine learning) I ſhall only point to ſome paſſages in the ſacred writ that look this way, 1 Kings 14. 24. after the mention of the Idols and Groves follows that there were Sodomites in the Land, doing according to the abomination of the Heathen, which the Lord had caſt out before the Children of Iſrael; which gives you moreover a view of the particularity of the ſin of the Amorites and other Nations, which provoked God to that fatal ſlaughter, and eradication of them, which is more fully ſet down Lev. 18. 24, 25, 27, 28. and an expreſs threat added from Heaven verſ. 29. that whoſoever ſhall commit any of theſe abominations ſhall be cut off from among their people. Sect. 20.

And perhaps it will not be unworthy a digreſſion here to mark, that at the rooting out of thoſe Nations, and the planting in of the Jews in their ſtead, by way of Covenant, (the condition of that Covenant being that they ſhould fear the Lord, and not walk in the ways of thoſe Nations) the ſign or ſeal of that Covenant was deſigned to be ſuch as had a particular reference to theſe ſins of the fleſh, σύμβολον ἡδονῶν ἐκτομῆς, ſaith Philo, a ſign of the exciſion of pleaſures, and denoted the amputation of the περιττὰς κακίας ſuperfluity of naughtineſs, which had been practiſed among thoſe Gentiles, and which would infallibly bring as certain exciſion upon them, (if they reformed it not) as was threatned by God to every male Iſraelite, that ſhould continue uncircumciſed. To the ſame purpoſe were all thoſe laws and rites concerning legal pollutions, to bring them to the greateſt alienation of mind, and deteſtation of this piece of Heatheniſm; Yea and one main part of the promiſe of God upon their obedience, viz. the multiplying of their ſeed, (which was ſo remarkable in that Nation, that Joſephus mentions τεκνοποιητικὴ as the craft, as it were, and ſpecial peculiar excellency of that people) was a moſt natural proper effect of the abſtaining from thoſe ſins; and it is as clear that in our Chriſtian Sacrament of Initiation, the ἀπόθεσις ῥύπου σαρκὸς, the waſhing away the ſordes of the fleſh, had a propriety alſo to that, (which is accordingly mentioned in the vow of Baptiſm, the forſaking of all the ſinful luſts thereof.) But this by the way. Sect. 21.

So again cap. 15. 12. the Idols and the Sodomites are mentioned together, and 2 Kings 23. 7. the houſes of the Sodomites are caſt down; where there is alſo mention of the groves for thoſe dark purpoſes, by which under that name of אשרות Aſtarte ſeems to be deſigned. So when the Babylonians made Succoth Benoth, what is meant thereby but the Tents of Venus, in which all the Virgins were ſolemnly proſtituted to the honour of that falſe deity Venus under the title of Mylitta? and ſo the proſtitution of their daughters for the honour of their Gods, which is mentioned not only by Herod. l. 1. and Strabo l. 16. but in the Epiſtle of Jeremy verſ. 43. where as the ἐμμώσαι πέπλους (from the Hebr. פתורה apertura) hath an unclean notation in it, ſo the cords mentioned are undoubtedly the ſigns of their unclean vows, and obligation (from thence) to pay that ſacrifice before they went. So Iſa. 57. 5. Inflaming, or, you that inflame your ſelves with Idols under every green tree] noting that proſtitution of men and women in the Groves about their Idol-temples in honour of their falſe Gods. So 1 Mac. 5. 43. the temple, that was at Carnaim, is expreſt 2 Mac. 12. 26. to be the temple of Venus, for ſo Ἀτεργάτειον ſignifies אדרעתא or Ἀτεργάτις being by the addition of but an א, all one with דרעתא or Δερκετὼ, and with אדרעא Athara in Strabo l. 16. i. e. ורעתא or ὁ σπείρουσα, the expreſſion of, and title for Venus, and 2 Mac. 6. 4. when the heathens profaned the temple of God, and transformed it into their Gentile worſhips, the firſt thing that is mentioned is their ἀσωτία and κωμοὶ, luxury and unclean meetings, Sect. 22.

ings, ῥᾳθυμούντων μεθ' ἑταιρῶν καὶ ἐν ἱεροῖς ἐκβόλοις γυναιξὶ πλησιαζόντων, &c. committing all filthineſs in the very porches and precincts of the Temple; which it ſeems the Jews themſelves had once been guilty of, I cannot ſay by any imitation of the Gentiles, or from any other incentive but of their own vile riotous luſts. And to inſtance in no more, it ſeems not improbable upon theſe grounds, that the frequent expreſſions of the Idolatrous practices of the Jews by fornication, whoring, and the like, may be ſomewhat more than a trope, or figure of Rhetorick, having thus much of reality in it alſo: Philo calling the πάθη τῆ ἡδονῆς the ſenſual inordinate pleaſures εἴδωλα idols; and it being clear that their falling off to the Heathen Idols brought them oft to theſe Heathen ſins alſo; as in the matter of Baal-Peor 'tis moſt evident. So Rom. 1.26. 'tis affirmed of the Gentiles that as a puniſhment of thoſe Idol-Heathen worſhips God gave them up εἰς πάθη ἀτιμίας, to diſhonourable infamous affections, and a particular account of them is ſet down, verſ. 26. women changing the natural uſe, &c. and likewiſe men alſo ἀσχημοσύνην κατεργαζόμενοι, verſ. 27. and ποιεῖν τὰ μὴ καθήκοντα, verſ. 28. guilty of thoſe moſt reproachful ſhames and contumelies of nature. Of which there was abundant ſtore in the Eleuſinia ſacra, Cybeles myſteries, Venus, and Flora's feaſts, and even in the Luſtrations among the Romans (of which the Sibylline Oracle ſpeaking Ἄρσεν δ' ἄρσενι πλησιάσει, σήσυσί τε παῖδας Αἰσχεῖς ἐν τίγεσι. l. 3. p. 231.) and generally in their Idol-worſhips; and therefore in thoſe Oracles, p. 264. ſpeaking of the Chriſtians giving over Idolatry —— ὧδ' ἔργ' ἀνθρώπων χρύσεα —— 'tis added immediately, Κοὐδὲ πρὸς ἀρσενικὰς παῖδας μίγνυνται ἀνάγνως. Ὅσσατε Φοινίκες —— naming all the ſeveral nations of the heathen world that were guilty of it, and p. 279. exhorting againſt Idolatry, φεύγετε λατρείας ἀθέμιτος, πῶ ζῶντι λάτρευε, μοιχείαν περφυλάξω, καὶ ἄκεπον ἄρσενα ἰυνὸν. and l. 4. p. 287. the true piety is ſet in oppoſition, as to Idol-worſhip, ſo to ἀλλοτείης κοίτης πίθον ἄισχρον, and ἄρσενα ὕβριν ἀπέχθης τε συγερὴ τε. and ſo p. 296. and 315. μοιχείαι παρὰ σοὶ καὶ παίδων μίξις ἄθεμις. of the Romans, and ſo p. 332. from which it will not be tollerable to repeat them.

Sect. 23. By this ungrateful unſavoury obſervation it will be poſſible to contribute ſomewhat to the illuſtrating of many places in the New Teſtament, and particularly of the notion of Idolatry there, (for which advantage it is that this Diſcourſe hath thus enlarged it ſelf.) As firſt Eph. 4. 19. where ſpeaking of the Gentiles, he ſaith ὅτινες ἀπηλγηκότες (i. e. in Heſychius's Gloſſary) who giving over all labour, (as idleneſs is the mother ſin of the Sodomites) gave themſelves up to laſciviouſneſs, to work all uncleanneſs ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ, we render it, [with greedineſs] the word is interpreted Covetouſneſs in other places, but ſignifies not only that, but all immoderate, and peculiarly inordinate unnatural deſire, not only counting of wealth, I ſay, but in Ariſtotle any thing, that is oppoſed ἰσότητι to equality, when any man will have (πλέον ἔξει) above his portion. So in Heſychius πλεονεξία τὸ πλέον τῆ δίκης ἐκ τινὸς λαμβάνειν, to denote the [more than is due or ought to be] whatſoever the ſubject matter be. So in Lucian de calumn. pag. 844. the Calumniator is deſcribed to be one that will have all his auditors to himſelf, will let no man elſe be heard, and for this he calls him πλεονεκτὴν; and ſo Democrates in his γνωμ. defines πλεονεξία to be a ſpeaking all, and not enduring to hear any body elſe: and in Themiſtius's Paraphraſe of the firſt Book de Anima, * πλεονεκτεῖν is taken for any kind of exceeding, and in Alex. Aphrod. δὲ Ἐιμαρμ. σωματικὰ πλεονεκτήματα wherein beaſts exceed men, and φυσικὴ πλεονεξία of men above beaſts. And the notion that I now ſpeak of, applied to inordinate luſt, though it differ in the object, is the ſame in effect with this, a deſiring and uſurping that which is not agreeable to his condition, ſex, nature, &c. and of that we have a Grammatical ground in the Hebrew word בצע which ſignifies covetouſneſs and luſt, and being oft rendred πλεονεξία is once rendred μίασμῶ pollution, Eze. 33. 31. where though our Engliſh read covetouſneſs, yet the ſence directs otherwiſe, even to that which v. 29. is expreſt by abominations. Thus in an ancient Prayer of Ephraim Syrus, λεγομένη ὑπὲς ἐξομολόγησιν, appointed for Confeſſion of ſins, and the ſin chiefly inſiſted on being that of uncleanneſs (as may appear by ἐμὲ τὸν ἀισχῆ τὸν φλυαρὸν καὶ μιαίνοντα τὸν ἀυτὸν ἀέρα ὑπὸ τῆ ἀισχρῶν καὶ ἀτόπων ἔργων μῦ, τὸν μιαίνοντα τὸν ναὸν τῆ σώματός μυ — ἀτίμοις καὶ πονηρῆς φιληδονίας μῦ, πᾶν μέλος μῦ ἐμίανε ἔφθειρε ——) he prays — ὅπως ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις μῦ, ταῖς ἀδικίαις, ταῖς πλεονεξίαις, ταῖς μοιχείαις, ταῖς πορνείαις, ταῖς ἀισχρολογίαις —— where if we may judge by the company, πλεονεξίαι are taken in this ſence. In this ſence I conceive Plato uſed the word, de Rep. l. 9. where ſpeaking of ſenſual men he compares them to the beaſts χορταζόμενοι καὶ ὀχεύοντες, full fed, and laſcivious, and farther adds, ἕνεκα τῶν τούτων πλεονεξίας κυείσκοντες καὶ τίκτοντες —— where the πλεονεξία τούτων muſt refer to the fulneſs of luſt and fleſh together. Or if you will needs have the notion of Covetouſneſs continued, yet I conceive the company that the word is ſo often found in, will have ſuch an influence on it, that it ſhall belong to that ἀισχροκερδία, getting wealth by theſe unclean proſtitutions, which ſure is expreſt by the Author of the Sibyllin Oracles l. 3. p. 231. where immediately after the mention of thoſe impurities is ſubjoined Ἀισχροβίῳ φιλοχρημοσύνῃ, κακοκερδεῖ πλούτῳ. But for the uſe of the word diſtinctly for this ſin of unnatural luſt I ſhall mention one plain place in an ancient Apoſtolical writing, the Epiſtle of Barnabas, Edit. Voſſ. p. 231. where giving the reaſon why hares were forbidden under the Law, intimating that we ſhould not be παιδοφθόροι like them, he adds ὅτι ὁ λαγὼς καθ' ἑαυτὸν πλεονεκτεῖ τὸν ἀφόδευσιν. Of this I ſhould not thus define, were not many places of the New Teſtament eminently applyable to this ſence, nor thus far extravagate on this word, did it not much tend to the explaining and aſſerting the New Teſtament notion of Idolatry, that now we are upon.

* πᾶσαν γνῶσιν, τιμίαν δὲ πλεονεκτεῖν δὲ ἑτέραν ἑτέρας.

Sect. 24. In that Rom. 1. 29. you have together in this matter πορνεία, πονηρία, πλεονεξία, κακία, fornication, villany, (not covetouſneſs again, but) inordinate deſire and naughtineſs, πονηρία and κακία in the ſame notion that Gen. 19. 7. and 9. πονηρεύεσθαι and κακῶσαι are taken, i. e. to ſignifie that ſin of Sodom there deſcribed; and ſo πορνεία and πλεονεξία in the ſame ſence alſo: and yet more evidently, Col. 3. 5. where ſpeaking of the Gentile unbelievers, among their deeds that a Chriſtian is ſo carefully to avoid, the Apoſtle mentions fornication, uncleanneſs, πάθος (I conceive, in Salvians phraſe, and as the Syriack there renders it) paſſivity, evil concupiſcence, and πλεονεξία, ſure inordinate deſire again which is Idolatry; and this ſeems to me to have been acknowledged by Saint Cyprian (who Ep. 52. will have [ἅτις, which] refer to each of thoſe foregoing names) the interpretation of that heathen worſhip of theirs, for which the wrath of God cometh on the children of diſobedience it ſeems again this was the ſin that brought that fatal deſtruction upon them) ἐν οἷς, in which ſins the Coloſſians had ſometimes walked, when they lived ἐν αὐτοῖς, among the Gentiles. So Eph. 5. 3. let neither fornication, nor uncleanneſs, or πλεονεξία, inordinate deſire to be named among you, (thoſe nefanda, ſins not to be named) as becomes Saints, as they are oppoſed to Gentiles again. And ſo v. 5. Every fornicator, and unclean perſon, and πλεονέκτης, (not covetous, but) inordinate luſter who is an Idolater. To this may be referred that of Maimonides, More Neb. l. 3. *c.*38. where ſpeaking of the unnatural ſins uſed by the Gentiles, and having named one abominable cuſtom of theirs, propter hoc, ſaith he, prohibita eſt inciſio arboris in aliam ſpeciem, ut elongemur à cauſis Idololatriæ & fornicationum.

This may poſſibly be the notation of Idolaters alſo, when the Apoſtle ſaith, 1 Cor. 10. 6. Be not ye Idolaters, as were ſome of them, as it is written, they ſate down to eat and drink and roſe up to play. For the Greek παίζειν, which we render to play, may poſſibly refer in that place to thoſe ſins of uncleanneſs. So Gen. 21. 9. the Targum of Jeruſalem renders Iſmaels mocking, by filium Ægyptiæ facientem opera mala, quæ fieri non oportuit, illudentem, & peregrinum cultum exercentem, the ſon of the Ægyptian doing evil works which ought not to be done (the ἄθεσμα 2 Pet. 2 7. and ἀθέμιτα, 1 Pet. 4. 3.) mocking, and exerciſing ſtrange worſhip. So R. Samuel mentions an interpretation, that Iſmael had committed uncleanneſs, and that that is the meaning of the Hebrew צחק to mock, and Lyra on Gen. 21. ſaith that the Hebrew word is equivocal, and ſignifies ludentem, Idololatrantem, occidentem, & coeuntem vel laſcivientem, playing, committing idolatry, committing uncleanneſs, wantonneſs, &c. So it is clear that ἐμπαίζειν doth Gen. 39. 14, and 17. which we there render [mock] and though παίζειν do not, the word there uſed, yet the Hebrew צחק ſignifies both, and is the word uſed both in that place of Geneſis, and Exod. 32. 6. from whence our Apoſtle cites it; and if comparing the ſtory Acts 7. 41. where 'tis ſaid in this matter, ἐυφραίνοντο, they rejoiced in the works of their hands) be apt to perſwade any, that παίζειν to play, is all one with ἐυφραίνεσθαι to rejoice, and ſo that both denote their dancing before their Idol, it will be as obvious to reply that ἐυφραίνεσθαι there uſed, ſignifies moſt properly the rejoycing at a feaſt, Luke 12. 19. and 15. 23, 24, 29, 32. and 16. 19. and ſo following the offering of ſacrifice to their Idol, ſhall denote a ſacrifical feaſt, and be all one with the eating and drinking here, but yet with the playing that attends it: and ſo ſtill the παίζειν may probably be thus interpreted; eſpecially when in this place it follows immediately after ἐπεθυμηταὶ κακῶν luſters after evil things, (in the notion that κακῶς ζῶ is uſed by Phavorinus in 'Ασελγὴ, that is, for this very ſin) and is attended with μήδε πορευώμεν, neither let us commit fornication, &c. and from thence perhaps it is that ver. 14. to his exhortation of flying from Idolatry, he ſubjoins, v. 15. I ſpeak to wiſe men, judge what I ſay; not willing to add more words on that ſubject. This is but a conjecture of which I am not over confident, and yet will receive farther confirmation by Saint Hieroms tranſlation of Tobit, c. 3. 18. where Anna to ſhew her ſelf free from all uncleanneſs, ἀπὸ πάσης ἁμαρτίας ἀνδρὸς ver. 17. adds, nunquam cum ludentibus miſcui me, where it ſeems uncleanneſſes are meant, and 'tis probable that the Greek which he tranſlateth was παιζόντων, though our Greek Copies wholly leave out that part of the period. But no queſtion this is the meaning of ἀθέμιτοι εἰδωλολατρείαι, the abominable nefarious Idolatries, 1 Pet. 4. 3. as will appear by the ἀσελγείαι juſt before, i. e. the τὰ παρὰ φύσιν, unnatural acts of uncleanneſs, in Phavorinus, and the ἀνάχυσις ἀσωτίας, ver. 4. confuſion of ſexes, and all kind of ἀρρητοποιΐα, as thoſe words denote, if this were a place to explain them; of the fruitleſs works of darkneſs, whereof Chriſtianity made them aſhamed; of the κρυφῇ γινόμενα, thoſe things that were done in ſecret, and ἃ λέγειν αἰσχρὸν, which 'twas a ſhame to name or ſpeak out: to which you may add, 1 Theſſ. 4. 3. this is the will of God, ὁ ἁγιασμὸς ὑμῶν, your purification, conſiſting, as it follows, in abſtaining from fornication, &c. and after ἐν ἁγιασμῷ καὶ τιμῇ, in purification and honour (as that is oppoſed to ἀτιμία, diſhonourableneſs, vileneſs, Rom. 1. 26.) not in the luſt of concupiſcence, as the Gentiles, &c. To which purpoſe 'tis the conceit of ſome learned men, that that which follows muſt be applied, τὸ μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν καὶ πλεονεκτεῖν ἐν τῷ πράγματι τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ, ver. 6. (though our Engliſh reading look quite another way) for ſo the context will enforce, v. 7. for God hath not called us, ἐπὶ ἀκαθαρσίᾳ, for uncleanneſs, but ἐν ἁγιασμῷ, to or in purification. And ſo every of thoſe words will bear, if 'twere now ſeaſonable to inſiſt upon it. And it is obſervable that Iſa. 57. 8. where the Prophet ſpeaks to the [a] adulterous Apoſtate Iſrael [Thou haſt diſcovered thy ſelf to others beſide me, and art gone up, &c.] the Greek Tranſlators have uſed theſe words, ἐλογίσω ὅτι ἐὰν ἀποστῇς ἀπ' ἐμοῦ πλεῖον τι ἕξειν, &c. by ἀποστῇς ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, [departing from me] expreſſing [the diſcovering her ſelf to others beſide me] and by [b] πλεῖον ἕξειν [deſiring more] rendring [the going up] which may therefore ſeem to be ſet in that place (according to the Hebrew עלה conſcendit, aſcendit, tranſcendit) for [ὑπερβαίνειν] in the notion that we now ſpeak of, and then you ſee the ſympathy betwixt [c] ὑπερβαίνειν and πλεονεξία, according to the dialect and idiom of thoſe Writers.

[a] That that whole verſe belongs to that matter will appear, if you view it in the Original, Thus, תרחבת thou haſt been diſſolute (laxata es, dilatata) מכשב by thy lying with them (ſo 'tis rendred Num. 31. 17.) Thou haſt cut them, or made them Eunuchs for thy ſelf (ſo כרת which perhaps we miſtake for ברית Covenant, doth ſignifie, and ſo the Targum renders it וקצצת ſuccidiſti, detruncâſti) thou lovedſt to lye with them, &c. [b] So in Alex. Aphrod. his Scholia on Ariſt. de Anim. ὁ ἄδικος αὐτῷ πλέον τῶν ἡδέων νέμει, the unjuſt man allows himſelf more of pleaſant things i. e. exceeds in carnal delights. [c] So in the Sybillin Oracles is this ſin expreſt by ὑπερηφανίης ἀδικίαι, l. 3. p. 231. and the ſinners called ὑπερφίαλοι καὶ ἄναγνοι. p. 232. (the word ὑπερφίαλοι noting all immoderate deſires or attempts, πᾶν ὑπέρμετρον· φιάλη being a veſſel, and the filling of it above the brim, being noted by this word) and as it is immediately ſpecified, κλεψίγαμοι καὶ πάντα κακοί. So the ſin of Sodom is expreſt by ὑπερηφανία, Eccluſ. 16. 8. and verſe 9. they are ſaid to be ἐξηρμένοι (not as we render, taken away, nor as ſome Greek Copies, ἐξερχόμενοι, but) liſted up above all meaſure in their ſins which they committed, which ſure were theſe βδελύγματα abominable ſins, as is implyed, v. 8.

Sect. 25.

So 1 Cor. 5. 11. ἢ πόρνος, ἢ πλεονέκτης, ἢ εἰδωλολάτρης, either fornicator, or inordinate luſter, or idolater. Which cannot be applyed to the worſhip of Images, becauſe he there ſpeaks of Chriſtians in profeſſion at leaſt, who ſure did not then worſhip Images, but might be guilty more probably of thoſe carnal heathen uncleanneſſes, thoſe impurities ſo ſolemnly uſed in the idol-worſhips. In which place and the precedent verſe, under the general word πορνοὶ, fornicators, are ſpecified πορνοὶ κόσμου τούτου, the fornicators of this World, i. e. the Gentiles, πλεονέκται, ἅρπαγες, εἰδωλολάτραι; The inordinate luſters, and Idolaters again belong to that matter; and ſo 'tis more than poſſible may the ἅρπαγες too, which we render Extortioners, but may rather ſeem to ſignifie the ἁρπαγὴ γυναικῶν, or παρθένων, the rape or ſtealing of women, or virgins, the ἅλωσις, 2 Pet. 2. 12. preying on them (the literal notion of the word from ἁρπάζω, rapio, by which as by ἁλόω, the Hebrew טרף is rendred) and ſo I have obſerved the word to be uſed in

Sect. 26.

* ἐξαβίβλ· βιβ. 5. τιτ. ζ. τὰ τῦ ἅρπαγος οἰς δημόσιον εἰσκομίσονται. Raptoris bona publicanda esse. So in the Sibyll. Oracles written by some ancient Christian, l. 2. p. 172. with [Ἀρπάλιω πολιτεύοντες, ἀναιδείᾳ πεποίηντες, those that had put off all shame] are joyned Ἁρπακταῖοι, Ravishers, and p. 216. with [Λεκτεύλοποι ἀδιαλοιδόρητοι] and [Οἷς κακὸς ὢν στρογγὸν ἔνι μεμανήμενος ὄπασσε (which I conceive belongs to inordinate lusts) there is joyned Ἁρπάζοντες ἀναίδεια θυμὸν ἔχοντες] rapes and shameful lusts: and Στίβξυσι κρυφίοις, secret loves and adulteries, and a [θοὴν ἐπιβήσεται ὄλμῳ, the judgment of brimstone] the portion of Sodome for such sins, follows in the end of the Book.

Sect. 27. To this nothing can more clearly belong, than that mention of Idolaters, 1 Cor. 6. 9. being so joined on both sides with fornicators, adulterers, soft or effeminate, defilers of themselves with mankind. And what if the phrase ὁ βδελυσσόμενος τὰ εἴδωλα, Rom. 2. 22. do so also, thou that abhorrest Idols.] The word βδελύσσεσθαι, seems to refer to those (so frequently) called βδελύγματα, abominations; Whether (those of the Sidonians, and the like, i. e. whether) abominable sacrifices, killing, and offering their Sons and Daughters unto Devils, or abominable sorceries, Deut. 18. or abominable senseless stupidity, in worshipping inanimate Creatures, or abominable lusts in their idol-feasts, I shall not now define; but only observe, that if we should apply it peculiarly to the last of these (yet not excluding the rest) the rational importance of the place will bear it very well, Thou that dost detest and abominate those Heathen villanies of their Idol-worships, and canst not with patience endure that any degree of them should be brought into the house or worship of the true God, if thou shalt yet so far despise that place and him that dwelleth there, as to rob it of those things that are consecrated to it, surely thou wilt never be able to clear thy self.

Sect. 28. Having gone through so many, there are but few more mentions of these words [Idolater or Idolatry] in the New Testament; I shall briefly give you a view of them. Gal. 5. 20. Where of the works of the flesh, carnal sins, there are in the Front, Adultery, Fornication, Uncleanness, ἀσελγεία (that foul sin, which our Translation renders here, lasciviousness, but elsewhere shameless uncleanness, Wisd. 14. 26.) Idolatry, &c. all clearly of a making, if this notion of Idolatry be accepted. So Apoc. 21. 8. where among the eight severals, to which the Fire and Brimstone, old Sodom's lot, is apportion'd, you will find these five, unbelievers (a general word for Gentiles) ἐβδελυγμένοι, (we render it abominable, 'tis most probably in that place, and in that conjunction, those that have been guilty of those βδελύγματα, abominations, or bestial sins, as Apoc. 17. 4. you have βδελύγματα καὶ ἀκαθάρτητα τῆς πορνείας, the abominations, and uncleannesses of her fornication, and so ver. 5.) fornicators, and Idolaters, and all lyars, (i. e. I conceive all that are guilty of those false idolatrous worships) and so again cap. 22. 15. Fornicators, Idolaters, and every one that loveth and worketh a lie, (all those that delight in, and practise those false worships, which are called a lie, Rom. 1. 25.) and φαρμακοὶ, sorcerers in the front, either because that sin was so ordinarily joined to those other Heathen impieties, (as may appear by one eminent place, Deut. 18. from the ninth to the thirteenth verse) or upon a ground, which I shall have occasion to mention anon, of conjuring their Gods by magical ceremonies, (γοητείαις and φαρμακείαις) to adjoin themselves to the consecrated images. And all this under the title of the dogs that are without, i. e. the Gentile World of Idolaters. So in the Epistle of Barnabas, Edit. Voss. p. 252. in the bedroll of destroying sins, of which Idolatry is the first, these four make up the close, φαρμακία, μαγεία, πλεονεξία, ἀφοβία θεῦ, witchcraft, magick, inordinate lust (I conceive) and fearlessness of God.

Sect. 30. Thus in some Latine fragments of Polycarpus's Epistle, speaking of Valens a Presbyter of Philippi, and his having committed somewhat utterly unworthy of that calling (which is not there named, and perhaps by that may be rather ghessed at what it was) by his example he admonisheth others to abstain [ab avaritiâ] (that sure was in Greek, ἀπὸ πλεονεξίας) from inordinate desires, [& sint casti] and be chast. Adding, that whosoever did not thus abstain [ὁ μὴ ἀπεχόμενος πλεονεξίας] ab idololatriâ coinquinabitur, & tanquam inter Gentes judicabitur, will be contaminated by Idolatry, and shall be judg'd as among the Gentiles. And so I have little reason to doubt, but that when Bede on Matth. 5. 32. speaking of Divorce, saith Non hic intelligitur tantum fornicatio in stupro quod in alienis viris aut fœminis committitur, sed omnis concupiscentia, vel avaritia, vel Idololatria — he means by avaritia, unnatural lust, having no doubt translated that note, out of some Greek Commentator who had used πλεονεξία in this sence. And then this will be no place on which to build that strange new interpretation, that fornication, Mat. 5. may signify * actum cujuscunq; peccati, every kind of sin, when Christ forbids divorce save for fornication.

* Seld. Uxor Hebr. p. 556.

Sect. 31. I have now sufficiently importuned and tempted my Readers patience with these observations, which might be thought very extrinsecal to the matter in hand (especially as far as concerns the word πλεονεξία) but that they tend immediately (to which I designed them) to that third and main importance of the word [Idol] in the Old Testament; and more than so, to the explication of the word Idolatry (and by the way, of many difficult passages) in the New, so as to signifie those Heathen baseneses, that the Gnosticks had received, and were so diligent to infuse into the Christians, and is probably the thing from which the Apostle so dehorts his little children, i. e. his new born babes in Christ, or Gentile converts that they abstain or keep themselves from Idols, 1 John 5. 21. See 2 Pet. 2. which Chapter being read and weighed in the Original, will appear to be almost wholly spent on this matter. I will give the Reader a little light to it.

Sect. 32. There was it seems, a villanous sect of false Teachers, ready to creep in among those Christians, verse 1. bringing in αἱρέσεις ἀπωλείας Doctrines of destruction; you will ghess what that means, if you mark what some antient Copies set instead of that word which we render [destruction] when it returns again v. 2. For there the old Manuscripts that were sent to his Majesty from Constantinople, and an antient one in the Library of Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, have ἀσελγείαις wantonnesses, instead of ἀπωλείαις destructions. Our English reads damnable heresies in the first place, and pernicious ways in the second, but those are only general paraphrases which come not home particularly to the notation of the word; and therefore the margent of our Books, confessing that other reading renders it ver. 2. lascivious ways, in the sence that now we contend for. This is farther explained (which convinces the discourse to belong to this matter) by the sins of the old World, verse 5. and of Sodom peculiarly verse 6. and Saint Jude verse 7. repeating the same thing, that Epistle indeed being directly parallel to that second of St. Peter, and looking all to this purpose) saith of the Sodomites that they did ὅμοιον τούτοις τούτοις τρόπον ἐκπορνεύσαντες, fornicate juſt as theſe men do, i. e. go after other fleſh, which is a deſcription of theſe beſtial ſins of the Gnoſticks. Then by the ἀθέσμων ἐν ἀσελγείᾳ ἀναστροφὴ, ver. 7 the converſation of thoſe that obſerved no Laws in their laſciviouſneſs, ſuch as did ſo grieve righteous Lot in Sodom, by ἐπιθυμία μιασμοῦ luſt of pollution or abominable deſire ver. 10. by γεγεννημένα εἰς ἅλωσιν καὶ φθοράν, ver. 12. we render it [born to be taken and deſtroyed] but it ſignifies rather in the active ſence, that are made ad prædandum, to prey, (or catch and tear, ſo Job 24. 5. לטרף by the Greek rendred εἰς ἅλωσιν to catch, in the Chaldee paraphraſe riſing up early to their prey) and to [a] corrupt, i. e. good for nothing but to aſſault and debauch (as ravenous Beaſts do uſe to prey upon) all they meet with promiſcuouſly; and 'tis obſervable, that the word טרפה θηριάλωτα which properly ſignifies thoſe things which are taken and torn with wild Beaſts, (becauſe ſuch were not to be eaten [b] Leviticus 17. 15.) is by uſe enlarged to all forbidden meats among the Rabbins (if the lungs of any thing have a hole in them, they call it טרפה &c. ſaith [c] Elias Levita) and ſo by analogy is here made uſe of to denote thoſe unclean perſons debauched by the Gnoſticks, which are ſo to be accounted of among Chriſtians, as the cibus vetitus among the Jews, and therefore it follows, that thoſe that take pleaſure in that τρυφὴν, ſuch riotous actions as theſe, ver. 13. are call'd σπίλοι and μῶμοι from the Hebrew מום macula, ſpots and blemiſhes, (ſuch as among the Jews made the ſacrifice unclean) defilers and polluters of thoſe with whom they do συνευωχεῖσθαι feaſt or revel, in the end of that verſe. So 'tis again expreſt ver. 14. by having eyes full of the adultereſs, and that ceaſe not from ſin, intangling unſtable or unconfirmed Souls, i. e. new converted Chriſtians, having a heart γεγυμνασμένην πλεονεξίαις (in the ſence which before we gave of the word, and which belongs to it alſo ver. 3.) exerciſed with thoſe inordinate luſts, i. e. wholly imployed on them; which denominates them τέκνα κατάρας children of a curſe, i. e. worthy to have a curſe fall on them (as the Son of perdition, worthy to be deſtroyed.) And verſe 15. by the way of Balaam (who we know brought the Iſraelites to that ſin of uncleanneſs with the Moabitiſh women, and to the curſe by that means) by ὑπόδειγμα καταδίκης verſe 18. that high pitch of vanity, or falſe Idolatrous worſhip, as a ſnare to bring men to the ἐπιθυμίαις σαρκὸς, ἀσελγείαις, &c. luſts of the fleſh, laſciviouſneſs, &c. (with reference to the vitious Heathen [d] converſation) by a villanous licentiouſneſs, verſe 19. (ſtollen in under pretence of Chriſtian liberty, but being indeed the baſeſt [e] ſubmiſſion) and by μιάσματα τοῦ κόσμου, the pollutions of the Heathen World, i. e. of the Nations, or Gentiles, verſe 20. (which the knowledge of Chriſt was deſigned to turn out, but complying and mixing with it, was the vileſt, and moſt damning condition that could befal any, verſe 21, 22.) and at laſt by a κύλισμα βορβόρου the moſt ſwiniſh wallowing in the mire of all uncleanneſs. And if you would know who theſe unclean hereticks were, (which Chriſtianiz'd all the villanies of the old Idol-worſhips) referred to in this and other places of the Epiſtles, I ſhall not poſitively define, but leave it indifferently between the Gnoſticks, and the Nicolaitans, the Gnoſticks covertly [f] named 1 Tim. 6. 21. (it ſeems they were then a creeping in at Epheſus) and profeſtly diſclaimed at, Tit. 1. under the title of the Cretian evil beaſts, and ſlow bellies, verſe 12. and μεμιασμένοι polluted perſons verſe 15. and βδελυκτοὶ abominable, and ſuch as by their works deny the faith, verſe 16. and by the beginning of that 1 Tim. 6. as thoſe that taught doctrines againſt Dominion, and ſo are here alſo expreſt both 2 Pet. 2. 10. and Jude verſe 8.

For, that theſe (being called to ἁγιασμὸς purification, and not to uncleanneſs, i e. being by their converſion to Chriſtianity obliged to forſake thoſe carnal luſts) did abuſe the Grace of God (i. e. the light and mercies of the Goſpel) to wantonneſs, εἰς ἀσέλγειαν, Jude, verſe 4. (which that it belongs to this matter in hand will appear by the parallel aſſigned them verſe 7. and ſo almoſt all the following verſes of that Epiſtle) i. e. uſed it as an occaſion to commit, or protection to continue in ſuch ſins, that they were guilty of ſtrange prodigies of filthineſs, and retained in their Sacraments ſome Symbola of them, I had rather ſhould be learnt from Epiphanius, than from this paper. Of them this is ſufficiently known, that perſwading themſelves, that they were the Children of God, they thought they might wallow in all filthineſs, and be no more polluted by it than the Sun-beams by the Dunghill on which they fall; And againſt that Doctrine of theirs it is that ſome interpret that of Saint John [that he which is born of God, cannot ſin becauſe he is born of God] i. e. cannot ſin upon that head or ſcore, to ſignifie that their being born of God can be no patent or ſecurity for their ſinning.

As for the Nicolaitans which had their name from Nicolas the Deacon in the Acts, and their ſenſual practices from his example (as might appear by the vile paſſages that Saint Jerome and others relate of him) I ſhall not need to ſay more than what we find mentioned of them, Apoc. 2. as firſt, that their works were odious to God, ver. 6. then ſecondly, that it was a ſect of Doctrine among Chriſtians (as odious as it was) ver. 15. and 'twill not be unſeaſonable to pray, that God will keep all Sectaries from the like. Thirdly, that it was the ſame Doctrine that Balaam taught Balaak to bring the Iſraelites to a curſe, when nothing elſe could do it, ver. 14. and that Fourthly, not only ſpecified in the ſtory to be whoredom with the daughters of Moab, Num. 25. but in this place particularly mentioned φαγεῖν εἰδωλόθυτα, καὶ πορνεῦσαι, eating things offered to Idols, and fornication; it ſeems the former of thoſe, the Idol-feaſts, was wont to be previous and preparatory to the latter, (and Saint Hieromes relation of Nicolas witneſſeth the truth of the parallel) and therefore of the ſeven precepts of the Sons of Noah, mentioned in the Apoſtles Councel in the Acts, (required of all Proſelytes, that came in to Judaiſm, and ſo by way of compliance at that time, preſcribed to all the Gentiles that became Chriſtians) the two firſt were thoſe of abſtinence from meats offered to Idols, and from Fornication, Acts 15. 29. and the former of them, ver. 20. called ἀλισγήματα τῶν εἰδώλων, the pollutions or abominable villanies in thoſe Idol-worſhips, as in Heſychius ἀλισγήματα is expreſt by μεταλήψεις τῶν μιαρῶν θυσιῶν, participation of their abominable (or as he renders, μιαρῶν, ἀκαθάρτων) unclean ſacrifices, and the ſecond πορνεία fornication, being all one with the עֶרְוַת נִגְלוֹ עֲרָיוֹת de detectione nuditatum, all uncleanneſs in general, contains adultery, inceſt, and all unlawful luſts. And that will give an account why thoſe εἰδωλόθυτα ſhould be ſo forbidden in the Acts (it ſeems from that danger of unclean ſins ſo commonly annext to the Idol-feaſts, as will appear, Pſalm 106. 28. and Num. 25. 1, 3.) and yet be counted of, as perfectly indifferent things by Saint Paul, 1 Cor. 8. viz. being ſeparated from all danger of that unclean appendage. Fifthly, of theſe Nicolaitans works it is there added, that unleſs they be ſtraight reformed, God will come quickly upon that Church of Pergamus, verſe 16. and that coming ſignifies a fatal blow, which was not only ob-

[a] So διαφθορὰ in Ignatius his Epiſtle to the Epheſians is by the tranſlator rendred maſculorum concubitores (though the old literal rehearſer hath domus corruptores) & Heſychius in a more general gloſs διαφθορὰ, μοιχεία and ſo Phavorinus alſo; all clearly referring φθορὰ corruption, to this carnal ſin or villany, which in the Epiſtle of Barnabas [Edit. Voſſ. p. 230.] (who will beſt notify the ſence of the word in the New Teſtament) is expreſſed by παιδοφθορεῖσθαι according to the vulgar uſe of that word in other Authors.

ſervable to have faln upon the ſeven Nations, on Sodom, on moſt of the great Monarchies of the World, for the revenge of this provoking ſin, (Idolatry thus heightned with this addition of villany) but even more than one of thoſe ſeven Chriſtian Churches may be thought to have been involved in that guilt, and ruine; even this of Pergamus, and the next of Thyatira verſe 20. which ſin being deſcribed by Jezebel making her ſelf a Propheteſs, and teaching and ſeducing Chriſtians, πορνεῦσαι καὶ εἰδωλόθυτα φαγεῖν, to commit uncleanneſs, and to eat things offered to Idols, (in the ſence before-mentioned) and by βάθη Σατανᾶ, depths of Satan, verſe 24. ſhe is ſaid to have time given her for the reformation of this villany verſe 21. and not making uſe of it, to have been delivered up to deſtruction, verſe 22. And more might be added from the ſtories of the Church and practices of after times to this purpoſe, particularly that of the Illiberitane Council Can. 2. Flamines qui poſt fidem lavacri & regenerationis ſacrificaverunt, eo quod geminaverint ſcelera accedente homicidio, vel triplicaverint facinus cohærente mœchia, placuit —— where it ſeems thoſe heathen Sacrificers or Chriſtians that after baptiſm undertook the office of Flamen, lay under a treble guilt, beſide that of ſacrificing, were guilty of the bloud-ſhed (in the Gladiators prizes, which were alſo joined ordinarily with the heathen Sacrifices) and of thoſe uncleanneſſes alſo which were joined with them. But no more of this.

Sect. 35. And this I have ſaid, and might add much more, to clear this truth, that there were ſuch Idols for new converts to take heed of, in thoſe days, ſuch carnal Goſpellers, that retained that part of the Heathen Idolatries, which fleſh and bloud was moſt apt to be taken with, when the worſhipping of Images was caſt out. And if that villainous piece of Heatheniſm, which (by Gods deſertion, and that thick long darkneſs, wherein they lived) lay, before the coming of Chriſt, as an hideous ſin at once and judgment on thoſe barbarous times, cannot yet (by 1600 years of full light, and by all Chriſt's precepts for all kind of purity of the very heart) be exorcized or mortified among us, and if ſtill our Ears are open to every ſect of hypocritical profeſſors, though never ſo wild and ignorant, that brings any liberty, or proffer of carnality along with it, then ſure is the title of Chriſtian but ill beſtowed on us, we are ſtill the groſſeſt Idolaters in the World; and ſo are in all reaſon to expect the moſt exemplary puniſhments, which fell on them, be it the portion of Sodom, a judgment rained down immediately, a kind of fire and brimſtone from Heaven, (ſuch are our ſtrange, groundleſs, irrational deſtructions wrought upon one another at this time, which no man living can tell from whence they came; which is a ſure argument that there is ſomewhat of the θεῖον in it, either as that ſignifies the divine hand of God, viſible in the judgment, or as θεῖον ſignifies alſo that * brimſtone-fire that comes with thunder) or be it the judgment that fell upon the † Nations for thoſe villanies, a πανωλεθρία, or final deſtruction of a prophane polluted people.

* Θεὸς ἔλιπτο, τὸ κεραυνίω πυρὶ. ὁμοίως δὲ ἔχει ὁ κεραυνὸς τὸ θεῖον. Heſych. † So in the Sibyl. Orac. l. 3. where that mention is premiſed of the unnatural ſins of the Romans, p. 231. it follows in the next words, ᾗ ἔσται ἅμασι κοίτοις Θλῖψις ἐν ἀνθρώποις μεγάλη, ᾗ πάντα ταράξει, Πάντα δὲ συγχύσει ——

Sect. 36. Having gone thus far in our inqueſt on occaſion of the origination and uſe of the word Idolatry, eſpecially in the Old and New Teſtament, and found ſomewhat meant by it in the New, which is not ſo vulgarly taken notice of, I ſhall deſire to prevent a miſtake, and do therefore profeſs not to have deſigned theſe obſervations to that end, that the ſin of Idolatry ſo declaimed at in the Scripture, ſhould be thought to ſignifie nothing elſe, but thoſe acts of villany in the Heathen myſteries, or becauſe the worſhipping of Images is not ſo frequently ſpoken of in the New Teſtament, and therefore it ſhould be no ſin now under the Goſpel. That it is a groſs and provoking ſin in them that are guilty of it, there is no queſtion, and the affirmation of Text is clear, that there is no communication, or reconcileableneſs betwixt the Temple of God and Idols, 2 Cor. 6. 16. and that the guilt of that ſin among the Nations, worſhipping thoſe ſenſleſs Deities, was ſo great, that it provoked God by way of juſt puniſhment to deliver them up to thoſe infamous vile affections, Rom. 1.

Sect. 37. I ſhall now therefore proceed from the more critical to the real material part of the Diſcourſe, and enquire into the nature of that ſin, meerly as 'tis a worſhip of Idols, or Images. In which matter you may firſt obſerve ſome conſiderable difference between the two ſorts of reſemblances, which have been uſual among men. Some exſtantes, corporeal figures, ſtanding out, γλυπτὰ, ſtatues, graven images; others only repreſentations, or pictures, painted on Windows, Tables, Chalices, &c. The former of theſe were moſt uſed by (becauſe fitteſt for the turns of) the Heathens, being by them (through the commodiouſneſs and advantage of their bodily ſhapes) conceived to be more capable of animation by thoſe Gods of which they were the reſemblances. Thus is it the known divinity of * Triſmegiſtus (or ſome body in his diſguiſe) that Statues or Simulachra were the bodies of their Gods, who by ſome magical ceremonies of conſecration (whence it ſeems to be that Gal. 5. Apoc. 11. 8. and 22. 15. φαρμακοὶ ſorceries are joined with idolatries) were forced to † join themſelves to them, to animate them, to aſſume, and inhabit thoſe earthen bodies as it were. To which phancy perhaps the Apoſtle may relate, when he tells the Chriſtians that their bodies are the Temples of the Holy Ghoſt, that God is powerfully in them, though not in thoſe dumb Images. || Proclus relates it as their opinion generally, that the Gods were by their favour and help preſent in their images, and thereon is grounded the old relation of the Tyrians, who on a fear that Apollo would forſake them, bound his Image faſt with golden Chains, and that other of the Athenians who clipt the wings of the image of Victory that ſhe might not fly away from them. And ſo the Sicilians in * Cicero complaining that they had no Gods in their Iſle, give this reaſon for it, that Verres had taken away all their Statues. And ſo the Idol thus raiſed above its natural pitch by bringing down ſome æthereal ſpirit into it, (viz. the God whoſe Image it was) became a God in their opinion, and that was thought able to hear, ſee, ſpeak, help, do any thing that belonged to a Deity. Thus doth Nero in Suetonius pretend to know things to come by the inſtruction of ſuch an icuncula or little image. So Triſmegiſtus tells us of ſpeaking Images, and Hiſtorians the like of Memnon's Statues, and ſo Laban's Teraphim, being ſuppoſed to have had a ſpirit included in them, went for Laban's Gods. And 'tis not improbable by the Text that the Iſraelites Calf was by them thus counted of, as an Image, which upon Aarons conſecration was thus animated by God, and ſo fit to go before them, to be their Conductor in Moſes abſence, whom they knew to be moved and directed by God.

'Tis

'Tis clear this Calf, these Gods as they call them, were by them desired to supply Moses place, and though the conjecture be not improbable, that the figure of it was the same with the figure of a Cherub (which God after appointed to be in the Tabernacle, Exod. 25. 18. and of which 'tis possible Aaron might then have some intimation) as may appear by comparing Ezec. 1. 10. with c. 10. 14. where that which is the face of an Oxe, or Calf in one place, is the face of a Cherub in the other, and the ground of this resemblance in reference to Joseph's providing for the Ægyptians, and also for his father and brethren in the famine (whereupon his scutcheon is said to be an Oxe, agreeable to that prophecy of him, Deut. 33. 17. his glory is like the firstling of a bullock, as Minutius for his care of feeding the Souldiers in a dearth was honoured by the Romans with a golden Oxe, Liv. l. 4. and as Suidas relates of King Apis that he fed the Alexandrians in a famine, and therefore was honoured * after death with a Temple and an Ox in it) yet was this image worship'd by them (as appears by their sacrifical feast and celebration) and so used just as the Ægyptian Idols, which were accounted as so many Gods. And therefore the question which is ordinarily made, [whether the Israelites worship'd this Calf, or only God in this Calf] may well enough be superseded, and the resolution be sufficiently clear, that they worship'd not God only, but the Idol-calf also, (and so I am sure their successors have conceived, which talk so much of a grain of the Calf in every judgment they have suffered ever since) and so doted upon the specious Idol, and were transported with their sensual way of worshipping it, that God was quickly almost lost, and forgotten amongst them, their heart going back into Ægypt, where such like Images had been in fashion, and werewont to be worshipped. Sect. 38.

* τελειότητικόν τι αὐτῷ νεῖον ἀνέστησαν ἐν ᾧ βοῦς εἰδώλιον σύμβολον φέρων τῆς γεωργῆς.

What is now said of this will belong also to the erection of Jeroboams Calves; of which though it may not be improbable, that they also were the imitation of the Images of the Cherubim, in the Temple, and so the sin of setting them up in Dan and Bethel, an act of Schism, designed on purpose by Jeroboam to keep open the great division in the State, 1 Kings 12. 26. yet was it not the guilt of Schism alone, to which it was lyable, (as † Moncæus hath laboured to perswade) but having an addition of sacrificing to those Calves also, ver. 32. and the Proclamation of [Behold thy God, O Israel, which brought thee out of the Land of Ægypt] ver. 28. (which intimates them to be set out by him to the people for so many animated inspirited images) and the words of Tobit being plain τῷ βάαλ τῇ Σαμάλει (as the more correct Editions read it, (not τῷ βάαλ τῇ Σαμάλει) and as St. Jeromes paraphrase [ad vitulos aureos quos Jeroboam] confirms the antiquity of that reading) they sacrificed to the Calf or Heifer Baal, i. e. to Baal, who had taken upon him that shape and name, or to that Calf now inspirited with the inhabitation, and so called by the name of a God or Baal; there is no question, but the guilt of Idolatry belonged to it, and that the divine censure, and character of Jeroboams sin (that stuck so close to his posterity) importeth also. Sect. 39.

The other pictures which are called dimissa, depressa, a plain painting on a table, &c. without any protuberancy, or bunching out, were not by the Gentiles thought so capable of receiving that animation. The distinction is Maimons; The first he calleth הצורה בולטת the protuberant Image, the other משוקעת the depresse, either drawn on a table in colours, saith he, or weaved in hangings. The former of these and not the latter, was it which was so strictly forbidden the Jews (and accounted as a neutheion of polytheism, a token of the worshipping of many Gods (a discriminative note between the worshippers of the one true, and the many false Deities) because of that Heathen opinion, that such statues, or protuberant pictures were by magick made capable of these æthereal spirits; an abuse, of which the depress pictures were not so capable. And hence it is (not without reason) that learned men that conceive the second Commandment to prohibit none but the former (peculiarly the graven image) and to that purpose read that which follows, by way of explication, not of disjunction [graven image, the likeness] &c. (as it is Deut. 5. 8. in the Hebrew, not [or the likeness] do extend it even to the making, or having any such, and not only to the worshipping of them. Sect. 40.

Thus, saith ‖ Maimon, it is forbidden to make images, though it be only לנוי for ornament; but then that, saith he, is to be understood of the images, that bunch out, or are embossed; but for the painted or woven אלו מיתרות they are not unlawful: and he specifies very nicely that a Ring that hath for a seal the figure of a Man, if it be gibbous, or swelling out, is not it self lawful to be worn, but yet 'tis lawful to seal with it, because the impression, in that case, is hollow, not swelling out; and on the other side if the seal be depress, or hollow, 'tis lawful to wear, but not to seal with it, c. 3. Sect. 13. 'Tis true this he restrains again, that none (in this matter only for ornament) is forbidden, but the figure of a man, but others in obedience to the words of the second Command, extend it to the prohibition of all living creatures also, (only the inanimate, such was the Golden Vine in the Temple, were excepted.) And truly it seemeth very probable, that to the Jews it was (whether by the force of the second Commandment, or by some precept elsewhere, or by the Traditions of the Elders I say not) conceived utterly unlawful to have any such images, especially in their temples, or places of worship (unless in case of Gods particular command, as the Cherubim, and the brazen Serpent) yea and to bow in their presence in any place; For this will Maimons stating the several cases convince to have been his opinion, and, as he conceived, the constant doctrine of the Jews. I am sure they are appointed to be broken down, Exod. 34. 13. and examples there are of the peoples practice that way, both in the story of Herod's trophaes, and the Eagle set up by him over the gate of the Temple, and in many other particulars. And the Greek Church at this day, though it hath pictures good store, yet I think it hath none of these embossed Statues allowed in it, (which yet the Lutherans use promiscuously, yea and cloth and adorn them too, and conceive not themselves to sin against any Commandment of the Law, because they do not worship them. Sect. 41. ‖ Cap. 3. 12.

The reason of this prohibition to the Jews, is by Maimonides again cleared to be, not for any natural primitive sinfulness in an image of a man, &c. but only for caution, and therefore within the veil whither the eyes of the people were not permitted to enter, God himself appoints the Cherubims to be set up, and Solomon graved Cherubims upon the walls of the greater house, 2 Chron. 3. 7. (i. e. in the body of the Temple I conceive, because none but the Priests did come in thither, Luke 1. 8, 9.) to hedge and keep them from all danger of falling into the Heathen worships, and upon the obligation of the words of that Text, Exod. 34. 12. beware, &c. lest it be a snare unto thee. Sect. 42.

Sect. 43. And therefore 'tis farther reſolved, that all thoſe Images were unlawful to them, (and perhaps none but thoſe,) which Idolaters uſed in their worſhip; and ſo the ſpecifying of the three ſorts in the Commandment may argue, [the things in Heaven, in Earth, in the Waters] from each of which the ſeveral follies of men had fetcht their Deities. To inſtance only in the laſt and loweſt of them, that the Crocodiles in the the River were ſo accounted of among the Egyptians is clear (among many other) by one notable relation in Max. Tyr. διαλ. λθ.: There was a woman, ſaith he, in Ægypt that nurſt up a young Crocodile, and was counted a mighty happy perſon ὡς τιθηνησαμένη θεὸν, as one that had brought her God to hand, and kept it tame by her; this woman, ſaith he, had a Son ἡλικιώτην θεοῦ, of the age of the God, and when they grew up to ſome bigneſs, the Crocodile killed and devoured the child, ἥδε δύσηνος ἐμακάριζε τὸν υἱὸν τῷ θανάτῳ, ὡς γενόμενον δῶρον ἐφετὸν θεῷ, ſhe in her mourning for her Son pronounced him bleſt, in his death, that he was thus offered a preſent to her domeſtick God. And they which could worſhip ſuch wild vulture Gods could not much be blamed, if they defiled every Onion in the Garden, much more every ſtar in the Sky, which ſure deſerved their acknowledgment much better than the vulture of the ſea the Crocodile had done.

Sect. 44. Agreeable to this interdict of Caution among the Jews (extended only to thoſe Images which were ſo abuſed by the Heathens) is the deſign of thoſe Homilies in our Book, concerning the peril of Idolatry,

* P. 20. l. 1. † P. 27. near the end. which though they acknowledge that * images be of themſelves things indifferent, and that † men are not ſo ready to worſhip a picture on a wall, or in a window, as an emboſſed and guilt image ſet with pearl and ſtone, and profeſs (in the beginning of the third part of the Homily) that all which is ſaid, is thus meant, [in that we be ſtirred and provoked by images to worſhip them, and not as though they were ſimply forbidden by the New Teſtament, without ſuch occaſion and danger] and count it a piece of Superſtition and ſcrupuloſity to abhor all pictures, or images of Princes, &c. which, ſaith that Homily, Chriſt ſaw on the Roman Coins and reprehended them not, nor condemned the art of painting and image making as wicked of themſelves, p. 44. yet, in reſpect of the frequency of that ſin in thoſe times, of the ſo imminent danger that images in Churches would be worſhipped, and all poſſible means would not be probable to ſecure the uſe of them againſt that danger, they do with great earneſtneſs exhort the not ſetting them up, eſpecially in Countrey Churches, where the number of the ignorant may much enhaunſe that danger; and it may be obſerved that in the Articles of our Church we make acknowledgment of that whole Book of Homilies, that they were uſeful and profitable for thoſe times, wherein (being ſo lately gotten out of Popery where image worſhip was ſo ordinary) the danger was ſo great of falling back, upon every temptation, to that ſin. And though the Homilies be wary and careful to prevent another contrary danger, leſt any private perſons under colour of deſtroying images ſhould make any ſtir or diſturbance in ‖ P. 18. l. 2. the Common-wealth, and therefore addeth ‖ that it muſt always be remembred that the redreſs of ſuch publick enormities pertaineth to the Magiſtrate, and ſuch as be in authority only, and not to private perſons, yet to thoſe whoſe duty it is to take care for the people that they be Godly as well as quietly governed, the exhortation is very inſtantly preſſed, that (after the pattern of Hezekiah, &c.) they perform this part of their duty, viz. that as Hezekiah did in the caſe of the brazen Serpent, ſo the Magiſtrate whenſoever he ſees Images to be abuſed, or the people apt to worſhip them, think himſelf obliged in conſcience to appoint them to be removed in care of the honour of God, and the peoples good. And this is certainly very good, and wholeſom doctrine, and nothing more reaſonable, than that he which is Defender of the Faith, ſhould take care to defend the impotent ſeducible weakling (I mean not the rayler at images, who ſure is of all others the ſafeſt from that danger of worſhipping them, and conſequently diſclaims any want of that fatherly caution) from ſuch imminent peril (when any ſuch there is) of this image-worſhip. And that this is the Supreme Magiſtrates charge, and belongs not to any inferiour, farther than to execute what he commands, might be evidenced from the Doctrine and cenſures of the Church, in the caſe of the iconoclaſtæ, if it were now pertinent. To this I ſhall only add (that which I conceive other mens experience of themſelves, will incline them to believe) that the worſhip of Images or of any thing but God, is not a thing to which Engliſh Proteſtants for theſe late years (eſpecially the Catechiz'd and knowing) have generally had any ſtrong temptations, at leaſt not ſuch in any compariſon, as immediately after the reformation, the minds of men (before uſed to ſuch ignorant vanities) were ſubject to. And I doubt not but many men that have frequented Churches and places where pictures have been, can ſincerely upon examination of their memories, ſay with me, that they are not conſcious to themſelves, that they ever found themſelves under any inclination or danger of falling into any act of image-worſhip. Which conſideration, if it be true, (as I cannot but perſwade my ſelf it is) will take off much from the neceſſity of continuing thoſe ſtrict cautions (of not permitting any kind of Image in any Church, and the like) which ſome other times or inclinations of men might make more neceſſary, and conſequently take off much from the odium which the way of adorning ſome Churches with imagery hath lately lain under.

Sect. 25. What was ſaid of having emboſſed Images among the Jews may be enlarged alſo to bodily geſtures, whether religious to God, or civil to our ſuperiours, in any place where Images are; for both theſe ſeem to have been interdicted the Jews, at leaſt by them to have been accounted unlawful (as will at large appear by Maimonides in the Book forecited) though the heart were never ſo far from worſhipping the Images. But then though the Jews were under that ſtrict reſtraint, yet aliens, proſelytes, of other Nations, were not bound to that ſtrictneſs; but Naaman is permitted by the Prophet to go with his Heathen Maſter into the houſe of Rimmon, and (when the Maſter worſhips there, and leans upon his hand) to bow himſelf in the houſe of Rimmon, 2 Kings 5. 18. upon this ground, firſt, that he never went into the Idol-temple, but to wait upon his Maſter in the office which he had. Secondly, that he profeſt himſelf to all, (even to that Heathen Maſter and thoſe that were in his Court) to be a worſhipper of none, but of the true God, and to that end carried two Mule-loads of earth out of Paleſtine with him, ver. 17. in honour of him whoſe name was great there, and to build an Altar, according to the preſcript Exod. 20. 24. by which it was ſufficiently clear to the beholders, (as by an interpretative proteſtation) that, when his Maſter worſhipt, he only bowed, and then his bowing was only civil to his Maſter the King, not religious to Rimmon or Saturn, or his Image there; And therefore to his queſtion whether God will be offended with him in that matter, the Prophet anſwers him with a [go in peace,] peace,] I cannot think ſo irreverently of the Prophet, as that he ſhould make that anſwer ironically to his new convert (any more than I can believe Naamans ſcruple belonged only to the former part of his life (reading it in the preter ſence) for ſure that had been guilty of the worſhipping the Idol, and not only bowing in the houſe of Rimmon) but that he meant in earneſt, what alone the words import, that in thus doing, and no more, he need not fear that he ſhould be a breaker of that Law, which in this particular was not given to him, or any, but thoſe of that Nation, or people of the Jews; For, it is an ordinary obſervation, that Gentiles, or Aliens were received in among the Jews under a double capacity, either as Proſelytes of Juſtice, to ſubmit to the whole Judaical Law, to every rite, and poſitive precept of it; or elſe only as Proſelytes of the Gates (and ſuch was Naaman) to ſubmit to the ſeven precepts of the Sons of Adam and Noah (and no more) among which the עבירה זרה of the ſtrange worſhip, or Idolatry was one, and ſo a neceſſity impoſed on them of caſting off the Idol-worſhip, but not of not bowing to the King in the preſence of an Idol, unleſs the caſe were of ſuch a geſture that in that Nation were performed to none but the deity in worſhip (the reaſon that the Grecians refuſed once to bow to the Perſian King, becauſe that reverence was there performed to none but God: and ſo that ſpeech of Mordecai, Eſth. 13. 14. making the cauſe of his not bowing to Haman to be becauſe he was not to bow to any but God, is thought by learned men to have been delivered by way of complyance and reference to the Gentile cuſtoms which allowed not thoſe bowings which were performed to their Gods, to be communicated to any elſe; for among the Jews the moſt ſubmiſs geſture was performed to Kings and inferiour perſons, as well as unto God) which was not the manner then in Syria, but veneration and even proſtration paid to the King as well as to God. Thus much I have ſaid on occaſion of the firſt ſort of Images, the emboſſed and protuberant among the Jews, and ſhall not need to deſcend to a more particular ſurvey of the ſecond ſort, it being already manifeſt that the reaſon that prevailed to prohibit the very having the former among the Jews, did not even in their opinion extend unto the latter. And for worſhipping, though the latter were not among them ſo likely to occaſion that ſin, yet if any Jew ſhould have been ſo mad to worſhip any ſuch image, the ſin, it is acknowledged, would have been as great, as that which was committed with the groſſer corporeous object, and ſo will it hold infallibly among all others.

Thus far I have gone on the antient old Teſtament notion of an Idol, and the Idolatry forbidden there. It may now be fit to proceed one ſtep farther, and to enquire whether there may not poſſibly be in the Chriſtian Church ſuch a ſin as Idolatry, i. e. whether he that acknowledges the Chriſtians God, and worſhips no Heathen Deity, much leſs Image of ſuch, may not yet poſſibly fall into that ſin of Idolatry, as that ſignifies worſhipping ſomewhat elſe beſide the inviſible God, be it an image of God, or elſe a Saint, or Angel, or ſomewhat elſe clothed in ſome reſpect or relation to God. Sect. 46.

And here will be no neceſſity or uſe of drawing a formal charge (in this matter) againſt any particular man or Church, or poſſibility of defining (from Books eſpecially) which (or whether any whole) Church or ſort of Chriſtians at this day are guilty of this ſin, becauſe it is to be expected that the writings of prudent men will be ſo cautious, as not to accuſe themſelves in this matter; as even now I gave you an example from Maximus Tyrius a Platonick Heathen, in the deſcription of it among the Gentiles. Yet becauſe * ſome number of ſober men which have lived in the Roman Communion have given me occaſion, I ſhall interpoſe my wiſh, that the care which by their Writers is taken for excuſe of the doctrine of the Learned, were uſed for the directing and examining of the practices of the ignorant alſo. Sect. 47.

* Divos, diváſq; non aliter venerantur quàm Deum ipſum, &c. Lud. Viv. in Aug. de civ. l. 8. c. ult. vid. Caſſandr. conſult. de imag. Polyd. Virgil. de rerum invent. l. 6. c. 13.

I ſhall therefore ſet down in theſi what may, according to the grounds laid in the former part of this Diſcourſe, conclude a Chriſtian guilty of Idolatry, and leave every man's own conſcience (and among all others the Romaniſts) to examine, and as occaſion ſhall be, to accuſe himſelf, and ever Chriſtian to adviſe and exhort (but withal to abſtain as much as is poſſible from judging) other men. Sect. 48.

And firſt, I conceive that he that (by Doctrine, and action) attributes to any creature, particularly to an Angel, thoſe things which belong peculiarly to God, though he acknowledge the true God, is yet guilty of that ſin, as truly as thoſe Heathens that worſhip'd the creature παρὰ τὸ κτίσαντα, beſide the Creator, Rom. 1. i. e. worſhipt God, but not God only. Thus the Arians were condemned of Idolatry, that affirming Chriſt to be a creature and not God incarnate, they did yet beſtow divine honour on him, and ſo Neſtorius in like manner, and his followers, ſtiled ἀνθρωπολάτρας man-worſhippers, and both theſe ſentences confirmed by the ſecond Council of Nice, which is thought ſo favourable to Images.) As for example. Sect. 49. Athanaſ. con. Arr. or 1. Eph. Concil. c. 67.

To attribute to the Angels omniſcience, omnipotence, &c. i. e. that the Angels can freely underſtand all mens prayers, and as freely grant them their wants, is, I conceive, a piece of Idolatry. [Freely] I ſay, and I mean by the word [Freely] their doing it by their own original power, and not only by God's revealing the one to them, or by giving them power to do the other. As for him, that ſuppoſes the Angels to know all things which God pleaſes to reveal to them, by looking upon God as on a voluntary glaſs (as Biel ſets it) and withal believes, that God reveals all things to them ſo, and that thereupon they know by that means whatſoever any man ſaith to them at any diſtance; Or again, for him that conceives them to ſee all things in the World by ſeeing God's face, and looking on it as in a natural Glaſs, that reveals all that God knows without any choice, or act of his Will (as ſome others ſet it,) theſe may be very erroneous, yea and (if they teach them for doctrines) be guilty of ſin, in that (but ſpeculative) miſtaking, namely the ſin of dogmatizing, of affirming for matter of Faith, that for which they have no ground of Scripture, or evidence (which I conceive to be the fault charged on ſuch, Coloſſ. 2. in the phraſe ἃ μὴ ἑώρακεν ἐμβατεύων, undertaking to penetrate, or know what men know nothing of, εἰκῇ φυσιούμενος ὑπὸ τοῦ νοὸς τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ, vainly puff'd up with the thoughts of their own fleſh, their own reaſon, or phanſie, fictions of men, (Gnoſticks, &c.) without any revelation from God.) Yet can I not ſay, that theſe are Idolaters by ſo conceiving, or thinking, or affirming, by imagining theſe vain or falſe things, if they go no farther: (as they that came into the εἰδωλεῖον, into the preſence of Images, but worſhip'd them not.) But then if they add practice to conceit, worſhipping thoſe whom they Sect. 50.

have elevated to that pitch, build Altars, make offices, pray to them, especially in the house (or in the time of the service) of God, they do by this action, add a greater aggravation to the speculative sin, and, for ought I know, fall into a kind of Idol-worship, phansying Angels to be what they are not, and then paying them that adoration which is due only to God; at least they fall into a prohibited act, by neglecting the only Christian course of making our addresses only by Christ to God, which I conceive is the meaning of μὴ τις καταβραβευέτω ὑμᾶς, Col 2. 18. Let no man deprive you of that Christian bravium, or prize,] the peculiarity of the priviledge of coming unto God by Christ only. The same will be said of offering sacrifice, incense, or the like unto them (acts of worship and so peculiar to God) making vows or swearing by them, asking grace, pardon of sins, or salvation of them.

Sect. 51. As for the * Angelici in the Primitive Church who conceived that nothing was to be asked of God but what was by the Petitioner committed first to one Angel, then from him to another, and so by those many degrees brought to God, this may be thought a first rise of the sin of Angel-worship, somewhat parallel to that, which we gave you from Maimonides of the Heathen Idolatry.

* Vid. Concil. Laod. can. 35. p. 352. & Zonar in can. istum, & Justel. in Cod. Eccl. univers. p. 261.

Sect. 52. What hath now been said, must be taken with some caution, and 'tis this, that to bow to an Angel appearing to any man, (which civility we pay to any superiour) would not come under this censure. A consideration which hath made some wise men think that the Angels refusing of worship at Saint Johns hands in the Revelation, cap. 19. 10. was not the rejecting it as an act of Idolatry (or any kind of sin if it had been accepted) but as an evidence of the Angel's acknowledging himself Johns fellow-servant (the reason which is there rendred in the Text) and so not superiour to him in that office. But to this it may be said, that the Angels admonition [worship God] that follows, may possibly argue that John took the Angel for God appearing, and accordingly worship'd him, and therefore I shall not define. But then still for any other reverence or bowing, but that of divine adoration, there is no question but it may be performed to a man, when we meet him, and then much more unto an Angel; And that any gestnre of reverence shall pass for divine adoration, will, I conceive, be only in the power of God, and each mans own soul to define, the same outward act being (without any danger) performable both to Man and God, and nothing but the intention of the person making the difference. Much less will the worshipping of God, when an Angel appears to us, (as supposing God to be peculiarly present where those his Satellites or Courtiers appear) come under that charge,, nor consequently doing it in the Church (peculiarly at the first † entrance into that holy place) where the Angels are supposed to be present (the Angels singing with us, saith Chrysostom, and Angelus Orationis, saith Tertullian, and the presence of whom in the Church is used by Saint Paul, as an argument for the decent behaviour of Women in that place) as Jacob at the appearing of the Angels both put off his shoes from his feet, and resolved that God was in that place; and that it was no other but the house of God, or gate of Heaven, Gen. 28. 17. and Moses in like manner put off his shoes from his feet, Exod. 3. 5.

† Vid. View of the New Directory.

Sect. 53. Nor will it be the sin of Idolatry to beseech that Angel, (in case he appear to me) to join with me, or help me, or to commend my wants to God in his Prayers, any more than it will be, to request the like favour of any fellow-Christian upon Earth. The Idolatry is either in the heart, the giving him a free unlimited power, or in the actions praying to him, as supposing he had such power, and not the bare observing (and reverencing accordingly) his created power or dignity, held from God by way of dignation, or desiring him, (when he comes within my reach) to discharge any office of charity to me.

Sect. 54. The same may be said again of the Saints in Heaven, that the beseeching them to bestow mercies upon me, the putting up those Petitions to the blessed Virgin, &c. which are terminated in her self (as many Forms, if not her whole Office may appear to be) are, over and above the errour of thinking her able to relieve when she is not, acts parallel to that old Idolatry also; And the thinking them to come to the knowledge of our prayers in speculo again, is a presumption in a matter of which Scripture hath told us nothing, and so may fall under the forementioned accusation.

Sect. 55. Yet so again, that if it were sure to any, that any Saint doth hear his demands, it were certainly no fault to beg that favour of him, which were in his free power to bestow, and which we ordinarily demand of one another, i. e. the joining with, or for us, assisting and reinforcing our prayers to God. And supposing that they do not hear or understand what he saith, yet what guilt shall lye on him that thinks they do, and speaks accordingly to them, I omit now to define, because it is not to my present purpose, which was only to enquire what is Idolatry, not Folly, what Worshipping or praying for help, to that which is not God, not speaking to them to pray for us which cannot hear.

Sect 56. Next for images either of God, or Christ, or Angels, or Saints, many particulars may be resolved and avowed from the principles of discourse already laid, 1. That to conceive them able to hear and help by virtue of him, whose image they are, is a spice of that heathen doctrine of [Images being the bodies of the Gods] (of their being animated by those whose images they were) which had among them its foundation in sorcery, and then was the ground of idol-worship; and it were happy if some * ignorant Christians in some places, were not either willingly betrayed to, or uncharitably kept in this barbarous rudeness. So again will it be, 2. to pray to, or to bestow any act of divine worship on any such Image in any respect; For that supposes, and is built on the former conceit, and so a worshipping of that which is not God; and what is that but Idolatry? I say in any respect, and I mean with any distinction of mediante imagine, or relativè, &c. For first it is an unreasonable thing for them, to whom the Law is given, to make a distinction by which it may in some sence be lawful not to keep it, such distinctions must be made by the law-giver, or else they are not safe. 2. Although it be to God also, mediante imagine, i. e. first fastning my act of worship upon the Image, as the next or immediate object, and then mediately on God, this is clearly to worship the Image, though not the Image, alone, and that must be Image-worship, or 2. Though it be only relativè to the Image in relation to God, whose Image it is, this is again worshipping that Image, though not that Image only, and that will not rescue the worshipping of an Image from the censure of image-worship, any more than the affirming Faith to justifie instrumentaliter relativè, is not the affirming it to justifie.

* Non video in multis quod discrimen sit inter eorum opinionem de sanctis & id quod Gentiles putabant de diis suis. Lud. Vives in Aug. de civ. l. 8. c. ult.

As

As for the difference betwixt Image-worſhip, and Idolatry, or Idol-worſhip, if any ſuch be pretended from the difference between imago and idolum, it will not be worth our pains to examine it, becauſe the worſhipping of any thing which is not God, be it Image or Idol, Chriſtian or heathen ſimilitude, or any thing elſe, will fall under the guilt which now we ſpeak of. Sect. 57.

But then thirdly on the other ſide to worſhip God (and none but God) in a Church where Images are (without ſo much as fixing the Eye on them in the act of adoration) to uſe an Image only for ornament (in a Kingdom where Image-work-hangings and Pictures do paſs for the nobleſt way of adorning thoſe places which we moſt prize) to pray or to bow down to God (and to him only) in a Church where ſuch repreſentations are ſet up (for beauty, or as an indifferent thing) without any the moſt inferiour degree of worſhip to them, (nay with a proteſtation of renouncing and deteſting it) cannot be affirmed Idolatry, without either affirming God to be an Idol, or elſe [not worſhipping] to be [worſhipping] nor indeed be liable to any guilt, unleſs it be in order to ſcandal, which how far it is to prevail, as we have already given an intimation, ſo the grounds of defining have ſufficiently been laid down in another diſcourſe. Sect. 58. Of Scandal.

And ſo for the reverend uſage of an Image, if it ſignify no more than the uſing it civilly for his ſake, or in remembrance of him whoſe ſuperſcription it bears, (as when * Alexander was wondered at by Parmenio, that meeting Jaddus the Jewiſh Prieſt καθάπερ τὶς ὑπηκόων πεσὼν προσκυνήσει, as if he had been one of his ſubjects he fell down and worſhipt him, his anſwer was fully ſatisfactory that he worſhipt not the Prieſt but the God whom that Prieſt honour'd, who had appeared to Alexander, and promiſed him ſucceſs againſt the Perſians) eſpecially if that be but a privative reverence, (a not uſing it vilely and contumeliouſly) or whatever may not come under the ſtile of a poſitive act of adoration, this is no part of religious worſhip, any more than the laying of a Bible on the Table, and not on the ground, &c. But if it be the actual beſtowing of worſhip on that inanimate thing, as on the next (though not laſt) object, I mean beſtowing that adoration on the Image (though in a lower degree) in one act, which in another is given to God, worſhipping the Image for Gods ſake (the relative worſhip) or God mediante imagine, ſo that the Image be either the object, or part of the object of any one act of worſhip, it will fall under the cenſure of Image-worſhip. Sect. 59. Euſeb. Chron. l. 1. ex Dexipp.
